To the Right Honorable Sir Wylliam Cecill Knight, principall Secretarij to the Queenes Maiesty, and of hir priuie Counsayle, Mayster of the Courtes of Wardes and Lyueries, and Chauncelour of the Vniuersitie of Cambridge: Richard Grafton Citezen of London, wysheth long health wyth encrease of honor.

OVBTLES, YOVR Honor and other maye marvayle, or paraduenture misslyke, that after so many bookes alreadie set forth, bearing the names and tytles of Chronicles of Englande, I should accomber the Readers superfluouslye wyth one mo of the same matter: Neuertheleße, the contentes of thys and the sayde other former bookes being compared, your wisedome can well discerne, and other shall easely perceyue, that this labor of mine was neyther altogether needeleße nor vnprofitable. For among so many writers, there hath yet none to my knowledge, publißhed any full, playne and meere Englißhe historie. For some of them of purpoße meaning to write short notes in maner of Annales, commonly called Abridgementes, rather touch the tymes when things were done, then declare the maner of the doyngs, leauing thereby some neceßitie of larger explication, and referring the desirous Reader to a further serch and study. Other haue dealt but with the reignes of a few kings, & yet therof haue made long bookes, with many tedious digreßions, obscure descriptions & friuolous dilatations: which forme of writing if it ſhould not be reformed, coulde not in the whole be folowed without peſtering the Reader with importable Volumes. Other haue intermyngled the affaires of other foreyne Nations with the matters of Englande, yea, euen where the one had no concurrencie or dependaunce of the other. Others, namely ſtraungers, as well in their bookes written purpoſely of England, as in diſcourſes enterlaced in their hiſtories of their awne Countries, and ſpecially concerning the actes of later times, both in matters of Religion and ciuill pollicie, partly folowing common reportes, and partly vſyng enuious conſtructions haue eyther by ignoraunce or malyce ſlaunderouſly written and erred from the manifeſt truth: ſo farre as to me ſeemeth a better worke could not be taken in hande, then that ſome learned Engliſhe man of good intelligence would by ſome ſpeciall worke, written in ſuch a language as other Nations might for the more part beſt vnderſtand, detect, and with plaine declaration of the truth, confute ſuch errors & vntruths as are written and ſcattred in foreyn ſtories concerning this realme: For ſome ſupply of all which defectes and errors conteyned in the ſaid former Chronicles of Englande, I haue to the beſt of my ſmall ſkill & with the vttermoſt of my diligence, gathered this booke, conteinyng a complete and whole hiſtory from the firſt entrie and habitation of the Britons in this Iſlande, vnto the firſt yere of the reigne of our ſoueraigne Lady Queene Elizabeth, preſently reigning. Large ynough (I truſt) without tediouſneſſe, ſhort ynough without darkneſſe, meerely and onely of Englande, not mingling the ſame with foreyne matters impertynent to oure ſtate, and finally true without miſreporting, ſo farre as the folowing of the beſt Authors & reporters & mine awne experience (hauing of long time ſeene and purpoſely noted much therof) could conceaue. And now hauing ended this worke, and seking to whom I might for testification of my speciall good will present it, or for patronage and defence dedicate it, and principally for all iudgement and correction to submit it: Among many I haue chosen your Mastership, moued therto by experience of your curteous iudgement towardes those that trauaile to any honest purpose, rather helping & comforting their weakneße, then condempning their simple (but yet well meanyng) endeuours. By which your accustomed good acceptation of others, I am the rather boldened to beseeche your Maistership to receaue this my worke and me, in such maner as you doe those, in whome (howsoeuer there be want of power) there wanteth no poynt of good will and seruiceable affection. Wherefore at this present, not meaning to trouble your Maistership with any farther tedious matter, my prayer shall be to God for your long prosperous estate with encrease of Gods grace, and so thereby to direct your trauayles in the seruice of the Queenes most excellent Maiestie, and the common weale of this Realme, as you may alwayes leaue to the posteritie happy and plentifull matter of worthy report.

To the gentle Reader.

AS I HAVE (WITH MY no little trauayle) collected this Hiſtory, which I name a Chronicle at large and mere Hiſtory of the affaires of Englande, for that the ſame is not intermixed with foreine affayres: ſo moſt gentle & louyng Reader, I beſeche thee take theſe my ſaid traueyles not only in good part, but alſo pardon the rudeneſſe of my ſtile & lack of learning which I acknowledge, or otherwiſe the ſame ſhould haue beene better furniſhed. But for ſome inſtruction to the better vnderſtanding of mine order obſerued in the diſcourſe of this Hiſtory: I thought beſt to admoniſh thee, that foraſmuch as this Iſland of Briteyn (whereof the greater part is now called England) had the ſame time of creatiō that al the reſt of the earth had: therfore I begin this booke at the creation of the world, and ſo continue the ſame with the bleſſed line and iſſue of Adam by Seth his ſonne, vnto our Sauiour Chriſt. And by the waye, when Brute, as by the teſtimonie of moſt auc̄thors, firſt entred this Iſland and named it Briteyne: there beginneth mine Hiſtory of this Realme, and from thence lyneally I proceede to the reignes of all ſuch as ſucceeded Brute in ſtate of kings, euen to the tyme of Wylliam the Conquerour, where I begin my ſecond volume, becauſe in the former parte (as maye at large appeere) thys Iſlande being firſt inhabited by Brute, was afterwarde conquered by the Romaynes, and then ſubdued and poſſeſſed by the Saxons, & laſtly by

by the Danes, and ſo was it neuer in perfect ſtate of gouernement, vntill the laſt conqueſt of the Normanes, from whence the Hiſtories of times doe more plentifully and plainely appeere. And in the diſcourſe of this Hiſtorie, folowing the common opinion of the deuiſion of this Iſlande in three partes made by Brute to hys three ſonnes, Locryne, Albanact and Camber, that is to ſay, of the part nowe called Englande vnto Locryne his eldeſt ſonne, and of that part nowe called Scotlande vnto Albanact his ſecond ſonne, and of that part nowe called Wales to Camber hys thirde ſonne, of whoſe name the ſame part is called to thys day in welſhe Cambry. Foraſmuch, I ſay, as before this deuiſion, this Iſland of Briteyn was but one entier Iſle, therefore profeſsing to write an Hiſtory of the Princes of this part, now called Englande: I thought it not meete vtterly to omit Scotland, being a part of this Iſle of Briteyn: And therfore in order as the Britones reigned, ſo I note alſo the ſucceſsion of the kings of Scotlande, wherein I doe not profeſſe to write of them any ſpeciall Hiſtorie, farther then they had to doe with the kings of this Realme, or the kinges with them, but with a briefe recytall of their kings names & time of their reignes to paſſe them ouer.

I haue alſo to admoniſhe you concerning the numbers that ſtande in the margent of this booke, from the creation of the worlde to the birth of Chriſt, hauing a lyne ſtryken betweene them. Thoſe numbers that are aboue the lyne, are the yeres of the worlde from the creation: And thoſe vnder the line, are the yeres before Chriſt. I haue alſo to admoniſhe you concerning the numbers that ſtande in the margent of this booke, from the creation of the worlde to the birth of Chriſt, hauing a lyne ſtryken betweene them. Thoſe numbers that are aboue the lyne, are the yeres of the worlde from the creation: And thoſe vnder the line, are the yeres before Chriſt. But after the comming of Chriſt, then the vppermoſt numbers are the yeres of Chriſt, and the nethermoſt thermoſt are the yeres of euery ſeuerall king; and ſo it continueth to the ende of the booke.

Here alſo I muſt aduertiſe you that in the computation of yeres, I folow the accompt of the Hebrues, the which I take to be moſt true, the which accompt, I haue at large ſet forth in the. 72. page of my firſt Volume.

Alſo in the ende of this booke, ye ſhall finde an exact table, wherein is expreſſed not onelye the reigne of euery king of this realme, ſithen the time that the City of London hath beene gouerned by Bailifes, Maiors and Shrifes, and the day and yere that they firſt entred into their ſeuerall reignes: but alſo the names of thoſe that then were and euer ſithence haue beene Maiors and Shirieſes of London, with the yeres, monethes and dayes of their entrie into their ſeuerall charge. Alſo I haue placed in this booke two ſeuerall Tables, the one in the ende of the firſt volume, and before the conqueſt, which I haue deuided into ſeuen parts, according to the vij. Ages of the world, as may at large appere in the. 72. page of the ſaid Volume as aforeſaid, & the other at the end of the ſecond and laſt volume, that is, from the conqueſt to the reigne of our Souereigne Ladye Queene Elizabeth, the which Tables ſerue for the readye fynding of anye name or ſpeciall matter conteyned in the ſayde booke, by the letter and order of the Alphabet.

And where I haue in the. xiij. yere of king Henry the firſt promiſed to place the maner & order that was firſt taken for the holding of the Parliament in the time of king Edwarde the thirde. I haue ſithen that time for ſundry good cauſes thought meete to omit the ſame, and therfore I admoniſhe the Reader not to looke for it.

And

And here to conclude moſt gentle Reader, I beſeeche thee louyngly and fauourablye to iudge and report of mee and my booke, to whoſe iudgement I moſt humbly ſubmit the ſame, and ſuch things as ſhall ſeeme to be a miſſe, or not ſo well penned and fully ſet foorth as by a learned and skilfull man the ſame might haue beene, either fauourably doe thy indeuour to amende the ſame, or elſe impute the fault to the diuerſitie and variance of Aucthors, among which differences, it ſhall be harde to trie the truth, and thus I bid thee farewell.

Richard Grafton.

FORASMVCH AS THE EXAMples of good and euill doinges, in thys that the one sort doe allure to good, the other doe fraye from euill, doe tende both to one good ende in well disposed mindes, it hath euer beene thought a beneficiall woorke to the societie of men to set forth in hystorie and true report, the doings and liues of men as they haue deserued. And though vertue of it selfe be of worthynesse ynough to be loued for it selfe, and in honest mindes free from vanitie, is to her selfe sufficient recompense, yet hath God for commoditie of mankinde planted in nature a prayse worthye affection to be well spoken of for doing well, and shame to beare infamy for doyng euill. Thys hath made vertue cõmended to encrease: This hath restreyned those from sinne, whom conscience coulde not: This hath holden men in order for feare of the sight of men, whome the feare of God that seeth all withheld not: This hath raysed men out of drowsie idlenesse, whome the sounde of Gods promises and threatnings awaked not: This, whereby is quickened endeuour to lyue after death, is the very proofe in nature, that mans minde confesseth and hopeth for immortality.

As true reporting therfore auayleth to the encrease of well doing, so good acceptation is profitable to the furtheraunce of the true reporters labour, and is the verie recompense that euerye honest trauayler in any good worke shall be sure to finde at the hands of euery one that feareth not to heere shame for his euill deedes.

And as it is reason that good be done to him that doth good to many, so where the author and gatherer of this woorke hath with his honest labors made the noble actes and good deseruings of many to liue in good memorie, so I thought it not reason, specially hauing among infinite other receaued commoditie by his labors, that his owne well doyngs should altogether dye in forgetfulnesse. I must therefore good Reader, to the intent to prouoke thy fauourable receauing and construyng of thys worke, put thee in remembraunce how manye wayes the great labors of this man susteyned with great charge and perilles, haue bene to vs profitable, that we be not to him vnthankfull. It hath suffised him to deserue well, it shall not suffise vs to receaue without receauing well, that is, to the encouragement of him and other to deserue well. That which he of modestie maye not vtter, we of honestie maye not hide. This therefore I am to affirme, because I knowe it, and the more assuredly to affirme becaus many moe knowe it, and most reasonably to allege becaus the whole Realme hath profite by it, that the man hath not spent one quarter of hys lyfe to his owne ease or commoditie, but as a good Citezen for the benefite of the Citie of London, as a good Englisheman for the profite of the Realme of Englande, and as a good Christian for the furtheraunce of true religion. The Bible in English, that vnvaluable Iewell, we haue by his trauayle, first with his charge and attendaunce procuring the translation thereof, then sundrie times copying the same out with his owne hande, thirdly printing it in Fraunce with his great expense and perill, when the rage of those holy fathers which then enuyed Christian men christianity, not only would not suffer it to be done in England, but also procured the same beyng printed to be attached in Fraunce & openly burned, himselfe hardly escaping with his life. Not discouraged herewith, but still caried with zeale to doe good, he attempted the woorke againe, and to Gods great praise and to the edification of Christes Church, performed it. Sithence that, how beneficiall he hath beene in furthering good wittes to learning, in setting learned wittes to working, becaus the rehearsall in particularitie cannot but haue some affinitie with exprobration, I leaue to their remembraunce that haue tasted of it, and shall be mooued in their conscience where it maye doe him good, to testifie it. But the

Citie

Citie of London may not forget, or forgetting may not be vntolde of it, or well remembring may not suppresse it, that moe maye be mooued by his example and their thankfulnesse, to be suche Citezens as he hath beene, how he hath trauayled in their affayres from time to time, as if anye priuate man among them had but a seruaunt or factor of such faythfulnesse, policie and painefulnesse, as he hath shewed himselfe for them all, it should not for shame be forgotten, I will not saye vnrecompensed. Who knoweth not his diligence in laboring for and attending on that noble worke of that most blessed Prince, King, yea saint, Edwarde the sixt, in erecting the Hospitalles? his labors and expences in ouerseing the same beyng erected, preferring it before all his awne businesse to his great hinderaunce? It is proueable ynough if any will be so past honest thankfulnesse to denie it. And nowe lastly, beside a number of good bookes by him published, he hath for the whole realme gathered thys Chronycle of Englande, wherein thou mayest readily see with small trauayle and coste that which heretofore scattered in manye woorkes was chargeable to get and troublesome to finde, beside very much that in none heretofore hath beene vttered.

In this he hath brought things vnknowne from darknesse, vntrue reportes from error, confusion of affayres from disorder, impertynent tediousnesse to reasonable proportion, and hath made a large, playne, true and meere historie of this Realme, wherby men may be certified of truth, the Reader may haue delitefull & profitable knowlege: our Countrie men and the subiects, but specially the princes therof, delyuered from slaunderous reportes of foreyne writers: Kings maye learne to depende vpon God, and acknowlege his gouernaunce in their protection: the nobilitie may reade the true honor of their auncestours: The Ecclesiasticall state maye learne to abhorre trayterous practises and indignities done against kings by the Popishe vsurping Clergie: high and lowe may shonne rebellions by their dreadfull effectes, and beware how they attempt against right, how vnhable soeuer the person be that beareth it: we all may be warned to thanke God for the most vertuous, wise and peaceable gouernement that we now enioye in comparison of terrible times heretofore: Eche man maye haue a glasse to see things past, whereby to iudge iustly of thinges present and wisely of things to come: To beholde the beautie of vertue and deformitie of vice: what sweetenesse remayneth after well doing, what stinges of repentaunce euill doing leaueth: Men of elder honor, maye learne not to deface their forefathers prayse: The newer sort maye seeke to bring light and dignitie to their houses: and finally all men in seing the course of Gods doings, may learne to dread his iudgementes and loue his prouidence: maye see how good doings be defended, euill doings and wrongs reuenged, bloud with bloud, violence with violence, iniuries with miseries, and so growe into an affection to geue to eache matter his right iudgement, to eche superiour his right duetie, to eche other that which iustice or charitie wylleth, and to all well doers, & among others to this setter forth of so many well doyngs, such thankfull acceptation as his whole life employed to common benefite hath deserued. Receaue it therfore good Reader so, as thy selfe maiest haue most benefite of it, and he may in his age thinke his youth well spent in doing good to London, Englande and Christianitie. And aboue all things forget not, to geue God thankes for the Queenes maiesties most gracious reigne, so farre in comparison exceeding the tymes that here thou readest of: And beseeche him long to preserue her, without or after whome there is great daunger and small hope: and specially let euery one endeuour for himselfe, not to moue God for our sinnes to cal her home from vs to him to hastily:

The first Age.

IN the beginning God made Heauen and Earth: and Moses the deuine Prophet and Historiographer (who was before the incarnation of Iesu Christ. 1569. yeres) sheweth vs howe that GOD deuided hys woorke of Creation into. vj. dayes. Moses. Creation of the World.

all the furnitures thereof, were created and made, God then of the ſlyme of the Earth made Man, that moſt excellent Creature vnto his awne likeneſſe, and ſimilitude, and breathed into him the breath of lyfe. Thus was Heauen and Earth finiſhed with all their Apparell in ſixe dayes, and the ſeuenth day God reſted from his labors and ſanctified the ſame, and commaunded it to be kept as his holy Sabaoth.

¶ After that GOD had created Man (as afore ſaide) he then gaue vnto him ſuch grace that without any inſtructions, but onely with the endowment of his originall righteouſneſſe, he was perfectly learned and ſeene in all the liberall Artes and Sciences. He was alſo endewed with the knowledge of all Herbes, Trees, Metalles, Stones, Birdes, Beaſtes, Fowles, Fiſhes, Wormes, and all other Creatures. Alſo God gaue vnto him power ouer all things that were vpon the Earth, and in the Sea, ſo that vnto all Beaſtes, Fiſhes, and Foules, he gaue a proper and conueniēt name according to their natures, euē in ſuch ſort as they are called at this day. Then was he brought by the Almightie Lorde into the pleaſant place of Paradiſe replenished wyth all delights and pleaſures, the felicitie of which place Saint Auguſtine doth deſcribe in this maner.

S. Auguſtin

Paradiſe

Man lyued in Paradiſe as he would, ſo long as he willed that God commaunded, he lyued hauing the fruition of God, of whome came his godneſſe, he lyued wanting nothing. Hauing in his power withall, ſo to lyue continually. Meate was euer ready and at hand bicauſe he ſhould not be hungry, and drinke for that he ſhould not thruſt: and the tree of lyfe, that age ſhoulde not conſume and ende his lyfe. No corruption was their eyther in his body or came of his body, which was to the lothſomneſſe or annoyance of any of his ſenſes. He feared neither inward diſeaſes nor outward violence. In his fleſhe was moſt perfite health, and in euerie part of his ſoule no leſſe tranquilitie and quietneſſe. As in Paradiſe no griefe was felt through heat or colde, ſo likewiſe to the inhabitours thereof happened there nothing through vnlaufull deſire, or feare, that might be to the impechment of his good and godly enclined will. In him was there no ſorowfulneſſe at all, nor yet any vaine mirth or gladneſſe. True ioy was in him, continued by God, towards whome there iſſued a burning Charite out of a pure hart, a good conſcience and an vnfayned faith: Betweene the Man and the Woman, there was ſemblably a faithfull ſocietie, proceading of vertcous and honeſt lowe, and agreeable watching of minde and bodye: and finally a keeping of Gods commaundements without griefe or grudging, to weete, that of all the trees in Paradiſe he might laufully eate, ſo that he abſteyned from the tree of the knowledge of good and euill. Hitherto Saint Auguſtine.

¶ Then God perceyuing that as yet there was no creature made like vnto man which might be an helper and companion vnto him, he forthwith caſt Adam into a ſlumber, and tooke a rib out of his ſide, filling the place with fleſh, whereof he made the Woman, and named her Heuah, or Eue (that is to ſay, lyue or be lyuing) and brought her vnto him, whome when Adam ſawe, he ſayde: This is now bone of my bones and flesh of my flesh, she shall be called Woman, bicauſe she is taken out of the Man: wherefore Man shall forſake his father and mother and cleaue vnto his Wyfe, and they two shall be one flesh. And the Lord bleſſed and ſayde vnto them. Increaſe and multiplie, and fill the earth and ſubdue it, and be ye Lorde ouer the Fiſhes of the Sea, the Fowles of the aire, and of all the Beaſtes that moue on the earth.

Creacion of the Womā

¶ But after that Man was placed in the highe felicitie as afore ſayde, he forgetting God, through the craft and ſubtiltie of the Serpent (which a little before was driuen oute of Heauen) and by the prouocation of the Woman, broke broke the commaundement, geuen to him by God, wherfore he with Eue his wyfe were driuen out of Paradise and made subiect to death, Sinne and all kindes of miserie: For the earth was restrayned, that it should no more bring foorth fruit of it selfe, but that by the sweate and painefull labors of theyr bodies, they should trauaile and leade their lyues. Then also came sickenesse vpon them, and heate and colde began to assayle their tender bodyes. For after they began to sinne, God did open the power of Sathan, but yet against him of the seede of the Woman: he promised that Christ should come and destroy his power, and deliuer vs from his thraldome, death and sinne. This was the first promulgation of the Gospell, at which tyme began the kingdome of Christ and the Church. And so Adam and Eue tooke comfort of the promise that was made of Christes comming, and of these two persons the Church first began. Gene. iij. Gene. iij. Adam and Eue, ỹ first of Christes Church.

¶ And when Adam was thus for his disobedience and transgression cast out of Paradise, he fell to labour and tilling of the ground, according as almightie God had sayd vnto him, and soone after he knew his wyfe Eue (and as Iames Philip of Bergamo sayth, in the suppliment of his Chronicles) he begat on her. xv. yeres after the creation of the Worlde two Children at one tyme, a Sonne and a Daughter, that is to say, Cain, and Calmana, and. xv. yeres next following which was the. xxx. yere of the creation of the worlde, he begat againe at one tyme a Sonne and a Daughter, that is to say, Abell, and Delbora. Iames Phil. 15 3959 30 3929

¶ The aforesayde two brethren Cain, and Abell, were the first founders of two contrarie Cities, Babell, & Ierusalem, by the one is vnderstand Confusion, and by the other, the vision of peace. Their father taught them to feare God, and to worship him with sacrifices. Cain was of a naughtye and vnhappie disposition, geuen vnto al vice and mischiefe, and was the first that tilled the earth, he offered alwayes the worst and most vile things vnto GOD: But Abell the yonger Brother, was of contrarye conditions: he gaue himselfe to all vertue, and in all things that he went about, he thought God to be present, his occupation was the keping of Beastes, and he euer offred vnto God of the best things that he had. For in their Sacrifices his offering was euermore consumed with fire from Heauen, but his brother Cains remayned vntouched: wherefore Cain (perceyuing that his brothers doyng, was more acceptable before God than his) enuied him, and ought him most damnable hatred and malice, and in the ende most cruellye and shamefullye murdered and slue him. Babel, Ierusalem.

¶ But Adam heering of the death of his sonne Abell whom he loued most derely, mourned and lamented his death, and continued mourning for him by the space of one hundred yere. And as sayth Nicholas de Lira vpon the iiij. of Gene: Adam did with himselfe decree neuer more to haue knowne Eue his wyfe: But afterward by Gods speciall will and prouidence, he did knowe her, to the intent that of that lyne our Sauiour Christ should come, and not of the line of cursed Cain. Adam mourned for the death of Abel an hundreth yere.

¶ And after that Adam had knowne his wyfe againe, he begat on her his third sonne named Seth, when he was. C. xxx. yeres of age, of whom came and discended Noe, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Dauid, and consequentlye our Sauiour Jesu Christ. And Adam (as saith Iames Philip) had beside Cain, 131 3832 Seth. ¶ Now after ỳ Cain had done this horrible murther afore sayd, he fled frō his father, and builded a Citie in the Orient, which was the first Citie in the world, and named it Enoch, after the name of his first begotten sonne, whom he begat of his sister Calmana, in the lande of Inde after he had taken her to wife, as it was lawfull for him then to doo for the multiplication and encrease of the worlde, which Calmana was borne. xv. yeres after the creation of the worlde as Cain himselfe was. And as Saint Augustine in his booke of the Citie of God sayth, that as it was then lawfull for the brother to take the sister to wyfe for the encrease of the worlde, so is it now most damnable to attempt or do the lyke, for that we are by the expresse worde of God prohibited and forbidden so to doo. This Cain was a great toyler and moyler in the earth, but very couetous and full of malice withall, at the prosperitie of any other, which was the onely cause that he murdered and slue his awne onelye brother Abell as afore saide: For the which fratricide or brother murthering, he was by the sentence of almighty God publyshed for a vagabond and a ronnagate, & so reputed and taken all the dayes of his lyfe, as afterward it shall more plainelye appeere in the discription, or rather in the Historie of Abell. Of the foresaide Enoch came afterward a great Nacion of people, but they were very wicked full of sinne, and aboue all other thinges they did exceede in the Sinne of the flesh, which was the greatest cause that his lyne did so wonderfullye encrease and multiplie. This Cain for that God had pronounced him to be accursed, and sayde that the Earth should not yeelde vnto him any fruite, as it is expressed in the. iiij. of Gene: For that cause he left off from the toyle and labor of the Earth, the which before he did exercise, and sought out by his wicked imagination the Mathematicall artes. And although he found in that trauaile great veration of mynd, and businesse, yet as the paine ceassed not, so did not his auricious couetous and greedye desire cease, by rapyne, spoyle, or by any other wicked meane to attaine to treasure and ryches, to the enryching of himselfe, without regarde or respect by what meane so euer he came by the same, not sparing neyther the robbery nor spoyle of his people, nor yet the robbery of his children, nor of his childers children, and all that came of them or any of them: Of the which mischiefes he was a most chiefe and principall doctor. Also he altered and chaunged the honest and simple doings that before tyme had bene vsed by honest and good men in their exchaunges and traffiques, and caused all things to be done by weyghts and measures, and brought in craft and corruption.

¶ The name of Cain by interpretation is as much to say as possession, and as Saint Augustine sayth in his. xv. Booke of the Citie of God in the. xvij. Chapter: Cain might well be called possession, for in a little tyme he and his posteritie possessed in a manner the whole Earth, but in the ende they were drowned and destroyed by Noes flood.

¶ Abell the sonne of Adam and brother to Cain borne with hys syster Delbora in the. xxx. yere of the age of his father Adam, that is to saye. xv. yere after Cain. This Abell in his tender age learned the feare of God and his iustice, in such sort that in all his doings and affaires, he imagined God to be present, and that he coulde doe nothing out of Gods sight and knowledge, and therfore he endeuored himselfe to all vertue and good liuyng, and did sacrifice vnto God of all the chiefest and best of his Cattell. And therefore almightie God had respect and regarde vnto him, and did multiplie and encrease his Cattell and goodes, which was the cause that his brother Cain enuied him. For the saide Cain, being a labozer & toyler of the earth, and yet notwithstanding insaciable, greedye, and couetous coulde not abide to see his brother so greatly to prosper and encrease, and therefore by the prouocation of the Deuill, rather desiring to be depriued of all consolation and comfort, then to lyue and remaine in the fellowship and companie of his owne naturall and onely brother Abell, on a tyme sayde thus vnto his sayde brother Abell, brother let vs go foorth into the Fieldes: To the which innocent Abell not thinking of any guile or deceit did consent. And when they were together alone, sodainely Cain ranne vpon him and slue him, the sayde Abell being then one hundred yeres of age, the which Abell is accounted the first Martir, and the first that possessed Paradise. ¶ Afterward God called Cain and cursted him, saying: Cain, what hast thou done? The voyce of thy brothers blood is come vp from the earth before me, thou shalt be cursted vpon the earth that did open and receiue at thy hand the blood of thy brother Abell. And when thou shalt labour the earth it shall not yeelde to thee any fruit. Thou shalt be as a Vacabond and fugitiue vpon the earth all the dayes of thy lyfe. And God set a signe vpon Cain, that is to saye a most horrible trembling and quaking of all the members and partes of his bodye and (as sayeth Lira vpon the .iiij. of Genesis) God did print a signe or marke in his forehed or face, to ỹ intent he should be knowne vnto all nations, and that he should not be slaine by chaunce where so euer he should be found.

¶ After the death of Abell and banishment of Cain, Adam when he was (as aforesayde) C. xxx. yeres of age begat Seth, and lyued after. viij. Of this Seth (as is aforesayde) the holy Fathers were begotten, whose posteritie continued, but the posteritie of Cain perished in the flood as shall appeere.

¶ Iosephus writeth that Adam & Seth made two Columnes or Pillers, one of Brasse, the other of Stone, for they foresaing that the worlde should perishe and be consumed, once by water, as it came to passe at the generall flood, and afterward by fyre, which tyme is yet to come, graued in the sayde Pillers such things as they vnderstood of the glorie of almightie God, to the intent that Gods most holy worde might be preserued from perishing, and that the same should remaine to their posteritie, that those ỹ followed might know what God had done in the former time. And he also writeth that Adam and Seth deuyded the yere into.xij. Monethes, and did first obserue and teache the course of the Celestial bodies, for that it was impossible that mans wyt could attaine to so high and difficile things, vnlesse God almightie had shewed and declared the knowledge thereof to Adam in his creation.

This Kenan was the fourth in order of the fathers from Adam in the Genealogie of the righteous men, but begotten in the thirde generation. For in the first generation Seth was borne, in the seconde Enos, in the thirde Kenan, in the fourth Malalehel, in the fift Jared, in the sixt Enoch, in the seuenth Mathusalem, in the eyght Lamech, and in the ninth was Noe borne, who was the tenth from Adam: For according to the mind of S. Augustine, the beginning of Adam was no generation, but a formation: Neuertheless, the plasmation or creation of Adam is reconed among the generations, where he is accounted in the first, and Seth in the seconde, and so consequently, which maner is most vsed.

The yere was then of. xij. moneths as it is now. The moneth conteyned the same time that it doth now. The whole course of the Sonne & Moone was then, as it is now. The day. xxiiij. houres, as it is now, whereby worthily are refused ỹ errors of them which holde that the yeres of that age were ten times shorter than they are now, the which opinions the holy scriptures condemne to be false. For the Scripture sayth that the flood began in the. vj. C. yere of the lyfe of Noe, in the. xvij. day of the seconde moneth, and ceassed the. xx. daye of the same moneth in the yeare following, in the which place the. xij. monethes is read, whereby it appereth that there was then no fewer monethes than is now. And as at this time, men liued much longer than we do now: so is it true that they had far greater bodyes & were of much more strength than we are now. S. Augustine writeth (as Lanquet sayth) that he himselfe sawe in Utica (a citie in Africa) the iawe tooth of a man of such exceeding greatnesse that it might well haue made an hundreth of oure teeth, and there he alleageth the sentence of Plinie, who sayth, that the longer that time passeth, the lesser bodyes shall be engendred. And I the writer and collector of this whole Booke, and Hystorie, did see the tenth daye of March. 1564. the checke tooth of a man, and had the same in my handē, which was as great as a Hennes egge, and the same did wey ten ounces of Troy weight. And the skull of the same man, as I am credibly informed, is extant and to be seene which will holde fiue pecks of wheate, and the shinne bone of the same man is also to be seene, which is reported to be six foote in length, and of a marueylous greatnesse.

time the children of Seth suffered much violence and wrong of the children of Cain.

¶ Enoch the sonne of Jareth or Jared in the .lxv. yere of his age begat Mathusalah, and liued after .iij. C. yeres. This Mathusalah or Mathusalem, as the holy scripture sayth, was of longest lyfe, and being borne in the viij. generation from Adam, did prefigurate the .viij. age of the world, which shall be the time of the Resurrection, which shall begin in the last day, and neuer after shall haue ende. 688 / 3275

¶ Mathusalem or Mathusalah in the .C.lxxxvij. yere of his lyfe begat Lamech, after whose birth he liued .vij. C. lxxxij. yeares, and dyed in the yeare of the flood. He was borne in the tyme when wickednesse and malice began to abound vpon the earth, not onely amongst the children of Cain, but also among those which were called the children of the Godly. This Lamech was not onely a iust man, but also a Prophet, for he was the father of Noe, and he prophesyed of him and sayde, he shall comfort vs from the workes and labours of our handes in the earth which the Lorde hath cursed. And Lamech when he had lyued .C. lxxxij. yeres he begat Noe. 874 / 3085

¶ Noe, when he was fiue .C. yeres of age, begat Sem, Cham, and Japhet, and here I will returne a little to the line of Cain, and shewe what cursed ende he came vnto, as matter by Gods sufferance, that with such measure as himselfe had measured to his only & owne naturall brother, whom he had most cruelly murthered, so he likewise at the last was murthered himselfe, and that by one that proceeded out of his owne lyne. 1659 / 2404

A digression.

IN The beginning of the worlde most people went naked, sauing that they were partly couered with the skinnes of some beast, & at that tyme they had no dwelling houses to defend them, neyther from the colde, nor yet from the heate, but after their owne phantasies they made with prety boughes and twigs of trees, such little pretye lodgings, as we call Cabons, or Boothes. And it so chaunced that Cain being verye olde and also werye, happened one day to lay him downe to rest in a bush that was enclosed with greene boughes as aforesaid. And Lamech one of the kindred of Cain in ỹ fift degree, who by reason of his great age had lost his sight, & yet at a time was disposed to go abroad to kill some wilde Beast, and taking his Bow and Arrowes, he tooke also with him a little boy to lead and direct him where he might haue a good shot. And when they drew somewhat neare vnto the bush where Cain lay, the little boye espying the bush to wag, and seeing as it were a great thing in the midst thereof, he imagined that there lay some wilde beast, and the boy beyng afraid therof gaue knowledge vnto old father Lamech, that in a bush stading right before him and not farre off, there lay a great and terrible beast. And Lamech vpon the report of the child stretched out his arme & drew a streight draught towarde the bush, where he slew his cosin Cain, that lay in the same after he had liued .vij. C. xxx. yeres, as sayth Philo. Of this ye maye reade more in Nicholas de Lira vpon the fourth Chap. of Genesis.

Cain slaine

¶ This Lamech as sayth Raynulph Monke of Chester, was the .vij. in degree from Adam, and was of the lyne of Cain, and the most shrewe, for he was the first that brought in Bigamye and spousebreach against the lawe of God and nature, and against Gods owne doome.

Musick.

¶ The same Lamech had also another sonne named Tuball, who was a great louer of Musick, and was the first inuenter of proportions and measures: But he was not the maker of the Instruments, for that was inuented long time after, in the time of Pithagoras. And this Tuball by the sounde of the Hammers that Tubalcaim his Brother being a Smith did vse, did imagine the distinction of soundes. Genesis. iiij.

Forging of Iron.

¶ Tubalcaim the second sonne of Lamech was a warrelike Man, and begotten of his Wyfe Sela, this Man was a louer and inuenter of all those things that were meete or necessarie for the warres: he founde out the Arte of forging of Iron. He and his brother Tuball foreseeing the two destructions of the worlde that were to come, the one by water and the other by fire did erect two great Columnes or rounde Pillers, the one of brent Brick to defende the fyre, and the other of Marble to defende the water: and therein did graue the Artes and Sciences that were by them inuented: This Tubalcaim was the last of the lyne of Cain.

Noemia.

¶ Noemia the daughter of Lamech and of Sela the Sister of Tubalcaim did first finde out the vse of Linnen and Wollen, & the Spinning, Carding and weauing of the same, and made it into cloth, both for lightnesse and warmenesse, where before they did weare beastes skinnes as is mencioned in Cronica Cronicarum.

BVT Now to returne again to the line of the iust, where before mencion is made that Jared begat Enoch & Enoch begat Mathusalem, the sayde Enoch about this time was by God taken vp into heauen, which thing doth euidently set foorth vnto vs the immortalitie that remaineth after this lyfe, and that God wil saue those that are righteous and condemne them that are wicked.

¶ Also before is vttered that Mathusalem begat Lamech, not that same Lamech of whome the storie last before is written, for he came of the lyne of Cain, but this Lamech whereof mencion is nowe made came of the lyne of Seth, and the same begat Noe, as a foresayde.

NOE The sonne of Lamech which came of the lyne of the iust, when he was. v. C. yeres of age, begat Sem, Cham, and Japhet, not all at one time, but he was so olde before he begat any of them. This Noe was a iust & righteous Man & one that loued and feared God, by the which he obteined the blessing & fauor of almightie God. And after the recitall of the birth of the sonnes of Noe, foorthwith the holy Scripture declareth the occasion of the Flood, because sayeth almightie God, the worlde began to ware wicked. And amonge other the great vices of the Worlde, there is recyted the contempt of God, Aduulterie, Uolupteousnesse and pleasure of the body, for thus the text hath: VVhen that Men began to multiply vpon the earth and brought foorth Daughters, the Children of God, seing the Daughters of men to be faire, tooke them to their vvyues.

The causes of the flood.

¶ The holy Scripture calleth the children of God all those which discended from Seth, the thirde sonne of Adam. And those the children of men that discended from Cain the first sonne of Adam. For Adam commaunded that the children of Seth should in no wise couple with the children of Cain, which was obserued of a long time, vntill that the zeale and loue of vertue decayed. And God perceyuing thereby that the wickednesse of man was great vpon the Earth, repented him that he had made man, not that there is any such passion in God, but that the Scripture so speaketh to vs after our familier and worldlye maner: and therefore he threatned a destruction to the worlde by a flood, and would therefore that Noe should declare this vnto the people. C.xx. yeres before it should come to passe. In the meane tyme God commaunded Noe that he should build an Arke, that should contein in length CCC. Cubites Geometricall, euery Cubite conteyning as S. Augustine saith vj. common Cubits, which is. ix. feete, and so it was in length, two thousand, seuen hundred feete. In bredth it was fiftie Cubites, which was foure hundred fiftie feete, and in deepenesse from the vpper decke to the bottome. xxx. Cubits, which was two hundred seuentie feete, and the roofe ouer it was one Cubite highe, which was. ix. feete. Cooper. This Arke was not by mannes power brought into the Sea, but by the course of the waters rysing vp, it was borne away: and rather by diuine prouidence, than by mans pollecye, it was gouerned from running to wreck. And Noe began to build this Arke in the. v. C. xxiij. yere of his age, and before the flood, as Berosus sayth, lxxviij. yeres. Cooper. Berosus.

¶ In the. vj. C. yere of the lyfe of Noe, and the second moneth, God saide vnto him ỳ after. vij. dayes this flood should come, in which space he brought into the Arke his stuffe, prouision and all other necessarye thinges for him, whereat euery man laughed, & toke him as one out of his wit. But finally, as it is written in the Gospell, they were eating and drinking, they maryed and were maried euen vnto the day that Noe entred into the Arke, and woulde not know it euen vntill the flood came and destroyed them all. For Noe shewed it vnto them, aswell in worde as in deede, and the building of the Arke was also a certaine declaration vnto them: But they were both without faith and the feare of God, for which cause they were worthely punished. Thus the time passing the seuenth day came, & that day Noe with his wife and his three sonnes and their wyues entred the Arke. And beholde, sodeinlye came together vnto him Beastes of all kindes, not brought thither by mã, but euen by the miracle of God: neyther did Noe take them, but suffered them as they came to enter into the Arke, neyther came there anye moe than of vncleane beastes two, a Male and a Female. Of cleane beastes seuen, foure Males, and three Females, of the which one Male was reserued for Sacrifice after the flood, the residue were kept for generation. A miracle most wonderfull.

¶ Thus they being entered, the Lord shut the doore of the Arke the. xvij. day of the second Moneth. And behold incontinent the springs of the Sea burst out, the windowes of Heauen were opened, the raine fell continuallye xl. dayes and. xl. nights, and the waters swelled and rose aboue all Mountaines. xv. Cubits. All liuing creatures dyed, except Fish and such as might endure in the bowels of the earth. The waters encreased. C.l. dayes, and on the. xvij. day of October the Arke stacke vppon the Mountaynes of Armeny. The last day of Januarie, Noe opened a window, and put foorth a Crowe, which was euer goyng and comming vntill such time as the waters 1656 / 2307 The flood of Noe terrible.

were dryed vpon the earth, and then came no more againe. After. vij. dayes he put foorth a Doue, which for that she could finde no resting place, came againe at night. And after this, he taryed yet other. vij. dayes, and put foorth the Doue again, which at night returned vnto him and brought in her mouth a braunch of an Olive tree. And he taried yet other. vij. dayes and sent foorth the Doue againe, but then she returned no more. Howbeit, yet he would not issue out, but remayned for the commaundement of the Lord, who commaunded him not to go foorth vntill the. xvij. day of the second Moneth, wherby it appereth that he remayned a iust yere and ten dayes in the Arke.

Berosus. ¶ Berosus the Chaldean wryteth of this flood in maner following. Before (sayth he) the famous flood of waters came, whereby the whole worlde perished, there preceded many yeres, which of our Chaldeans were faithfully obserued. They wryte that about Libanum was a great Citie of Gyantes called Enoch, who were Lordes of the worlde from the rising of the Sonne vnto the setting of the same (that is from the East vnto the West) and they trusting in their strength and hougenesse of their bodyes, with armour that they had inuented, oppressed all men. They deuised Tents, Musicall Instruments, and all delicacies: They fed of Mans flesh and accompanied comonly with their Mothers, Daughters, Sisters, Men & Beastes. There was no wickednesse which they omitted. Then many prophesied and preached that destruction should come, which they did write in stones, but they scorned all things. And there was one of these Gyants wiser than all the other in Siria, whose name was Noa: he with his three sonnes, Samo, Japeto & Chem, and their wyues, Titea, Pandora, Noela, and Noegla, fearing this destruction, which he perceyued by the Starres, began to make a Ship in fashion of an Arke. lxxviij. yeres before the flood. And in the same yere that the Ship was finished, sodeynely the Occean swelled, and all the Seas, Floods & Springs roase aboue the Mountaines with continuall raine that fell from the Heauens, whereby all mankinde perished (except Noe with his Familye) who were saued in the Ship, which the waters bare vp to the tops of the Mountaine Cordiei, where in my tyme remayned part thereof, hetherto the wordes of Berosus.

Here endeth the first Age of the worlde, which is from Adam vnto the Flood of Noe, and is after the account of the Hebrewes. xvi. C. lvi. yeres, and after the. lxx. interpretors. M. C. C. xlij yeres.

The ſeconde Age

When Noe had continued a yere in the Arke and more, and the Waters being aſſwaged, and the Earth dryed, God commaunded him to come foorth, vnto whome incontinent he builded an Aultare, and offered of all cleane Beaſtes and Birdes, a delectable Sacrifice. Then God bleſſed him and ſayde: Encreaſe and multiplie the Earth. 1658 / 2309

¶ And after God inſtituted as it were a newe worlde againe, and firſt he gaue his Worde, and promiſed that he would neuer more deſtroy the worlde with water, and for the confirmation thereof, he gaue the Rainebow for a ſure token betwene him and man. For in that Bow is expreſſed both the colours of Water & Fyre, the one part being blew, and the other red, that it might be a witneſſe of both the iudgements, the one paſt, and the other to come. Alſo then he graunted libertie to men to eate fleſhe, which the holy Fathers before the flood neuer vſed. The Rainbowe.

¶ Moreouer, God gaue a newe precept for eternall thinges and commaunded more plainely, that who ſo euer did ſhed any mans blood, his blood ſhould be ſhed againe, of them, to whom lawfull authoritie for the iudgement thereof was giuen (meaning the Maieſtrates and Rulers) for that Man is made to the Image and ſimilitude of God. A newe commaũdemẽt.

¶ This Noe was faythfull vnto God, and another father vnto mankinde, kinde, hauing within the space of one hundreth yeres his issue wonderfully encreased, being also throughly learned in the knowledge of deuine and humaine things, in the reuolution of tymes, in the Histories of the world passed: But most specially in Justice & Religion, and he deuided the world into three parts, which he himselfe in the residue of his life traueiled and went through, leauing behind him in all places perpetuall monuments, both of his vertue, and also of his Empire. He planted the first Grape, and inuented the vse of Wyne, with the which he was made dronke, so that he lay dishonestly discouered: who being seene of Cham his sonne, the Father of Canaan, was of him scorned, and he in derision brought his two brethren to behold that sight. But they moued with shamefastnesse and honestie, couered their fathers mēbers and would not see them. The which when Noe perceyued, he blessed them, but Cham he would not curse, bicause God had blessed him, and therfore he cursed Chanaan his Nephew the sonne of Cham, who as some suppose did deryde and mocke his Grandfather.

The worlde deuided into iii. partes by Noe.

The plāting of the Grape first inuented by Noe.

¶ This Noe liued after the Flood. CCC.L. yere, and for his sundrie benefites shewed vnto all Nations, they gaue vnto him diuers names, among the which, these as the most famous are celebrated. Noe, Gyges, Fenir, Uranos, Coelus, Sol, Protheus, Janus, Geminus, Immonimus, Quirinus, Patulcius, Bacchus, Uortumnus, Chaos, Ileton, Seede of the world, and Father of all Gods and Princes. The Italians after his decease dedicated vnto him by the name of Uortumnus, a Temple, and worshipped him with deuine honours and ceremonies.

And also his wife Uesta, for her great prudence and worthy deserts obteyned these names following. Earth, Opis, Aretia, Uesta, Cybiles, the great Mother of the Gods, who taught the Maydens to kepe the holy Fire, whereof arose the error and ceremonies of the Uirgines Uastalles.

¶ After the vniuersall Flood, the World by the children of Noe was shortly replenished with people: For God or Nature neuer yet fayled the necessity of things: Of them there were many mighty nations as hereafter followeth.

¶ Cham the seconde sonne of Noe, Prince of Aphrick called also Innuus, Incumbus, Syluanus, Pana, Saturne of Egypt, the rayser and spreder of the wickednesse punished with the Flood, inhabited the South part of the world with his children. Of Canaan came the Canamites: of Phuth the Libians: of Mestraim the Egyptians: of Chus the Ethiopians: and of Saba the Arabians.

¶ Affrique as sayth Isidore in the. xiiij. booke of his Ethimologies, and the fift fift Chapter, doth begin at Egipt, and so passeth Southward vnto the Mountayne Atlas, and toward the North, the same is enclosed with the Sea Mediterraneum, and endeth in the Sea Gadique. Some also say that it is called Affrique of Afer, the sonne of Abraham, begotten of Cetura his wyfe, which conquered that country, and named it Affrique according to his owne name. And it is the same country that we now call Barbary, wherein is the Citie of Carthage.

¶ Japhet the thirde sonne of Noe Prince of Europa, called also Japetus Priscus, Diris, Maurus and Athlas, receyued of his father Noe for his portion all the countries of Europe, from the Gades, called at this time the streits of Marock, vnto the great ryuer Tanais. Europa.

¶ Europe as sayth Isidore in the .xiiij. of his Ethimologies and .iiij. Chap. beginneth at the Ryuer Tanais, and so lyeth Westwarde by the great Northen Sea, vnto the ende of Spaine. And the East part and South part of the same is ioyned vnto the great Occean Sea, and it endeth at the Iles called Gades, and it is the same part of the world wherein we doe now inhabite. But Cooper sayth that Europa is deuided from Asia with the great Seas Hellespontus, Propontis, Bosphorus, Thracius, and Pontus Euxinus, and hath the vttermost boundes in the Northest, the Ryuer Tanais, and from Affrique it is deuided by the middle Sea. ¶ Of Japhet came these Princes and Nations: Comerus Gallus, who first reigned in Italy. Magog of whome came the Scithians, and of them the Turkes. Madans of whome sprang the Medes. Of Janan the Grecians, which were called Janes. Of Tuball the Spanyards. Of Mosoch the Moscouites, and of Tyras the Thracians.

¶ And of this Japhet came also Brute who first inhabited this Realme, of him called Britayn, for Japhet begat Janan, and Janan begat Sethum, and he begat Sipius of whome Cypres had his first name, and he begat Saturnus, and he begat Jupiter, and he begat Dardanus, and he begat Erichtonius, and he begat Tros, and he begat Assaratus, and he begat Capis, and he begat Anchises, and he begat Eneas, and he begat Ascanius, and he begat Siluius, who was the father of Brute. ¶ I finde also alleged by Berosus that Noe had another sonne borne after the flood, who was named Jonithus, or Jonichus, which was a great Astronomer, and was the first that atteined to the whole scyence of Astronomie, and thereby did deuine and shew before what should after happen to the .iiij. principall Monarchies of the World: He was also Scholemaister to Nemroth who began the building of the towre of Babilon, and at that tyme all the people of the world spake but one tongue. NEMROTH The sonne of Chus, was among all the other that issued out of Noe, the mightiest and most hardiest, and he was the first that tooke vpon him the Empire and gouernement ouer his Subiects, and his abyding was at Babilon, which Citie he builded. This Nemroth enterprised the building and erecting of an houge, great, and most highe Tower made of Bricke, which was commonly called the Tower of Babell or Babilon, and he purposed that this Tower should haue extended vnto heauen, to the entent that he would make an euerlasting memory of him selfe. But after that this Tower began to be of a great heigth, and was halfe finished, God almighty willing to abate and ouerthrow the great presumption and enterprise of Nemroth, confounded the speches and languages of the workemen that wrought vpon the same Tower, so that no one of them vnderstood another.

¶ But for that the foresaid Tower is by certaine writers noted to be marueylous great and houge, I thought it good to note and mencion somewhat thereof vnto you. This Tower & City of Babilon was compassed with foure walles square, euery wall beyng fiftie Cubites in bredth, and two hundreth Cubites in heigth. And the length of euery of the square walles, was. xvj. Myles (after the accompt of our Myles) so that the compasse of the foure walles were. lxiiij. Myles. And in the same Citie were one hundreth Gates of Brasse. And the sayde Towre was builded. CC. lxxij. pace highe. But some wryte that the sayde Towre was three Myle highe. And other wryte that it was fyue Myle highe and. C. lxx. paces. And was in bredth foure Myle. And throughe the middest thereof ranne the famous Ryuer Euphrates, whose heade spring came out of Paradice, and that the same was buylded wyth Tyle, and Pitch in stede of Morter. Ninus.

¶ Ninus the thirde King of Babilon, was the sonne of Belus, the sonne of Nemroth, that was first King of Babilon, and he reigned. Lij. yeres, and maried Semyramis, which Semyramis after the death of her husband Ninus reigned as Queene of Babilon. xlij. yeres, but not contented with the lymytes and circuite of that Realme, she made a conquest of the whole countrie of Ethiope, and adioyned the same vnto her Realme of Babilon, and she attempted also marueylous fierce and cruell warre against the people of Inde, and by force entered into that Countrye and conquered the same, in such sort, that after that conquest the Indians neuer had other Emperour, King, nor other other Prince but her and Alexander the great.

¶ Mesraim, otherwise called Osyris the seconde sonne of Cham, was the first king of Egypt. He is called Mesraim of Moses as apereth in the. x. of Gene. And Berosus in his booke of Antiquities calleth him Osiris. This Osiris (sayth Berosus) did find out in Affrique the vse of Wheate, and the maner of sowing, reping and dressing of the same. And afterward he came into Egypt where he inuented the Plough, and all that euer appertayned vnto husbandrie. And from thence he passed trauayling through the rude Countreyes and people, who fed of Acornes and fruite, and had nothing else to feede vpon: Those also he taught his inuention. And by this meanes he became a souereigne Lorde and a great ruler through the vniuersall worlde, except vnto them which were vnder the Empire of the Babilonians. He also did first teach the Almaynes to sowe Corne, to set Trees, to plant Vines in places most commodious. And where there was no store nor plentie of wyne, there he taught them to make drinke of Barlye, Otes, and other Grayne, which drinke they called in theyr tongue, Ceruoys, somewhat applying to the name of his Sister, which was called Ceres. And furthermore at the request of the people of Italy he discomfited the Gyauntes called crueil tyrantes, for that they most tyrannously did reigne ouer that countrye. He kept him selfe out of the Realme of Tuscane, and reigned ouer the Italians by the space of xb. yeres, being resident the greatest part of that tyme in the Citie of Viterbe, which afterward was called Vetulonia. And from thence he passed by Sea into Greece, that is to say, vnto the Prouince of Peloponesse, which is nowe called the Moores lande, and there he reigned in the Citie of Argos by the space of. xxxb. yeres, as Eusebius writeth, and in the end returned againe vnto Egypt. And after all these thinges thus done and finished, the malice of his brother Typhon an Egyptian, being as great as the malice of Cain was to his brother Abell, conspired by treason to slaye him, which at length he brought to passe and cut him in. xxbj. peeces and deuided the same among the conspirators, which were in number. xxbj. ¶ Laabin or Libycus surnamed Hercules, commonly called the great Hercules of Libia, was the sonne of Osyris (as Berosus sayeth) who did accompany his father in all his great warres and trauailes. And after ward for the reuengement of his fathers death, he offered open warre to all the Gyants of the world. And first he went into the land of Phenice, the which he conquered, and after he went into Frigia where afterward Troye was built, and their he slue Typheus the Gyant of that Cuntrie, and gaue the lande to his awne sonne Athus, and with the same one faire Ladie called Omphale. In lyke maner he discomfited Milinus king of the Isle of Candy. And from thence he came vnto Affrique, which now is called Barbary, and there he destroyed Antheus the Gyant and named the Cuntrie after his awne name Libia, which before was called Phuthee of the name of Phuth the thirde sonne of Cham. And there he set vp a great and highe Colome or Piller in the memorie of his conquest. as the.x. king of that Realme with Galathe his wyfe, where they builded a great Citie in the Cuntrie of Laurois, the which he named Aleria, of the which Iulius Cæſur maketh often mention in his Commentaries. And then purpoſing to go into Italy, he chaunced to light vpon a great armie, and entered into the Countrie of Allobroges, which now is called Sauoy, and firſt he brake and tare in peeces the harde & ſtony rocks, and paſſed ouer the ſame rocks and Mountaines which we nowe call the Alpes, making away thorowe euen by force of people, for it was a marualous enterpriſe and a thing neuer lyke to be brought to paſſe, that in ſuch a ſtreight and ſo harde a rock and in ſo high and terrible a Mountaine withall, that there ſhould be awaye made for an armie with their Cattell and Baggages to paſſe cleane ouer: and there he deſtroyed all the Theeues and Murderers that lay hidden in thoſe Mountaines who did much hurte to ſuch as were trauayers by that Region. After he had paſſed the Mountaines he deſcended into Italy and there he made warre againſt the Titans, which were Gyants, who within x.yeres following, after he had bidden them diuers battailes, he deſtroyed them and cleane droue them out of the Cuntrie. And the place where one of the battailes was foughten and they vanquiſhed, is called at this daye, the Valley of ỹ Gyants nere to the Citie of Tuſcanel in Tuſcane. And after this the great Hercules King of France was quietly poſſeſſed of all Italy, in the which he reigned after peaceably the ſpace of.xx. yeres as ſayth Beroſus. And afterwarde when he had crowned Tuſcus one of his ſonnes, king of Italy, then he went into Spaigne and there dyed. RAGAV or Reu the ſonne of Phalech in the.xxxij. yere of his age begat Seruch or Saruch, & lyued after. CC. vij. yeres.

Here I leaue the lyne of Cham and returne againe to the lyne of Sem of the which our Sauiour Jeſu Chriſt came.

In this time there were. iiij. Realmes that tooke their firſt beginning, that is to ſaye, the Realme of the Scithes, wherein firſt reigned Tanaus, of the which the Riuer Tanais did firſt take his name. The ſecond was the realme of the Amaſones the which as Iuſtine writeth were warlike women deſcending from the Scithes. The.iij. is the Realme of Egypt. The.iiij. is the Realme of Boheme, the which was ſo called by a Prince named Bohemus, that was preſent at the building of the Tower of Babilon as ſayth Bergamo.

so greatly encreased, and men prone and readie to all mischiefe, it was of force that the wickednesse of the euill must be suppressed by the honestie and discretion of the good, and therefore they chose some certaine Man more sage, wise and prudent, than other to rule the Commonaltie, to aduance and procure vertue, to defend the innocents, and to punish the wicked. And hereof is he rightly called Noble, the which in vertues before other is notable. whereof S.Iherom speaketh, I can see none other thing in Nobilitie (saith he) but that they are by a certaine necessitie compelled to be Noble, least they should degenerate from the Noblenesse of their parents. S.Iherom.

¶ The second cause was the discord, variaunce and Brawles among the people for lacke of right iudgement: wherefore it was most necessarie, that by the authoritie of the Nobilitie, they shoulde be compelled to concord and vnitie as by them vnto whose iudgement and authoritie they must obey. 2

¶ The thirde cause proceeded of the valyaunt courage and manly prowes of certaine notable persons declared in resisting and encountring the enimies of their Cuntrie and repressing their inuasions. And such a one the people had in great reuerence and estimation and worshipped and honored him as one that had delyuered their Cuntrie from daungers, and by this meanes most chiefely did the Cuntrie yeelde and geue vnto suche worthy Men the name of Nobilitie, to them and their heyres for euer, and for this purpose were they chiefely aduaunced to the dignitie of Noble men. 3

¶ The fourth cause, came of abundance of ryches, that when penurie and scarcetie came, then the common people were relieued and succoured of the ryche, for the which reliefe and succour the poore men had the ryche in great reuerence and estimation, and accompted them euer after as their Masters and Lordes. 4

¶ Therefore all such as are discended of noble Parents and Auncestors, ought chiefely & before all others to call to often remembrance these foresayd causes of true Nobilitie, that thereby they maye be the more stirred to such souereigne vertues, for the which their worthy progenitors first became Noble, thinking themselues vnworthy the name, except they haue withall those endowments and qualities for the which the same name was first geuen vnto them.

¶ There were also certaine personages made Noble by Gods deuine prouidence (but not many of them) and some of them continued as Noble, as Dauid, and some were ouerthrowne in short time as Saul, Jeroboam, and many other.

¶ There are many also that haue made themselues Noble by violence and tiranny. And here the olde and auncient writers of Histories doo note, that seldome or neuer among the Turkish and heathen people, there is anye roote or perpetuall successe of Nobilitie, bicause they enter by pride, & continue by violence and tiranny. And euen many among the Christians haue for the verie same cause bene oppressed and confounded according to the saying of Ecclesiasticus in the. x. Chapter. The high and mightie Princes for their pride and tiranny God hath ouerthrowne and cast downe, and ha.. aduaunced therevnto the lowly and meeke. And note also that no man can hate Nobilitie, for that euerie man desireth by nature to be accompted as Noble, euen as we desyre to be accompted vertevous and religious. But yet manye Eccle.10.

perteous and holy men haue fled that vocation, for the great perill that is proper and annexed to the same, and this may at large and sufficiently appere in the Prophet Dauid, whome God himselfe did specially elect and choose.

The thirde Age

Abram.

Abram was a man more prudēt and expert in all thinges both diuine and humaine, then any other before him was. He was the first that durst mainteyne God to be the Creator of all thinges, against the opinion of all the Chaldeyes, for the which he was compelled to forsake his country of Chaldey. And soone after, he by the will and commaundement of almightie God, with Thare his father, and his wyfe Sara, and his Nephew Loth departed from the sayde coūtry of Chaldey to go into Chanaan, that is to say, into the lande of Chananee, which afterwarde was called the land of Jury, or the land of promes, & he first arriued in ꝑ land of Haran, which is in Mesopotania, there making some abode, where for some speciall causes he remayned vntill the death of Thare his father. And then God made his first promes vnto Abram saiyng. Get thee out of thy Countrye and from thy kyndred, and out of thy fathers house into a lande which I will shewe thee. And I will make of thee a mightie people, & I will blesse thee and make thy name great, that thou mayst be a blessing: And I will blesse them that blesse thee, and curse them that curse thee, and in thee shall be blessed all the generations of the Earth.

yeres olde when he departed out of Haran to go vnto Cananee. And he tooke with him Sara his wyfe, and Loth his nephew, with all their goodes which they had gotten, and all the Soules that they had begotten in Haran, and they departed to go into the land of Canaan. And when Abram was arryued in the lande of Canaan, God spake vnto Abram and sayd, vnto thy lyne and seede I geue all this lande. And soone after Abram buylded an Altare vnto the Lord in the same place where the Lord appered vnto him, vpon the which he offered sondry Sacrifices vnto the Lorde. After this, there came a dearth in the lande, and Abram went downe into Egypt to soiorne there. And knowing that the Egyptians were lecherous people, & fearing also that Pharao king of Egypt would not let to kill him, to the entent he might freely haue the vse of his wyfe which was one of the fayrest women in the worlde, he streightlye charged and commaunded her, that she shoulde declare none other vnto the Egiptians (and stoutly to stande therein) but that she was the sister of Abram and not his wife.

¶ And when Pharao was aduertised of the great beuty of Sara, he caused her to be taken and sent home to his house, for the which God sent vnto him many plagues, which lighted both of him and all his householde. But after, when Pharao vnderstoode by his wyse men that the aforesayde plagues happened vnto him bicause of the rauishing & withholding of the wife of Abram: He foorthwith restored her vnto her husbande Abram, and did further commaunde that his seruauntes should safely conduct her, and all thinges that belonged vnto her, to the entent that nothing should be hurt or spoyled by the Egyptians. Reade. Genesis.xii.

Gene.xiij. ¶ Abram and Loth after they had bene a little time in Egypt, they returned into Cananee. And in the meane tyme Loth and he so greatly encreased in cattaile, that it was impossible for the lande to mainteyne the goodes of them both in that place, and there happened much brawle and vnquietnesse betweene the Shepards, and heardes of Loth, and the heardes & Shepards of Abram, wherefore Abram spake vnto Loth and sayde. My Brother and my Friende, thou seest daylye what discordes and variaunces there happen betweene thy seruauntes and myne, for the keeping and feeding of our Cattaile, I pray thee hartely, because there shall aryse no malice nor displeasure betweene vs two, which I would not should come to passe, for we two are brethren, choose thee a place for thee and thine to go vnto, and if thou choose the ryght hand, I will go on the left. And if thou take the left, I will go on the right hand. Then Loth beholding the Countrey round aboute, and noting the goodly playnes & Medowes that led to the flood of Jordan, which was very pleasaunt for the comfort of his Cattaile, chose that part, and so leauing the East part or Country vnto Abram, departed toward Jordan into the place where afterwarde was Sodom and Gomorra consumed from Heauen with Fyre and Brymstone.

¶ And after the departure of Loth from Abram, the Lorde spake vnto Abram and sayde. Lift vp thine eyes and behold from the place where thou art Northward, Southward, Eastward, and Westwarde, for all the land which thou seest will I geue vnto thee and thy seede for euer. Gene.xiii.

2036 / 1927 ¶ Then Abram seeing that he could haue no issue by Sara his wyfe, did by the counsayle of the sayde Sara take one of his Maydens or bondwomen named named Agar and knew her, and she conceyued with childe and brought foorth a sonne which was called Ismaell, and of him is come the Nation of the Saracens. Saracens.

¶ In this time also God destroyed Sodome, Gomorra, Adama, and Semois: The cause of that destruction as Ezechiell the Prophet sayeth was, for their iniquitie, pride, superfluity of meate, abundance of ryches and ydlenesse, and they reached not foorth their handes vnto the poore, and did abhominations against nature. This place is now called Mare mortuum, the dead Sea, whose length and bredth containeth manye Miles. And at this day it is full of Pitche and boyleth continually out in Vapours, which is a wytnesse & testimony of the deuine indignation and wrath of almightie God vpon such wickednesse. At the time of this destruction God by his Angelles preserued Lot his Wyfe and two Daughters: But hauing a commaundement that none of them after they were come out of the Citie should looke back againe, it happened Loths Wyfe breaking the commaundement to looke back againe, and she was foorthwith turned into a Salt stone. ¶ Isaac the sonne of Abraham by his Wife Sara, was in this time borne, a Man beloued of God, of whose lignage Christ descended. He represented the figure of Christ, when God commaunded his father to offer him in Sacrifice, whereby was signified that Christ should be an oblation which should satisfie for sinne and death. When he therefore should haue bene sacrificed by his father, and was come both to the Aultar and to his death, he exhorted his father that with a good hart he should obey and fulfill the commaundement of God, saiyng. My father if were not iust, that any should be borne, if he would refuse the iudgements of God and his father, or would not shewe himselfe obedient vnto their willes. After, when he came to the age of.xl. yeres, he tooke Rebecca to Wyfe: who being a long time barrein, at the last by the fauour of God, she brought foorth two children at one birth, the first Esau the Prince of the Idumeis: and Jacob although the yonger, yet by the will of God, both blessed of him, and also endued by his father with the right of the first borne, and afterwarde was the father of the.xij. Patriarches. Finally, after many troubles and temptations, and being with age also made blinde, he gaue his blessing not to Esau, to whome he would, but to Jacob to whome he would not. ¶ This Jacob not long before his death, prophecied moſt plainely of Chriſt and of the vocation of the Gentiles, whoſe prophecie was this in effect as Uincencius Gallus writeth ſaiyng. Of the ſtock of my ſonne Juda ſhall come a Uirgin of whome the Lambe immaculate ſhall be borne, which is the Lambe of God that by grace ſhall ſaue all men, whoſe kingdome ſhall be euerlaſting and neuer corrupted. Therefore the great Lorde ſhall appere in earth as a man, and ſhall take vpon him a mortall body, and ſhall eate as a man: his Starre ſhall ariſe in heauen, and he ſhall ſhyne in the earth as the Sonne. The heauens ſhall open ouer him, and out of the Temple no little ſanctification of glorie ſhall come vnto him. He ſhall poure out the ſpirite of grace vpō vs, and you ſhall be his children in the truth. He ſhal be from Leui a Prieſt, and from Juda a King, he ſhall be both God and Man, a Mediator betweene God and Man: and ſhall take awaye all darkeneſſe which is vnder the heauen: and there ſhall be peace thorow the vniuerſall world. The voyce of the euill doers ſhall be againſt him, not knowing his reſurrection: But the blood of his innocencie, ye ſhall receiue on your heads. And in his paſſion, the ſtones ſhall cleaue a ſunder, the Sonne ſhall be darkened, and all other things ſhall be troubled, the inuiſible Spirites ſhall tremble, and Hell ſhall be ſpoyled: he ſhall open the gates of Paradiſe, and ſhall make the threatning ſworde againſt Adam to ſtande, and ſhall geue vnto his Saints to eate the tree of life: Beliall ſhall be bounde by him. Then ſhall yee ſee Enoch, Noe, Sem, Abraham, Iſaac, and mee your father, ryſing in ioy from the right hande of God, and ſhall geue power to his children to ouercome pernicious Spirites: and as many on the earth as beleue on him ſhall alſo reioyce. Then ſhall all men ariſe againe, the Godly to glory and ioy: and the vngodly to ſhame and perpetuall damnation: & moſt ſpecially he ſhall iudge Iſraell which would not beleue in him, hetherto Vincencius Gallus.

¶ In this tyme, Abraham that moſt holy Patriarche fynished his lyfe in this worlde, after whoſe death, there aroſe a great famine in the land of Canaan, for which cauſe Iſaac went to ſoiourne with Abimelech King of Paleſtine.

ous, was in this time borne: he in his youth, by his excellent fauour, vertue, and wisdome, excelled all his brethren and was of his father aboue all other beloued: for which cause, and for his dreames, he was of his brethren had in great despite, and by them solde into Egypt, where after long imprysonment, in the. xxx. yere of his age, he expounded the dreames of Pharao, by whom he was made President of all Egypt, and was called among them the Sauiour of the world. For God would by this maruelous occasion he should come into Egypt, that his power might be there knowne, & that helpe might be ministred to Jacob and his family in the tyme of famine and dearth. This Joseph taught the Egyptians both Religion, and Ciuile pollecye, which is most woorthy to be obserued. And it is to be noted, that a man inspired with the holy Ghost (as Joseph was) should institute so hard and so seuere a maner of administration of iustice among the Egyptians as he did, and yet draw together the whole Realme of Egypt (a Countrie beyng so large and wyde) and ioyne them together as it were the members of one body without murmure or grudge. And here we may learne that sometyme seueritie is to be vsed to keepe the people in obedience, and the same is here approued of God, although gentle gouernement is to be commended. But to our purpose: After that Joseph had gouerned the Realme of Egypt by the space of. lxxx. yeres he then deceased, being of the age of. C.x. yeres, whose Bones he gaue charge in his death bed that the Hebrues should cary with them into the land of promes at their departure out of Egypt. The residue of his noble history ye may read at large in the booke of Genesis, in the. xxxvij. xxxviij. &c.

¶ Of this Joseph, Trogus Pompeius, and also his abreuiator Iustine do write in this maner: Joseph was the yongest among the brethren, whose excellent wit they fearing, solde him vnto straunge Marchauntes, by whome he was brought into Egypt. When Joseph was in Egypt, and by diligent studie and in short tyme had learned the Magicall artes and sciences, he grewe in fauor with the king. For he was both expert in Prodigies, and also first found out the right interpretation and expounding of dreames: yea, there was nothing neither of Gods law nor mans, that seemed vnto him vnknowen. Insomuch that he foreseeyng the barrennesse of the Fieldes to come, gathered in tyme corne to prouide for the dearth that followed. And so great was his wit and experience, that his aunsweres seemed not to come of man, but rather of God: But Iustine saith that Moses was the sonne of Joseph, whose excellent fauor did much commend him. And the Egyptians when they were plagued wyth scabbes and filthinesse of body, were admonished that they should expell him with all the sicke people out of Egypt, least that Pestilence shoulde be more infectuous. Trogus Pompeius. Iustine.

¶ After the death of Joseph, the people of God merueilously encreased, and liued quietly vntill there was another king in Egypt, to whome Joseph was not knowne: Then by reason of their great multitude and aboundance of goodes, they were of the Egyptians greatlye hated, and by them kept vnder in miserable seruitude and bondage, which they susteyned. C.xliij. yeres, vntill that by the mightie power of God, they were delyuered from thence.

¶ Aaron the sonne of Amram, nephew to Leui and brother to Moses, was at this tyme borne. And incontinently after his birth, Amenophis then king of Egypt, who also was the. viij. Pharao, commaunded all the Hebrue chil- 2355 / 1608 dzen to be dzowned: For Aaron was borne without any ieopardie, but ſo was not Moſes.

¶ Whiles that the Hebrues were thus entangled in miſerie and thraldom, God in a viſion in the night apered vnto Amram promiſing him a ſonne to be borne, who ſhould both deliuer his people from the Egiptians ſeruitude, and alſo ouerthrow them, plague them, ſpoile them, and drowne them in the Sea, which viſion followed to be true. Therefore when Moſes was borne, hys birth was kept ſecret (by the will of God) and. iij. Monethes was he nouriſhed at home. But his father fearing the crueltie of the Egyptians, made a little veſſell of Bulruſhes, well pitched within wherein he put the childe, and ſet it in the Riuer, commending it to the tuition of almightie God, who before had promiſed him to be borne. Then almightie GOD ſhewing that not by mannes wiſedome and pollicie, but by his aboue diuine prouidence his determinate will and pleaſure is brought to good effect, ſaued this little helpleſſe and innocent childe. For he cauſed Termuth the daughter of Pharao to walke to the Ryuer ſyde to ſport her, where ſhe ſawe this little veſſell ſwimming vpon the water. Incontinent ſhe commaunded it to be brought vnto her, and opening it, founde therein a wonderfull fayre and goodly Babe, at the which ſhe reioyſed not a little, and according to the chaunce, ſhee named it Moſes, which ſignifieth preſerued from the water. After this, for the fauor and towardneſſe of the childe, ſhee adopted him for her ſonne, and cauſed him to bee inſtructed in all the learnynges of Egypt. It chaunced on a time, that the King for his daughters ſake tooke the childe in his armes, and ſet the crowne vpon his head: which Moſes as it were childiſhly playyng, hurled it to the ground, and with his feete ſpurned at it. But the Prieſt the Soothſayer, beholding this, cryed out and ſayde, that this was he, whome before he had prophecied ſhould be borne which ſhould deſtroy the Kingdome of Egypt, except he were by death preuented. But Termuth excuſed the childe, alleaging that his age had yet no diſcretion, and for proofe thereof, ſhe cauſed burning coles to be put to his mouth, which the childe with his tongue licked, whereby hee euer after had impediment in his tongue: By this meanes their fury was for that tyme appeaſed.

¶ In proceſſe of time there aroſe cruell warres betweene the Ethiopians and the Egyptians: The Ethiopians deſtroyed Egypt, tooke their Townes, waſted and ouerran their country, euen vnto Memphis their principall Citie. On the other part, the Egyptians by this neceſſitie compelled, fled for counſaile to their Oracles and Diuinations: where they receyued aunſwere that they muſt elect an Hebrue Captain of their armie, by whoſe helpe they ſhould not onely expulſe the Ethiopians from their borders, but alſo bring them vnder their ſubiection. Moſes both for his wiſdome and perſonage was choſen ſoueraigne Capiteine of this Armie, and he ſo pollitiquely led his hoſt, that vnwares he ſet vpon them, and at the firſt battaile he diſcomfited them and put them to flight, not without the ſlaughter of a great number of them. And when they in no place were able to reſiſt him, they fled to their ſtrong Citie Saba. In which, whilſte they ſuffered the ſiege, & Moſes often tymes pollitiquelye and valiauntly aſſauting them, he was of the Kinges Daughter of Ethiope vehemently loued, which being no lenger hable to ſuſtaine the force of loue, by certeyne faythfull miniſters required of Moſes mariage: he vpon condition that the Citie might be rendred vnto him, agreed thereunto, ſo by her meanes was the Citie geuen vp and ſhe maried vnto him according to his promiſe. By this occaſion he ſubdued all Ethiope, returning to Egypt with great triumph and victory: which proſperitie to the Hebrues was hope of libertie, and to the Egyptians cauſe of great feare: wherefore they ſought dayly occaſion how to deſtroy him. The which thing Moſes perceyuing, diligently imagined how to auoyde their deceytes, and therfore denied himſelfe to be the ſonne of the daughter of Pharao, choſing rather to be afflicted with the people of God, then to enioy ſinfull pleaſure of the World. Wherfore, he ſlue an Egiptian that oppreſſed an Hebrue, and fled into Madian, not farre from the Mount of Synay, where he was receyued into the houſe of Iethro the priest of that Citie, who gaue to him in mariage his Daughter Sephora: There he continued.xl. yeres and kept ſheepe. ¶ After this when king Pharao without all meaſure vexed the children of Iſraell, God ſent Moſes to deliuer his people out of Egypt, who after diuers miracles by him done in the ſight of Pharao for confirmation of his authoritie, at the laſt obtained of Pharao to lead and carie away the children of Iſraell out of Egypt, and he led them towarde the land of promiſſion: But Pharao chaunging his minde, purſued the Iſraelites with moſt eger cruelty, entending to haue vtterly deſtroyed them, for ſo much as they had at that time no place of refuge, nor ſuccour. For on the one ſide they were encloſed with Hilles, and on the other ſide with the Sea, and he their moſt cruell enimie followed at their backs. But here God declared that when extreme neceſſitie happeneth, and all mans helpe and ſtrength fayleth, then is he readie and bendeth the bowe of his people. For at the prayer of Moſes and wayling of the Iſraelites, the water of the Sea contrarie to the naturall courſe thereof, went back, and by the ſpace of certaine Myles gaue way to the people to paſſe without daunger: which thing when Pharao and his hoſt aſſayed to follow and were in the deepeſt, the Sea keeping againe his former courſe, ſwallowed him vp with all his power. Wherin God ſhewed a notable ſpectacle or example vnto vs, that we may aſſure our ſelues that he will be reuenged of the ſtubborne, impious, and cruell Tirantes, which vexe and perſecute his people.

Here endeth the thirde Age of the worlde, and is from Abraham to the departing of the children of Iſraell out of Egypt. CCCC.xxx.yeres.

Law. Comaundementes.

THe fiftie daye after that the Israelites were thus departed out of Egypt, and were come to the Mount of Sinai, the lawe of the Decaloge or. x. Commaundemẽts was to them geuen by almighty God, with a great and terrible magnificence. At which tyme also God gaue to them a certaine pollitique gouernaunce, and a speciall kingdome, in which nothing wanted that appertayned to the true worshippyng of God, Priesthood and Ciuil iustice, to the intent that a certaine people should be notably knowne, among whome the worde of GOD remayned: and of whome Christ in tyme to come shoulde be borne: So that among this people alway remayned the Church, the kingdome and the true worde of God, vntill after Christ had suffered. Whereby all men may know that the Church hath alway beene: and that God from the beginning of the worlde hath both reueled and preserued his worde among his people.

¶ After the death of Moses the Israelites had Princes and Gouernors, which were created, partly by the authorie of wise men, partly set vp by the speciall calling of God, by which Princes, many notable and famous thinges were done. And so God declareth that he is present, and doth continually defende his people, although they may seeme for a tyme to be tossed in the waues of these woaldly troubles and perilles. These Gouernors after the custome of the Hebrues were first named Judges. 2493 / 1470 Judges.

¶ The number of the children of Israell when they went out of Egypt, were (as it is written in the. xij. Chapter of the booke of Exodus) sixe hundreth thousand men on foote, beside women and children. Exo. xij.

After Moses, Iosua was seconde Judge or Duke of the Hebrues, and reigned. xxviij. yeres after the computation of the Hebrues, he brought the Children of Israell into the lande of promission: and had a great battaile against the Amorites in Gibeon, where he commaunded the Sonne to stande, and it stoode still longer then before had beene accustomed by the space of one whole day, and he had a notable victorie, for God fought for him, and he slue in that day. xxx. Kinges, and almost all their people, and he deuided the land of Chananee to the Tribes of Israell. This Iosua was a Man that feared God, he was also right sage and wyse, mightie in armes, and in peace verye happye and fortunate, and finally endued with all vertues, who when he was. Finally, by the fraude of Dalila an Harlot, he was deceyued and brought into the hands of his enimies, who blynded him, and afterwarde being brought foorth to play before the Princes of Palestine, he tooke in his armes the pillers of the house whereupon the whole house stood, and so ouerthrewe the whole house, and slue in that place at the same present time, three thousande Philistines, and himselfe also was there slaine.

2838 / 1125 HEli came of the lyne of Ithamar, which was the sonne of Aaron, and he was iudge ouer Israell: he was also the great and high Priest after the death of Ozi, which came of the lyne of Eleazer. And in the time of Heli the Arcke of the Lorde was taken by the Philistines, and that came to passe by the fault and foly of Heli, for that he kept not his two sonnes, Ophni and Phinees

Phinees in due order and correction, but ſuffered them to runne in all ryot and wickednelle. For the which at the laſt he was plagued, for when he heard of the death of his two ſonnes and how the Philiſtines had taken the Arcke, he fel backward out of his ſtoole and brake his neck, after that he had iudged Iſraell the ſpace of.xl.yeres. j.Reg.iiij.

After the death of Heli, Samuell the ſonne of Helcana and of Anne his wyfe, the verie true prophet of our Lord God: iudged Iſraell. xl.yeres, who being but a Childe was offered by his father and mother vnto God in the Temple, where he bowed vnto God. And he was in ſo great fauor that almightie God declared vnto him that he would tranſlate the office of Prieſthood from the houſe of Heli, onely for the wickednelle of hys ſonnes: and in his time the Arcke of God was reſtored againe by the Philiſtines. This Samuell by the commaundement of almightie God did annoint Saul the ſonne of Cis the firſt king of Iſraell.

Samuell.

¶ Here beginneth the Kinges of Iſraell.

Aul the ſonne of Cis being of the Tribe of Beniamin, was at the importunate ſute, petition and requeſt of the people, made and ordeined the firſt king vniuerſall ouer all Iſraell. He was a mighty man and great and high of ſtature, and was ſo high that being among all the people, his ſhoulders were ſene aboue any mans head. And as he was beutifull and comely in ſhape and proporcion of bodye, ſo was he alſo adorned and beutified with many ſinguler vertues, for he was prudent, ſage and wiſe, and there was not found in all Iſraell one that did loue, feare, and obey God and his commaundements, more then he did. And for this cauſe God did choſe him out before all the reſt.

Saul ỹ firſt king of Iſraell.

¶ After that Samuell by the commaundement of almightie GOD had brought Oyle to annoynt the king, hee called together the people, and ſpecially all the Trybes of Iſraell. To whome after he had declared vnto them the authoritie, right, power, prerogatiues, commaundementes, and executions that kynges ſhall dayly and from tyme to tyme haue ouer euery of them, as his Vaſſalles and ſubiectes, and alſo that their requeſt to haue a king was againſt the will and minde of God, and many other perſuaſions he vſed to haue remoued them from that opinion, but they would not, but ſtill cryed out they would haue a king. Then he cauſed lots to be caſt out, to know who ſhould be king, and the lot fell vpon the Tribe of Beniamin, and to conclude, in the ende it fell vpon Saule the ſonne of Cis: by reaſon whereof he was immediately ſought out, and annointed and confirmed king.

¶ Saule continued and perſeuered in his former vertues the ſpace of two yeres, as it may apeere in the. iij. Chapter of the firſt booke of Kynges: But afterward he despysed and brake the Commaundementes of almightie God, geuen vnto him by Samuell the Prophet. Wherefore it was declared vnto him that his reigne and continuance should not be perpetual, but that it should be taken from his lyne and issue, and geuen vnto another. Finally, after many great iniuries, berations, persecutions, and wronges by him done to Dauid, which had maryed his Daughter, he was ouerthrowne in a battaile agaynst the Philistines in the mountaynes of Gelboe, in the which his whole armie perished. Three of his sonnes, that is to say, Jonathas, Abinadab, and Melchisue, with manye other were also slaine and murthered. And because Saule would not dye by the handes of the Philistines, after he had reigned xx. yeres, he fell vpon his awone swoorde and slue himselfe, as appereth in the xxxj. Chapter of the first booke of Kinges.

Saul, Murdred himself

NOw that we are come vnto the tyme that this our native country now called England was as the cõmon opinion is first inhabited by Brute, and called of his name Britaine. It were not amisse that we shewed how this land hath bene heretofore called, and by whom the same hath bene before time inhabited: But for ẏ herein the writers of the Histories of this Realme do so greatly vary & are of sundry opinions, & also that almost no one of them all but speaketh doubtfully and diuersly therof. I thought it best to passe ouer the vaine & fonde story written by the writer of the English Historie, who sayth, that this Realme was first named Albion of Albine, the Daughter of Diocleſian King of Syria, who had xxxij. daughters and were maried vnto. xxxij. Kings, and in one night they did cut all their Husbandes throtes: And that then Diocleſian their father beyng wrath with them for those cruell murthers, did therefore cause them all to be put into a Ship, without any person with them and turned them to the aduenture of the Sea, and so by chaunce they arriued in this lande, and called the same Albion, of Albine the eldest Sister: And that afterwarde Deuilles did accompanie with them, and begat Gyauntes and Monsters of them, and so this land was first inhabited: which story as it is most fabulous and soolishe, so is it also false and slaunderous to shew that this noble Realme should haue so lewde a beginning. But sundrie other writers, wryte otherwise: saiyng, that it was called Albion of the whyte Clifes that are seene vpon the East costes. But I will passe forwarde with the report of the Historians that haue written in this our latter tyme, which say that Brute discending of the auncient blood of the Troyans, and beyng the sonne of Syluius Posthumus king of Troy, did arriue in this Iland in the yere of the World, two thousand eight hundreth fiftie and fiue, and the. xj. C. viij. yeres before the comming of our Sauior Jesu Christ, accompting the yeres after the accompt of the Hebrues contynued in the holy Scriptures, which accompt I obserue throughout this whole Story. But Policronicon and Fabian say that Brute was the sonne of Siluius Aeneas, for they say Aeneas begat first vpon his wife Lauina, a sonne who was called Ascanius, & he had a sonne also by his first wife whom he named Siluius Aeneas, and this Siluius Aeneas was father to Brute: But other say otherwise, wherefore I refer it to the iudgement of the reader. But now returning to the story of Brute, this following, I find written in an olde Pamplet which hath no name.

After

After the Citie of Troy, by the false coniecture and treason of Aeneas, the Sonne of Anchises and other (vpon peace to be had with the Grekes for themselues, their friends, and parents, and vpon condicion also that their goodes might be reserued vnto them) was entered and destroyed: And the king thereof named noble Priamus taken and murdered, and Polixena king Priamus Daughter taken and beheadded vpon the Tombe of Achilles, and Helenus the sonne, and Cassandra, another daughter of king Priam taken and delyuered at large. And for that Aeneas at the time of the taking of the sayde Citie, had hid and conueyed from the knowledge of the Grekes the sayde Polixena, and woulde not delyuer her but by compulsion: Agamemnon, and the other Grekes commaunded Aeneas to take his goodes and friends and to depart out of that lande, and so was he banished.

And therefore being exiled went into those partes of Greece where were of the progeny of the Troyans, to the number of. viij. thousand beside women & children kept in seruitude vnder king Pandrasus king of that region: with which king Pandrasus the sayde Brute for his prowesse and amiable personage fortuned at the length to be in great fauour: And after that at the prayers of the sayde Troyans the same Brute with the helpe of Assaracus, brother to king Pandrasus by the father side, in Concubinage by a Troyan woman had taken Pandrasus and put him in prison: (For whose delyuerance the same Pandrasus gaue vnto Brute in marriage Innogen his daughter with Shyps, treasure, victuall, and other necessaries to seeke aduentures:) And after that Brute had made his sacrifices, prayers, and requestes to the Goddes Diana, and had receyued answere of the sayde Goddesse that he should go into France and there build two Cities, which he named Towers and Towrayn: And after that he had builded the sayde Cities in the remembrance of his Cosyn Turnus which was there kylled and buryed in a battell that he had with Goffare then king of Poytenynes: & after diuers victories had by the sayd Brute vpon the Poytenynes in the time that Hely was highe Priest of Israell, and in the yere from the creation of the worlde. Brute arriued in Albion

M. C. viij. hee arryued in this Realme then called Albion and landed in the west part of the same in a Hauen then called Totnesse, where then inhabited certaine Gyants, whome afterwards he baliauntly oppressed and destroyed, and after that possessed and enioyed all this Realme, and named it Briteyn after his awne name, and called also the inhabitaunts thereof Briteyns.

Gwendolena daughter vnto Corin, maryed to Locryne the eldest sonne of Brute.

¶ This Corin had no children but one daughter, named Gwendolena, which was maried to Locryne Brutes eldest sonne. For Brute begat on his Wyfe Innogen three sonnes, Locryne, Albanact and Camber, and gaue to Locryne his eldest sonne (as afore sayde) the land on this side Humber, which the same Locryne after his fathers death named Loegria. And to his second sonne Albanact he gaue that part of the Northside of Humber, which he named Albania, whereof a great part is nowe called Scotland. And to hys ponger sonne Camber, gaue he that parte of this land, which is beyonde the Ryuer of Seuerne, and he named the same after his awne name Cambria, which of the Welchmen is so called at this daye, but the Englishmen call it Wales.

¶ Howbeit Fabian, and the English Chronicle and others say that Brute with his company after his first landing in this Iland at Totnesse as afore sayde, he searched and trauailed throughout all this land, and found the same to be maruellous ryche and plentifull of wood and pasture, and garnished with most goodly and pleasaunt ryuers and stremes. And as he passed, he was encountred in sundry places with a great number of mightie and strong Gyants, which at that time did inhabite the same: Howbeit he alwayes ouerthrewe them and wan the victorie. But among all other, as sayeth the English Chronicle, there was one that was of passing strength named Gogmagog, the which he caused to wrestle with Corineus his kinsman beside Douer: in the which wrestling the Gyaunt brake a ryb in Corineus side, by reason whereof Corineus being put in a chafe, with great strength ouerthrew the Gyaunt, and cast him downe the rock or cliffe of Douer, whereof the place was named the fall of Gogmagog, but sithen that tyme the name is chaunged, and the place called the Fall of Douer, and so is it called at this day. For this deede and other, Brute gaue vnto his sayd Nephew Corineus or Coryne, the whole Countrie of Cornewall, as afore sayd.

The fall of Douer.

¶ Thus haue you heard the opinion of the writer of the English Chronicle, and of Polichronicon, Fabian, and others: But forasmuch as in these our dayes and time, a learned, wise, & famous Man whose name is Thomas Cooper now Vicechauncelor of the Vniuersitie of Oxford, hath with great industrie and trauaile searched the Originall names, and the first inhabitation of this Realme, and hath also shewed many euident and great reasons and argumentes for the proofe thereof, aswell to condempne the fond coniectures of such as slaunderously haue written of the same, as also to confirme a truth, and to declare that which is most lykely and probable: I thought it therefore very meete in this place to insert his saiynge in his last Dictionary, which he nameth Thesaurus linguæ Latinæ, vpon these two Vocables, Albion & Britannia.

ALBION

ALBION saythe he (the most auncient name of this Ile) conteyneth England and Scotland: of the beginning of which name, haue bene sundrie opinions, one late feygned by him, which first pryntd the English Chronicle, wherein is neyther similitude of truth, reason, nor honestie: I meane the fable of the fiftie daughters of one Diocletian king of Siria, where neuer any other story maketh mention of a king of Syria so named. Also that name is Greke, and no part of the language of Syria. Moreouer the comming of them in a Boate or Ship from Syria without any Mariners, through the Sea called Mediterraneum into the Occean: and so finally to finde this Ile, and to inhabite it, and haue generation by Deuilles, is both impossible, and much reproche vnto this noble Realme, to ascribe her first name and habitation to such inuenters. Albion.

¶ Another opinion is (which hath a more honest similitude) that it was named Albion, ab Albis rupibus, that is, of white rockes, because that vnto them that come by Sea from the East or South, the Bankes and Rockes of this Ile do apere white. Of this opinion haue I most meruaile, because it is written of great learned men. First Albion is no latin word, nor hath the analogie, that is to say, the proportion or similitude of latine, for who hath found this sillable, on, at the ende of a latin word. And if it should haue bene so called for the white colour of the Rockes, men would haue called it Alba, or Albus, or Album. In Italy were townes called Alba, and in Italia a Country called Albania, and neyther of them tooke their beginning of white Rockes or Walles, as ye may reade in bookes of Geography: nor the water of the Ryuer called Albis, seemeth any whyter than other water. But if where auncient remembrance of ỹ beginning of thinges lacketh, it may be lefull for men to vse their conjectures, than may mine be aswell accepted as Plinies (although he incomparably excelled me in wisedome and doctrine) specially if it may apere that my conjecture shall approch more nere to the similitude of truth: wherefore I will also set forth mine opinion, onelye to the intent to exclude fables, lacking eyther honestie or else reasonable similitudes.

¶ When the Grekes began first to prosper, and their Cities became populous, and waxed puyssant, they which traueyled on the Seas, and also the Iles in the Seas called Hellespontus, Aegeum, and Creticum, after that they knew perfectly the course of sayling, and had founden thereby profite, they by little and little attempted to search and finde out the commodities of outwarde Countries: and lyke as Spanyardes, and Portyngales, and our Merchants of England haue of late done, they experienced to seke out countryes before vnknowen. And at last, passing the streytes of Marrocke, they entred into the great Occean Sea, where they found dyuerse & many Iles: among which they perceyuing this Ile to be not onely the greatest in circuit, but also most plenteous of euerie thing necessarie to man, the ayre most wholsome and temperate, the earth most apt to bring forth all things that maye susteyne: The flesche of Beefes and Mottons most sweete and delicate, the Wooll most fine, not lacking any kinde of Metall, hauing abundaunce of Wood and Timber to builde with, also great and fayre Ryuers, with great Lakes or Meeres of fresh water, & as well in them as in the Sea, wherewith the coutry is enuironed, there was great plenty of fishes of diuers sorts most apt to be eaten: they wondering and reioysing at their good and fortunate nate arriuall, named this Isle in Greke Olbion, which in English signifieth happy: in latine Fœlix. Like as a part of Arabia which is most fertile, is called Arabia fœlix. But in processe of time by resort of sundrie people hauing diuerse languages, no marualle though one letter were chaunged, & the first letter O, turned into A, & so for Olbion, it was at the last called Albion, which worde hath no maner of signification. This chaunging of letters is not vnlikely since at this present tyme the Northren men of this Realme do vse A in wordes, where Southren men vse O, as a Bane, a Stave, a Bare, a Bande: for a Bone, a Stone, a Bore, a Bonde. And among the Grekes were lyke alteration of letters. And it may be the more easely borne, that one vowell may be chaunged in a word, & specially, A into O, which in some mannes mouth soundeth often tymes lyke, then that a sillible impertinent to the proporcion of latine, should be vnaptly added to. Notwithstanding Pomponius Mela maketh mention of a Gyaunt called Albion, whom Hercules slue in Gallia, which was the sonne of Neptunus, who mought with more reason be demed the first geuer of this name vnto this Isle, then ỳ the other surmises should be likely.

Olbion.

If any man can find matter more certeyne concerning the beginning of this Isle, I will not be offended, but congratulate with him his good fortune and diligence. Hetherto Cooper shewing howe this Realme was first called Olbion, and after Albion. And the lyke trauayle he taketh in shewing of hys opinion why this Realme was called Briteyn, & therein writeth as foloweth.

Britannia.

¶ Of the first naming of this Isle (sayth he) is yet no certeine determination, forasmuch as there remayneth no auncient Historie, making thereof remembrance, the olde Britons bookes (such as were) beyng all destroyed by ỳ Sarons: who endeuored themselues vtterly to extinct the honorable renoume with the name of Britons, lyke as the Gothes dealt with the Romaynes. Also the part of Titus Liuius, where the conquest of Briteyn is remembred, with the stories of Iulius Rusticus, and dyuerse other noble writers, that wrote specially of this Countrie, are vtterly perished. Such as remaine, as the Commentaries of Iulius Cæsar, Cornelius Tacitus, Diodorus Siculus, and they that wrote of Cosmographie, haue omitted the originall beginning of the name. The Historie of Gildas the Briton cannot be found, who was after that the Sarons had inuaded the Realme, and therefore mought lacke such bookes as best should instruct him. As for Beda seemeth to haue seene nothing written of that matter. For where he sayth that this Isle tooke the name Britannia of the inhabitantes of Briteyn in Fraunce, it is nothing like to be true. For that Country was (not long before the tyme of Beda) named Armorica, & Armoricus tractus, when this Isle was called of most auncient writers Britannia, and (as Solinus writeth) seemed to be an other worlde, forasmuch as the west part of Gallia was thought to be the vttermost part of this World. Also Iulius Cæsar writeth that the places of this Isle were vnknowne to Frenchmen sauing to a fewe Marchantes, and yet they knewe no farther than the Sea coast towarde Fraunce. Moreouer the same Britons affirme that it was left among them in remembraunce that the innermost partes of the country was inhabited of them which had their first beginning in the same Isle. This well considered with the authoritie of the writer, both an excellent Prince, and also a great learned man, and was himselfe in this Isle, it is not to be doubted but that he most diligently searched for the true knowledge of the auncientie thereof.

thereof. And if he mought haue founden that the inhabitants had come of the ſtock of Eneas, of whoſe progeny he himſelfe came, he would haue reioyſed much for the prowesſe and valiant courage which he commended in them. Moreouer, that the name came of Brutus (whome our wryters imagined to deſcend of Eneas the Troyan) is no more lykely then that this Iſle was called Albion of Dioclesians daughter, or of white rocks. All the olde Latyn Hiſtories agree that the ſonne of Siluius, the ſecond in ſucceſſion from Eneas, and of them named the ſonne of Aſcanius, was Eneas, called alſo Siluius, whereunto alſo the Grekes do accorde, but they name Siluius to be brother to Aſcanius, and borne after the death of Eneas, and was therfore called Poſthumus. But neyther the Romaynes, nor the Grekes doe write of any man called Brutus before Julius Brutus which expelled Tarquinus out of Rome. Which name was alſo geuen to him (by the ſonnes of Tarquyne) in deriſion becauſe they tooke him to be fooliſh and dull wytted. Moreouer, there is ſo much diuerſitie betwene Britannia and Brutus, that it ſeemeth againſt reaſon that the one ſhoulde proceede of the other. For if Brutus had bene the firſt geuer of the name to thys Iſle, he woulde haue called it Brucia rather then Britannia, which hath no maner of proporcion nor Analogie with Brutus. But here (as I haue done before in the worde Albion) I will declare a reaſonable cauſe of coniecture why this Iſle was named Britannia. About .xxx. yeres hence it happened in Wilſhire at Iuye Church about two Myles from Saliſburie, as men digged to make a foundation, they found an holow ſtone couered with another ſtone, wherein they founde a Booke, hauing in it little aboue .xx. leaues (as they ſayde) of verye thick Uelume, wherein was ſome thing written: But when it was ſhewed to Prieſtes and Chanons which were there, they coulde not reade it. Wherfore after they had toſſed it from one to another (by the meanes whereof it was torne) they did neglect and caſt it aſide. Long after a peece thereof happened to come to my hands: which notwithſtanding it was all to rent and defaced, I ſhewed to Mayſter Rycharde Pace, then chiefe Secretarie to king Henry the .viij. whereof he exceedingly reioyced. But becauſe it was partly rent, and partlye defaced and blurred with wet that had fallen out, he could not finde any one ſentence perfite. Notwithſtanding, after long beholding he ſhewed me, it ſeemed that the ſayde booke conteyned ſome auncient Monuments of this Iſle, and that he perceyued this worde Pritannia to be put for Britannia: but at that tyme he ſayde no more vnto mee. Afterward I geuing much ſtudy and diligence to the reading of Hiſtories, conſydering whereof this worde Britannia firſt came, finding that all the Iſles in this parte of the Occean, were called Britannia, after my firſt coniecture of Albion, remembring the ſayde wryting, and by chaunce finding in Suydas that Pritannia in Greke, with a circumflered aſpiracion, doth ſignifie Metalles, alſo reuenues belonging to the common treaſure, I than conceyued this opinion, that the Grekes flouriſhing in wiſedome, prowesſe, and experience of sayling, as I ſayd before in Albion, and finding the Iſles of the great Occean full of ryche Metalles, as Tynne, Leade, Iron, Braſſe, Copper, and in ſome places great ſtore of Golde and Syluer, they called all thoſe Iſles by this generall name Pritannia, ſignifying the place, by that which came out of it, as one would ſaye he went to market when he went to Andwarpe Pritannia.

warpe or Barow, or to the fayre, when he goeth to Sturbridge, or to his reuennes, when he goeth to anye place from whence his reuenues do come. And yet because this Isle excelled all the other in any condition, it was of some priuately called Olbion, that is to say, more happier or richer. Thus farre D. Cooper. And this haue you his opinion and iudgement concerning the first name and habitation of this Realme. And nowe I will returne to the Historie of Brute where I left.

Thamys.

¶ After that Brute had landed in this Isle as aforesayd, and that he had passed and searched throughout the land, & comming by the riuer of Thamis, for the great pleasure that he had in that Ryuer and pleasaunt Medowes adioynyng to the same, began there to buylde a Citie in the remembraunce of the Citie of Troy lately ouerthrowne & raced, & named it Troynouant, which is as much to say as newe Troy: which name endured vntill the comming of Lud, who was king of Briteyn about a thousand and fortie yere after. And the sayd king Lud commaunded it to be called after his awne name Luddes Towne, which nowe by shortnesse of speche we call London, and the same was builded. iij. C. Lxj. yere before Rome was builded, in the time of Heli the high priest of Iewrie.

Troinouãt or London.

Rome.

¶ When Brute had thus builded his Citie, and saw that he was stablished in his Realme quietly: he then by the aduice of his Lordes, commaunded the sayd Isle and Countrie to be called as dyuerse Authors write, after his awne name Briteyn, and his people Britons, and so continued his reigne prosperously. In the which time he established many good lawes and ordinaunces, for the good gouernment of his people. But after this, as in this story shall apere, this Realme was conquered and brought in subiection to Straungers dyuerse and sundrie tymes, as first after Brute to the Romaynes, then to the Saxons which conquered this land, & called it Anglia (as saith Polichronicon) eyther of Angli, that is to say, people of Saxony, or of the name of a Queene of this lande that was called Angela. And some also thinke it was called Anglia of Angulus, which is in English a Corner, for that it is but a Corner in respect of the mayne and continent land of the whole worlde. Then was it in subiection to the Danes, and lastly to the Normanes.

Briteyn.

¶ Now, when Brute as is aforesayde, had set this Realme of Briteyn in order, he as the superior Lord deuided it into three partes, and gaue the same to his three sonnes, as aforesayd. And vnto Locryne his eldest sonne, he gaue this Isle of Briteyn, the which after was called middle England, wherein he had built his Citie called Troynouant, with all the Countries thereunto adioyning, both East, West, and South. And because this part shoulde sounde somewhat toward the name of Locryne, it was called Loegria, or Logiers: and therefore the Welshmen call it in their language vnto this day Lloyger.

Loegria.

Cambria now called Wales.

¶ To his second sonne Cambre, he gaue the Country of Wales, the which was first named after him Cambria. This in the East syde was sometyme departed from England by the Ryuer of Seuerne, as before is sayde. But now the Riuer named Dee at Chester departeth Englande and Wales on the Northsyde: and in the South, the Ryuer that is called Wye, at the Castle of Stringlyng parteth the sayd Countryes.

¶ To the thirde sonne Albanact he gaue the North part of this Isle of Briteyn, and called the same Albion, or more truely the sayd country tooke the name name of the thirde ſonne, and was called Albania. This Country was after named Scotlande, and ſo is it called to this day, and it is deuided as S. Bede ſayth, from Loegria or Logires by two armes of the Sea, but they meete not. The Eaſt arme of theſe two beginneth about two myles from the Mynſter of Eburcuring in the Weſt ſyde of Penulton. The Weſt arme of thoſe twaine hath in the right ſyde (or ſometyme had) a ſtrong Citie named Aclud, which in the Britiſh tongue was named Clinſtone, and ſtandeth vpon the Ryuer named Clint, ſuppoſed of ſome to be that towne, which is called at this day Burgh on the Sandes, within. v. myle of Carliſtle, where that famous Prince king Edward the firſt dyed, in his returne from Scotland. And of others it is iudged to be the Towne called Aldburgh in Yorkeſhire ſet on the Ryuer of Owſe, which runneth from thence to Yorke, the ſpace of. xij. myles or thereaboute.

Albion nowe called Scotland.

Aclud.

Burgh.

¶ Thus when Brute had deuided this Iſle of Briteyn, as before is ſhewed in three partes, and geuen the ſame vnto hys three ſonnes, and had holden the principalitie thereof noblie by the terme of. xxiij. yeres, he dyed and was buryed in London, then called Troynouant.

LOcrinus, or Locryne the firſt and eldeſt ſonne of Brute, was made king of Briteyn, next after the death of his father, in the yere of the worlde. M M. viij. C. lxxix. In the tyme of the reigne of this Locryne, there was a certeyne Duke (who as the writer of the Britons ſtory ſayth, was named Humber) who warred ſore vpon Albanactus his brother, beyng the ruler of Albania, nowe called Scotland, and ſlue Albanact in plaine battaile. Howe be it, as ſome writers affirme, the ſayde Duke was not at the tyme of his comming into Albania called Humber, but Hunys, or Hunnys, king of Hunes, or king of Scithya without any other addicion.

Humber.

¶ This king as before is ſayde, after he had thus ſubdued Albanactus, he helde the lande of Albania, vntill that Locrinus with his brother Cambre gathered a great power of men of Armes together, and went againſt him, and by ſtrength of the Britons chaſed and ſubdued the ſayd Hunes ſo harply, that many of them with theyr king were drowned in a Riuer which departeth England and Scotland. And becauſe vnto the writer of the Story of Britons his name was declared to be Humber: therefore the ſayde writer ſheweth that the Ryuer wherein the ſayde Duke or Capitaine was drowned, tooke the firſt name of him, which name continueth yet to this day.

Gauſride.

¶ Moreouer, after the death of Brute his father, Locryne Maryed with Gwendoloena the daughter of Coryn, Nephew vnto the aforeſayde Brute. And it ſo came to paſſe, that after the aforeſayde victory had againſt the king of the Hunes, or of Scithya, as aforeſayd, that Locryne fell in great phancy and loue with a faire Damoſell named Eſtrild, who was alſo the daughter of the aforeſayde Humber, as the ſayde Author writeth, and Locryne kept her vnlawfully a certeyne tyme. Wherewith his wife Gwendoloena beyng ſore diſcontent, excited her father and her friendes to make warre vpon the ſayde Locryne her huſbande, in the which warre Locryne was ſlaine, when he had reigned after the agreement of moſt wryters. xx. yeres, and was buried by his father in Troynouant leauing after him a yong ſonne named Madan. Fabian.

Gaufride. ¶ But becauſe myne Author whom I here follow diſſenteth in manye things from Gaufride, writer of the Britiſh Hyſtorie, I haue thought good to recite alſo as briefely as I can, what the ſayde Gaufride reporteth hereof, to the ende that the reader may vnderſtande wherein they varie, and then vſe his awne iudgement touching the truth of the matter: his wordes in effect are theſe. When the three brethren, Locrinus, Albanactus, and Camber, had of long time peaceably reigned euery one in his awne dominion, at the length a certaine king of the Hunes named Humber, arriued with an armie in Albania, and geuing battaile vnto Albanact ſlue him, and thereby compelled the inhabitours of that Countrie to flie vnto Locryne for ayde and ſuccour, the which thing when Locryne vnderſtoode, he ioyning vnto him his brother Camber, and they both aſſembled together a power of all the warrelike yong men of their Countries, and met and encountered with the ſayde king of the Hunes, about the water now called Humber, and in fine diſcomfited his hoſt and put him to flight, and then purſued him ſo egerly that he was compelled to take the ſayd water, wherein he was drowned, and therefore was it after Humber. the name of the king there drowned called Humber. This done, he deuided the ſpoyle of the field among his Souldiours, reſeruing nothing to himſelfe, but ſuch treaſure as he founde in the Ships, ſaue that he kept alſo for his awne ſtore three goodly yong Damoſelles of paſſing bewtie. Of the which Eaſtrelde. three, the firſt of them named Eaſtrildis, was the daughter of a certaine king of Almayn, whome with the other two, the ſayde Humber had caried awaye with him from her father, after he had waſted and deſtroyed his lande. The which Eaſtrildis ſo farre excelled in bewtie, that none was then lightly found vnto her comparable, for her ſkin was ſo whyte that ſcarcely the fyneſt kinde of Iuorie that might be found, nor the Snowe lately fallen downe from the Element, or the Lylyes did paſſe the ſame: For this cauſe Locryne being rauiſhed with the ſight of her, determined to marry her. The which when Corineus. Corineus vnderſtood, he was in a wonderfull chafe, becauſe Locryne had promiſed him before to marry his daughter: he therefore taking his battaile Are in his hande, went vnto the king and ſpake vnto him on this wiſe: Is this the reward that thou geueſt me Sir king for ſo many woundes as I haue receyued in thy fathers ſeruice and quarell, all the time that he warred againſt ſtraunge and vnknowne Nations, that thou I ſaye, forſaking my daughter intendeſt this to couple thy ſelfe in mariage with a damoſell of a barbarous Nation? Be thou ſure I will be auenged vpon thee, ſo long as there remayneth any ſtrength in this right hand of mine, which hath beene the death of ſo many Gyants in the Sea coaſtes of Tuſcane. And when he had repeated theſe wordes twiſe or thriſe together, he tooke vp his Are as though he woulde haue ſtriken the king, but both their friends perceyuing that, ranne betweene them, ſo that there was no harme done. And ſo Corineus being pacified, compelled the other to accompliſh his promiſe. Thus therefore came it to paſſe that Locryne married Corineus daughter called Gwendoloena: Howbeit, the ſinguler great loue and affection that he bare Eaſtrilde. vnto the ſaide Eaſtrilde could not yet out of his minde be forgotten, wher-

foꝛe he made a Caue vnder the ground in the Citie of Troynouaunt and enclosed her therein, committing her vnto the custody of his moste neere and familier friends: Foꝛ standing in dꝛead of Cozineus he durst not vse her company openly, but as it is befoꝛe sayde pꝛiuely and by steaith: in so much as he had the companie of her the space of.vij. yeres full, and none knewe it, but a fewe of his verie familyer and faithfull friendes, foꝛ so often as he had accesse vnto her, he feyned that he would make a secret sacrifice to the Goddes of his countrie, and so he bꝛought all men into a false beliefe causing them to thinke that it was so in deede as he sayd. But at the length it came so to passe that Estrild was great with childe and delyuered of a verie faire daughter, whom he named Habꝛen. At the same season also Gwēdoloena was bꝛought a bed of a man childe called Madan, which was committed to his Graundfather Cozineus to be bꝛought vp in those Artes that he was skilfull in. Afterwards, when in pꝛocesse of time Cozineus was dead, Locryne put away his wife Gwendolyn, and caused Estrild to be crowned Quene. The which thing Gwendolyn being maruellous wꝛoth withall, went into Cornewall, and assembling together the power of the youth of the country, began to disquiet Locryne and to warre vpon him. At the length they ioyned battaile and met together nere a Ryuer called Stooꝛe, where the sayde Locryne was slaine with an Arow. Then incontinent after his death, Gwendolyn folowing the raging passions of her father, tooke vpon her the gouernement of this realme, commaunding Estrild with her daughter Habꝛen to be cast both hedlyng into the riuer Seuerne, called in English Seuerne. And further made a pꝛoclamation thꝛoughout all the whole realme of Briteyn, that the same water should be euermoꝛe called Habꝛen, after ꝑ Maydens name, foꝛ so euen at this day is Seuerne called in the Welsh tongue. And this did she as one desirous to make thereby the name of the yong Mayden immoꝛtall, because she was her Housbands daughter: The same Gwendolyn reigned. xv. yeres after the death of Locryne, who reigned. x. yeres. At the length when she saw her sonne Madan was of a good stature and hable to gouerne himselfe, she caused him to be crowned king, being contented her selfe to leade the residue of her lyfe in her awne country of Cornewall. IN this time Dauid, of the Tribe of Beniamin being the sonne of Jsai, oꝛ Jesse, was both the kinge and Pꝛophete of almightie God after the death of Saul: Foꝛ by the commaundement of almightie God he was annointed king of Jsraell by the Pꝛophet Samuell, whome Saule (after the spirite of God had foꝛsaken him) partly foꝛ enuy that Dauid was so highly pꝛayse of the Jsraelites, and partly fearing that he would defeate him of his kingdome, vexed with cōtinuall persecution: during which time, Dauid shewed many examples, both of Godly pacience, & also of loyall obediēce toward his Pꝛince. Insomuch as when Saul (by the pꝛouidence of God) fell in his hands: he onely cut a peece of the hemme of his garmēt, in token that if he had listed at that pꝛesent, he might haue slaine him, & foꝛ ꝑ dede, afterward he greatly repented that he had bene so bold, as to cut off a pece of the garment of Saul, his souereigne Lord & king: notwithstanding ꝑ he was his most grieuous enimie, and euery houre sought his death. This noble king reigned ouer Jsraell. xl. yeres, that is to say, he reigned ouer Juda. vij. yeres, & ouer all Jsraell.

And furthermore, Dauid himſelfe by the inſpiration of God in his Hymnes and Pſalmes moſt manifeſtly prophecieth of the Conception, Birth, Life, Death, Reſurrection, Aſcention, & heauenly Kingdome of our Sauiour Chriſt. Wherefore among the Prophetes and other holy men, his writinges were had in great eſtimation, and of like aucthoritie as were the writinges of Moſes. after the death of his father began to reigne as king ouer all Israell. And of him it is written in the. iij. And in the. iiij. yere of his reigne and. iiij. Moneth called Zif, which some say is Aprill, and some May he began to buyld the Temple of God at Jerusalem, that is to say in the foure hundreth eightie yere after the Children of Israell departed out of Egypt. But in the ende, he forgat God and delighted in fleshly lustes and pleasures, he had seuen hundreth Wyues that were Queenes, and moreouer he had three hundreth Concubines that were straungers and Idolaters, and they turned his heart from God to Images, and Idolatry, so that his heart was not perfect with the Lorde his God, as his fathers was. And because Salomon would not turne to the Lord his God, therefore God sayde vnto him, that he would rent his kingdome, but not in his tyme, but after his dayes. And Salomon reigned ouer Israell. xl. yere, and then dyed, and was buryed with his father in the Citie of Dauid, and after his death Jeroboam the seruant of Salomon reigned ouer x. Empricius, or Mempris the eldest sonne of Madan, and his brother Manlius, after the death of their father, made great strife for the souereigne dominion of this Realme of Briteyn: But at the last Mempricius by treason, procured the death and destruction of his bother Manlius, and shortly after he tooke vpon him the sole gouernement of this Realme of Briteyn, who in the tyme of his reigne vsed such cruelty, and tyranny towardes his subiectes, that he endeuoured to make away almost al the nobles of his Countrie, and now thinking himselfe in rest, he waxed slouthfull and tooke pleasure in filthie and fleshly affections, and at length gaue himselfe wholy to Harlots and Concubines, and finally forsooke his lawfull wyfe, and erected the act of filthie Sodomy, and so brought himselfe into the hatred of God and all his people. the other. r. ¶ This Ebrank was alſo a man of a comely ſtature, & of a great ſtrength, and by his power and might he enlarged his dominion: in ſo much, that he wanne and occupied a great parte of Germania, by the ayde and helpe of the Latynes, and returned thence with great praye and ryches. LVd Hurdibras, or Ratiudibras, or as some wryte Rudibras, sonne of Leyll, began to reigne in Briteyn: And after he was stablished in his kingdome, he appeased the great variance and discordes that sprang in his fathers tyme, and that beyng done, he then builded the towne of Caerkyn, which now is called Cantorbury: He builded also the Towne of Caerguen, now called Wynton or Wyncheſter: And another towne called Mount Paladoure, now called Sepron or Shaftesbury. In the time of the buylding of which towne of Sepron, as affirmeth Gaufride, an Egle there spake certeyn wordes, the which he sayth he will not wryte nor declare for any certentye. And when he had ruled this land nobly by the space of. xxx. yeres, he dyed, and left behind him a sonne named Baldud or Bladud. But in very deede the sayde Gaufride was here decepued, taking Aquila for the name of a birde called an Egle, which was the proper name of a man, that liued in the dayes of the aforenamed Lud Hurdibras, who by reason of the great knowledge and skill that hee had in the Judicialles of Astronompe, coulde tell before of thinges to come, and therfore was in those dayes taken for a great Prophet, insomuche that when the same king was determined to builde Sepron, or Shaftesbury, and had already layed the foundation of the walles, he desyred the sayd Aquila, the Horoscope of the beginning of the said woorke first considered, to shew his opinion touching the continuaunce and fortune of the same Towne: And therfore it is that many report how an Egle should then speake. This Aquila is of writers called Aquila Septonius, that is to say, Aquila of Shaftesbury. BLadud, or Baldud, the sonne of Lud Hurdibras, after the death of his father reigned ouer Briteyn. This man as sayth Gaufride, Polichronicon, and others, was very well sene in the Mathematicalles, and in Negromancie, and by that Art he made the hoate Bathes in the Towne of Caerbadon, now called Bathe, the which Towne or Citie he also builded. 3100 / 863

¶ John Bale in his booke of the famous writers of Briteyn, writeth of him in this wise: Bladud, surnamed the Magician the. x. king of the Britones, was sent in his youth to the famous citie of Athens in Greece, there to be instructed in Philosophie and the liberall Sciences. And when he had there studied a certaine time, hearing of the death of Lud Hurdibras his father, he returned home againe, bringing thence with him foure expert Masters in many Sciences, not thinking it meete that his Country shoulde lack any lenger such singuler ornaments of learning as they were. These Philosophers as wryteth Marlin, placed he at Staunforde in a verie pleasaunt soyle, ſoyle, and made ſchooles for them, to the intent they ſhould there reade the liberall ſcyences, where they had many tymes a great audience. He was a man very cunning and ſkilfull aſwell in prophane ſciences of the Gentiles, as in all wiſdome and knowledge that the Grecians excelled in: But eſpecially ſtudious and ſingularly well ſeene was he in the Mathematicall artes and ſciences, for the which cauſe, one of the Sibelles that liued in his tyme, hearing of the wonderfull fame that went of his name and doctrine, wrote and dedicated vnto him a booke of Prophecies, and foretellings of thinges to come. Some affirme that the ſame Bladud builded the Citie of Bathe, and therein made by a wonderfull arte certeyne hote Bathes, for the vſe and commoditie of the people, which do remaine yet to this day, committing the conſeruation thereof vnto the Goddeſſe Minerua, in whoſe honour he cauſed a Temple there to be erected, to the entent that beyng preſerued by ſo mightie a Goddeſſe ſhould neuer faile, but continue for euer. They wryte alſo how that he read and taught Necromancie throughout all his Realme. But theſe things are verily as I ſuppoſe feined matters. Hetherto Bale. And it foloweth after in the ſame Auctour: And when he had at the length prepared himſelfe by Artmagique and Sorcery ſuch winges as Dedalus made himſelf, he attempted to flye in the ayre in the preſence of the people, in which attempt he fell downe hedlong vpon the Aultare of Apollo, and ſo bruſed his body with the fall that he dyed thereof, when he had reigned. xxj. yeres, and was buried at Troynouant. John Harding in the firſt booke, and. xxv. Chapter of his ſtorye, ſheweth that the ſchole or vniuerſitie of Stamford aforeſayd was forbidden by Auſten the Monke, like as other Vniuerſities of this Realme were, vnder this pretence, that they mainteyned the Arrian and Pelagian hereſies, the which his prohibicion was the cauſe of the decay of the ſame Vniuerſities and therefore long after his tyme, there was no common profeſſing of learning, but in great Monaſteryes or Abbeyes. But William of Malmeſburye ſayth, that the hoate Bathes were made by the procurement of Julius Ceſar Emperour, hee dyed and was buryed at Troynouant, when hee had ruled Briteyn by the ſpace of. xx. yeres, leauing after him a ſonne named Leyr.

Amaſia the ſonne of Joas was after his father King of Juda, and reigned in the tyme that Joas the ſonne of Joacham was King of Iſraell. In the beginning he gouerned very well, but yet he did not ouerthrow the hill Aultars where they ſacrificed to their Idols, and therefore when he had reigned xxix yeres, he was of his awne people ſlaine.

3119 / 844 Leyceſter.

Leyr the ſonne of Bladud, or Baldud, after the death of his father, was made ruler ouer the Britons. This Leyr was of noble condicions, and guyded his land and ſubiectes in great wealth and quietneſſe, he made the Towne of Caerleir now called Leyceſter. And albeit that this man reigned long ouer Briteyn, yet is there no notable thing worthie of memorye written of him, except as Gaufride ſayth, that he had by his wife three daughters and no ſonne, and the daughters were named Gonorilla, Ragan, and Cordeilla, the which he loued much, but moſt ſpecially hee loued the yongeſt, Cordeilla by name.

Leyr.

¶ When this Leyr, or Leyth, after ſome writers, was fallen into competent petent age, being desirous to know the minde of his three daughters, he first demaunded of Gonorilla the eldest how well she loued him: the which calling her Goddes to record, sayde, she loued him more then her owne soule. With this answere, the father being well contented, demaunded of Ragan the second daughter, how well she loued him? To whome she answered, and affirming with great othes, sayde, that she coulde not with her tongue expresse the great loue she bare to him: and added further, that she loued him aboue all creatures. After these pleasaunt answeres had of those two daughters, he called before him Cordeilla the yongest: who vnderstanding the dissimulation of her two sisters and entending to proue her father, sayde: Most reuerende father, where my two sisters haue dissimuled with thee, and vttered their pleasaunt wordes fruitlesse, I knowing the great loue and fatherly zeale, that thou euer hast borne toward me (for the which I may not speake vnto thee otherwise then my conscience leadeth me) therefore I saye to thee father, I haue euer loued thee as my father, and shall continually while I liue, loue thee as my naturall father. And if thou wilt be further inquisitiue of the loue that I beare thee: As thy ryches and substaunce is, so much art thou woorth, and so much and no more doe I loue thee.

Gonorilla.

Ragan.

Cordeilla.

¶ The father with this answere being discontent, maried his two elder daughters, the one vnto the Duke of Cornewale, and the other vnto the Duke of Albania, or Scotlande, and deuided with them two in mariage his lande of Briteyn after his death, and the one halfe in hande during his naturall life. And for his thirde daughter Cordeilla he reserued nothing.

¶ It so fortuned after, that Aganippus, which the English Chronicle nameth Aganip king of France, heard of the bewtie and womanhood of Cordeilla, he sent vnto her father and asked her in mariage. To whome it was answered, that the king would gladly geue vnto him his daughter, but for Dowar, hee would not depart with, for he had promised all vnto his other two daughters.

Aganippus or Aganip Kinge of France.

¶ Aganippus, by his Messengers beyng thus enformed, remembring the vertues of the aforenamed Cordeilla, did without promise of Dowar, take the sayde Cordeilla to his wyfe.

¶ But here is to be noted, that where this Aganippus or Aganip is called in diuers Chronicles the king of Fraunce, it can not agree with other histories, nor with the Chronicles of Fraūce. For it is testified by Reynulph of Chester, and by Peter Pictauiens, by Robert Gagwyne, by Bishop Anthony, and many other Chronicles that long after this tyme there was no king of France, neyther was it long after called France: But at this day the inhabitaunts thereof were called Galli, and afterwards were tributaries to Rome without hauing any king, till the time of Valentinianus Emperour of Rome, as hereafter in this worke shall be plainely shewed.

Galli.

¶ The story of the Britons sayeth, that in the time that Leyr reigned in Briteyn, the land of Fraunce was vnder.xij. kings, of the which, Aganippus should be one, the which saiyng, is full vnlike to be true, and the same maye be proued many wayes, but I passe ouer, for that it is not my purpose to vse any speciall discourse of the kings of Fraunce.

¶ Then it followeth in the History, when Leyr was fallen into age, the aforesayd two Dukes, thinking long before the Lordship of Briteyn fell into their Conetousnes the roote of all euill.

their handes, arose against their father (as Gaufride sayth) and spoyled him of the gouernance therof vpon certaine condicions to be continued for terme of lyfe, the which in processe of tyme were minished, as well by Maglanus as by Henninus housbands of the aforenamed Gonorild and Ragan: But that most displeased Leyr, was the vnkindnesse of his two daughters considering their wordes to him before spoken and sworne, and now found and proued them all contrary.

Maglanus Henninus.

Leyr fleeth out of his land.

¶ For the which he being by necessitie constrayned, fled his land, and sayled into Gallia for to be comforted of his yongest daughter Cordeilla. Whereof she hauing knowledge, of naturall kindnesse comforted him: And after shewing all the matter to her Husband, by his agreement, receyued him and his to her Lordes Court, where he was cherished after her best maner.

¶ Long it were to shew vnto you the circumstance of the vtterance of the vnkindnesse of his two daughters, and of the wordes of comfort geuen to him by Aganippus and Cordeilla, or of the counsayle or purueyance made by the sayde Aganippus and his Lordes, for the restoring againe of Leyr to his dominion: But finally, he was by the helpe of the sayde Aganippus restored again to the gouernement of the Realme of Briteyn, and possessed and ruled the same as Gouernor therof, by the space of three yeres after. In which season dyed Aganippus. And when this Leyr had ruled this land by the terme of.xl. yeres, as diuerse do affirme, he died and was buryed at his owne towne Caerleyr or Leycestre, leauing after him for to inherite the lande, his daughter Cordeilla.

For the moſt of them that write the feates and deedes of the Britons, make but a ſhort rehearſall of theſe fiue kings, that is to ſay, from Riuallo to Gorbodug, ſaying that after Riuallo ſucceded Gurguſius, after him Lago, & after Lago, Kinimacus, and after Kinimacus ſucceded Gorbodug. FErrex and Porrex his brother, Sonnes of Gorbodug reigned ouer this Realme of Briteyn, and continued in amitie a certain time. After which time expired, as sayth Reynulph and Gaufride. Porrex being couetous of Lordship gathered his people together vnknowne to his brother Ferrex, entending to destroy him. Whereof he being warned, for lack of space to assemble his people for sauegarde of his lyfe, fled sodainely into Gallia or France, and prayed ayde of a Duke of Gallia named by Gaufrid, Gunhardus or Swardus, the which Duke ayded him, and sent him againe into Briteyn with his host of Gallis. After whose landing, his brother Porrex with his Britons met him, and gaue to him Battaile, in the which battaile Ferrex was slaine, with the more parte of his people. But here some Authours write that Porrex was slaine and Ferrex surviued. But whether of them both was lyuing, him did the mother of the same two brethren named, Widen, setting a parte all motherly pitie, with the helpe of her women, most cruelly murdered, in the night season in his sleepe, and cut him in pieces. And thus ended the aforesayde two brethren, after they had reigned in Briteyn in warre and peace. v. yeres. And here endeth the lyne or offspring of Brute, after the opinion of most writers, for as Gaufrid sayth, after the death of these two brethren, great discorde arose among the Britons, the which continued long among them, by meane whereof the people were sore vexed and noyed vnder. v. kings, whose names I finde in an olde Pedegre to be Rudaricus, that was king of Wales, Clotemis king of Cornewall, Pinnor king of Loegria, Staterius king of Scotlande, Yeuan king of Northumberlande. And as sayth Guydo de Columna the Britons abhorred the lynage of Gorbodug, for so much as first the one slue the other, and chiefely for the vnnatural disposition of the mother, that so cruelly slue her awne child. The English Chronicle sayth, that after the death of the two forenamed brethren, no rightfull inheritor was left on lyue, wherefore the people were brought into great discorde, insomuch that the lande was deuided into foure partes. So that in Albania was one ruler, in Loegria another, in Cambria the third, and in Cornewall the fourth. But of these foure Rulers, the English Chronicle alloweth Cloton Duke of Cornewall, for most rightful heyre.

Cloto Duke of Cornewal.

¶ Reynulph of Chester sayth, that after the death of the sayde brethren, great discorde was in this lande vnder the gouernement of.x. kynges, but he neyther reherseth their names nor the times of their reignes, sauing that he sayth that the discorde continued vnto the cõming of Mulmucius Dunwallo. So that here appereth no time certaine, howe long this discorde and variance among the Britons continued, but who so lust to looke in Fabian, in a draught by him drawne, in the beginning of his Chronicle, shall there finde that it continued here to the terme of.xj.yeres.

Blackwell Hall.

MUlmucius or Molantius Dunwallo, the sonne of Cloten, vanquished the other Dukes or rulers, and reigned himselfe ouer Briteyn. This man ruled Nobly and builded a house in the Citie of Troynouaunt now called London, which house as some suppose is now called Blackwell Hall. Also he made many good lawes, the which long after were called Mulmucius lawes. These lawes Gildas translated with great diligence out of the Britishe speche into Latyn. And long time after, Aluredus or Alured king of England turned the same out of Latyn into English, or the Saxen tongue. He also gaue priuilege to Temples, to Ploughes and Cities, and to the wayes leading to the same. Wherby as Raynulph sayth, all such malefactours as fled vnto them for succour and sauegarde of themselues, might not be empeched nor molested any maner of wayes of their enimies, so that had a man done neuer so much harme (as Caxton reporteth in his story) if he might once come into the Temple, it was not lawfull for any to mistreate him, and lykewise he shoulde bee suffered therein to go safe and in peace, and afterward go into what Country he would without any harme. And if any man fortuned to set any violent hand vpon him, he then should leese his lyfe. And as some Authours affirme, he began the foure highe wayes of Briteyn, the which was finished and priuileged also by Belinus his sonne, as after shall be declared. The olde Chronicle testifieth that this Mulmucius, whom he nameth Molle and Caxton Douebant made the two Townes of Malmesbury and Uyes. And many other writers affirme that after he had stablished himselfe in this land, and set his Britons in good order, he by the aduise of his Lordes ordeyned him a Crowne or Diademe of Golde, and caused himselfe to be crowned with great solempnitie after the vsaunce of the Pagan law. And for this cauſe, after the opinion of ſome writers, he was called the firſt king of Briteyn. And all the other before reherſed were called Rulers, Dukes, or Gouernors. Of the ſame Mulmucius it is further written by John Bale Doctour and others, that he was a great fauourer and ſupporter of all learned men, and that by him was reſtored to the auncient trade and maner, the ſcience of Chiualrie, wonderfully decayed before his tyme, and in maner cleane extinguiſhed. John Bale.

¶ Finally, when he had guided the lande well and nobly the ſpace of. xl. yeres, he dyed, and was buried in Troynouaunt, now called London, leauing after him two ſonnes, the one named Belinus, the other Brennus.

BElinus and Brennus the two ſonnes of Mulmucius, began to reigne ioyntly as kinges of Briteyn: and Belyn held Loegria or Logiers, which is that part that we now call England, Wales, and Cornewall. And Brennus had all the land beyond Humber, with the which partition eche of them held himſelfe well contented, and ſo was the Realme of Briteyn peaceably gouerned betwixt them, the ſpace of. v. yeres, as Polichronica ſayth, and in this meane tyme Brennus builded the Citie of Briſtow. After which terme, the ſayde Brennus entending to haue more lande or all, aroſe againſt his brother Belyne, and made vpon him ſharpe and mortall warre. In the which warre Brennus was ouerſet and compelled to flie the lande, and to ſayle to Armorica, nowe named little Briteyn, but as Reynulph and Gaufride ſayth, he went into Norway, and there maried the daughter of Elſunge or Elfyng which then was Duke of Norway. When this was ſhewed vnto Belyn, he conſidering the ſodaine departing of his brother: did in all the haſt firſt ſeaze Albania, and al the other land that belonged to Brenne into his awne hand, and fortified the Cities thereof and other ſtrong places, with his awne Gariſons and Souldiours. Whereof when Brenne was aduertiſed, he in all poſſible haſt aſſembled a great armie of people of the Norwayes, and tooke his ſhipping to ſayle into Briteyn. And as he was keeping his courſe vpon the ſea, he was encountred with Guilthdacus king of Denmarke the which had lyen in awayte for him, for loue of a Damſell that he had maried, which before tyme was promiſed vnto the ſaide Guilthdacus by the ſaide Elſunge her father. When theſe two Nauies were met, ſtrong ſhot and fight was vpon both parties: but finally the Danes ouercame the Norwayes, and tooke the Ship by ſtrength, wherein the yong Damſell was, who was quickly brought vnto the Ship of Guilthdake. And ſo in fine Brenne with a fewe of his Shippes left, was faine to prouide for his awne ſafetie by flight.

¶ When Guylthdake had thus obteyned the victory, he entending to haue ſayled toward Denmarke, the tempeſtes were ſo great, and wind ſo contrary, that he was enforced to land in Northumberland, where at that tyme was Belyn making of preparation of defence againſt his brothers comming. But when word was brought vnto Belyn, of the landing of the king of Denmarke with a ſmal company he reioyced at it, and commaunded him with his Shippes and company to be put in ſure holde and keeping.

Guilthdake

¶ It was not long after, but Brenne had newly rygged and victualled his Shippes, and hearing of the arriuall of Guilthdacus in Northumberland with with his wyfe, sent woordes of manace vnto his brother Belyne, willing him to send vnto him his wyfe, wrongfully rauished and deteyned by Guilthdacus king of Denmarke, and also to restore him to his Patrimony, or else he would shortly inuade his lande, the same for to waste, and as his enemy to destroye. The which request was of Belyne plainly and shortly denied. Wherof when Brenne had knowledge, he shortly after landed in a part of Albania, & made towarde his brother, and his brother towardes him: so that their hostes met nere vnto a Wood, named the Calatere, where betwene them was a mortall and terrible battayle, insomuch, that much people were slaine vpon both parties: But in the ende the Britons wan the fielde, and chased the Norwayes vnto their Shippes. And as Gaufride sayth, the fight was so cruell & sharpe, that there were of both sydes slaine, to the number of .xl. M. men.

Brennus sendeth defiance to his brother Belyne.

A cruell battaile betwene two brethren.

¶ After this discomfiture, Brenne was constreyned to flie, and with a very fewe in number, recouered the land of Gallia.

¶ Belinus hauing obteyned this great victory ouer his enemies, after thankes and oblations made vnto his Goddes, after the maner of the Pagan lawe: he then assembled his Lordes at Yorke, and there tooke their aduice what he should do with the king of Denmarke. In the which counsayle it was concluded, that the aforesayde Guilthdacus should holde and do homage to the king of Briteyn for the land of Denmarke, and yerely pay vnto him a thousand pound for a tribute: which beyng done with suretie and hostages, the sayd Guilthdacus with his woman, was set at libertie, and returned into his awne Country.

Guilthdake king of Denmark became tributary to England.

¶ Now when Belyne had by this victorie possessed the quiet state of this Realme, he confirmed the lawes made before by his father, and did ordeine that iustice was ministred throughout the lande. And where the foure wayes begon by his father were not perfighted and ended: He therfore called workmen and set them to paue the same with stone, that they might the better bee knowen to all trauaylers.

The foure high wayes of England, paued by Belyne.

Fosse.

¶ The first of these foure wayes was named Fosse, the which stretcheth out of the South, into the North, & began at that tyme at Totnesse in Cornewall, and passed forth by Deuonshire, Somersetshire, and so forth by Tutbury vpon Cotteswolde beside Couentry vnto Leycester, and from thence by wylde playnes toward Newarke, and endeth at the Citie of Lincolne.

Watling-streete.

¶ The seconde way was named Watlingstreete, the which stretcheth ouerthwart the waies of Fosse, out of the Southeast, into the Northeast. This began at Douer, and passeth by the middle of Kent ouer Thamis beside London, by west of Westminster, and so forth by S. Albones, in the West syde of Dunstable, of Stratford, of Toueter, & of Wedon: by South Killingbourn, by Atherstone, and then passeth besides Bewdley ouer Seuerne vnto Gilbertes hill, that now is called the Wrekyn, and so forth vnto Stratton to the middle of Wales vnto a place called Cardican at the Irish Sea.

Erming-streete.

¶ The thirde way was named Ermingstreete, the which stretcheth out of the West, Northwest, vnto the East Southeast, & beginneth at S. Dauids in west Wales, and so stretcheth forth vnto Southampton.

Kykeneldes streete.

¶ The fourth and last way is called Kykeneldes streete, the which stretcheth forth by Worceter, by Wycombe, by Birmyngham, by Lichfielde, by Darby, by Chesterfielde, by Yorke, and so forth vnto Tynmouth, the which were

were sufficiently made. And he graunted and confirmed vnto them, all such priuileges as before were granted by Dunwallo his father. The which priuileges with other lawes by him made, such as are desirous to knowe, let them reade the translation of Gildas, made of Mulmucius lawes, out of Britishe speech vnto latine, and there he shall see the whole.

¶ While Belyne was thus occupied, his brother Brenne beyng as afore-sayd in a prouince of Gallia, taking his expulsion very grieuously, and beyng without comfort to attayne to his former dignitie, at the last resorted (being accompanied onely with. xij. persons) vnto the Duke or ruler of that Prouynce or Country.

¶ For ye shall vnderstande, that in those dayes (as sayeth Eutropius and other wryters) the Gallis occupied diuers Countries. And therefore Titus Liuius wrote the histories of the Romaynes, made distinction of the Gallis, and nameth them that Brenne lead when he besieged Rome, and afterwards the Capitoll Senones Galli, of whome the Citie of Sene in Tuscayne tooke name, because (as testifieth the Author of Chronica Chronicarum, and other) it was first builded of the aforesayd Galles in the time of Brenne being there Duke and leader before the comming of Christ. CCC. lxxx. yeres. And for this cause the Senenses are of the aforesayde wryters reckened also among the Galles.

Fraunce at ſ first was deuided into ſũdry countries

¶ Now when Brenne was commen to the Duke, whome Gaufride calleth Siginus Duke of Alebzog, the which is to be vnderstande the Duke of Armorica, now called little Briteyn, as Reynulph doth plainely declare, and that he had opened vnto him all his griefe and trouble: the sayde Duke receyued him into his Courte with all curtesie and gentlenesse. And for that he was a personable & of gentle nature furnished with all that belonged to a Gentleman, he within a short time after was had in great estimatiõ before any other that apperteined to his Court. By reason wherof at the last he fell in loue with his daughter, and in the ende maried her vpon condition that if he dyed without issue Male, that he then should be ruler of that Countrie, and if it happened him to haue an heyre Male, that then yet notwithstanding, to ayde and helpe him to recouer his land lost.

Armorica called little Briteyn.

¶ The which condicions well and surely vpon the Dukes partie, by the assent of the Nobles of his land were assured. And the sayde Duke within lesse then one yere following dyed. After whose death, when by a conuenient tyme, it was knowne that the Duchesse his wife was not with childe, all the Lordes of the land did their homage to Brenne. To the which Lordes, the more to winne their loue, he departed much of his treasure, and shortly after with their assent gathered a great armie, and so in all haste sayled into Briteyn to make new warre vpon his brother Belyne, and after a little tyme landed there. Of whose landing when Belyne was informed, he in all haste gathered his Britons together in great number & made towarde Brennus, as to his mortall enimie. But the mother of the two brethren, named Conwenna, or after the English wooke Conuey, considering the mortall hatred betwene her two children, of a motherly pitie went betwene her two sonnes, and vsed her selfe so wisely and discretely, that at length she agreed them. After which agreement, both the brethren with their Lordes and friendes sped them vnto Troynouaunt, or London, and there after many things done and ordered ordered for the weale of the lande, they agreed to leade both their hostes into Gallia for to subdue to them the sayde Countrie. And in as goodly haste as they might prepare for the iourney, they tooke shipping and so sayled into a part of Gallia, brenning and wasting the Countrie without all pittie. And as sayth Gaufrid, they in short time subdued a great parte of Gallia, Italy, and Germany.

Belyne and Brenne were great conquerours.

¶ Here Gaufrid doth vary from Eutropius, Titus Liuius, and other the writers of the Romaine Histories, for where Gaufrid sayeth that at suche time as Belyn and Brenne made warre in Italy, Gabius and Porsena were the Consules of Rome, that saiyng differeth farre from other. For as they affirme, at the time when Brenne besieged Rome, Claudius Æmilius, and Lucius Lucretius were Consules, & Furius Camill' was at that time Dictator of Rome, and none lyke vnto the other were Consules many yeres before nor after.

¶ But truth it is, that the sayde two brethren did many great actes in the aforenamed Countries, but not all agreeable with the saiyng of Gaufrid. For where he referreth all those deedes to both brethren, the aforenamed Titus Liuius speaketh but of Brenne, as hereafter shall appere. Now when Belyn had remained a certeyne of time with his brother Brenne in those partes, by agreement of them both, Belyn returned into Briteyn, & Brenne remayned behinde.

¶ When Belyn was returned into Briteyn, he repayred certaine olde Cities and builded vpon the Riuer of Vske a Citie, and called it Caervske, nere vnto the Riuer of Seuerne. This Citie was after named the Citie of Legions because the Legions of the Romaines were lodged in the same Citie, and now it is called Caerleon, which in the time of king Arthur was an Vniuersitie and had in it two hundred Philosophers, as Gaufride wryteth, which being well learned in Astronomie and other Sciences, diligently obserued the courses of the starres, and by true and infallible reasons, shewed before what straunge and wonderfull things should that time happen vnto king Arthur.

Caerleon.

¶ Also he builded in Troynouant an Hauen, with a gate ouer the same, in the Pynacle or top whereof was a Vessell of brasse, in the which was inclosed the Ashes of his brent body, when he was dead. This gate was long after called Belyns or Belynus gate, and at this day it is called Belyngsgate.

¶ While Belinus was thus occupied in Briteyn, his brother Brenne desirous to winne fame and honour, builded in Italy and in certeyn partes of Gallia certeyn Cities and Townes as foloweth.

¶ The which Cities and Townes were builded of the Galles, or at the least were new repayred in the time that Brenne was their Duke and leader, although some writers suppose that Comum, and Cremona were builded after Brenne was dead. Reynulph sayth, that the Senons, which he meaneth by the Galles dwelling about the Citie of Sena, by the leading of Brennus ouercame the Romaines .xj. Myles from Rome, at the Riuer Albia, and chaced chaced them to Rome and tooke the Citie, and after layed siege to the Capitoll. And in a night while the warders of the Capitoll slept, the Frenchmen or Galles by a way vnder the earth came into the Capitoll and were lykely to haue wonne it. But a noble Romaine named Mallius or Manlius Torquatus, awoke by the crying and noyse of a Gander or Ganders. The which Manlius resisted the Galles, for which the Romaines long time after held a feast of Ganders the first day of June: Howbeit, afterward, it was called Junos Feast, because they thought that Juno the Goddesse had by her influence geuen that grace vnto the Ganders, that they should by their noyse awake the Romaines. But yet the Galles or Frenchmen, helde the Romaines so shorte, that they were compelled to giue vnto Brenne their Duke a thousande pound weight of Golde, as sayeth Titus Liuius, and he sayeth further that the Galles slue of the Senators of Rome a great many in number, whome they supposed to haue bene Goddes, because of the riche apparell that they sate in. But shortly after this, the aforenamed Furius Camillus, which was called againe from the Citie of Ardea, where he was outlawed before, and by the Commonalty of Rome in this distresse made againe Dictator, pursued Brenne and his people, and gaue to them battaile, and slue of them a great number, and wanne from them all the Golde and Jewels that before time the Galles had wonne of the Romaines. The which deede was done. CCC.lxiiij. yere before the comming of Christ.

The noyse of a Gander awoke Manlius and saued the Capitoll.

¶ Now when Brenne was this discomfited of the Romaines, he turned his people toward the Macedones or Grekes, and deuided them into two hostes, whereof he reteyned the one with him, and the other he sent into a Countrie called then Gallacia, and after Gallogrecia, and lastly Galates. Then Brenne ouercame the Macedones, with their Duke Sosteme, and after spoyled their Goddes and their Temples, and sayde in myth, riche Goddes must geue to men some of their riches. Also he spoyled the Temple of the God Appollo Delphicus, standing in the hill of the Mount Pernasus. Wherefore as sayth Policarpus, the people of that Countrie prayed to God for helpe, and sodainely the earth began to quake, and a great parte of the hill fell vpon the host of the Galles and slue them. And after that, there fell Hailestones of such greatnesse, that it slue another part of the host, and Duke Brennus was sore wounded, whereby he fell in such dispaire, that he slue himselfe with his owne swoorde.

¶ Now for as much as I haue here shewed you the ende of Brennus, I will now returne to Belinus his brother, who as before is declared, busyed himselfe in the guyding and ordering of his Realme and people of Briteyn, and in executing many notable deedes, like as he constituted and ordeyned three Archflamyns, whose Seas, were at London, Yorke, and Caerleon. And as Master Layland sayth, he buylded the Tower of London, and did many other notable things in his dayes, the which for length I ouerpasse: and finally he dyed and after the Pagan maner, was with great pompe burned and buried at Troynouant in London, when he had reigned with his brother and alone, after some writers. xxvj. yeres, leauing after him a sonne named Gurguinthus, or Gurguint Brabtruc, or after some wryters Gurguint Barbarouge, which is to meane Gurguint with the red beard.

GUrguintus the sonne of Belyne, a Prince of great wisdome and soberneſſe and when time came succeded his father, & reigned king of Briteyn. xix. yeres, who following his fathers steppes, loued both peace and iustice. This king forasmuch as the tribute that was graunted to his father by the king of Denmarke, was nowe denyed to bee payed, assembled a great army, and prepared a great Nauy, and sayled into Denmark, and there wasted & spoyled the Country with swoord and fyre, in such wise, that at length the king of Denmarke, with the assent of his Baronage, graunted to pay and continue the aforesayde Tribute of a thousande pound yerely. Howbeit Gaufrid writeth, that he slue the sayde king in battaile. After which victory thus had of the Danes, he with great triumph returned into Briteyn. And in keeping of his course, he encountered with a nauie of. xxx. sayle beſyde the Iſles of Orcades full of Men and Women, of which flote, the chiefe Capiteyn was called as moſt writers affirme, Bartholomew, ꝑ which when he was brought vnto the kinges presence, shewed that he with his people were put or exiled out of Spaine, and were named Balenſes, and had sayled long time vpon the Sea, to the ende to finde some Prince that would geue to them a dwelling place, and they to become his Subiectes, and to holde their lande of him, beseching the king to haue compaſſion vpon them, and to graunt to them some place to inhabite in, that they should no lenger dwell in their Shippes, considering their victuall was spent by reason of their long lyng vpon the Sea. After which requeſt thus made by their Capitaine, the king with the aduice of his Barons, graunted to them a voyd and waſte Countrie, which was and is the fartheſt Iſle of al the Iſles toward ꝑ weſt, the which, Iſle as saith the English Chronicle, was then named Irelande, after the name of their Capiteyn called as he writeth Irlamall. But who so will know the first cauſe of the naming of this Iſle Ireland, let him reade the. xxxij. and. xxxiij. of the first booke of Polichronica, and there he shall finde the more certeinty of the naming thereof, with many other thinges touching the sayd Iſle.

¶ Then it foloweth in the story, after Gurguintus was returned into his land of Briteyn, he eſtabliſhed and ordeyned to be kept the lawes made by his forefathers, and exerciſed iuſtice to his Subiectes, and gouerned his lande well and nobly by the space of. xix. yeres, and then dyed, and was buryed at Caerleon, or after some writers at Troynouaunt, leauing after him a sonne named Guyntelinus or after some, Guintellius.

GUintelinus, or Guintellius the sonne of Gurguintus, was made king of Briteyn, and he guyded this lande with great meekeneſſe and soberneſſe. He had also a noble Wife called Marcia, who was learned in many sciences, and among other noble deedes by her done, she set foorth vnto the Britons a wholeſome and notable law, which long tyme after was called Marcians lawe. This lawe, for that it was good and neceſſary, Aluredus which long after was king of England, trãſlated out of Britiſh into the Barons speech, and then was it called euer after in the Barons tongue, Marthehelag, that is to say, the lawe of Marcia. To this Woman for her wiſedome, was committed all the gouernance of the land, and (as Gaufride sayth) shee reigned as Queene of Briteyn a certeyn tyme after her Huſband was deade. But the yeres of her reigne are accompted with the yeres of her Huſband, or with with the peres of her Sonne Sisillus, so that the tyme of her reigne is not certeyne.

¶ In this time the said Guintelyn builded the towne of Warwike, which was about the tyme of the birth of great Alexander. But after that the Saxons destroyed it. But it was reedefyed agayne by king Guyderius.

¶ Now when Guinthelimus had reigned well and worthely the space of xxvj. peres, he dyed, and was buried at Troynouaunt, or London, leauing after him a sonne named Sisillus, or Cecilius.

CEcilius, or Sisillus, the sonne of Guinthelyn, reigned king ouer Briteyn, but there is no notable thing written of him, but that (as the Scottes write) in the first yere of his reigne, a people of Almaine called Pichtes, aryued here in Briteyn, and possessed those partes which we now call the Marches of both the Realmes of England and Scotland, and when he had reigned. vij. yeres he dyed, and left after him a sonne named Kimarus. 3640 / 330 Pichtes.

KImarus, ꝑ sonne of Cecilius, reigned king of Briteyn, but of him there is nothing written, but that he was a wilde and wanton Prince, geuen to all pleasure and pastime, & reigned but thre yeres, beyng slain of his aduersaries as he was a hunting, and left after him a sonne named Elanius. 3640 / 323

ELanius the sonne of Kymarus, reigned king after his father, but some Authours wryte that Elanius was brother to Kymarus, and some wryte that Kymarus and Elanius was but one person, howbeit: it is most lyke they were two persons, now to be short, he reigned but two yeres, but other wryte (whom I credite) as Lanquet, that he reigned. ix. yeres, and then dyed.

MOrindus the bastard sonne of Elanius (as sayeth Gaufride) was made king of Briteyn. This man was gotten vpon the Concubine of Elanius, named Tanguestela, and was a man of worthy fame in deedes of Chiualrye, but he was so ouercome with wrath and cruelnesse, that commonly he was the death of any that angred him. Besides this, he was comely of personage, and liberall in rewardes, and was also of a meruelous strength, insomuch, as he had not his lyke of any man that was within the Realme, beyng of Noble birth. 3652 / 311 Morindus a cruell man.

¶ In his time there came a Prince into this realme out of a Country called Mauritania, the which Prince with his cruell and fierce people wasted the land of Briteyn with swoorde and fire, without all pitie and mercy. Whereof when Morindus was certified, he in all haste gathered his people, and met with him in the field, and bad him battaile, and fought in such wise, that at the last he chased the Prince to the Sea againe, and tooke many of his Souldiers Prisoners, whome to be reuenged of the tyrannie vsed by the sayde Prince, he caused to be put to death in diuerse cruell maners, as by hangyng, heading, fleayng, brenning, and other cruell executions done in his sight. Cruell executions.

¶ Finally (as sayth Guido de columna) and other, this Morindus on a time walking, or riding along by the Sea coast, espied a wonderful strange Monster, the which of his knighthood and courage he thought to slaye. And with Guydo de Columna.

Mozindus was slaine & deuoured of a Monster in the Sea.

a manly foyce assayled the Monster, fighting with it a certeyne space: But in conclusion, he was deuoured and swalowed of the sayde Monster, after he had reigned. viij. yeres, leauing behinde him. v. sonnes, Gozbomannus, Archigallo, Elidurus, Vigenius, and Peredurus.

ABout this time the Scottes begynne their Chronicles at Fergus or Fergucius the sonne of Ferquard king of Ireland: who (as they write) came with a great power out of Ireland to their ayde in the tyme of dissension, betweene them and the Pichtes, where by wisedome and prowesse he so handled the matter that he agreed those people, and obteyned such fauour, that they elected him to be their king, and he reigned among them. xxv. yeres, and finally in passing the Seas betweene Ireland & Scotland, he was drowned.

Fergus king of Scottes drowned.

¶ But these Historyes of the Scottes, as they set them foorth are full of lyes, and agree with none other Historiens, for they saye that Fergus slue Coill king of Briteyn, when there was then no such of that name, nor many yeres after, as it maye hereafter appere. But I will take the yeres of the reignes of their kings as they write them, which were from this time vnto the comming of Cesar. GOrbomannus the first sonne of Mozindus was made king of Briteyn, he was a iust and a righteous man both to his Goddes and to his people, that is to saye, he yelded and gaue to eyther part that was theirs, he gaue to his Goddes due reuerence and sacrifice, and ministred to his people iustice and equitie. And he renewed and repayred all the olde Temples throughout his Realme, and builded some new, and as the English Chronicle sayth, he builded the Towne of Cambridge and Grantham. And in the time of his reigne the land was much more welthier than it was in the dayes of his predecessors. But finally to the great sorrow of all his people, he was taken with a grieuous sickenesse, and thereof dyed without issue of his body, when he had reigned after most writers. xj. yeres.

ARchigallo or Artogallo, the second sonne of Mozindus, and brother vnto Gorbomannus reigned king of Briteyn. This man folowed nothing the steppes of his brother, but gaue himselfe to all quareling and strife, and imagined causes against his nobles, to pull from them their goodes and dignities, and in their places to set vp vnnoble, and men of rude birth and maner. And so from the riche, by synister meanes he plucked their riches and goodes: by which inordinate meanes, he enriched himselfe and impouerished his subiectes. For which condicions his Lordes and subiectes murmured against him, and at the last by one assent tooke him and depriued him of all honor and kingly dignitie, when he had reigned. v. yeres. ELidurus the third sonne of Mozindus and brother to Archigallo, was by the assent of the Britons made king. This man became so mylde and gentle to the Britons, that they gaue to him a surname, and called him Elidure the meeke. And among other deedes of meekenesse, this that foloweth is not the least to be noted. It happened hym on a day to be on hunting in a Wood nere vnto Yorke called Calater, and there he founde hys elder brother Archigallo late king, wandering in the thickest of the Wood, whom louingly & charitably he in secret maner conueyed home to his mansiõ house, into the Citie then named Aldud or Aelim. And (as Gaufride sayth) to the intent to bring his brother to his former dignitie, as after followeth: For when Elidurus returned home, he feyned him selfe sicke, and in all the haste sent his messengers about his realme to gather an assembly of the Barons of his land together. And when the day of assembly was come, and his Lordes according to his commaundement were present, he called them one by one, as they were of honour into his priuie Chamber, and there by his wyse and discrete wordes he gat graunt of his sayde Lords to ayde and strength him to bring his brother Archigallo to his former dignity and Regality. After which graunt by the Lordes made, he assembled a counsayle at Yorke, and there so persuaded the commons that they were content to receiue Archigallo againe to be their king. And then Elidurus when he had reigned .v. yeres, resigned to his brother the Crowne, and all his kingly honor and dignitie.

And about this time Ptholomeus Philadelphus, king of Egypt reigned in Alexandria. This prince aboue al other was geuen vnto study & learning. He made a Librarij in Alexandria, which hee furnished with innumerable sortes of bookes of all Sciences. Among which as chiefe was the volume of Moses law. And the king heering that the deuine lawe was in Ierusalem, he being verie desirous to haue it translated, first discharged out of bondage all the Iewes that were in his subiection, who were in number aboue one hundreth thousand persons. And then he sent Demetrius and Aristeus to Eleazar the high Priest of the Iewes with great giftes to the Temple of God, desiring that the law might be sent vnto him, with learned men to translate it into Greke. And forthwith Eleazar sent .lxxij. interpretors, who commonly are called Septuaginta interpretes. These the king honorably receyued, & sent them to Demetrius Clerk of his Librarij in Alexandrie, who prouided a place for them, where they assembled daylie to translate the holye Scripture, and in lxxij. dayes, they finished it. And in this tyme also Ferithias, brother to Fergus, was chosen king of Scottes during the nonage of his brothers children, who by Feriegus his Nephew, for the desire to reigne, was slaine, when he had reigned .xv. yeres, and Ferlegus for that act fled Scotland.

Archigallo king of Britayn amended his life.

When Archigallo was againe restored to his kingdome as afore sayde, he remembred well the euill life that before tyme he had led, and the punishment that he had suffred for the same, wherfore in the eschewing of like daunger, he chaunged all his olde condicions and became a good and a righteous man, ministring to the people equitie and iustice, and bare himselfe so nobly and honorably towardes his Lordes and the rulers vnder him, that he was beloued and dread of all his subiectes, and so continued during the terme of his naturall lyfe, and finally he dyed, when he had reigned now lastly.x. yeres, and was buried at Yorke.

Eldurus before named, was now againe by one assent of the Britons made king: But his two yonger brethren, Vigenius and Peredurus hauing indignation at him, for that he was for his vertue and good gouernaunce so well fauoured and beloued of the Britons, conspired against him of malice, and gathering an armie of Souldiours, gaue him battayle: and in the fielde tooke him, and then sent him to the Tower of Troynouant, which now is called the Tower of London, and there kept him as prisoner, when he had reigned now lastly two yeres.

Vigenius and Peredurus the yongest sonnes of Morindus and brethren of Eldurus beforesayd, reigned ioyntly as kings of Briteyn. These brethren parted the land betweene them: So that all the lande from the water of Humber westwarde fell to Vigenius: and the other parte of the land with Albania or Scotland also, fell vnto Peredurus. But as sayeth Guydo, Vigenius was not king, but alonely Peredurus, who as he sayeth, kept his brother Eldurus in Prison, by his owne assent, because Eldurus was not willing to be king, as the sayde Guydo sayth. Peredurus was cruell and tyrannous to the Briteyns, and slue and intreated the Lordes in most cruell maner, so that in the ende he became so odious vnto them, that they rebelled against him and slue him. But Gaufride sayth, and it appereth to be tru, ethat Vigenius dyed when he had reigned.vij.yeres: After whose death Peredurus seazed all the land into his owne rule, and ruled it with great soberneſſe, in such wise that he excelled all his other brethren, so that Eldurus was cleane forgotten of the Britons: But at the last Peredurus was visited with sickneſſe, and thereof dyed, when he had reigned with his brother and alone.ix. yeres, leauing behinde him no childe.

Hely. HEly the sonne of Diuellus reigned ouer Briteyn, not full one yere, and he had three sonnes, Lud, Callibelan, and Stemmius, or rather Nennius, they were wise men, and valiaunt in warres. And of this man the Isle of Elye tooke (as some writers affirme) the first name: notwithstanding, Laylande supposeth it to be so called, of Eelys, which are there ingendred in great store, and therefore calleth it in latine Insula Anguillaria.

Ludgate. LVd the eldest sonne of Hely, was after his father King of Briteyn. This Man was honorable in all his deedes, and he builded new temples and repayred the olde. He also repayred olde Cities and townes, and specially the Citie of Troynouant, where he caused many buildings to be made, and also made about the sayde Citie a strong wall. And in the west part of the sayde wall, he erected and made a strong and fayre Gate, and commaunded the same to be called by his awne name Luddes gate, which at this day is called Ludgate. And for that he loued this City, he vsed much and often to lye therin, by reason whereof it was called Caerlud, or Luds towne, & after by corruption of speech, it was after called, & is so named at this day London.

¶ Bale writeth how there fell great dissension betweene Lud and his brother ther Nennius afore sayd, about the chaunging of the name of Troynouaunt into Luddes towne, or London, because it might be the occasion that the memorie of Troy and the worthie deedes there done, should thereby be buried in oblivion, and be forgotten.

¶ This Lud also (as sayth Gaufrid) was strong and mightie in armes in subduing his enimies. He was also bounteous and liberall and kept a great houshold, by meane wherof he obteyned the great loue and fauour of all the Britons. And when he had reigned in honour. xi. yeres, he dyed, and was buried in his gate called Ludgate, and left after him two sonnes, as Guydo sayth, the one named Androgeus, and the other Temancius, or Tenancius. Lud buried in Ludgate CAssibelan or as some wryte Cossiuelan, after the death of his brother Lud, was made king of Briteyn, for so much as the two sonnes before named, were to yong and insufficient to take in hande so great a charge. 3905 / 58 But as sayth the Flowre of Histories, this Cassibelan was not made king of Briteyn, but rather ruler or protector of the lande, for the time of the nonage of the aforesayde brethren: albeit Gaufrid sayth, that after Cassibelan was set in aucthoritie, he became so noble and liberall that his name sprang farre, and by his exercise of iustice, the Britons ought to him more fauour then to eyther of his Nephewes: Howbeit, he cherished them and brought them vp according to their birth. And when they came vnto yeres of discretion, he gaue to Androgeus, the Citie of London, with the Dukedome or Ereldome of Kent, and to Temancius the Dukedome of Cornewall. Flowres of Histories.

¶ In this tyme Caius Iulius Cæsar, who most commonly is called Iulius Cæsar, being sent by the Senate of Rome, as felow and Consull with Lucius Bubulus into the countrie of Gallia, for to subdue the Galles to the Empire of Rome. The which Iulius being vpon the Sea side, as sayth Gaufrid, after he had ouercome the sayde Galles, and beholding the white Clifes or Rockes of Briteyn: enquired of the Countrie, and what people dwelled therein. And when he was sufficiently informed of all the commodities thereof, he had great will to bring the sayde Countrie vnder the obeysance of the Romaynes, as other Countreyes for the most parte then were. But as Bergamo writeth, the time that Iulius made warre vpon the Galles, he knew that they receyued great ayde out of Briteyn, and therefore was he the willinger to conquer it, because they should not be any more ayded by the Britons. And so hauing diligently enquired of the state thereof, he wrote to Cassibelan, willing him as he tendered his owne safetie and the quietnesse of his realme and people, that he would become tributarie vnto the Empire of Rome, like as many other Nations were. Iulius Cæsar.

¶ But Cassibelan hauing great indignation to become subiect, wrote vnto him sharpe and short answeres, shewing that he and euerie noble man was bounde specially to keepe his Countrie and people from seruitude and bondage, the which to obserue he would doe his vttermost endeuour: with the which answere Iulius Cæsar being nothing contented, in all haste made readie his Nauie and people, and sayled towarde Briteyn. And when the Romaines were come nere the land of Briteyn, and should haue landed: the Britons pight sharpe stakes and long vpon the bancks, which caused them to winne the lande with great daunger. And not long after their landing, Cassibelan belan with a strong hoste of Britons encountered the Romaines, geuing to them a fierce battaile, in so much, that they were faine to flie to their Ships for suretie, and after with sodaine tempest his Naule being almost destroyed, he returned againe into France there to Winter. Notwithstanding (as Gaufrid and other sayth) after he had renewed his armie, and also rygged and encreased his Naule, he came againe the second time: But as before time, so he was now againe by the Manhood of the king and of his Britons manfully and knightly withstanded and chased away, and compelled to flee with great dishonour. In the which battaile, the valiaunt courage of the hardy and noble knight Nennius brother vnto king Cassibelan is worthy of perpetuall memorie, who manfully fighting for the defence of his Countrie and the libertie thereof, besides other noble deedes of armes then by him atchieued, ranne vnto Cæsar and plucked his sworde out of his hande, and therewith slue Labienus Tribune or chiefe Captaine of the Romaine Nobilitie: And receyuing againe as Gaufride writeth his deathes wound by the same Cæsar, dyed thereof verie shortly after, and was buried at the Northgate of Troynouaunt, and the sayde sworde put in the Coffyn with him by his commaundement.

Iulius Cæsar and his Romaines had the repulse.

John Lydgate.

¶ John Lydgate in his booke named the Serpent of Diuision writeth that Iulius Cæsar builded in this land diuers Castelles and Cities for a perpetuall memorie of his name, that is to say, a Castell not farre from Douer, the Castelles of Cauntorburie and Rochester, and the auncientst parte of the Tower of London. The Castell and Towne of Cesars Bury, which now is called Sarisburie or Salsburie: he also edefied Cesars Chester or Chichester and the Castell of Excester.

¶ For which victorie thus twise obteyned, Cassibelan entending to geue thanks vnto his Goddes, and torewarde his Knights, in goodly haste caused an assembly to be made of all his Lordes and Knightes at the Citie of Caerlud, or London, where after due obseruaunces done to their Goddes, after the vse of their Pagan lawes, a great and solempne feast was holden by the king to all that would come with most liberalitie and plenty, in all that was necessarie to such a feast. And the more to encrease the kings honor, and to the comforte and delectation of his Lordes and other being there present, there was all maner kinde of games and pastimes, that at those dayes were exercised and vsed. During the tyme of which feast, two noble and yonge knights among other hapned to assay eyther other in wrastling, whereof the one was Nephew to king Cassibelan named Hirelda, & that other was named Euelinus, who was allyed vnto Androgeus, Erle or Duke of London. By meane of this wrestling, deuision, or vnsitting words fell betwene them, and after wordes ensued strokes, by meane whereof partes were taken on eyther side, which ranne together in great yre and malice, so that on eyther parte, many and diuers were hurt and wounded. Among whome Hirelda Nephew to the king was slaine, which caused great disturbance in the Court among the Lordes.

¶ Now when that knowledge of the death of Hirelda was brought vnto the King: he was therewith greatly moued, and entending due iustice to be had and ministred by the aduise of his Barons caused the aforenamed Coffyn of Androgeus, who was named Euelinus to be sommoned for to appere before him and his Counsayle, and there to acquite him of such crime as to him should be layed, for the death of Hircida before slaine. But Euclimus by the counsayle of Androgeus his Cosyn, withstoode that commaundement, and shortly after, the sayd Androgeus and Euelyne departed the Court, without taking leaue of the king.

¶ The king disdeyning this demeanour of Androgeus, after diuers monicions to him giuen, gathered his knightes together and made warre vpon Androgeus. Wherfore, after many wayes and meanes sought, at the last he sawe that he was not of power to withstande the kinges great indignation, sent his Letters vnto Caius Iulius Cæsar, then being in the Countrie of Gallia, shewing him the circumstance of the matter, and excusing himselfe of all guilt, prayed him in most humble wise, that he would shortly retourne with his armie into Britayn, and he with his whole power should be readie to ayde and helpe him against the Britons.

Androgeus sent Letters to Caius Iulius Cæsar to prouoke him to warre against Cassibelan king of the Britons.

¶ Of this message Iulius was verie glad, and in all haste made toward Britayn with a great power. To whome the winde was so fauourable, that in shorte time after this message, he drewe nere the lande: But (as Gaufrid sayth) before he would land, to auoyde all treason that might be wrought by Androgeus and the Britons against him, he receyued from him vi. hostage his sonne named Scena, with .xxx. other of the most noble of his Lordship, and that done he landed with the helpe of Androgeus, whereof when Cassibelan had warning, he forthwith made towarde the Romaines, and in a Valey nere vnto Dorobernia, now named Cauntorbury, there he founde the hoste of the sayde Iulius lodged, and with him Androgeus with all his power. After which knowledge had, they fiercely with their habilliments of warre vered and grieued eche other, till at length both hostes met hande to hande, and fought cruelly, in such wise, that many fell to the ground and were slaine on both parties. But when the Britons (as sayth Gaufrid) had long foughten and knightly defended the Romaines: Androgeus Erle of Kent, came with his people in a wing vpon them, and so sharply assayled them, that they were constreyned to forsake the fielde, and place, that they before had kept; The which flight so discomfited the other, that finally all fled and gaue place to the Romaines, who pursued and slue them without all mercie. So that Cassibelan with his Britons that were left, were faine to get them to a place of suretie, there to rest and encampe themselues that they might newly prouide to withstand their enimies.

Iulius Cesar suspected Androgeus.

Iulius Cesars victory.

¶ But to conclude, all writers agree, that Iulius held the king so short, that for an vnitie and concorde, hee was faine after manye losses to geue pledges and to become tributarie to the Romaines, and to paye yerely as Gaufride sayth, in the name of a tribute, three thousande pounde in Golde. Now when Cæsar had accomplished his will and pleasure, in all thing that to him was thought necessary: He with Androgeus departed the lande with a great number of Hostages and Prisoners, and so sped him towarde Rome, where soone after he was againe by the will of the most of the Senatours made Emperour. But finally, beyng Emperour, he was at the last slaine in the Senate house, by the Senators with Bodkins, as Rastell sayeth. And this tribute was thus graunted, when Cassibelan had reigned as king of Britayn full .viii. yeres and more. And by the agreement of most writers

Iulius Cesar made this Realme tributarie to Rome, in the 50. yere before the comming of christ.

xlviij. yeres before the incarnation of Jesu Christ, or as some write fifty. And as Lanquet sayeth, this conquest of Briteyn made by the Romaines, was MM. CC. lv. yeres after the vniuersall flood: and M. lvij. after the arriuall of Brute: and. vij. C. ij. after the building of Rome, in the second yere of the. C. lxxxij. Olimpiade, and the. M. C. xvj. yere before the conquest of Englande made by Wylliam Duke of Normandy, and. M. vj. C. xvj. yeres, before this present yere of our Lorde. M. D. lxvj.

¶ Now after this conquest, Cassibelan reigned as Tributary. ix. yeres, and as sayeth Lanquet, he reigned in all, before the Tribute and after the Tribute. xix. yeres, but other write. xvj. yeres, and some other as Caxton, xvij. yeres, and then dyed, and is buried at Yorke.

EDeir, after the death of Ewyn, tooke vpon him the gouernance of Scotland, and ruled it. xxxviij. yeres. In the time of his reigne, as appereth before, Briteyn was subdued to the Romaines, and Scotland also troubled with sundry sedicions.

A traytorous person is fearefull.

THeomancius, or rather Tenantius, the sonne of Lud, and Nephew to Cassibelan, succeded in the realme of Briteyn. This Man in the Englishe Chronicle is not named King, but his brother Androgeus. But Gaufrid sayth, that for as much as Androgeus feared the hatred of the Britaynes, for his treason wrought against the king and the lande: he therefore coueted to abide with Iulius Cæsar at Rome, rather then to be king ouer such as he thought would neuer loue, nor fauour him.

¶ The foresayd Tenancius was a noble Warryer, and ruled this land of Briteyn with great diligence and iustice, and defended it well and knightly against all Alyens and straungers, and paide his tribute to the Romaines, which Cassibelan had graunted, and lastly dyed when he had reigned. xxiij. yeres, and was buried at London.

CImbelinus or Kymbelinus, the sonne of Tenancius, as sayeth Guydo, succeded next after him, who was brought vp at Rome among the Romaynes, and there made knight, and was of the Emperour Augustus Cesar so fauoured and beloued, that he was at libertie, whether he would pay the tribute or not. Of him is little written, sauing that all wryters agree, that in the time of his reigne, our Sauioure Christ Jesus was incarnate of the blessed Virgin Marie. And when this Cimbalyn had reigned. xxxb. yeres ouer the Britons, he dyed and was buried in London, leauing after him two sonnes, named Guiderius and Aruiragus.

¶ I haue before as is aboue saide declared that our Sauiour Christ was borne in this kings tyme, which was in the. xix. yere of his reigne, and that was in the yere of the worlde after the accompt of the Bible and of the Hebrues, which accompt I folow. MMM. ix. C. lxiij.

EWyn, the thirde sonne of Edeir succeded hys Father in the Realme of Scotland and reigned. vij. yeres. A Prince geuen all to vice and lechery, for being not content, as they write with an hundred Concubynes, with whome he might fulfill his lust, he made a law, that it should be lawfull for his Subiects to haue as many wyues as they were able to keepe, and that the wyues of his Commons should be common to the Nobles: and that the Lord should haue the Maydenhead of all Virgins dwelling in his Lordship: the which lawe continued vntill the tyme of Malcolme Cammore, & from thence vnto this tyme, they pay to the Lord of the soyle a redemption of their Maydenhead. And when he had thus continued.viij.yeres, in exercising of his tiranny and filthy lust, he fell into the hatred of his Lordes, and was by them deposed and slaine in prison.

Metellane, Nephew to Edeir, was chosen king of Scottes, a vertuous, and quiet Prince, who peaceably reigned.xxxix.yere. 3953 10

¶ And here I thinke meete to note to the reader, that the order that I haue kept in this my story hetherto, hath bene chiefly to expresse and set forth vnto you the pedigree and discent from Adam to Christ, in the line of the righteous, wherein is to be learned that all those that heard the voyce of the Lord, and obserued his lawes, prospered and were blessed of the Lord, and brought to high honour and aduauncement: And such againe as hearkened not to the worde of the Lord, were deliuered as prayes and spoyles to their enemies. And although sometyme, I haue vpon sundrie occasions made some notes of the lyne of cursed Cain and others, yet I haue chiefly obserued the lyne of the iust, out of the which almightie GOD promised there shoulde issue of the Seede of the Woman, one that should breake the Serpentes head, which Seede was ment by our Sauiour Jesu Christ, who in this tyme was borne of the Virgin Mary. And here I will as it were drawe forwarde the lyne where I left before, at the kinges of Juda, (in the tyme that they were made captiue to Babilon, which kinges discended out of the loynes of Dauid) and will now for the perfighting of my purpose recite the ende thereof. The last king of Juda that I haue spoken of before, was Sedechias the sonne of Josias, who was captiue in Babilon, from whom issued Joachim, and successiuely, Jechonias, Salathiell, Zorobabell, Abiud, Eliachim, Azor, Sadoth, Achim, Eliud, Eleazar, Jacob, and Joseph, who maryed Mary the Virgine, of whom was borne our Sauiour Jesu Christ.

He that heareth the word of God, and doth it, shalbe happy in his deede.

The ende of the lyne and issue of Juda was Christ.

¶ And the Virgin Mary discended also out of the Loynes of Dauid, as first Nathan, the second sonne of Dauid, begat Mathata, and he begat Menna, from whome successiuely came Melcha, Heliachim, Jona, Joseph, Juda, Symeon, Leui, Mathat, Joram, Eliezer, Jesu, Her, Helmadam, Cosan, Abdi, Melchi, Neri, Salathiell, Zorobabel, Rese, Johanna, Juda, Joseph, Semei, Mathathias, Joseph, Jamna, Melchi, Leui, Mathat, Joakim, and Marie the Virgine, who was borne.xv.yeres before Christ, and maried vnto Joseph. Flores historiarum. Polichronicon, and sondrie others.

And here for order and keping of a iust accompt, endeth the first Age of the worlde, or first part of my booke, and this first Age was from the Captiuitie of Babilon, vnto the Birth of our most blessed Redemer and Sauiour Jesu Christ, to whom be all honor, prayse, and glory, for euer and euer. Which age continued. 627. yeres.

¶And

¶ And here also I thought it conuenient to make a recitall of the Ages of the Worlde.

1 The first Age is from Adam to the Flood of Noe. 1656.yeres.

2 The second, from Noe to the birth of Abraham. 363.yeres.and.x.dayes.

3 The third, frō Abrahā to the departing of the Childrē of Israel out of Egypt. 430.yeres.

4 The fourth, from their departure, to the building of the Temple. 480.yeres.

5 The fift, from the building of the Temple, to the Captiuitie. 419.yeres.

6 The sixt, from the Captiuitie, to the birth of Christ. 627.yeres.

And thus it may apere, that the number of yeres from the Creation of the Worlde, vnto the birth of Christ, were.3963.yeres.

¶ And for the better satisfaction of those that knowe not the true summarie or accompt of the aforesayd Ages, I will shew by a perticuler accompt gathered out of the holy Scriptures, how the true knowledge of euery Age is collected, which may appere as followeth

The first Age conteyneth. M. vj. C. lvj. yeres and is proued thus.

The seconde Age conteyneth. iij. C. lxiij. yeres, and.x.dayes, and is Proued thus.

The thirde age

Abraham was in Charan.b.yeres, and departed in the.lxxb.yere of his age. And he begat Isaac, when he was an hundreth yere olde, and in the.lxb. yere of his departing. Isaac begat Jacob when he was.xl.yere olde. Jacob went into Egypt with all his family when he was. C.xxx.yere olde. And Israell remayned in Egipt CC.b. yeres, at which tyme Moses departed with the Children of Israell out of Egypt. So that the whole somme of yeres of this third Age is as afterseyd, iiij.C.xxx.yeres.

The fourth Age conteyneth.iiij.C.lxxx.yeres, and is gathered in this maner.

The fourth Age

Moses remayned in the Desart or Wildernesse.xl. yeres. Josue, and Othoniell reigned.xl.yeres. Aioth.lxx.yeres. Debora. xl.yeres. Gedeon.xl. yeres. Abimelech iii.yeres. Thela, xxiii.yeres. So that the whole somme of yeres of this fourth Age as afterseyd, is. iiij.C. lxxx.yeres.

The fift Age conteyneth.iiij.C.ix.yeres, and.vj. Monethes, and is collected in this wise.

The fift Age

Salomon reigned after he began the building of the Temple, xxxvi.yeres. Roboam xvii.yeres. Abia.iii.yeres. Asa.xli.yeres. Josaphat.xxb.yeres. Joram.viii.yeres. Ochosias one yere. Athalia the Quéne.vii.yeres. Joas.xl.yeres. Amasias.xxix.yere Ozias.lii.yeres. Joathan.xvi.yeres. Acas.xvi.yeres. Ezechias. xxix.yeres. Manasses lv.yeres. Amon.ii.yeres. Josias.xxxi.yeres. Joachas.iii. Monethes. Eliachim.xi.yeres. Joachim.xi.monethes: And then began the Captiuitie of Babilon, and not after the.xi.yere of Zedechiah (when both the Temple and the Citie were destroyed and burned) as some suppose. So that the whole somme of yeres of this fift age, are as afterseyd, iiii.C.ix.yeres, and. vi. monethes.

The sixt age is from the captiuitie of Babilon, vnto the comming of Christ, and conteyneth sixe C.xxv.yeres, and is proued thus.

The sixt Age

The captiuitie continued.lxx.yeres. The children of Israell were deliuered and restored to their fredome in the first yere of kinge Cyrus. The Temple was begonne to be reedified in the.xj. yere of the sayde Cyrus, and finished in the. vi. yere of the reigne of Darius. After that Darius had reigned. xx. yeres, Nehemias was restored to libertie, and went to builde the Citie, which was finished in Daniell. ix. the. xxxii. yere of the sayde Darius. Also it is mencioned in the. ix of Daniell that Jerusalem should be builded vp againe, and from the tyme of that building vnto the comming of Christ, should be. lxix. weekes, and euerie weeke is by that text reckoned for. vii. yeres. So lxix. weekes amount to. CCCC. lxxxii. yeres. For from the xxxii. yere of Darius vnto the xiii. yere of Augustus, in the which yere our Sauiour Christ was borne, are iust and complete so many yeres. Whereupon we reckon that from Adam vnto Christ are 3963. yeres, vi. monthes and. x. dayes. And from the birth of Christ, vnto this present time is 1567 yeres. And the whole summe and number of yeres from the beginning of the worlde vnto this present yere are 5530. yere, vi. monthes and. x. dayes.

And here is to be noted that the Ages of the worlde are not called Ages in respect of the number of yeres that they conteyned (as some doe imagine that euery age conteyned certaine thousands of yeres) but for certaine great and marueilous things that happened or were done in the beginning of euery of them.

1 In the beginning of the first Age, God made Heauen and Earth and all the Creatures that are therein, and also made Man vnto his owne Image and similitude.

2 In the beginning of the second, God sent the vniuersall Flood, and drowned all the creatures in the worlde, eyght persons onely except.

3 In the beginning of the third, God made his couenaunt with Abraham in Circumcision.

4 In the beginning of the fourth, God brought the children of Israell out of Egypt, through the red Sea, and deliuered his holy law vnto Moses out of the Mount Sinai.

5 In the beginning of the fift, was the Temple of Jerusalem builded.

6 In the beginning of the sixt. The Temple was destroyed, and all the Jewes brought captiue into Babilon.

7 In the beginning of the. vii. our Sauiour Jesu Christ was borne of a Virgin, and toke vpon him our nature, who suffered moste cruell death and passion for the sinnes of the whole worlde.

¶ Thus haue I set forth vnto you the Ages of the worlde, and why they are so called, and also the true computation of them as is expressed in the holy Scripture, which computation I obserue throughout this my Chronicle, because the same agreeing with the Scriptures must of force be most true.

When Cæsar Augustus, or otherwise called Octauian the Emperour had stablished most sure peace throughout the world, our Redeemer and Sauiour Jesu Christ, very God and man, and the onely pacifier of Gods wrath, and the true peace maker was borne in the. xl. yere of the reigne of Augustus, after the vniuersall Flood 2305. yeres, and from the birth of Abraham 2012. yeres. And after the departure of Israell out of Egypt 1509. yeres. And from the arriuall of Brute in England 1107. yres. After the building of the Temple of Salomon 1029. yeres. From the building of Rome 752. yeres. After the captiuitie of Babilon 614. yeres, and in the last yere of the 194. Olimpiade. And here is to be noted that the first yere of our Lord hath but. vii. daies after some computation, for he was borne the. xxv. day of December, and the first day of January folowing began the second yere. Lanquet.

And nowe followeth the seuenth Age of the Worlde, and the seuenth part of this booke, which Age beginneth at the birth of Christ, and shall continue to the ende of the Worlde.

The ſeuenth Age

Ieſus of Nazareth king of Iewes and onely head of the Chriſtians, with the Father and the holye Ghoſt, one Eternall God, and almightie Lorde of all things, begotten by his Father God in euerlaſtingneſſe, and in the fulneſſe of time, taking fleſh of the pure Virgin Marie, by the worke of the holy Ghoſt, and being verie God and man, according to the holy Oracles of the Prophets, to redeeme with his moſt precious blood the ſtreyed Sheepe, and loſte grote, was borne in Bethlem a City of Iuda: where incontinent by the glorification of the Angels, the agnition of the Shepeherds, the veneration of the wiſe men, the prophecy of holy Simeon, and the admiration of the Doctours, he was had in honour. And then from the. xij. yere of his lyfe, in age, wiſedome and fauour both with God and man he encreaſed: He was in the. xv. yere of the reigne of Tiberius baptiſed in Iordane by Iohn Baptiſt, to the example of his, & ſo executed all things, ſubduing his fleſhe with faſting, the Deuill with prayer, and the world with humilitie. At which time the weekes of Danyell being fulfilled, he taught euery where moſt conſtantly, euen to the Croſſe, partly with his mightie worde, and partly with his effectuall workes, the kingdome of God, that is, the true knowledge of God the Father and his exceeding charitie towardes mankinde, with the ſure confidence in him, the ſonne of God: declaring alſo the way of helth, and the mutuall loue, with the rewardes of the faithfull and punishments of the vnfaithfull. Then for the confirmation of his doctrine and faith, euen with a little beck he commaunded calmenesse to the Elements, helth to all diseases, life vnto the dead, obedience vnto the quick, detection vnto thoughts, abolicion vnto sinnes, and flight vnto the Deuill. For all this, after all the passions and labours of mans miserie, which he suffered (sinne onely excepted) whereby he witnessed himselfe to be a very man, and after the innumerable documents and beneficiall deedes (passing mans power) openly shewed vnto his vnkinde people the Iewes, by which he declared himselfe to be true God, as it was before written in the Prophets: he was by the elders of the Iewes and people (his Disciple Iudas Iscarioth betraying him) taken, accused, endited, scorned, scourged, crowned with thornes, crucified betwene theeues, and euen then all things fulfilled, with the quaking of the earth, and darknesse of the Sonne, he dyed. After which being buried, he losed Hell, and the thirde day folowing, lyke a conquerour of sinne, death and Hell, he rose againe, from which tyme being .xl. dayes conuersaunt with his, in the .xxxiij. yere of his lyfe, with glorious triumph he ascended to the heauens vnto his father, from whence he came. Where being the onely Mediator, Intercessor and aduocate of his, sitting on the right hand of God his father, shall in the ende of the worlde be iudge ouer all the lyuing and the dead, rendring to euerie man according to his deseruing, to the faithfull certeyntie of lyfe, but to the vnfaithfull euerlasting death. Then good and euill segregated, with the whole worlde purged and pacified: our Lorde Iesu Christ the onely and verie almightie Emperour of the worlde, as he hath from the beginning, so doth he now, and for euer shall reigne, to whom euerie knee of celestiall, terrestriall, and infernall creatures shall bowe, and euerie tongue shall confesse that Iesus Christ is the Lorde, to the glory of God the father. Lanquet.

¶ And from this place foreward vnto the end of this worke, the numbers that are aboue the lyne in the Margent are the yeres of Christ, and the numbers vnder the lyne, are the yeres of the reigne of euery seuerall king.

GUiderius the first sonne of Cunbalyne began his reigne ouer the Britons: This man was valiaunt, hardie, welthie, and trusted much in his owne strength, and for that he thought the Romaines had the aforenamed tribute with wrong, he therefore of a knightly courage denyed to them the payment thereof: wherefore Claudius the fift Emperour of Rome, came into Briteyn with a great armie of Romaines (as sayth Polichronica) and wanne againe the sayde tribute without great fight, and therof came a Prouerbe among the Romaines, that the Britaines were neyther strong in battaile, nor faythfull in peace. And that done, he also subdued the Isles of the Orchades, which stand beyond Scotland within the great Ocean, and after returned againe to Rome, in the first Moneth that he came from thence.

¶ But Gaufrid sayth, that in the hoste of the Romaines, there was a Capitaine named Hamo, who entending the hurte of the Britons chaunged his Shilde and Armour, and put vpon him the Armour of a Briteyn, and by that meane being not suspect, he entered into the thickest of the Britons, and lastly came where king Guiderius fought, and shortly after slue the king. But Arui-uiragus seing this sodeyne mischiefe, fearing that the Britons would haue geuen back, quickly caused himselfe to be armed with the cognisaunce and Armour of the king: And as king continued the fight with such manhood and courage, that the Romaines were at that time put to flight. And thus was Guiderius slaine of Hamo, when he had reigned ouer Briteyn. xxviij. peres, leauing after him none heyre.

CIratak, king of Scottes, reigned. xxj. yeres, a Prince more valiaunt then fortunate, he gaue his whole minde and courage to defende his Realme and subiects from the seruage of the Romaines, with whome he kept long warre, and ayded the North Britons. 30

AND in this tyme Saint Paule the elect Vessell of God, being called by a vision, was made of an open aduersarie and cruell persecutor of the Church of Christ, the most faythful Apostle and true Doctor of the Gentiles: Among whome he taught the worde of God with so great fruit, and encreased so largely the christian faith, that he was after worthily and rightly named the chiefe of the Apostles. 34 / 18 S. Paule.

ARuiragus the yongest sonne of Kymbelyn, and brother to Guiderius before slaine, was ordeyned king of Britons in the yere of our Lorde xlv. This Man did well and knightly behaue himselfe against the Romaines, and slue the afore named Hamo, nere vnto a Hauen or Port of the Sea. And when he was slaine, he threw him gobbet meale into the same sea. And for this cause, that Hauen was long tyme after called Hamons Hauen, which at this day is called Southhamtō. Fabian. But here in a very old Pamphlet, which beareth no name, I finde that in the tyme of Hengist afore mencioned, and in the reigne of Vortiger, there was a Saron named Varius Ham and he builded three townes, one in the South, and named it after his awne name South Hams towne, another North fro thence, which he named North Hams towne. Another West, and by North from thence, which he named (bicause he had there made a staple of Wolles) Wolner Hams towne. 45 / 1 Aruiragus. Southhātō. Northhātō. Wolnerhamton.

¶ Then sayth Reynulph, that Claudius after dyuers happes of Battaile, tooke Aruiragus to his grace, and brought his base daughter Genissa by name from Rome, and maryed her vnto Aruiragus. And because he woulde make the place of the mariage more solempne, he therefore called the Towne of mariage Claudiocestria after his awne name, and after Glouernia, of a base sonne (as some say) of the sayd Claudius Cesar called Glorus, begotten and borne in the same Citie, which afterwarde was Duke of Demecia or Southwales, and at this day it is called Glocester. Hector Boecius the writer of the Scottish Chronicle sayth, that Aruiragus before this mariage was made, was deuorced from his former wife, named Voada, sister vnto Caretieus king of Scottes, of a desire that he had to be alyed vnto the Romaines. Gloceſtr. Hector Boecius.

¶ Then it foloweth, after the solemnitie of this mariage, which was with all honour finished, Claudius sent certeyne Legions of his knightes into Ireland, to rule that Countrie, and returned himselfe to Rome.

¶ It was not long after the departing of Claudius, but that Aruiragus roade about his Realme, and with great diligence repayred Cities & townes before decayed and broken with the strength of the Romaines, and as it is of some mencioned, builded the Castle of Douer, and finally intreated his subiects Douer Castle.

iects with such iustice and good order, that they loued and drad him more then any of his progenitors. And this in continuance of tyme made him very welthy, and thereof ensued pryde, so that he thought great shame to be vnder the rule or guyding of the Romaynes, wherefore, at the last he denyed the Tribute before graunted to Rome, whereof, when knowledge came vnto the Senate of Rome, in all hast a Duke was sent from Rome called Uespasian, with certeyne Legions of knightes and Souldiours to subdue Aruiragus.

A legion of knightes is vj. hundred. vj. C. lxvj.

¶ When Uespasianus was landed in Britayn (as sayth Reynulph) he sped him so, that in short tyme he subdued Aruiragus to the Empire, and caused him to graunt payment of the aforesayde tribute.

¶ But Gaufride here writeth howe Aruiragus heering that Uespasianus was about to lande at Sandwich, met him there with a puyssaunt armie of the Britons, and by mayne force kept him off, that he could not enter the Hauen and land: For so great was the multitude of the sayde Britons, that the sight of them made the Romaynes afeard, insomuch that they durst not lande for feare least the other would haue sodeinly set vpon them, before they could bring themselues in aray and order of battaile, wherefore they hoysed vp their sayles, and departed from thence againe, and went to Totnes in Deuonshyre and there aryued, and beyng landed, their Capitaine and Generall Uespasianus marched incontinent towardes the towne, which then was called in the British tongue, Cair Penchuet goit, as ye would say, the Towne vnder the Wood, and at this daye is called Excestre, to the entent to besiege it. And when he had continued his siege by the space of seuen dayes, Aruiragus entending to rayse the same, sodeinly came with his armie and set vpon them, and manye went to wracke on both parties, but neither partie had the victorie of the other. On the morow both the Capitaynes were made agreed by the mediation and meanes of the Queene Genissa. Thus it apereth that the tribute was payed againe by her intreatie, and not by any violent constreynt or coaction.

¶ After Uespasian had thus recouered the tribute, he then also made subiect to the Empire an Isle lying in the Sea, which we nowe call the Isle of Wight, and after returned to Rome.

¶ When Aruiragus was thus the second tyme subdued, and brought vnder the yoke of the Romaines, he became more mylde towardes them, so that during his lyfe, from thencefoorth, he payde the tribute with lesse grudge, and kept himselfe in their fauours, in such wise that he was of them very wel beloued. And lastly he dyed, when he had reigned. xxx. yeres, and was buryed at Gloceſter, leauing after him a sonne named Marius.

Coirbreid king of Scottes.

After the decease of Caratake king of Scottes his yonger brother Coirbreid obteyned the crowne, and reigned. xviij. yeres. He was fierce and of a valiaunt courage, and beyng confederate with the Pictes, made often times warre against the Britons.

And for as much as at this time, Nero that notable Tyraunt Emperour reigned at Rome, vnder whome a great number of the true Preachers and Apostles of Christ, suffered most cruell persecution, Martirdome, and death, I thought it not much impertinent to the story to make some speciall mencion of him, and namely bicause this lande as is aforesayde, was in his tyme againe made tributarie to the Empire of Rome, the saide Nero reigning now as Emperour. But chiefely for that he was a wicked Tyraunt and a cruell a cruell persecutour of the vniuersall Church of Christ.

AT this time as is aforesayde, Nero the sonne of Domichius, being adopted to be Emperour by Claudius, which maried his mother, reigned xiiij. yeres. This man, although he was brought vp by the reuerent, wise, and learned Seneca, yet by the inuentable corruption of his nature, he became horrible in all kinde of mischiefe, and so detestable in dissolute wantonnesse, prodigalitie, monstrous lecheryes, beastly crueltie, and couetousnesse, that he seemed to be borne to the destruction of the whole worlde. He was so greatly delighted in singing and playing with the Harpe, in sworde playing, and driuing of Cartes or Wagons, that he did not onely these exercises priuately, without all measure, but also wearing the garments of Minstrels, Sworde players, and other vile personages, wandered ouer all Italy and Grece, to seeke and haunt common games, where he might trie masteries, and shewe his cunning in those feates: and at his returne, triumphed in the Citie of Rome, and sent into all Countries letters of commaundement to make supplications and reioysing for his victories.

Nero the Tyraunt.

¶ In vncleane lust of his body, he so furiously raged, that he abstayned not from his naturall Mother, Sister, ne any degree of affinitie or kindred. He tooke in open mariage a Boye of excellent fauour, named Sporus, and vsed him as his Wife, he vicyously bent and gaue himselfe to filthy imbracings of his owne seruaunts, & in riotous spending of his treasure he exceeded, for he vsed to fishe with Nettes made of Golde, which should be drawne with Cordes of Purple silke: He neuer ware one garment twise: he caused to be put to death his mother, his brother in lawe, his two Wyues, and his instructor and Schoolemaster, the reuerend Seneca, hauing therevnto no iust cause, nor honest pretence: He commaunded the City of Rome to be set on fyre, and himself in the meane season with all semblant of ioy, sitting in an high Tower to beholde the same, played vpon the Harpe, and sang the destruction of Troy. This Nero was so wicked, that at the last he gaue himselfe openly to such naughtie and wanton liuing, that in the night season he would haunte Brothell houses, and other suspitious places, and oftentimes breake vp mens houses, and eyther robbe and beate them, or else rauishe their Wyues. And after that he had committed most abhominable incest with his naturall mother, he commaunded her to be put to death. And then maried Poppea, a woman of notable incontinencie. And after all this he caused himselfe to be gelded and cut in the forme & shape of a woman, and so to be abused. And when the Senate had considered of the outragious life & wicked doinges of Nero, they charged him with the setting of Rome on fyre, and he to excuse himselfe charged the christians therewith, whereof folowed a most cruell persecution of the christians, and in this persecution Peter and Paule, the Apostles of Christ, with many other Martirs were put to cruell death. And by his beastly cruelnesse, there were also many noble and vertevous men put to most shamefull death, among the which were the aforenamed Seneca and Lucan, men of excellent learning. Finally, this wicked Tyraunt Nero was proclaymed by the Senate to be an enimie of the weale publique, and iudged to be drawne through the Citie, and to be whipped to death: wherfore he fearing to come into the handes of his enimies, fled into a Farme house of his seruants in the Countrie, where at last he was inforced to slea himselfe. At

AT this tyme the Scottes, because Corbreid Galdus the eldest sonne of king Corbreid was not of sufficient age, made Vardanius the nephew of Metellane their king, who for his seemely personage was greatly beloued of his people. In the beginning of his reigne, he vsed the counsayle of his Nobles, but after three yeres he left all iustice and honesty, and slipt into most vncleane vices and cruell tyranny, and lastly endeuoured himselfe to haue murdered Galdas with his brethren, and therefore the Scottes deposed him, and put him to death, when he had reigned. iiij. yeres.

Marius. MArius the sonne of Iruiragus, after his father was king of the Britons: which Marius as Gaufrid sayth, was an excellent wise man, and gouerned this lande very honourably, and greatly prospered and encreased in welth and ryches.

¶ In the time of the reigne of this Marius, a Duke or king of a Nation called Pictes, which descended of the Scithians, named also of some Gothes, or Hunes, came into this Isle. The aforesayde Duke or leader of the Pictes, as Gaufride sayth, was named Londricus, and he landed with a great Nauy in the Prouince of Albania, now called Scotland, and there vnmercifully he began to spoyle the Country, with swoorde and fire: whereof when Marius was warned, he in all haste assembled his knightes and people, and made towardes them, and gaue them a strong battaile, in the which Londricus was slaine, and a great part of his people ouerthrowne. In the remembraunce of which victorie, king Marius caused a great stone to be erected, and commaunded therein to be grauen these woordes, Marii victoria, that is, the victory of Marius.

Londricus a Duke of the Pictes.

Londricus slaine.

¶ This battaile as the English Chronicle sayth, was foughten at a place which now is called Stanes Moore. But where soeuer this stone is set, the Countrie thereabout was long after called VVestmaria, and is nowe called Westmerland.

Stanes Moore.

¶ Now when the residue of the people of Londricus which were fled from the fielde, vnderstood that their hed & Capitaine was slaine: they made their humble request to the king, that he would accept them into his grace, and that he would geue them some land or country to dwell in. And at the last the king graunted them a place in the farre ende of Scotland, which Gaufride nameth Catheneſia, where the sayd Scottes, or Pictes first inhabited. And forsomuch as the Britons disdeined to geue vnto them their daughters in mariage, therfore they acquainted them with the Irish men, and maryed their daughters, and grew in processe of tyme vnto a great people. And for this allyaunce betweene the Irishmen and them, their Country (as sayth Reynulph, in the xxxvij. Chapter of his first booke) was called Irelande, and after Pictauia, and lastly Scotland. But I find in an olde written Chronicle, that when they tooke the Irish women to their Wyues, and vnderstoode not their language they were therefore called Sottes, and afterward Scottes, and their countrye which before was called Albania named Scotland, and this was the beginning of the Scottes, as it is there alleaged. Howbeit, Mathew of Westminster, Author of the booke, entituled the Flowres of Histories, sayth they were called Scottes, because they were a Nation that tooke their beginning of dyuerse Nations: For Scot, sayth he, is a woorde signifiyng an heape of Martius king of Britayn geue Londricus people ſ farre ende of Scotland to inhabite in.

Reynulph.

Scotts were first called Sottes.

¶ And when Marius had thus subdued his enimies, he attended and set his minde to the common weale of his lande and subiects, and continued the residue of his lyfe in great rest and quietnesse, and in the ende payde his naturall debt or tribute, and was buried at Caerleyle, leauing after him a sonne named Coylus or Coyll, when he had reigned. liij. yeres. Marius dead.

¶ In this time the Citie and Temple of Jerusalem was taken, conquered, spoyled, and destroyed by Titus, in such wise that scarcely any man couldе iudge where the place was that it once stood in: which chaunced in the .xj. C. and one yere, after the Temple was first builded by Salomon, and the same day of the Moneth that it was first destroyed by Nabuchodonosor king of Babilon. And in the time of the siege of the same, were slaine of the Jewes xj. C. thousand, ouer and beside them which Uespasian slue in the subduing of the Countrie of Galile. And .xvij. thousand Titus sent into Alexandria there to be kept in most vile and peynfull bondage. And two thousand he brought in his triumph to Rome, of the which, parte he gaue to be deuoured of wilde beastes, and parte were otherwise most cruelly slaine: at which time apered the most terrible example of the wrath & vengeance of God, for the contempt of his worde & veritie. For what hart is so stony or hard that will not tremble for feare, when it considereth that God tooke so sharpe punishment vpon his awne people, whom before he loued most entirely, & among all other nations of the worlde, chose them for his peculier flock and Uineyarde. And shortly after Uespasian the Emperour, and Titus his sonne, triumphed at Rome for their victorie and conquest in Judea. Cooper. But hereof ye may reade more in Iosephus, and there shall ye finde a most horrible and terrible Historie. The destruction of Jerusalem and the Temple.

GIldus, after the death of Dardanus, was ordeyned king of Scottes. 79

¶ This was the most valiaunt Prince that euer reigned among them, and was endued with many excellent and Princely qualities. At the first entry he punished the wicked counsaylours of Dardanus, and after called a parliament of his Lordes, wherein many noble acts were deuised, and the naughtie lawe of king Ewyn (by the which the Wyues of the commons were free to the nobles) was repealed and fordone. Of him the Scottes made many goodly remembraunces in the honour of his noblenesse and great victories that he atchieued. A wicked law.

¶ About this time Petulius Cerealis was sente of the Romaines, as Lieutenaunt to Briteyn, where he discomfited Galdus king of Scottes, vanquished the Pictes and the Silurians, subdued to the Romaynes the Countrie of Brigantes or Yorkeshire men, ouerthrewe and chased Uodicia the daughter of the valyaunt woman Uoada, and quieted the Kentishe men, and certaine other Britons which rebelled. After this Petulius, a Romaine named Iulius Frontinus was Lieutenaunt in Briteyn, who also warred against the Scottes and Pictes. Petulius Cerealis a Romaine sent from Rome to gouerne Briteyn.

AND after the death of Galdus king of Scotland, succeded Lugtack, an hatefull and wicked tyraunt, & was as much hated of the Scottes for his vice, as his father was beloued for his vertue. He slue many of the rich men onely to confiscate their goods, and committed the gouernance of the Realme to most 104 Lugtack, king of Scottes.

to most vniust and coueteous persons, and with their company he was most delighted. He defloured his awne Auntes, Sisters, and Daughters, and scorned his wise and graue Counsaylours, calling them olde doting fooles, wherefore in the thirde yere of his reigne he was slaine of his Nobles.

106 Mogallus King of Scottes.

MOgallus, being ordeyned king of the Scottes after Lugtack, at the beginning gaue himselfe to follow the wisedome and maners of his Uncle Galdus, and obteyned diuers great victories against Lucius Antonius the Romaine Capitaine: but in his age he became hatefull in all kinde of Uices, and chiefely in couetousnesse, lecherie & crueltie. He gaue lycence to theeues and robbers to take the goods of their neighbours without punishment. He first ordeyned the goodes of condempned persons to be confiscate to the kings vse, without respect of wyues, children or debtours, for which naughtynesse he was slaine of his Nobles.

126 1 Coilus king of Bryteyn.

COilus the sonne of Marius reigned king of Bryteyn after the death of his father. This man was from his infancy nourished and brought vp among the Romaynes, by reason whereof they were louing and kinde to him, and he to them. And for as much as he knewe the power of the Romaynes to be inuincible, he yelded and payde to them the tribute during his life. This Coilus also (as Gaufride sayth) was a liberall man, by reason whereof he obteyned great loue of his Nobles, and also of his commons. And as some write, he made the towne of Colchester, but other ascribe it to one Coill that was king next after Asclepiodatus. And after that this Coilus had reigned in soueraigne peace the terme of. liiij. yeres, he dyed, and was buryed at Yorke, and left behinde him a sonne named Lucius.

144 Donarus, which was the chiefe causer of his fathers death, was made king of Scottes, who dissimuled the vices wherevnto he was naturally enclined: But assoone as he was established in his kingdome, he wasted all the rentes perteinyng to the Crowne, in his leude lustes, and gaue landes and riches to most vile and naughtie persons, because they fauoured his corrupt liuyng, he inuented new exactions vpon his people, and therfore was of his nobles cast in Prison, and his wicked counsaylours hanged. In his place Argadus guided the Realme about. xiiij. yeres.

165 Ethodius King of Scottes.

EThodius the first, nephew to Mogallus, was ordeyned king of Scottes, and reigned, xxiij. yeres. This Man was greatly delyted with hunting, and made many lawes thereof: He rewarded Argadus for his administration of iustice: He quieted the Iles, and being ayded by the Pictes, he vanquished Victorine the Romaine Capitaine, and brake downe the Wall of Adrian.

180 1 Lucy the first christian King.

LUcius, or Lucy, the sonne of Coilus, was made king of Brytons, by the ayde and authoritie of Marcus Aurelius Antonius then Emperour of Rome, who fauoured him singularly: He was a very good Man, and folowed his forefathers steps, in all that was good, and his gouernement was so graue and discrete that he obteyned the loue of all his people. This Lucius as sundrie Authors doe write, did sende to Eleutherius then Bishop of Rome, two godly learned men named Eluanus and Meduinus with certaine Epistles and Letters, prayeng him, that he and his Britons might be receyued to ued to the fayth of Christes Church. Whereof Eleutherius being very glad, sent into Briteyn two noble Clerkes, Faganus and Dunianus, or after some Fugacius and Damianus.

¶ And as the reuerend Maister Jewell, Bishop of Sarisbury, writeth in his Replye vnto Maister Hardings aunswere. Fol. 191. The sayd Eleutherius for generall order to be taken in the Realme and Churches here, wrote his aduice vnto Lucius the king in this maner folowing.

Eleutherius Bishop of Romes Letter.

Ye haue receyued in the Kingdome of Briteyn by Goddes mercy, both the lavve and fayth of Christ. Ye haue both the newv Testament and the olde: Out of the same through Goddes grace by the aduice of your Realme take a lavv, and by the same through Goddes sufferaunce, rule you your Kingdome of Briteyn: For in that Kingdome you are Goddes Vicare.

¶ Now when these learned men were come, they were honourably receyued of Lucius, the which by their good doctrine & vertevous example geuing, conuerted the king and a great part of the Britons. Now after that Lucy had thus receyued the fayth, he by the aduice of the aforesayd learned men, & with the instructions sent to him by the aforesayde Eleuthery, did institute and ordeyne, that all or the more part of the Archflamyns, which is to meane Archbishoppes, and Bishoppes of the Pagan lavv, which at that day were in number (as sayth Gaufride and other) three Archflamins, and. xxviij. Flamyns, shoulde be made Archbishoppes and Bishoppes of the Church of Christ as foloweth.

Britaynes first receyued the fayth of Christ, in the yeare of our Lorde. 188. and in. 1294. peres, next after the arrinall of Brute.

¶ The first Sea of the first Archflamyn, was at London. The seconde at Yorke, and the thirde at Glouceſter. To these three Archbishoppes were subiect the aforesayd. xxviij. Flamyns or Bishoppes. To the Archbishops Sea of London, was subiect Cornewall, & all middle England vnto Humber. To the Archbishoppes Sea of Yorke, was subiect all Northumberlande, from the Bowe of Humber, with all Scotland. And to the third Archbishoppes Sea, which was Glouceſter, there was subiect all Wales: In which Prouince of Wales were. vij. Bishoppes, where as nowe is but foure. And at that day Seuerne departed Briteyn and Wales. But after the Sarons had the rule of the land, they altered much of these orders, and to be short, there are nowe but two Archbishoppes in Englande, that is Cantorbury and Yorke, whereof Cantorbury hath the prymacie, and hath vnder him. xv. Bishoppes in Englande, that is to say, Rochester, London, Chichester, Winchester, Salesbury, Exceter, Bathe, Worceſter, Hereford, Couentry and Lichefield, Chester, Lincolne, Orford, Ely, and Norwich. And in Wales he hath. iiij. Bishoppes, Landaffe, S. Dauids, Bangor, and S. Asaph, commonly called S. Asse. And Yorke hath but two Bishoppes in Englande vnder him, which is Caerleyll, and Durhame.

¶ Beſydes these good orders taken, the sayd Lucius destroyed the temple of the false God Apollo, which then stood in a place called the Isle of Thorney nere London, and was so called for that it was a place all ouergrowne with Thornes, and he erected and made the sayde Temple a place dedicated to the honour of God, and named it Westminster, as it is called at this day, and endowed the same with such and so great priuileges, that what person soeuer could escape to the sayd Church, for what trespasse so euer it were, the same should be safe body and goodes.

¶ Now

¶ Now after that Lucius had thus set this realme in good order, he died, when he had reigned. xiij. yeres, leauing behinde him none heyre, which was the occasion of great trouble to the Realme: For the Britons among themselues coulde not agree vpon a Gouernour, by reason whereof there was among them great discord, which continued the space of. xv. yeres, in the which time, the Empire and Senate of Rome apointed their Lieutenauntes to gouerne and reigne ouer this Realme.

196 Satrahell king of Scottes.

Satrahell the brother of Ethodius (because his sonnes were not of sufficient age to gouerne the Realme) was ordeyned king of Scottes, he was of false and subtile wit, and geuen to such cruelty, that for feyned causes he slue all the frendes of Ethodius to the intent to defraude his heires of the crowne, wherfore he was murdered of his familiers when he had reigned. iiij. yeres.

199 Money first coyned in Scotland.

Donald, an humble and gentle Prince was chosen king of Scottes, and reigned. xxi. yeres. He was the first king that coyned any money of Gold or Siluer in Scotland, for the Scots vsed before enterchaunging of wares for chaffer, and one thing for another, and had no money of their awne, but of the Britons and Romaines, and other externall Nations.

The Britōs receyued the fayth of christ xx. yeres before Scotland.

¶ About the yere of our Lorde. CC. iij. this Donalde procured certeyne wise and learned men to instruct him, his Wyfe, Children, and Subiectes in the fayth of Christ, which happened, 533. yeres after the beginning of the Realme of Scotland.

208 1 Seuerus.

Seuerus Emperour of Rome hering of the great discorde in Briteyn, made haste from Rome, and came into this land to apease the byrores of the same. And at this time the Scottes and Pictes inuaded Briteyn, and vexed the Britons very sore: wherfore Seuerus caused a Wall of Turues to be made, wherein were driuen great stakes, which Wall as sayeth Polichronica was in length. Cxxij. Miles, and it began at the Riuer of Tyne and stretched to the Scottishe See, or from the ende of the Lordship of Deira vnto the sayde Scottishe See, or after some Writers, from Durham to the See aforesayde. A wall of Turues.

¶ And now Fulgenius the chiefe leader and Capitaine of the Pictes issued out from Albania or Scotland into the land of Briteyn, & destroyed much of the Countrie beyonde Durham. Wherefore Seuerus with an hoste of Britons and of Romaines met with the sayde Fulgenius in a place nere vnto Yorke, where after sore fight, the sayde Seuerus was slaine, when he had ruled this land fiue yeres, and was buried at Yorke, leauing behinde him two sonnes the one named Geta and the other Bassianus, betweene whome there was and euer had bene from the beginning mortall hatred and enmity.

Bassianus Caracalla, after the death of his father, began to rule thys land of Briteyn, he was a Man of nature cruel and fierce and hable to endure all paines and labours, specially in warfare. But as Gaufrid sayth, after the death of Seuerus, great strife arose betweene the Romaines and the Britons then being within the land of Briteyn. For the commons helde for their king Bassianus because he was borne of a Britishe Woman: And on the other side, the Romaines allowed Geta for their king, because he descended of a Romaine. And for this dissension a battaile was foughten betweene twene the sayde two brethren, in the which Geta was slaine, and Bassianus remayned for king ouer all the land. Geta slaine.

¶In the time that Bassianus was now both Emperour and king of Bryteyn, one named Carassus a Bryton of lowe birth, but valiaunt and hardie in martiall affaires: purchased of the Emperour the keeping of Bryteyn, or as some write onely of the coastes of Bryteyn, and promised to withstand the malice of straungers, as the Pictes and others. By meane whereof Carassus drewe vnto him many knightes, and spetially of the Brytons, promising to them that if they woulde make him king, he would cleerely deliuer them from the seruitude of the Romaines. By reason wherof the Brytons (as saith Gaufride) rebelled against Bassianus, and with their Duke and leader Carassius arrered against him deadly warre, conceyuing the better hope of victory because he was priuily certified of the Emperours death, who was then slaine by a seruant of his owne in Mesopotamia, when he had ruled this land sixe yeres.

¶But Polidore affirmeth that this Carassus tooke on him the gouernance of Bryteyn in the time of Diocletian, and sayeth that this lande was in good quietnesse the space of.lxxvj.yeres, with whome the Latyn Stories seeme to agree.

CArassus reigned after Bassianus ouer Bryteyn, who as before is expressed, was by the Emperour of Rome deputed for a substitute or a ruler vnder him. This Carassus for that he was not of power to withstande the Pictes, or for the fauour that he bare vnto them for ayding him against the Romaines: gaue to them the Countrie of Albania, that nowe is called Scotland: But here is not meant all Scotlande. For as witnesseth Polichronica, that parte which was thus geuen to the Pictes, was the South parte of Albania, and beganne at Twede, and endured to the Scotishe Sea. Of the nature and kinde of these Pictes, is somewhat shewed before, in the story of Marius, but more shall bee shewed hereafter in place conuenient, both of their offspring and maners.

Note that Albania now called Scotland was wholy in the possession of Carassus, and he gaue the same to the Scottes and Pictes.

¶Nowe it foloweth when the Romaines had knowledge of the death of Bassianus, they forthwith sent a Duke from Rome named Allectus, with three Legions of knightes to subdue and vanquishe Carassus, who in the ende slue him, when he had ruled ouer the Brytons. viij. yeres, and such as are disposed may read more of this man in Fabian and others.

EThodius the seconde was ordeyned king of Scotlande and reigned. xxj. yeres, he was of dull wyt, geuen to auarice and gathering of riches, and nothing meete to gouerne the Realme: wherefore his Nobles tooke vpon them the charge, and so continued all the time of his reigne.

ALlectus a Duke or Consull of Rome, sent as before is sayde from the Senate of Rome, began to rule the Brytons: and first he restored the land to the subiection of Rome, and then pursued certaine of the Brytons that had fauoured Carassus against the Romaines. And in that doing, he vsed and exercised many tyrannies and exactions, by reason whereof he fell in grudge and hatered of the Brytons. Wherefore, they entending to oppresse and subdue the power of the Romaynes, procured and excited a Noble man of the Britons called Asclepiodatus Duke of Cornewall to take vpon him to be their Captaine, who gathered a great hoste of the Britons, and made warre vpon the Romaines, and chased them from Countrie to Countrie, and from Towne to Towne: and lastly Alectus with his Romaines drewe him to London and there abode for his more suretie. Whereof Asclepiodatus being warned, he with his Britons came nere vnto the sayde City, where by meanes of prouocation of eyther partie vsed, at the last, the Romaines issued out of the Citie and gaue battaile to the Britons. In the which fight many fell on eyther partie, but the more on the partie of the Romaines, among the which was slaine Alectus, wherfore a Capitain of the Romaines called Liuius Gallus, perceiuyng this mischiefe, and the great daunger that the Romaines were in, drewe back into the Citie with the Romaynes that were left aliue, and defended it with their powers. This was Alectus slaine of the Britons when he had reigned and ruled this land vnder the Romaines the space of.bj. yeres.

ASclepiodatus or Asclepiodotus Duke of Cornewall (as sayeth Gaufride) tooke vpon him the gouernement of the Britons, and with a great armie besieged London, and kept the aforesayde Liuius Gallus and hys Romaines in streight holde, and with knightly force and violence entered the sayde Citie, and slue the aforenamed Liuius Gallus, nere vnto a Brooke which then was within the sayde Citie, and threwe him into the sayde Brooke: By reason whereof, the same was from thence forth called Gallus Brooke, or Wallus Brooke, and at this time the place where that Brooke was, is called Walbrooke. And after Asclepiodatus had thus vanquished the Romaines, he held this lande a certaine of time peaceably and quietly, and ruled the Britons with good iustice.

This brooke came from ỳ place which we call nowe Moore field, and that place being then a marish, ỳ water ran from thence thorow London into Thames

¶ And in this time by the motion of some lewde and vnquiet persons, there grewe displeasure betweene the kinge and a Duke of this lande, named Coill, the which as some say builded Colchester and named it after his owne name in the Britishe tongue Caercolyn, but what the matter of displeasure was, is not apparaunt. But howsoeuer it was, a great number of people were arreysed and assembled on both partes, and in the ende met in the field, where was foughten a great and fierce battaile, wherin Asclepiodotus was slaine, when he had reigned ouer this realme.xxx.yeres.

At the beginning, he shewed some tokens of honest towardnesse: but after he was so wrapped in all vncleane vice and effeminate lustes, that he was not ashamed to go openly in the sight of the people playyng vpon a Flute, and reioyced more to be a Fidelar than a Prince: Finally, being pursued for rauishing of the daughters of Nathalas, by a noble man of Argile, he slue himselfe.

Coill

COill, Erle of Colchester tooke vpon hym the gouernaunce of Bryteyn, and ruled the same very well for a certeine tyme. But as Gaufride saith: when the Senates of Rome had vnderstanding of the death of Asclepiodatus, they were ioyous of his death, for that he had euer bene an enemie to the Empire: But forasmuch as at those dayes ꝑ Romaines themselues were at great dissention, they could not conueniently send any army to warre vpon this Coilus, by reason whereof he continued the lenger in rest and peace. 226 1

¶ Howbeit at length, the Senate sent a noble and wyse man called Constantius, who when he was arriued in Bryteyn with his army, anone Coilus assembled his Britons: But before he proceded further, he sent an Ambassade to the said Constantius, for that he feared the strength and fame of him, which Ambassade declared vnto hym condicions of peace, & graunt of the paiment of the Tribute: But finally, while this matter was in talke, Coilus dyed, & then the Britons for peace sake, entreated this noble man to take to wife Heleyn the daughter of Coilus, with the possession of the land of Bryteyn, which by him was graunted. And thus Coilus when he had reigned. xxviij. yeres dyed. Constantius sent from Rome to gouerne Bryteyn.

AT this tyme Findock the eldest sonne of Athirco was made kinge of the Scottes, he kept peace with the Romaines, and Britons, and quieted the rebellion of Donald (a noble man of the Isles) by whose counsayle, through the consent of his awne brother Carance, he was afterwarde slaine, when he had reigned. x. yeres. 263 Findock king of Scottes.

DOnald was king of Scottes one yere, he was taken in battail by Donald of the Isles, and shortly after he dyed. 273

AFter the death of king Donald, great trouble was in Scotland: For Donald of the Isles tooke on him the Crowne, which was Donald the third, and vsed much Tyranny the space of xij. yeres: He neuer laughed, but when he heard of the disorde and slaughter of his Nobles, and therefore in the end for his cruelnie he was slaine of Craithlint the sonne of Findock, with. CC. of his naughtie Counsaylours. 274 Donald of ꝑ Isles king of Scotes.

CRaithlint the sonne of Findock, after the death of Donald the Tyraunt, was made king of Scottes, and reigned xviij. yeres, with great wisedom and iustice. In his tyme happened great variance betweene the Pictes and the Scottes (which continued frendes from the tyme of Fergus the first king of Scottes, to these dayes) for stealing of a Greyhounde, whereof ensued great murder and slaughter on both partes. 286 Craithlint king of Scottes.

COnstantius afore sayde, tooke vpon him the gouernement of the Britons, and as is aboue sayde, first maryed Heleyn the Daughter of Coilus, last king of Bryteyn, which Heleyn was very beutifull and fayre, and therewith had learning and many other vertues, and after gouerned Bryteyn very wisely and honorably: But within short tyme after, Diocletian, and Maximinian had geuen by the Imperiall auctoritie, he was chosen Emperour, and reigned Emperour and king of Bryteyn. xix. yeres, and then dyed, and is buried in Yorke, leauing after him a sonne named Constantine. 289 1 Constantius

¶ This Constantius was a Man of great affabilitie, clemency, and gentlenesse, and therewithall very liberall, endeuouring alwaies to enriche his subiectes, little regarding his awne treasure, thinking that to be his that the Commons had. Wherefore he sayde, that it was better that priuate persons had the common treasure to the vse of the weale publique, then the same to be locked vp in Princes Cofers. In feastiuall dayes when he bade his Nobles to any banket, he borowed Plate of his friendes to furnishe his Cubbardes withall. Cooper.

Cõstantine.

COnstantine the sonne of Constantius and of Helyn, daughter of king Coilus, reigned ouer Britayn after his father, and ruled the lande with much equitie. And albeit, that at this time he was a heathen and Pagan, yet he vsed no tirannie, neither did he compell the Britons to refuse their law, and to worship Idols, as other Tyrants before had done.

¶ In this time, while Constantine ruled the Britons, one Maxencius which was the sonne of Herculeus Maximianus sometime felow in the Empire with Diocletian, was of the prætorian Souldiours declared Emperour. This Maxencius did there behaue himselfe the worst of all men, and enterprised all maner of tirannie, and persecuted the christians with all kindes of torments. And when Constantine heard of the tiranny of this man. He assembled a great hoste of Britons and Galles for to oppresse his outrage and malice.

¶ And for to rule and guyde this land of Britayn in his absence, he ordeyned a man of might called Octauius, which then was king of Wales & Duke of Gwiscop, which some expound to be Wessex, some Cornewall, and some Wynsore, to haue the gouernement of this dominion. Now when he had prouided all things necessarie for his voyage, he betooke the lande of Britayn to Octauius, and sped him forward in his iourney.

¶ After whose departure, and during the time that he was occupied in the affaires of the Empire, Octauius being Lieutenaunt in Britayn vnder the sayde Constantine, ruled the lande to the contentation of the Britons for a certaine time. But when he perceyued that he was in fauour with them, and also that Constantine was nowe farre from him, and considering with hymselfe also, that the sayde Constantine being then Emperour, would not, nor could not so lightly returne into Britayn: he therefore with the helpe of his friendes and such as he was alyed with, withstood the Romaines that were left in Britayn by Constantine, and vsurped the rule & dominion of the land: whereof when Constantine was truely certified, in all haste he sent a Duke into Britayn, named Trayherne, the which was Vncle vnto Helyn the mother of Constantine.

Octauius vsurped the gouernment of Britayn.

Trayherne.

¶ When this Trayherne was arriued in Britayn with three Legions of souldiours or men of warre: anon Octauius made toward him with his Britons, and met him nere vnto the Citie then called Caerperis, and nowe named Portchester, but more truely in a Fielde nere vnto the Citie of Caerguent, which at this day is called Winchester.

Portchester
Winchester

¶ Now when the two hostes were met, they ioyned a most eger and cruell battayle, wherein was a long and terrible fight. But in the ende, Trayherne was inforced to forsake the Fielde, and withdrew himselfe and his Romaines into Albania or Scotlande. Whereof Octauius being warned, followed him, and in the Countrie of Westmerland gaue him the second battaile, where then Octauius was chased and Trayherne had the victorie, the which pursued Octauius so egerly, that he compelled him to forsake the lande of Britayn and to sayle into the Countrie of Norwaye for his safe garde.

¶ But

¶ But it was not long after, but the sayd Octauius gathered a newe power of people, aswell of Britons as also of Norwayes, and was redye to returne againe into Briteyn. In which tyme an Erle of Briteyn that entirely loued Octauius by treason slue the sayd Traherne a little before the landing of Octauius aforesayde, who afterwardes reigned in this lande at the least. liiij. yeres. but not without great and often warres made by the Romaines. And this shoulde be as most writers doe affirme, when Constantyne with the ayde of Traherne had ruled this lande. x. yeres. But Polidore affirmeth that this Realme was in good quiet all the tyme of Constantyne and his successors vnto the. iiij. yere of Gracian, and maketh no mencion of this Octauius, whereby it may apere what great varietie there is euen among the best and most approued story writers.

Traherne slaine.

¶ This Constantine was a right noble and valiaunt Prince, and the sonne of Helena, a woman of great sanctimony and borne in Briteyn, the which Elyn as it is reported of her, founde the Crosse at Jerusalem, on the which our Sauiour Christ suffered his passion, and three of the Nayles wherewith his handes and feete were pierced.

¶ The sayd Constantine was so mightie in Martiall prowesse, that he was surnamed Constantine the great. Of whome it is further written, that when he was in his voyage or iourney, which he made against Maxencius the Tyraunt, who was an extreme persecutor of the Christians, he saw in the night season, the signe of the Crosse shining in the Element lyke a fyre, and an Angell by it saiyng on this wise: In this signe thou shalt ouercome. Wherefore receyuing great comfort thereby, he gathered such a courage, that shortly after he vanquished the armie of Maxencius and put him to flight, who in the chase was drowned in Tyber.

Constãtine the great.

¶ Finally this good Emperour had the fayth of Christ in such reuerence, that alway most studiously he endeuoured to augment the same. And in witnesse of his beliefe, he caused the booke of the Gospelles to be borne before him. And further made the Bible to be copyed out, and sent into all partes of the Empire. Of this man, the kynges of Briteyn had first the priuelege to weare close Crownes or Diademes. He ended his lyfe at Nicomedia, whete he receyued Baptisme by Eusebius Bishop there, and was buried at Constantinople, called before Bizance, who lust to know more of his actes and life, may read the sayd Eusebius, who hath written a speciall treatise therof extant among his other workes.

FIncormake, after the death of his Cosyn Cairthquint, was ordeyned king of Scottes, and reigned. xlvij. yeres. 310

OCtauius Duke of the Jesses, tooke vpon him againe to rule as king of Briteyn, and in the tyme of his reigne, he gathered such plentie of Treasure that he feared no man, and he ruled the land peaceably, saue that he was now and then as is aforesayd, troubled with warres by the Romaines. And of him is no notable thing written, except that when he was fallen into age, by the counsaile of the Britons, he sent vnto Rome for a yong Man of the kindred of Heleyn mother vnto Constantyne called Maximianus, to whome Octauius offered his daughter in mariage, and to yelde vnto him the kingdome of Briteyn, the which when Maximianus vnderstood, he consented 329 1 thereunto, and prepared in all haste for his voyage, and shortly after he with a conuenient companie landed at Southhamton, whereof Conan Meriadock beyng warned did purpose to haue fought with the sayd Maximianus, & thought to haue distressed him, for so much as he knew right wel, that by him he should be put from the rule of the land. But this purpose was letted by the commaũdement of the king, or otherwise, so that the sayd Maximianus, was conueyed safely to the kinges presence: and shortly after the king with the consent of the more partie of his Lordes, gaue his daughter in mariage vnto the sayd Maximianus, with the possession of this Isle of Britteyn. The which mariage beyng solemnised, and ended, the said Octauius dyed shortly after, when he had reigned as the most writers agree. liiij. yeres.

358 Romake king of Scottes.

After the death of Fincormake king of Scottes, because his heyres were but children, fierce warre was arreared betweene two noble men called Angusiane, and Romak, for the gouernaunce of the Realme: whereof ensued much trouble in the Realme of Scotlande, and great displeasure thereby engendered betwene the Scottes and the Pictes, for as much as by the ayde of the Pictes Romake tooke on him the kingdome, and vsed great crueltie three yeres.

362 Angusian king of Scottes.

Not long after the Nobles of Scotland assembled themselues and set vpon Romake their king and slue him, and then was Angusiane ordeyned king: Betwene whome and the Pictes was great warre for the death of Romake, and in the ende therof both Angusiane and Nectanus king of Pictes were slaine. Then was Fethelmake crowned king, which vanquished the Pictes, and was after slaine in his bed by two Pictes, which were his seruauntes.

366 Eugenius king of Scottes.

About this time one Eugenius the first, was made king of Scottes. Here the Scottishe Historie maketh a long processe of the fierce & cruell warre that this king kept against Maximus the Romaine Capiteyn, and the Pictes and Britteyns, which I thinke to be of no more credit than the residue of their Historie, that they haue feyned from the beginning. For vndoubtedly, if they had put the Romaines to so much trouble as their Chronicles shewe, both in the tyme of the Conquest and after: Cæsar, Tacitus, Plinie, and other woulde haue made some mencion of the Scottes, as they did of the Trinobantes, Cenimagnes, Segontiaces, Bibraces, Brigantes, Silures, Icenes, and diuerse other.

379 Note here that the Britons had the possession of all Scotland.

¶ The Scottes say, that in this time, after long and cruell warre made by the aforesayde Maximianus, they were vtterly extermined and driuen out of their Realme into Ireland and other Countries, and that then the said Maximus the Romain, placed in their land the Pictes and Britons. And Hector Boecius sayth, it was for rebellion: But rebellion could it not be properly named, except they had beene subiectes.

Maximianus or Maximus, the sonne of Leonyn and Colyn Germain to Constantine the great, tooke vpon him the gouernement of this Iland of Britteyn. This man was strong and mightie, but for that he was cruell against the Christians, he was called Maximianus the Tyraunt. Betwene this man and Conan before named, was great enuy and strife, and diuers conflictes and battayles were foughten, in the which eyther parte of them sped diuersly: howbeit, at the last, they were made Friends. So that Maximianus reigned a while in quiet, and gathered ryches and treasure, but not not altogither without murmure and grudge. Finally, he was prouoked and excited to make warre vpon the Galles, through which counsayle, he with a great hoste of Britons sayled into Armorica that now is called little Briteyn, where he bare him selfe so valiauntly that he subdued that Countrie vnto his Lordship, and after gaue the same vnto Conan Meriadok, to holde of him and his successours the kings of great Briteyn for euer. And then commaunded the sayde land to be called little Briteyn.

Armorica is called little Briteyn.

¶ Now for this victorie, the Souldiours of Maximianus proclaymed him Emperour, by reason whereof, he being the more exalted in pride, passed further into the landes of the Empire, and victoriously subdued a great parte of Gallia and all Germania. For this deede, dyuers Authours doe accompt him false and periured, wherefore it should seeme that before his comming from Rome, he was sworne to Gracian and Valentinian the Emperours, that he should neuer clayme any part of the Empire.

Maximianus proclamed Emperour

¶ Now after that worde was brought vnto the Emperours that Maximianus had by force of armes thus subdued Gallia and Germania: Gracianus with a great hoste came downe to resist him. But when he heard of the Marciall deedes of Maximianus, he feared and fled back to the Citie of Lyons in Fraunce: where afterwardes the sayde Gracianus was slaine, and his brother Valentinian compelled to flee to Constantinoble, for safegarde of hys lyfe.

¶ Then Maximianus to haue the more strength to withstand his enimies, made his sonne named Victour, felow of the Emperour. And in this time that Maximianus warred thus in Italy, Conan Meriadoke, to whome as aforesayde Maximianus had geuen little Briteyn, for so muche as he and his Souldiours had no will to marrie the daughters of the Frenchmen, but rather to haue Wyues of their owne blood: sent Messengers vnto Dionotus then Duke of Cornewall and chiefe ruler of Briteyn, wylling him to send his daughter Ursula with a certaine number of Virgins to be coupled to him and his knightes in marriage, the which soone after was prepared according to the request of Conan, the aforesayde Ursula accompanied with. xj. thousand Virgins, were sent by her sayde father toward little Briteyn, as sayeth Gaufrid and other. But truely it appereth rather to be a Fable, and the writers herein doe not agree, and therefore I will wade no further therein. But to returne where I left.

Ursula commonly called Saint Ursula.

A fable.

¶ Maximianus, being thus occupied in warres in Italy, two Dukes named Gwanus or Guanius Capitaine of the Hunes & Melga, king of Pictes, the which as Gaufrid saith, were set on by Gracian and Valentinian the Emperours, to punishe and subdue the Britons that fauoured the parte of Maximianus, warred sore vpon the coastes of great Britaine, and occupied a great parte of Albania. Whereof when Maximianus had knowledge he sente into great Briteyn a knight and Capitaine called Gracianus, the which with two Legions of Souldiours bare himselfe so valiauntlye, that in a short time he chased the sayde two Dukes into Ireland, and helde the land of Briteyn in good peace to the behoofe of Maximianus.

¶ In this tyme Maximianus continuing his warre against the Empire, and entending to be Emperour. Theodocius named the elder, being then Emperour of the East part of the worlde hering of the death of Gracian, and the chasing chasing of Valentinian his brother, sped him with a great power towarde Maximianus, and shortly after at a Citie in Italie named Aquileia tooke the sayde Maximianus and him beheadded.

WHen knowledge of the death of Maximianus was come to Gracian, who then had the rule of great Britayn, he seased the land and made himselfe king of Britayn by strength, when or after that Maximianus had gouerned the same, as most Writers doe beare wytnesse, the space of viij. yeres.

¶ This Gracian hauing nowe obteyned the souereigne authoritie, became a verie cruell Prince and exercised all tyranny and exaccion vpon the people, for which cause he was abhorred of all the Britons, and by them was slaine when he had reigned foure yeres. Then was the Realme a good space without a head or gouernor, in the which time the Britons were oftentimes sore vexed with the aforesayde Barbarous people and their forrein enimies.

IN this time was Augustine the most famous & learned Doctor of Christes Church: he was Bishop of Hippone a Citie in Affrique. This man was of such excellent wyt, that in his childhood he learned all the liberall Sciences without any instructor, and in all partes of Philosophy was wonderfully well learned. At the beginning he fauoured the opinions of them which be called Manichees, but by the continuall prayer of his good mother Monica: and the persuasion of holy Saint Ambrose, he was conuerted tothe true faith. They both of them being replenished with the holy Ghost, sang the Psalme, Te deum, aunswering mutually one to another. And afterwardes, in prayer writing and preaching he so much profited the Church, that to this daye hys name is worthily had in honour and reuerence of all men.

THe Scottes (according to their Histories) vnder their king Fergus the second, returned out of Ireland into Albion, and continuing the reigne of three kings, that is Fergus, Eugenius and Dongarde, pursued the Britons with most cruell warres. But here they dissent from the English Chronicles, as well in the computation of tymes, as in the relacion of the whole Historie, For after Beda, Gildas and other auncient and credible Writers, the Scottes came first about this time out of Ireland into that Countrie, which they afterwards named Scotland. But howsoeuer these Histories agree, truth it is that the Scottes being confederate with the Pictes, not long from this time, by consent of all Writers, inuaded and spoyled the lande of Britayn so cruelly, that the Britayns were constreyned to sende for ayde to the Romaines, promising that they would perpetually be subiect to the Empire: which request was heard, & a Capitaine sent with a Legion of Souldiours, who within a fewe dayes chased their enimies out of the land, teaching them to make a Wall of Torues and stakes, ouerthwart the lande, from Sea to Sea, that is to meane from the water of Humber to the Scottishe Sea, and ordeyned them Wardeyns and keepers of the Wall (wherewith their enimies might be kept back out of the land) and then they tooke leaue of

¶ But notwithſtanding the ſayd wall, the Britons were againe inuaded by the Pictes and Scottes, who ſpoyled the Country verye ſore: So that they were driuen to ſeeke for newe helpe of the Romaines, who ſent to them againe a company of Souldiers, which eftſones chaſed the Pictes, and made a wall of ſtone of .viij. foote thicke, and in heigth .xij. foote: which thing when they had done, comforting the Briteynes, and admoniſhing them hereafter to truſt to their awne manhood and ſtrength, they returned again to Rome. A wall of ſtone.

¶ The Scottes and Pictes yet once againe after the departure of the Romaines, entred the lande of Briteyn, and ſpoyled the countrie, and chaſed the commons ſo cruelly, that they were altogether comfortleſſe, and brought to ſuch miſery, that eche robbed and ſpoyled other, and ouer this the ground was vntilled, whereof enſued great ſcarcetie and hunger, and after hunger death. 433

In this neceſſitie they ſent for ayde to Aecius the Romaine Capitaine beyng then occupied in warres in a part of Gallia. But they had no comfort at his hand. And therefore were forced to ſend Ambaſſade to Aldroenus king of little Briteyne to deſyre of him ayde and comfort, which they obteined vpon condicion, that if they atchiued the victory, Conſtantyne his brother ſhould be ordeyned king of great Briteyn, for to that day they had no king. Which thing beyng graunted of the Ambaſſadours, the ſaid Conſtantine gathered a company of Souldiours, and went forth with them. And when he had manfully vanquiſhed the enimies, and obteyned the victory, according to promes made, he was ordeyned king, & guyded this land .x. yeres with ſuch manhood and pollecy, that he kept it in quietneſſe & from daunger of ſtraunge enemes. Here endeth the Dominion and tribute of the Romaines ouer this land of Briteyn, which had continued the ſpace of. 483. yeres.

COnſtantine the ſecond, who was the brother of Aldroenus king of little Briteyn, was crowned king of great Briteyn and guyded wel the land the ſpace of .x. yeres, and in great quietneſſe. Of this Conſtantyne is little written, except ỳ he had by his wife thre ſonnes, ỳ which were named, Conſtancius, Aurely Ambroſe, & Uter ſurnamed Pendragon. But for that he ſawe his eldeſt ſonne named Conſtancius to be dull and inſolent of wit, he therefore made him a Monke in the Abbey of S. Swithines at Wincheſter. And the other two brethren, he betoke vnto Gwethelinus Archbiſhop of London to nourich and inſtruct. Some wryte that Conſtancius entred into religion of pure deuocion, without the conſent or knowledge of the king his father. 433 1

¶ In the Court of this Conſtantyne (as ſayth Gaufride) there was a Pict, that was much loued & greatly fauoured of him, ſo that he might at all times come to the kinges preſence, when he would himſelfe. The which beyng an arrant Traytour, and ſerching conuenient time to execute his deteſtable treaſon, by a ſecret meane ſlue the king in his Chamber, when he had reigned as king .x. yeres. the Scottes one of the same name, who was named Constantyne the first, he was a wicked Prince, and geuen wholy to filthy lust and pleasure of the body, and without all vertue of policye or noblenesse, wherefore in the ende he was slaine for rauishing of a noble mannes daughter.

COnstantius, the sonne of Constantyne, by the meane of Vortigerus Duke of Cornewall, or as some write of the Iewelles, after called West Barons, was made king of Briteyn. This man as before is mencioned, was thought by his father, for that he was dull of wit and hawtye of minde to be therefore vnmete to take the charge of the Gouernement vpon him, and therfore his father made him a Monke as afore sayde. But now it came so to passe that by the practise and procurement of Vortiger he was taken out of the Abbey and made king: By meane whereof the sayd Vortiger had all the rule of the lande, so that Constance had but onely the name.

Constancius first a Monk and then a king.

¶ This Vortiger then considering the innocencye and mildenesse of the king, cast in his minde how he might be king himselfe. And among other meanes, he practised to haue about the king an hundreth Pictes, to waite and attend vpon his person as a garde, which beyng brought to passe, he bare him selfe so friendly towardes the sayde Pictes, and shewed him selfe so liberall vnto them euery way, that at length he had thereby so wonne their good will and fauour, that they abashed not to say openly, that he was more worthy to be king than Constance.

A Garde first appointed to attend on the king.

¶ And in this while Vortiger gate into his possession the kinges Castels and treasure, and looke what he commaunded, that was done, though some did murmure and grudge thereat, and euer in right or wrong he fauoured the aforesayd Pictes.

¶ Now when he sawe that he had wonne all their fauours, he made them all dronke on a tyme, and then declared vnto them in that case his pouertie and miserie, and that with teares, saying howe he was not able of his awne proper reuenew to wage somuch as fiftie Souldiours, and with that he departed from them vnto his lodging, as a man altogether dismayde, leauing them still drinking and quaffing in the Court. The Pictes hearing him say so, beyng nowe distempered and set in a rage by reason of Wyne, murmured one of them to another, saying, why do we not kill this blockish Monke, that this noble Man Vortiger, who is so good and beneficial a Lord vnto vs may enioy the Crowne. And with that they rose vp in their dronken moode, and fell vpon the king and slue him.

Constancius slaine.

¶ After which cruell deede so by them done, they presented the head of Constance vnto Vortiger. Wherof when he was ware, and to thentent that the Britons should thinke that deede to be done against his minde and will, he wept and made semblaunce of all sorow and heauinesse, and caused the sayd hundreth Pictes forthwith to be taken, and them by the iudgement of the law of the lande to be beheaded, by reason whereof he was iudged not to be culpable, but innocent of the kinges death.

The kings Garde put all to death.

¶ When the kings death was knowne to such persons as had the keeping of the two yonger brethren, Aurelius & Uter, they in all haste for the sauegard of themselues fled into little Briteyn, & there kept them vntill it pleased God otherwise to prouide for them. And thus as ye haue heard was king Con-

Ongallus, the sonne of king Nongarde was ordeyned king of Scotland after the Death of Constantine. He was geuen to peace, quietnesse, and iustice, and was a good and moderate Prince. 446

Vortiger after the death of Constance, by force made himselfe king of Briteyn, and ruled, but not all without trouble. For it was not long or that the Pictes hauing knowledge of the death and destruction of their knightes and knismen, inuaded the Northpartes of the land, & did therin great domage and hurt. And besides this, many of the nobles of the Britons perceyuing that king Constance was not murdered altogether without the consent of the sayde Vortiger, rebelled against him, and daily sent and sayled ouer into little Briteyn to the ayde and assistaunce of the aforesayde children of Constantine, which put the sayde Vortiger to great vnquietnesse, the more for that that he wist not, nor knewe not in whome he might put his trust and confidence. 448

¶ Now yet in all this broyle and vnquiet time, there was in this Realme so great plentie of Corne and fruite, that the lyke thereof had not bene seene in many yeres passed, wherewith was ioyned lecherie and pestilence, with many other inconueniences, so that it was accompted for small or none offence. The which reigned not onely in the Temporaltie, but also in the Spiritualtie and heads of the same. So that euerie man turned the poynt of his Speare against the true and innocent man, and the commons gaue themselues altogether to dronkennesse and Idlenesse, by reason whereof ensued fighting, strife, and much enuie. Of which afore sayd mischiefes ensued much mortalitie and death of men, that the lyuing scantly suffised in some Countries to burie the dead. And besides this, the king was so heard beset with the afornamed enemies, that he was constreyned, as sayth Polichronica, to sende for Paynems, as the Saxons, to helpe to withstande his enimies and to defend his land, and also he daily feared the landing of Aurely and Uter. Plenty of Corne and Fruite. Lechery. Pestilence. Dronkénes Idlenesse. Mortality. Saxons.

¶ Vortiger being thus beset with many enimies, and then being for the exployte of sundrie his affaires at Cauntorbury, tydinges was brought him of the arryuing of three talle Ships full of armed men at the Isle of Tenet. Wherefore, first he made countenance, as though he had bene in doubt whether it had bene the two brethren of Constance or no: But when the fame was blowen about, that they were none enimies: anone he caused the leaders and Capitaines of them to be brought vnto his presence, demaunding of them the cause of their landing, and of their Nation and Countrie: who answered vnto the king and sayde, they were of the Countrie of Germany, and put out of their Countrie by a maner & sort of a Lot, which is sundrie times vsed in the sayde lande, and the vse thereof grewe for that the people of that Countrie encreased so greatly, that without such prouision had, the Countrie might not suffise to finde the people that were therein: And that therefore sence fortune had brought them into this land, they besought the king that he would take them to his seruice, and they woulde be ready to fight for the defence of him and his Countrie. And when the king had enquired further, he founde that they had two leaders, named Hengist and Horsus, and they and their people were called Saxons. Hengist Horsus.

¶ The king being thus assertayned of the maner of these strangers, & that they were of the heathen and Pagan law, said, he was verie sorie þ they were miscreaunts, but he was glad of their coming, forsomuch as he had neede of such Souldiours to defend him and his lande against his enimies: and so receiued them into his wages and seruice, as saith Gaufride and other writers.

¶ Beda the holye man and faythfull Historian sayeth, that Vortiger sent for the Saxons for that they were strong men of armes, and had no lande to dwell in, the which came in three long Shippes or Hulkes, and receyued a place of him to dwell in, in the East side of Briteyn called the Isle of Tenet beside Kent: but Guilielmus Malmesburiensis in his worke De Regibus, sayth, that the Saxons came out of Germany of their awne will and courage to winne worship and laude, and not by any lot or compulsion. He sayeth also that they worshipped in those daies, a God named WODEN, supposed to be Mercury, and a Goddesse named FRIA Uenus. In the worship of which God, the third Feriall daye in the weeke, they named Wodensdaye, which we nowe call Wednesday. And in worship of the sayde Goddesse, they called the fifte daye Frees day, which we now call Friday.

William of Malmesbury

The dayes called Wednesdaye and Friday, from whence they came first.

¶ And these foresayde people were of three maner of Nations, that is to saye, Saxons, Anglys and Jewets. Of the Saxons came the East Saxons, West Saxons, and the South Saxons. Of the Anglys, came the East Anglys, the middle Anglys or Merceys, called Mercij, which helde middle England, that stretcheth Westward towarde the Ryuer of Dee beside Chester, and to Seuerne beside Shrewesbury, and so forth to Bristow, and Estwarde towarde the See, and Southwarde towarde the Thamys, and so forth to London, and turning downe ward and Westwarde to the Riuer Mercea, and so forth to the West See.

Jewets.

¶ And of the Jewets came the kentishmen, and the men of the Isle of Wight. Of the first comming of these Saxons into Briteyn, the writers doe varie. But to returne to the storie.

¶ These Saxons with the kings power did beate downe the enimies aforesayde, and defended the land in most knightly wise, so that the king had the Saxons in great loue and fauour: which fauour Hengistus well perceyuing, vpon a season, when he saw conuenient time, he asked of the king so much ground as the hyde of a Bull or Ore would compasse, which the king graunted him. After the which graunt, the sayde Hengist to the entent to winne a large plot of ground, caused the sayde beastes skinne to be cut into small and slender Thonges. And with the same he met out a large and great circuit of ground, vpon the which he shortly after builded a large and strong Castell. By reason of which Thonge, the sayde Castell was long after named Thong Castle, and it was builded in Lyndsey.

¶ After this, tydings went into Germany of the plentie and fatnesse of the lande of Briteyn, with other commodities belonging to the same: By meane whereof, the Saxons dailye drewe to the sayde lande, and couenaunted with the Britons, that the Britons should exercise and attende vpon their husoandry and other necessarie traffique, and the Saxons as their Souldiours would defende the lande from incursions of all enimies, for the which the Britons should geue to them competent meate and wages.

¶ Then by the assignement and apoyntment of Hengist, there came out of Germany

Germany.xvj. Sayles well furnished with men of warre, and in them came Ronowen the daughter of the sayd Hengist, which was a Mayden of excellent beutie. After whose comming, Hengist vpon a day besought the king that he would see his Castle, which he had newly edified. To whose request the king was agreeable, & at the day assigned he came to the Castle, where he was ioyously receyued. And there among other pastimes, the sayd Ronowen with a Cup of Golde full of Wyne presented the king, saluting and saying vvassayle. The king which before that tyme had heard no like salutation, neither vnderstood what she ment, asked of her father what she ment by that worde vvassayle. To whome it was aunswered by Hengist, that it was a salutation of good lucke and gladnesse, and that the king should drinke after her, and adding also this aunswere, that it was as much to say, as drinke hayle. Wherfore the king as he was informed tooke the Cup of the Maydens hand and dranke: And after he behelde the Damsell in such maner, that he was wounded with the dart of the blinde God Cupide, in such wise that neuer after he coulde withdrawe his lust from her: but lastly by the instigation of the Deuill, asked her in mariage of her father. And by force thereof as witnesseth Polichronica, he put from him his lawfull wyfe, of the which he had before tyme receyned three noble sonnes, Vortimerius, Catagrinus, and Pascentius. Then the king gaue to Hengist the Lordship of Kent, though Garangonus then Erle thereof thereat grudged with many of his Nobles and Commons.

¶ For this, and because the king had maried a Pagan woman, all the Britons in a maner forsooke him and his woorkes. Notwithstanding, yet some there were, as well of the Nobles as other, that comforted the King in hys euill doyng. By which meane and other vnlawfull deedes, then dayly vsed, the fayth of Christ began sore to decay. And besides that, an heresie called the Arians heresie began to spring in Briteyn, for the which two Bishops named Germanus, and Lupus (as Gaufride saith) were sent into Briteyn to reforme the people that were infected with the same, and erred from the way of truth.

¶ Then to finish the story of Vortiger, forasmuch as the Britons withdrewe themselues from hym, he was therefore constrayned to retayne with him the Sarons. By whose counsayle he afterwarde sent for Octa the sonne of Hengist, the which brought with them another companie out of Saronie. And from this tyme the Sarons sought alway occasion to extinguish vtterly the power of the Britons, and to subdue the land to themselues.

Octa the son of Hengist.

¶ When the Lordes of Briteyn saw and considered the great multitude of Sarons, & their dayly repayre into this land, they assembled them together, and shewed to the king the inconuenience & ieopardy that might ensue to him and his land, by reason of the great power of these strangers, & they aduertised him in aduoyding of greater daunger to expel & put them out of this realme, or the more part of them: But all was in vaine, for Vortiger had such a mind to the Sarons by reason of his wyfe, ỹ he preferred the loue of them, before the loue of his awne natural kinsmen & frends. Wherfore the Britons of one will & mind crowned Vortimerus the eldest sonne of Vortiger king of Briteyn, and depriued the father of all kingly dignity, when he had reigned.xvj.yeres.

Vortiger deprined.

VOrtimer the sonne of Vortiger, was by the assent of the Britons made king of Briteyn, the which in all haste pursued the Sarons, and gaue vnto them a great battayle vpon the Riuer of Darvvent, where he had of them the victorie. And secondarily he fought with them vpon the Foorde called Epyfoord, or Aglisphorpe. In the which fight Catrignus the brother of Vortimer, and Horsus, brother to Hengist, or Colin, after long fight betwene them two, eyther of them slue other, in which fight also the Britons were victours. The thirde battaile he fought with them nere vnto the Sea syde, where also the Britons chased the Saxons, and compelled them to take the Isle of Wight for their suretie. The fourth battayle was nere vnto a Wooze called Cole Wooze, the which was long and sore fought by the Saxons, by reason that the sayd Wooze closed a part of their hoast so strongly, that the Britons might not approche to them for daunger of theyr shot. Howbeit, in the ende they were chased, and many of them by constraint were drowned and swalowed in the sayde Wooze.

¶ And ouer and besides these foure principall battailes, Vortimer had with the Saxons sundrie other conflicts and skirmishes, as in Kent, Thetfoorde in Norfolke, and in Eller, nere vnto Colchester, & left not vntill he had bereft from them the more part of suche possessions, as before time they had wonne, and kept themselues onely to the Isle of Tenet, where Vortimer besieged them, with his Nauie, and oftentimes fought with them by water.

Gaufride.

¶ And as Gaufride sayeth, when they sawe that they were not able any longer to endure the force of the Britons, and to make their partie good with them, they then sent Vortiger the father (whome they had present with them in all the Fieldes that they fought against the Britons) vnto the king his sonne, praying him to licence them safely to depart againe into their country of Germany. And whiles this matter was in talke betweene the father and the sonne, they priuily conueyed themselues into their Shippes, and so returned home againe, leauing their wyues and children behinde them. Fabian.

Rowen practised the poysoning of Vortimer.

¶ When that Rowen the daughter of Hengist perceyued the great mischiefe that her father and the Saxons were in, by the martiall knighthood of Vortimer: she sought such meanes (as sayeth Gaufride and other) that Vortymer was poysoned, when he had ruled the Britons. viij. yeres.

¶ Because the storie touching the end and death of the sayde Vortimer is verie notable, it shall not be amisse to recite it here in effect, as it is written by the sayd Gaufride. When Vortimer had now gotten the victorie of the Saxons, he beganne lyke a good Prince to restore againe vnto the Britons such possessions as were taken from them by the sayde Saxons, and to loue and honour them: And at the request of the holy man Germaine to reedefie such Churches as were by them destroyed and ouerthrowne. But the Deuill by and by enuied at his vertue and godlynesse, who entering into the heart of his stepmother Rowen, moued her to imagine his death: wherevpon she sending for all the Wytches and Poysoners that she coulde hereof, caused verie strong Poyson to be ministred vnto him, by a verie familier and nere friend of his, whome she had corrupted before with many great giftes. Now when this noble warryour had receyued this deadly poyson, he vpon a sodaine became desperately sick, in such wise as their was no hope of lyfe in him. Then commaunding all his Souldiours to come before him to shewe to them what daunger he stood in, and how the houre of death was at hande, he deuyded among them his treasure and such goodes as his auncetours had left him. And perceyuing them greatly to lament and bewayle the miserable case and daunger that he was in, he comforted them, saiyng, that the waye which he should goe was common to all flesshe, and so exhorted them that as they had before sticked vnto him like men, and had shewed themselues valyaunt and couragious in fighting against the Saxons, euen so hereafter they woulde lykewise persteuer in the defence of their native Countrie, against all the inuasions of forrein enimies. That done, of a great heardy courage he commaunded a Sepulcher of Brasse to be made spire wise, and the same to be set in that porte or Hauen where the Saxons were commonly wont to arryue, and his dead corps to be layde in it, that assoone as those barbarous people should see once the Sepulchre, they for feare might returne backe againe into Germany. For he sayde that not one of them all durst be so hardie as to approche the lande if they once saw the sayde Sepulchre. O most hardie and dowtie king, who desyred to be feared of them euen after his death, vnto whome he was a terrour in his lyfe time: But when he was dead, the Britons performed not his commaundement, but buryed his body at London.

Vortiger restored to his kingdome.

VOrtiger was now againe restored to the kingdome of Briteyn, and shortly after Hengist eyther of his awne accorde, or as Gaufride writeth sent for by the procurement of his daughter Rowen, entred thys land againe with a great multitude of Saxons, whereof Vortiger, being informed in all haste, assembled his Britons and made towardes them. But when Hengist heard of the Britons, and of the preparation that was made against him, he then made meanes for the intreaty of peace, where in the end, it was concluded that a certaine number of Britons, and as manye of the Saxons, should vpon the next May day assemble vpon the playne of Ambrij, now called Sarisbury, or as Gaufride saith, nere vnto the Abbey of Amesburie, founded by one Ambrius: which day being certeynly prefixed, Hengistus vsing a new practise of treason, charged all his Saxons by him appointed, that eche of them should put secretly a long knyfe in their hosen, and at such time as he gaue to them this watch or bye worde, Nempnith your Sexes, that is, drawe your knyfes, that euerie one of them should drawe out his knyfe and slea a Briton, sparing none, but Vortiger the king onely. And at the day before appointed, the king with a certaine number of Britons, not ware of this purposed treason, came in peaceable wise to ỳ place before assigned, where he found ready Hengist with his Saxons. The which after due obedience made vnto the king, he receyued him with a countenance of loue and amitie, where after a time of cõmunication had, Hengist being minded to execute his purposed treason, gaue forth his watchword. By reason whereof anon the Britons were slaine lyke shepe among Wolues, to the number (as Gaufride writeth) of .iiij. C. and .lx. barons & noble men, hauing no maner of weapon to defend themselues withall, except that any of them might by his manhood & strength either get ỳ knife out of his enimies hand, or else by stones or such like weapõ as they might come by, anoy them, by which meanes diuers of the Saxõs also were slaine, so ỳ this there trechery was performed. And among the number of these Britons ỳ were thus distressed, there was then an Erle called Edolfe Erle of Chester, or rather after Gaufride Edole, Baron of Glowcester, who seing his felowes & friends thus murthered (as the said Gaufrid saith) by his manhood recouered a stake out of a hedge, with the which he knightly defended himselfe and slue of the Sarons three score and ten persons, and being ouer set by his enimies and not able to make any longer resistance was compelled to flie to his owne Citie. After which treason thus executed, the king remayned with Hengistus as Prisoner. Fabian.

¶ But the sayde Gaufride writeth more fuller hereof in this wise. After the Sarons had accomplished their mischeuous purpose, they woulde in no wise slay Vortiger: But threatning to kill him, they kept him in a holde, and demaunded him to geue vp & deliuer vnto them his good townes and strong holdes as a raunsome for his lyfe: vnto whome the king graunted whatsoeuer they requyred of him, so that he might depart with lyfe. And when he had confirmed his graunt made vnto them by an othe, then was he set at libertie and deliuered out of Prison. This done, the Sarons tooke Yorke, Lyncolne, and Winchester, and wasting al the Countreys as they went, they set vpon the common people and slue them, as Wolues are wont to deuoure the siely poore Sheepe that are left alone and forsaken of their Shepheards. Now when Vortiger sawe the great murther and slaughter of his people, he gat him into Wales as a man that wist not what to doe, and howe to be reuenged vpon this wicked Nation.

Vortiger taken.

¶ Of the taking of Vortiger, and slaying of the Lordes of Briteyn (Guilielmus de regibus sayth) that Hengist agreed with Vortiger and his Britons that he should enioy the Castell by him before made, with a certeyne lande thereunto adioinyng for him and his Sarons to dwell vpon. And when the said agreement was surely stablished, this Hengist entending treason, desired the king with a number of his Lordes to come and feast with him within his sayd Castle, the which of the king was graunted. And at the day assigned the king and his Lords came vnto the sayd Thongraste to dynner, where he with his, was well and honourably receyued, and also deyntily serued.

Treason

Thong Castle.

¶ But when the king and his Lordes were in their most mirth, this Hengist had commaunded before, that his owne knightes shoulde fall out among themselues: which beyng so done, the remnaunt of his Sarons, as it were in parting of frayes, should fall vpon the Britons, and slay them all, sauing only the king. The which thing was done, as ye heard before deuised, and the king was kept and holden as prisoner.

A trayterous practise not altogether preuenged.

¶ Hengist then hauing the king as prisoner, and a great part of the rulers of Briteyn, thus as afore sayde subdued, was somedeale exalted in pride, and compelled the king to geue vnto him, as Polichronica sayth, three prouinces in the East part of Briteyn, that is to say, Kent, Sussex, Norffolke and Suffolke (as sayth the Floure of Histories) But Guido de Columna sayth, that the afore sayde three Prouinces were Kent, Essex, Norffolke and Suffolke. Of the which sayde Prouynces when Hengist was possessed, he suffered the king to go at his libertie. And then Hengist began his Lordship ouer Kent, and sent other of his Sarons to guyde and gouerne the other Prouynces, vntill he had sent for other of his kinsmen to whome he purposed to geue the same Prouynces vnto.

Hengistes lande.

¶ Thus Hengist beyng in the possession of this Prouynce of Kent, commaunded his Sarons to call it Hengistes land, whereof as some Authors write, the whole land of Briteyn tooke his first name of England: But that is not so, as after shall be shewed in the story of king Egbert.

¶ The Lordship or kingdome of Kent had his beginning vnder Hengist, in the fift yere of Vortigers second reigne, and in the yere of our Lorde after most wryters. iiij. C. lxxvj. But Denys and other which say, it begonne. xxj. yeres sooner, alloweth the beginning hereof to be when Hengist had first the gift of the same, by reason that Vortiger maryed his daughter. This Lordship conteyneth the Countrie that stretcheth from the East Ocean vnto the Ryuer of Thamys, and had vpon the Southeast, Southery, and vpon the West, London: vpon the Northeast the Thamys aforesayde, and also Esser, and in this Lordship was also conteyned the Isle of Thanet, which Lordship or kingdome endured after most wryters, from the tyme of the first yere of the reigne of Hengist, vntill the. xxb. yere of Egbert before named, which by that accompt should be. iij. C xlij. yeres. At which season the sayd Egbert then king of West Sarons, subdued Baldredus then king of Kent, and ioyned it to his awne kingdome. Howbeit Polichronica affirmeth it to endure by the space of. iij. C. lxviij. yeres, vnder xb. kinges, whereof Baldredus was the last. The first Christen king of this Lordship was Ethelbertus or Ethelbert, the which receyued the fayth of Christ by Austine or Augustine the Monke, in the yere of our Lorde. iiij. C. xcvj. The which Ethelbert caused the Monasterie of Saint Peter and Paule at Cantorbury to be buylded, and as some say, he first began the building of Poules Church in London. He gaue vnto Austyn and his Successors Bishoppes of Cantorbury, a place for the Bishoppes See, at Christes Church within the sayd Citie, and endowed it with many riche possessions, as more at large shall be shewed in the lyfe of Careticus.

Ethelbertus the first christian king of Kent.

¶ This Hengist and all the other Sarons which ruled the. vij. principates of Briteyn, as after shall be shewed, are called of most writers Reguli, which is as much to say in our vulgare speche, as small or petie kings: So that this Hengist was accompted as a little king. The which when he had thus gotten the rule of the thre Prouinces before mencioned, he sent for mo Sarons, and gathered them together that were sparkled abroade, so that in these Prouinces the fayth of Christ was vtterly quenched and layde a sleepe.

¶ Then Hengist with Octa his sonne gathered a great strength of Sarons, and fought with the Britons and ouercame them, and chased them in suche wise that Hengist kept his Lordship in peace and warre the space of xxiiij. yeres as most wryters agree.

¶ Nowe let vs returne againe to Vortiger, the which when he sawe the Sarons in such wise encrease their strength, & the Britons dayly to decrease, for as Gaufride sayth, the Sarons had the rule of London, Yorke, Lincolne, and Winchester, with other good townes. Wherefore the king for feare of the Sarons, and also for that he was somewhat warned of the comming of the two brethren, Aurely, and Uter, sonnes of Constantyne: He therefore considering these manye and great daungers, fled into Cambria, or Wales, and there held him for the more suretie, where before he had builded a strong Castle. Of the which buylding, and impediment of the same, and of the Prophet Marlyn many thinges are written by Gaufride, and reported by the common voyce of the people yet at this day.

¶ Now while Vortiger was thus in his Castle in Wales, the aforenamed two brethren Aurely and Uter prepared their nauie and men of armes, and paſſed the Sea, and landed at Totneſſe, whereof when the Britons had knowledge, they drew vnto them in all haſtie wiſe. The which ſayd brethren, when they ſaw that they had a competent number of knightes and men of warre, firſt of all made towarde Wales to diſtreſſe Uortiger.

¶ Whereof he being well warned, and knowing alſo that he coulde not make ſufficient defence againſt them, he therefore furniſhed his Caſtle with ſtrength of men and victuall, entending there to ſauegarde himſelfe, but all was in vaine: For the ſaid two brethren with their army, beſieged the Caſtle and after many aſſaultes, with wyldefyre conſumed the ſame, and Uortiger alſo, and all that were with him.

¶ Of this Uortiger it is redde, that he lay with his awne daughter, in truſt that kinges ſhould come of his blood. And laſtly, he ended his life as before is expreſſed, when he had reigned now the ſecond tyme .ix. yeres.

481 1 Aurelius Ambroſe.

Aurelius Ambroſe, the ſeconde ſonne of Conſtantine was by the Britons made king of Briteyn. Of him it is written that when he vnderſtood of the deuiſion that was in the land of Briteyn betwene Uortiger and the Sarons, and in what maner the Sarons had ſubdued the Britons, he in all goodly haſte, with the ayde of the king of little Briteyn, ſped him into his land, and firſt came to Yorke, and there chaſed the Sarons that helde the Citie with Octa the ſonne of Hengiſt, and tooke the ſayde Octa, and kept him as priſoner a certeyn ſeaſon.

Octa taken & after eſcaped.

¶ But howe it was, by treaſon of his keeper or otherwiſe, he brake Priſon and eſcaped. And after, he with his father gathered a great hoſte, and met Aurelius and his Britons, at a place called Crekynforde, where was foughten a ſtrong and mightie battaile, to the loſſe of both parties, but the greater loſſe fell vpon the Sarons: For of them was ſlaine foure Dukes, and .iiij. M. of other men, and the reſidue chaſed to their great daunger. Yet this notwithſtanding Hengiſt continued his Lordſhip in Kent: and Aurelius Ambroſe kept the Countrie called Logiers or middle England with Wales, and chaſed the Sarons that dwelled in the two Prouinces of Eaſt Saxon, and Eaſt Anglis out of thoſe Countries.

Ella. Symon. Pletynger. Ciſſa.

¶ And in this tyme a Saxon named Ella, with his three ſonnes, Symon, Pletynger, and Ciſſa, came with three Shippes or Hulkes, and landed in the South part of Briteyn, & ſlue many Britons, at a place then named Cuneueſhore, or Coningſborough & chaſed many into a Wood then called Andreſleger, and after occupied that Countrie, and inhabited himſelfe & his Sarons within the ſayde Prouince, making himſelfe king and Lorde thereof: By reaſon wherof and by his might and power, the ſaid Prouince or Country was after named the kingdome or Lordeſhip of the South Sarons. The which after moſt writers had his beginning the xxxii. yere after the firſt comming of Hengiſt, which was the yere of our Lorde 482. and the ſecond yere of the reigne of Aurely Ambroſe then king of Briteyn.

South Sarons.

¶ The kingdom of the South laſt aboue named had on the Eaſt ſide, Kent, on the

on the South, the See and the Iſle of Wight, and on the Weſt, Hampſhire, and in the North Southerey, and conteyned Southhampton. Somerſetſhire, Deuonſhire and Cornewall. Of which ſayde kingdome Ethelbald or Ethelwald was the fourth king, and the firſt chriſten king. This kingdome endured ſhorteſt ſeaſon of all the other kingdomes: For it endured not aboue an hundred and.xij.yeres, vnder. v. or. vij. kings at the moſt. Ethelwald the firſt chriſtian king of the South Saxons.

¶ But now to returne where we left: Aurely which as before you haue heard, held and occupied the middle part of Briteyn with Cambria or Wales, did his diligence to repayre ruynous places, as well Temples as other, and cauſed the ſeruice of God to bee ſayde and done, which by the meane of the Saxons was greatly decayed thorough all Briteyn. Aurely inhabited Wales.

¶ And after this, Aurely beſieged the Saxons in the hill of Badon or Baathe, where he ſlue many of them. But dailye the Saxons encreaſed and landed in great Briteyn, as ſhall appere. For ſhortly after a Saxon named Porth, landed with his two ſonnes at a Hauen in Suſſex, after whoſe name as ſome wryte, the Hauen was afterwards called Portesmouth, which Hauen is ſo called to this day. And lykewiſe they came to lande in diuers places of Briteyn, ſo that Aurelius had with them manye conflictes and battailes, wherein he ſped diuerſly, for he was ſometime victour and ſometime ouercome. Portesmouth.

¶ It is written in the Engliſh Chronicle and other, that Aurely by the helpe of Marlyn did fetch the great ſtones now ſtanding vpon the playne of Salſburie, (called the Stone Henge) out of Ireland, and cauſed them to be ſet there as they now ſtand, in the remembraunce of the Britons that were there ſlaine and buried in the time of the treyterous communication that was had with Hengiſt and his Saxons as before in the ſtorie of Vortiger is touched: But Polichronica allegeth the ſame act to Uter his brother. Marlyn. Stonehege. Salſbury playne.

¶ In the tyme of this Aurely, as ſayeth Polichronica, dyed Hengiſt in his bed, when he had reigned ouer the Kentiſhe Saxons. xxiij. yeres. After whoſe death Octa his ſonne ruled the ſayde kingdome other. xxiij. yeres. Albeit that the Britiſhe bookes and alſo the Engliſhe Chronicle, ſaye that Aurelius ſlue in battaile Hengiſt, & then tooke to his grace Octa his ſonne, and gaue to him and his Saxons a dwelling place in the Countrie of Galewaye, which ſeemeth not lykely, for matter that ſhall after enſue, and alſo that which before is touched of the Pictes and Scottes in the time of the miſerie of the Britons. Hengiſt dead. Octa.

¶ Now it followeth, that this Octa, neyther augmented nor miniſhed his Lordſhip, but helde him therewith contented as his father had lefte it vnto hym.

¶ And finally in the ende of the reigne of Aurely, Paſcentius the yongeſt ſonne of Vortiger, which after the death of his father was fled into Ireland for feare of Aurely, purchaced ayde of Guiliamor king of Ireland. And with a great armie inuaded this lande of Briteyn, by the Countrie of Wales, in taking the Citie of Menenia, now called S. Dauids, and in waſting the ſayd Countrie with ſworde and fyre. In the which ſeaſon and time Aurelius laye ſicke in the Citie of Wincheſter. Paſcentius. Guiliamore king of Irelande.

¶ For which cauſe he deſyred his brother Uter to gather an hoſte of Britons together, and to appeaſe the malice of Paſcencius and his Adherents.

The

The which accordingly prepared his hoste, and at length ouercame the hoste of Pascentius and slue him and the aforenamed Guyliamour in the Fielde.

¶ Howbeit, Gaufride reporteth this storie otherwise, affirming that Pascentius the sonne of Wortiger, who for sauegarde of his lyfe, fled into Germany, came with a great armie of Germaynes out of the same Countrie against Aurelius to be reuenged vpon him for his fathers death, and gaue battaile vnto Aurelius himselfe, in the which the sayde Pascentius and hys Germaines were discomfited and put to flight. Then Pascentius who durst not after the sayde discomfiture returne into Germany, gate him into Ireland desiring ayde of Guillomannius then king of that Countrie, who taking compassion of him, ayded him with all he might. And so by the helpe of the sayde king arriued at Menenia, now called S. Dauids in Wales: At the which season Aurelius being sick at Winchester, commaunded his brother Uter to gather an armie to appease his malice, the which he did, and then went into Wales to meete hym, where was foughten a cruell battaile betwene them, in the which Uter had the victorie, and Pascentius and Guillomannius were slaine.

¶ Now while Uter was thus gone against Pascentius, a Saxon, feyning himselfe a Briteyn, and a cunning man in Phisick, by the entisement of Pascentius & vpon great rewards by him promised, came vnto Aurely where he lay sicke, and by his subtill and false meanes, purchased fauour with those that were nere vnto the Prince, that he was put in trust to minister potions and Medicines vnto the king. This man of some writers is called Copa, and of some Coppa, but of Gaufride Copa. The which when he had espied his conuenient time, gaue to Aurelius a potion enpoysoned: by violence whereof he shortly after dyed, when he had reigned. xix. yeres, and was buried at Stonhenge besides Amesburie.

¶ In the time of the reigne of the aforesayde Aurely (Polichronica sayeth) that the kingdome of East Anglys began vnder a Saxon named Uffa, in the yere of our Lorde. CCCC. xcij. The which conteyned that Prouince which we call now Northfolk and Suffolk. They had in the East and Northsides, the Sea, on the Northwest, Cambrideshire: notwithstanding diuers writers affirme Cambridgshire to be parte of the sayde kingdome, and in the West S. Emondes Diche, and Hertfortshire, and in the South Esser. Thys Lordship was called first Uffins Lordship, and the kings thereof were named Uffins, or as some write, they were called Uffines people, but at the last they were named East Anglis.

Uffa, first king of the East Angles.

¶ The first christen king of this principate, was Redwallus, but he was not so constant as was meete for his Religion. His sonne named Corpwaldus was more stedfast, which after was slaine of a misbeleuing man, and for Christes faith as some write. But Guido sayth that Sebertus was the first Christian king of this Lordship, and that he made Paules Church of London. This Lordship vnder. xij. kings, endured vntill the Martirdome of S. Edmond the last king thereof, the which was martired in the yere of our Lorde. viij. hundreth. lxix. And of this Lordeship at those dayes was Elman or Thetford the chiefe Towne.

VTer the laſt and yongeſt ſonne of Conſtantine, and brother of Aurely, tooke vpon him the kingdome of Briteyn, and gouerned the ſame verye honourably. This man was ſurnamed Pendragon. The cauſe thereof, as ſayth the Engliſh Chronicle, was for that Merlyn lykened him vnto a Dragon vnder a ſtarre apering in the firmamente: Whereof there is made long proceſſe in the ſtory of Gaufride, but Layland a man in his tyme very ſkilfull in the antiquities of this Realme, thinketh this name was geuen him for his great prudence and wiſedome wherein Serpentes do excell. But how ſo euer it were, truth it is, that after Uter (as is afore ſayde) was made king, he atchiued many victories againſt the Saxons, and laſtlye ſlue theyr chiefe Capitaines, Octa, & Coſa, as Gaufride writeth of him: It is alſo written that he was enamored vpõ the Dukes wife of Cornewal named Igerne, and for to obtaine his vnlefull luſt, he ſought many and dyuerſe meanes: So that laſtly he made warre vpon her Huſbande named Garolus, or Gorleys, and at length ſlue the ſayde Duke at his Caſtle called Tyntagell, ſtanding in Cornewall, and after maryed his wyfe, and receyued of her the noble knight Arthur, and a daughter named Anne. And in the ende he dyed at Uerolame by force of poyſon, when he had reigned. xvj. yeres, and was likewiſe buryed at Stonage or Stonehenge, vpon the plaine of Sariſbury, leauing after him the moſt puyſaunt and noble king Arthur.

¶ Here ſayth Fabian I would fayne declare the fame of this noble Prince to the comfort of other to follow his martiall dedes, ſo that I might ſomwhat iuſtifie my report by ſome autentique Authour, but hereof I doubt the more becauſe of the ſaiyng of Reynulph Monke of Cheſter, which voucheth vpon William of Malmeſbury, wryter of the Hiſtoryes of kinges, as is reherſed at length in the. vj. ¶ In this tyme also I finde mention made of a noble and valiant man called Arthgall, and he was the first Erle of Warwike, and he was one of the knightes of the round Table of king Arthure, after whome folowed by succession Morvyde, and Merthyde. Cerdicus first king of the west Saxons.

¶ About the fift yere of his reigne, began the Lordship of the West Saxons, vnder the Saxon called Cerdicus and Kenricus his sonne: For Diomice and other say, that this Lordship or kingdome should haue his beginning the lxxj. yere after the first comming of Hengist, or the yere of our Lord fiue hundreth. xxij. which agreeth with the fift yere of Arthure aforesayd.

¶ This Lordship conteyned the West Country of England, as Wiltshire, Somersetshire, Berkshire, Dorcetshire, Deuonshire, and Cornewall, and had in the East syde, Southhamton, on the North Thamys the famous Ryuer, on the South and West, the Sea Occean.

¶ The aforesayd Cerdicus, which of some is called Childericus, landed first at Cerdishore, which now is called Yermouth, an hauen Towne in the Countie of Norffolke. And by the helpe of other Saxons which then dwelled there, the sayde Cerdicus at length obteyned the aforesayde Countries, and named them West Saxons, and reigned therein as Lorde and king a certeyn of yeres, and after him Kenricus his sonne.

¶ This kingdome endured longest of all the other, which were seuen in number, or sixe beside this. But Guydo accompteth the continuance of this kingdome from the first yere of Cerdicus vnto the last yere of Edward the Confessor, and by that accompt it should endure fiue hundred and.liiij. yeres: But most agree that it should be reconed from the first yere of Cerdicus to the last yere of Aluredus, for he made one Monarchy of all the.vij. kingdomes, in the which time passed away.CCC.lxxviij. yeres. ¶ 521

The kingdome of the west Saxons cõtinued fiue C.liij. yeres.

¶ But nowe to returne to Arthur, the which by a long tyme dwelled in warre and mortall battaile with the Saxons, by meane of their daylie repaire into this lande. The which also ayed them with the Pictes and other Nations, and made their partie the stronger by that meane: But yet king Arthur brought them into such an obedience, that they knowledged him to be the chiefe Lorde of Briteyn.

¶ Finally, when he had by a long time maintained his warres against the Saxons, and specially against Cerdicus king of West Saxons: he for a fynall concorde gaue vnto the sayde Cerdicus (as sayth Polichronica) in his sixe Chapter of his fift Booke, the Prouinces of Hampshire and Somersetshire. And when he had set his lande in some quietnesse, he betooke the rule thereof vnto his Nephew Mordred, and with a chosen armie sayled (as sayth Gaufride and other) into Fraunce where as sundrie Authors write, he wrought wonders.

Mordred.

After the departure of Arthur (as Polichronica sayeth) the aforesayde Mordred being desirous to be king, feared somewhat the might of Cerdicus king of the West Saxons: he therfore sought for his fauour and to obteyne his good will, gaue vnto him certaine Townes, Fortes, and Castels, and other great giftes, so that at the last he wanne him, in such sort that he consented to Mordreds request: in so much that Mordred was shortly after at London crowned king of Briteyn, and Cerdicus was after the maner of the Pagans crowned king of West Saxons at Wyncheſter.

Treason.

¶ Now when knowledge came to Arthur of all this treason wrought by his Nephew Mordred: he in all the haste made towarde Briteyn and landed at Sandwiche, where he was met of Mordred and his people, which gaue vnto him a strong battaile at the time of his landing, and there Arthur lost many of his Knightes, as the famous knight Gawen and other. But yet this notwithstanding, Arthur at the length recouered the land and chased his enimies, and after the buriall of his Cosyn Gawen and other of his, that were there slaine, he set forward his hoste to pursue his enimies.

¶ Mordred being thus ouerset of his Uncle at the Sea side withdrewe him to Wincheſter: where he being furnished of newe Souldiours, gaue vnto Arthur the second battaile, wherin also Mordred was put to the worste and constrained to flee. Thirdly and lastly, the sayde Mordred fought with his Uncle Arthur at Baath, where after a long and daungerous fight, Mordred was slaine, and the victorious Arthur wounded vnto death, when he had reigned.xxvj. yeres, and after buried in the vale or Isle of Aualon, nowe nowe called Glascenburie, whether he was conueyed to bee cured of hys woundes. Who so list to know more touching the certeyntie and truth of these matters maye reade the booke of the excellent antiquary John Leyland, intituled the Assertion of Arthur, where euerie thing is more at large discoursed.

534 EVgenius the thirde, the sonne of Congallus, was made king of Scotland after Conrannus, and reigned. xxviij. yeres. The Scottishe Historie affirmeth, that he with his Scottes were present in the battailes that Mordred fought against Arthur.

¶ The Scottes say that this Mordred was king of Pictes, and that Arthur was slaine in battaile, and the Britons discomfited, and Guanora the Queene taken prisoner by the Scottes with great spoyle.

543 COnstantine the thirde, the sonne of Cador Duke of Cornewal, and Cosyn to king Arthur by assent of the Britons was crowned king, and he was by the two sonnes of Mordred grieuously vexed, for that they claymed the lande by the right or title of their father. So that betweene him and them were foughten many and sundry battayles, but where or when, it is not shewed, neyther are the names of the two sonnes of Mordred expressed.

¶ But sundrie Authors agree that after the aforesayde two battailes thus foughten finally the two sonnes of Mordred were constreyned of pure force to flie for their safetie. And so the one fled to London, and the other tooke Sanctuarie in the olde Abbey Church of Winchester, dedicated to Saint Amphibalus.

¶ Whereof Constantine being warned, left not vntill he had slaine the one within the Monastery of Wyncheſter, and the other within a Church or Temple of London, of the which crueltie of his, Gildas sore complayneth.

Gildas.

¶ When Constantyne had thus subdued his enimies and thought himselfe now in a sure and quiet state: then arose vp his awne kynsman named Aurelius Conanus and arrered mortall battaile against him, and at the last slue him in the Fielde, when he had reigned three yeres, who was buried at Stonehenge. But some writers say, he dyed by the hande of God of a great sickneſſe.

Aurelius Conanus.

546 AVrelius Conanus after the death of Constantine was crowned king of Briton. This man was noble and liberall, but he vsed to cherishe and make much of such as loued strife and dissention within his lande, and gaue light credence to them that accused other, were it right or wrong. And as sayeth Gaufride and other, he tooke by strength his Uncle, which of right should haue bene king and cast him into a strong prison, and after slue tirannously the two sonnes of his sayde Uncle: But his reigne continued not long, for as sayth Gaufride, he dyed in the second yere of his reigne leauing after him a sonne named Uortiporius.

¶ And here is to be noted, that after this time, the Britons decreased of Lordship and rule within Briteyn, and drewe them toward Wales, so that the Countrie about Chester was the chiefest of their Lordship within Briteyn. For dailye the Sarons landed with their companies, and occupied the principall partes of the same, as shall after appere.

Britons dreyed.

¶ Now

¶ Now in the time of the reigne of the aforeſayde Aurely (as ſayeth Polichronica, Guydo and other) beganne the kingdome or Lordſhip of Bernicia, vnder a Saxon named Ida in the. D. xlviij. yere of our Lord, and in the laſt yere of the ſayde Conanus. This Lordſhip was in the North parte of Briteyn, and grewe in ſhort while more and more, ſo that finally, it was named the kingdome of Northumberlande, and was firſt deuyded into two kingdomes, whereof the firſt as abouesayde was called Bernicia, and the other Deyra. The meres or markes of this kingdome of Northumberlande, were by Eaſt and by Weſt the Ocean Sea, by South the Ryuer of Humber, and ſo downeward toward the Weſt by the endes of the Shires of Notyngham and Derby, vnto the Ryuer of Merſe, or Martia, and by North the Scottiſhe Sea, which is called Foorth or Frith in Scottiſhe, and in Britiſhe, the Werde.

Ida the firſt king of Bernicia, or Northumberlande.

Deyra.

¶ The Southſide of this Lordſhip is called Deyra, which is now called the Biſhoprick of Durham, and the Northſide was called Bernicia, which were then departed or ſeuered with the Ryuer of Tyne, Deyra conteyned the lande from Humber to the Ryuer of Tyne, and Bernicia included the Countrie from Tyne to the Scottiſhe Sea.

Biſhoprick of Durham.

¶ In Bernicia reigned firſt as is abouesayde, Ida or Idas, and in Deyra reigned firſt Ella, which Lordſhips beganne both within three yeres. But in proceſſe of time both in one were named the kingdome of Northumberlande, which ſo continued, ſomewhile vnder one king, and ſomewhile vnder two, the ſpace of. CCC. xxj. yeres, as ſayth Reynulph Monke of Cheſter. And the name continued afterward vnto the Saxons and Danes, vntill the comming of Edredus brother of Ethelſtane, and ſonne of Edward the elder. The which Edredus in the. ix. or laſt yere of his reigne ioyned this to his awne kingdome. By which reaſon it ſhould ſeeme that this kingdome endured vnder that name foure hundreth. ix. yeres.

Ella firſt king of Deyra.

¶ The firſt chriſtian Prince of this kingdome was named Edwynus, that receyued the fayth of S. Paulyne (as Guydo ſayth.) In this Lordſhip alſo were included theſe Shires and Countries now called, Yorke, Notyngham Shire, Derby Shire, the Biſhoprick of Durham, Copelande and other.

Edwinus the firſt chriſtian king of Northumberlande.

¶ Among the many kinges of Saxones that reigned in thys Lordſhip, which after ſome wryters were to the number of. xxiij. there was one which was accompted the. viij. king, named Ethelſtridus, who deſtroyed moe Britons than all the other Saxon kings, and he was father to Oſwy, called Saint Oſwald.

Ethelſtridus.

¶ But moſt cruellye raged he againſt them in a battayle that he had beſyde Cheſter, where by the inſtigation of Ethelbert king of Kent, he ſlue alſo two thouſande Monkes of the houſe of Bangor, as ſayeth Polichronicon in the. x. Chapter of his fift Booke, the which Monkes were come together to praye for the good ſpeede of the Britons. And beſyde this number of Monkes, there were fiftie that fled, whereby they with their leader Brucinall were ſaued. Of ſuch a number of Monkes in one houſe, might be demed a wonder: But Reynulph and Guydo alſo do affirme that in the houſe of Bangor at thoſe dayes, were three tymes ſeuen hundreth Monkes which liued by the trauayle of their handes.

A ſlaughter of Monkes.

Gaufride.

¶ The cause of the great slaughter of the aforesayd Monkes is declared by Gaufride in the. viij. booke and. iiij. Chapter, who wryteth thereof as foloweth. Their Abbot sayth he named Dionotus, was a man singularly well learned in the liberall sciences, who when Austyn required the Britishe Bishoppes to submit themselues vnto him, and perswaded him to take paynes with him to preach the Gospell vnto the Englishe Nation, proued by diuerse reasons that they ought not to yelde any such subiection vnto him, forasmuch as they had an Archbishop of their awne, nor yet to preach to their enemies the Saxons, which ceased not dayly to take from them theyr awne naturall Countrie, for the which cause they hated them deadly, and weighed not what sayth or Religion they were off, neyther did they communicate with them in any thing more than with Dogges. Therfore when Ethelbert king of Kent saw how the Britons disdeyned to submit themselues vnto Austyn, and contemned his doctrine, and preaching, beyng highly displeased therewith he incensed Ethelfride king of Northumberland, and other of the Saxon kinges also, to assemble a great power of men of armes, and then to go to Bangor and destroy Dionotus, with the Clergie there, & all the sayd religious persons that had so dispised the sayd Austyn. The which Princes folowing his aduice and counsayle, gathered together a wonderfull great army, and so marching forwardes towardes Wales, came into the towne of Chester, where Brocuall head ruler of that towne wayted for theyr comming: Whether also came at that same season an innumerable sort of Monkes and Heremites out of diuerse Prouinces of the Britons, but especially out of the Citie of Bangor, to pray to God to saue and defende their people.

¶ Nowe when Ethelfridus king of Northumberlande had arrered a great power out of all quarters, he set vpon the sayde Brocuall, who by reason he had the lesse number of Souldiers, was constreyned to forsake the Citie and flie away, but not before he had slaine a great number of his enemies. Now when Ethelfridus had taken the City, and vnderstood the cause of the comming of the sayd Monkes, he commaunded them first of all to be set vpon, and so were there of them the same day a thousand and two hundred martyred. Hetherto Gaufride.

Oswald or Oswy, gaue xij. Lordshyps to bulloc. xij. Abbeyes.

¶ The aforenamed Oswy or Oswolde, was after king of this Prouynce, which gaue with his daughter Elfleda a Nonne. xij. Lordshippes vnto the Church, to buyld therewith. xij. Monasteries, whereof. vj. of the sayd Lordshippes were in Bernicia, and. vj. in Deyra, as sayth Guydo and Reynulph in his fift booke, and. xvj. Chapter.

VOrtiporius the sonne of Conanus, reigned after his father ouer the Britons: Of this man is no notable thing written, but that Guydo sayth he was a victorious knight, and that in sundry battayles he discomfited the Saxons.

¶ In the tyme of the reigne of this king, a Saxon named Ella the sonne of Iffus, began to reigne on the Southside of the kingdome of Northumberland called Deyra, as before is expressed.

¶ When Vortiporius had ruled the Britons foure yeres, he dyed, leauing none heire of his body.

¶ And forasmuch as all writers agree that the kinges of West Saxons,

at length subdued all the other kingdomes in Briteyn, and made the whole lande of Briteyn but one kingdome or Monarchy, and all other aswell of Britons as Sarons left off: Therefore I entende to bring in the name of euery king of the West Sarons from the first Cerdicus or Childricus, and ioyne them with the kinges of the Britons, for so long as hereafter the sayde Britons continued their reigne within any part of Briteyn.

MAlgo a Duke of Briteyn, and nephew to Aurely, reigned ouer the Britons. This Malgo by the testimonie of many writers was the comlyest and most personable man of all the Britons that then lyued, and therewithall was a hardie knight. And he so withstood the Sarons, and kept them vnder, that they dammaged not the lande, the which he then had possession of, and as Gaufride sayth, he subdued fiue Prouynces, that is to say, Ireland, the Iles of the Orcades, Gothland, Iseland, Norway, and Denmarke, and held them in quiet possession. 552 1 Malgo. Iselande. Orchades.

¶ In the tyme of the reigne of this Malgo, reigned in the Lordeship or kingdome of Kent Ethelbert, who (as sayth Reynulph) assembled a great armie, and gaue battayle vnto Ceaulinus sonne of Kenricus, and then king of West Sarons, the cause whereof is not expressed. But this battayle was the first battaile that was foughten betweene the Sarons, after that they obteyned land and dwelling within Briteyn, which was foughten in a place called Wilbaldowne. And in that fight were slaine two Dukes of Ethelbertes, and himselfe with his people put to flight and chaced.

¶ Also the sayd Reynulph witnesseth that the yere folowing Cutwolphus the brother of Ceaulinus before named, fought strongly against the Britons at Bedford, and recouered from them foure Cities or townes, named Liganbrough, Egelsbrough, Besington, and Eupsham.

¶ But now to returne to Malgo king of the Britons, the Authour of the Flowre of Histories sayth, that notwithstanding the many vertues, the which God had endued him with, yet in the ende he forgat God, forsaking all vertue and gaue himselfe to sundrie vices and sinnes, namely to the abhominable sinne of Sodomy: whereof ensued to him the wrath of God, wherby he was afterward sore persecuted of his enimies the Sarons. Sodomy.

¶ It was not long after the aforenamed battaile done at Bedforde, but that the aforesayde Cutwolphus dyed: But yet his sayde brother Ceaulinus desirous of honour, mainteyned his warre against the Britons, so that after he made a newe voyage against them, and gaue them another discomfiture, and tooke from them the Cities of Bathe, Glouceſter, and Worcestre, which should be as Reynulph accompteth in the. xxix. yere of the reigne of Malgo.

¶ About the. xxxiij. yere of his reigne Ceaulinus before named, gathered his Sarons, and fought with the Britons at a place called Fechanlege: where after long fight the sayde Ceaulinus chased the Britons, and wan of them victory: but his brother called Cutha, was slaine in the fight, for whom he made great sorow. Thus in his latter dayes, Malgo beyng oppressed and pursued of his enemies, lastly dyed, when he had reigned. xxxb. yeres.

COnwall was made king of Scottes, and reigned. x. yeres. He was a Man of great deuocion, and gaue much to Churches. He made many lawes concerning the libertie of Priestes. In his tyme Saint Colme of Ire- 568 17 land, and Mungo the holy Bishop of Blasquew were in Scotland.

578 / 27 KIncatill brother of Conwallus reigned in Scotlande foure Monethes, and after him Aidane.xxvij.yeres. In his tyme variaunce happened betweene the Pictes and Scottes, because that Lerudeus kinge of Pictes would not restore to Aidane certaine Traytors which fled out of his land.

586 / 1 CAreticus, or Carencius, as some call him, after the death of Malgo, reigned ouer the Britons. This Man was a louer of ciuile battayle, and was in maners and condicions the worst of all men, and therefore was hated of God and his subiectes, in such wyse as they excited and prouoked the Saxons to warre against him (as sayth Guydo) and chased him from Citie to Citie, and from Towne to Towne, vntill they had recouered from him all such land as his predecessor Malgo, had holden before him.

Ciuile battaile.

¶ But Polichronicon addeth more thereunto, and sayth, forasmuch as the Saxons knewe of the dissension betweene Careticus and his Britons, they in all haste sent into Ireland for the king called Gurmundus, king of the Affricans, and he warred so sore vpon the Britons, that lastly the sayd Careticus was faine to take the Towne nowe called Sicester, and therein besieged him with his Britons a certaine time, where, by dailye skirmishes and assaultes he lost many of his people.

Gurmundus king of Irelande.

Sicester.

¶ When Careticus had a season assayed and prooued the strength of hys enimies, and sawe that they still encreased and his people lessened and minished: he sodainely left that Towne, and with a certaine number of Britons tooke ouer Seuerne water and so into Wales, then called Cambria, which should be in the thirde yere of his reigne.

¶ Truth it is, that after Careticus and his Britons were thus driuen into Wales, yet he lefte not continually to make assaultes vpon the Saxons that were nere vnto him.

IN this time, or sone after, Ethelfridus ruled the North Saxons, for as sayeth Guydo, he began the reigne ouer Deyra and Bernicia, in the yere of our Lorde fiue hundred.xciij. This is Ethelfridus the sonne of Ethelricus that pursued so sore the Britons, & slue so great a number of the Monkes of the Towne of Bangor as is before rehersed, the which daylie warred vpon the Britons, and the Britons vpon him, so that he destroied & subuerted much of Christes fayth, with the helpe of the aforesayd Gormond: insomuch as the Bishops of London and Yorke, with other ministers of the Church, fled into diuers Countries, so that their Churches were shut vp after them, or else occupied in the worshipping of their Idolles and false Goddes.

Ethelfridus the sonne of Ethelricus.

Bishops fled out of this Realme.

¶ Thus the fayth that had endured in Briteyn from the time of Lucius the first christian king in Briteyn till this day, neere vpon the space of foure hundreth yeres and odde, was almost extinct throughout all the lande.

Fayth of Christ decayed in Englande.

¶ And when the aforenamed Gurmond had finished his tirannie within the lande of Briteyn, then he sayled into France, where he was after slaine (as sayeth Polichronica) albeit the French Chronicle speaketh nothing of any such man during this persecution, as witnesseth Guydo.

¶ During also this trouble betweene the Saxons and the Britons, the Lordship or kingdome of the East Saxons beganne to take place, as after shall be shewed.

¶ In this time also Ethelbert reigned in Kent, and bare himselfe verie valiantly, in such wise that he enlarged his kingdome to the bounds of Humber. In which time Gregory, who for his notable deedes was surnamed the great, was made Bishop of Rome: This Gregory as before is touched in the storie of Ethelbert, having compassion on the Countrie from whence so fayre children came, as he before had seene, and thinking it not meete that it should be inhabited with Pagans or people of misbeliefe, sent into Briteyn a learned man named Austyne, with other of his brethren, to preache to the Englis the fayth of Christ. But as sayeth Antoninus in the thirde Chapter, and xij. title of his aforesayde worke: when Austyne was three dayes tourney gone and passed, such a sodaine feare entered into him and his felowes that they turned againe. Then Gregory comforted the sayde companye, and sent them with Letters to the Bishop Arelatensis, wylling him to helpe and ayde him in all that to him needed. The tenour of which Letters and other sent to Ethelbert king of Kent, with their aunsweres, are written with other questions in the Register of Gregory, and in the bookes of Beda and other.

Gregory Bishop of Rome

Antoninus.

Austyn sent into Englād to preache.

¶ Austyne being thus comforted, sped him on his tourney and landed on the East side of Kent in the Isle of Thanet with xl. of his felowes, whereof some were Interpretours, or such as could speake all languages. Nere vnto the place before named, where Austyne landed, stood at those dayes, the manour or Palace of the sayde king Ethelbert, where at this daye appere some of the ruynous walles, and is called of the inhabitaunts of that Isle, Richbourgh. It is apparaunt betweene the Isle and the Towne of Sandwiche, vpon a Myle and a halfe from the sayde Towne, Eastwarde from Cauntorbury.

Richbourgh

¶ Then when Austyne was landed, he sent the sayde interpretours vnto Ethelbert, saying that they were sent from Rome for the saluation of the king and his Realme. The king before time had heard of the fayth of Christ, for he had to wyfe a French woman that was christened, named Berta, and had receyued her vpon condicion that he should suffer her to lyue after her lawe.

¶ Then after a certaine time, the king spake with Austyne, but that was without the house, after the maner of his lawe, who against the comming of the king arrered and displayed a Banner of the Crucifixe, and preached to him the worde of God. Then the king sayde, it is fayre that ye promise, but for that it is to mee straunge and newe, I maye not so soone assent vnto yoti. But for that ye become so farre for my sake, ye shall be well entreated, and haue all things that shall be vnto your necessarie, and we graunt you leaue to conuert of oure people as many as ye can. And when they had receyued this comfort of the king, they went with procession to the Citie of Cauntorbury, singing Alleluya, where they led their liues, like as holy fathers did first begin in the Primatine Church, in fasting, praying, watching, and such lyke godly exercises. Fabian.

Procession.

¶ At length, when the king had well considered the conuersion and godly lyfe of Austyn and his felowes, he heard them the more gladly, and lastly, by their good exhortations & ghostly loue, he was conuerted, and christened in the yere of our Lord fiue hundreth. xcvj. and the first yere of his reigne, as sayth Polichronicon.

¶ Then the king gaue to Austyn a place for his Bishops See, at Christes Church in Cauntorburie, and builded the Abbey of S. Peter and S. Paule, on the East syde of the sayde Citie, where after Austen and all the kinges of Kent were buried, and that place is called now Saint Austynes.

Saint Austynes in Cauntorbury.

¶ Then Austyn sayled into Fraunce to the Bishop of Arelatensis, and was of him consecrated Archebishop of Cauntorburie.

¶ Now when Gregory was certefyed of the good expedicion of Austyn, he sent to him mo helpers, as Melitus, Iustus, and Paulinus, with bookes and answeres to Austynes questions: that was, that all such goodes as fell to the Church, should be deuided into foure partes: The first part should go to the house and maintenance of the Bishoppes housholde: The seconde to the Clergie, the thirde to the amendment of the Churches, and the fourth to the relefe of poore people and deedes of mercie.

¶ When Austyn had baptised a great part of the kingdome of Kent, he after made two Archbishops by the commaundement of Gregory, the one at Cauntorburie, the which before was at London, and the other at Yorke, as sayth the writer of the flowers of stories: and by the helpe of Ethelbert, he assembled and gathered together the Bishoppes and Doctours of Briteyn, that were before disparkeled. The place of the assembly was long tyme after called Austynes Oke, which is expounded to be Austines strength, & is in the Marches or confines of the people then called Wicti, now Wigornienſis, that is to say Worcester. For this synode, as Bale writeth was holden in Worcestershire.

Archbyshops to Cauntorburie & yorke

Austynes Oke.

¶ In this place, he charged the sayd Bishoppes, that they should ayde him to preach the worde of God to the Anglis, and also that they shoulde among themselues amend certaine errors then vsed in the Churche, and specially for the tyme of keping their Easter, the contrary whereof, the Bishoppes of Briteyn held an opinion vntill (sayth Fabian) that Austyn by his prayers shewed there a Myracle by a blinde Angle or Saxon.

Myracle.

¶ After the which Myracle shewed, the sayd Bishoppes applyed them to the will and minde of Austyn in that matter: But for all this, there were of them that sayd, that they might not leaue the custome which they so long had continued, without the assent of all such as had vsed the same. Then he gathered a Synode, to the which came .vij. Bishoppes, but they agreed not.

¶ The Authour of the flower of stories, sheweth howe Austyn hauing conference with the Britishe Bishoppes and Clergie, coulde in no wise perswade them at the first, to receyue his doctrine: And beeing by him required to come to a second Synode or counsayle, as they were goyng to the same, they came first vnto a discrete godly man, which had of a long time led an Anchorys lyfe amongest them, to aske him counsayle, whether at the preaching of Austen they should forgo their olde traditions or no? who answered on this wyse: If he be a man of God, folowe him. To whom they sayd againe, & howe may we knowe that? you knowe (sayth he) that the Lorde gaue this commaundement, saying: Take my yoke vpon you, learne of me because I am lowely and meeke in heart, then is it likely that he beareth the yoke of Christ him selfe, and also offereth the same vnto you to beare. But if he be proude and hye minded, you may be sure that he is not of God, neyther ought you to take any regarde vnto his wordes. Then sayde they againe, and how may we discerne this: Prouide (sayth he) that he and his may come first into the Synode, and if when you come, he arise vp and reuerence you, then you may be sure that he is Christes minister, and is to be heard obediently of you: But if he dispise you, and thinke himselfe to good to geue any such reuerence vnto you beyng the greater part, dispise you him againe. And it so fortuned afterwardes, that Austyn beyng set downe before they came in, sate still in his Chayre, and made them no countenaunce at all, neither yelded any reuerence vnto them. The which thing they beholding, were by and by in a chafe, and notyng him to be hautye and proude, endeuoured themselues, to contrary and speake against al that euer he spake: But who so desyreth to read more hereof, shall finde the same set out at large in Fabian in his fift part and. ¶ Ethelbert as diuers writers doe write beyng now confirmed in the faith, among other chargeable and costlye deedes began the foundation of Paules Church within the Citie of London, and ordeyned it for the Bishops See of London. For the Archbishops See that before tyme had beene there, was by Austyne and Ethelbert at the sute and request of the Citizens of Cauntorburie, translated to Cauntorbury. But of the building of the Church of S. Paule, diuers opinions be. For some write that it was builded or begonne to be builded by Sigebert king of East Anglis, but more truely king of Esser. This Ethelbert also foũded the Church of S. Andrew in Rochester in Kent.

Ethelbert foũded Paules church in London, but some say Sigebert founded it.

¶ Also (as Fabian sayth) he excited an inhabitaunt or Citizen of London to builde a Church or Chappell in the worship of Saint Peter in the West ende of London then called Thorney (and now the Towne of Westmynster, the which at that time was exceedingly forgrowen with Thornes, Bushes and Bryers,) where the sayde Citizen began to builde the Church of Westmynster, which afterwarde was by Edwarde the Confessour enlarged or new buylded. But by king Henry the third it was newly edified and made as it is now a deuotifull Monastery, and he endued it with goodly possessions and riche Jewels.

¶ During alſo the aforeſayde perſecution of the Britons, before anye ruler of them were ſpecially named, began the reigne of the Eaſt Saxons (as ſayeth Reynulph) vnder Sebertus their firſt king. Albeit that Guydo de Columna ſayth, that it began when the kingdome of the Eaſt Anglis began. This kingdome, that is to ſay, Eſſex, hath on the Eaſt ſide the Sea, on the Weaſt Middleſex and London, on the South the Thamys, and on the North Suffolke, and endured two hundreth yeres, as moſt writers affirme.

Sebertus conuerted to the chriſtian fayth.

¶ The firſt chriſtian king of this Lordſhip was the aforenamed Sebertus, conuerted by the meanes of Mollitus Biſhop of London, as ſayth Guydo: But after his ſaiyng this Sebertus ſhould be the thirde king of Eſſex. All writers agree that the kings of this Lordſhip were moſt commonly named vnder kings, or Pety kings, & were ſubiects vnto the kings of Mertia.

¶ But now to returne to the Britons, which in all this time occupied a part of Cornewall and the Countries of Cambria, as Northwales & Southwales, and there held them in making of aſſaultes vpon the Saxons as before is ſayde, the which ſo continued by the ſpace of.xxiiij. yeres. At which tyme the Britons of one aſſent choſe for their ſouereigne and ruler the Duke of Northwales named Cadwane.

CAdwane Duke of Northwales, was by one aſſent of the Britons made their Lorde and gouernour.

¶ Ye haue heard before what diſcorde and trouble was among the Britons in the time of Careticus laſt king, and long after, by reaſon wherof the Saxons wanne the more lande. And as before it is ſhewed that Ethelfride king of Northumberlande ouerſet the Britons at the Citie of Cheſter, and forced them to flee ouer Seuerne, and ſo into Wales, where they then choſe or elected this Cadwane to be their Duke and leader. The which after he was put in auctoritie, aſſembled his Briteynes and came againe into Briteyn, and gaue battaile vnto the ſayde Ethelfride, in the which they ſped diuerſly, ſo that ſome ſeaſon the Saxons wanne, and ſometime the Britons: But the Britons helde Cheſter and other good Townes, which they recouered at their laſt comming.

¶ It ſhould ſeme by the meaning of Reynulph, that this Cadwan ſhould at the length ſlea the ſayde Ethelfride and Oſtricus, both kings of Bernicia and Deyra. But Guydo and Gaufride ſaye, that after this Cadwan had the better of Ethelfride, it was agreed by Mediatours that Ethelfride ſhoulde enioy all the lande ouer and beyonde Humber into Scotland: and Cadwan alſo ſhould haue the lande from Humber toward the South. To the which ſaiyng agreeth the Engliſhe Chronicle, affirming alſo that he ſhould be the ſonne of Brucuall king of Leyceſter, the which of other Writers is not teſtified.

Brucuall king of Leyceſter.

¶ It is alſo there ſhewed, that after the ſayd accorde betweene Ethelfride and Cadwan, that then they continued during their lyues as two moſt ſpeciall friendes and louers, during the reigne of this Cadwan, the two ſonnes of Colricus, Kingilſus and Quichilinus after the death of their fathers brother, Colwolphus ruled ioyntly the principalitie of the Weſt Saxons. The which in their in their beginning fought against the Britons at Abyndon beside Oxford, and wanne of them the Towne and other holdes, which the Britons in that Countrie occupied. But by agreement of writers, this Cadwane was not at this conflict, neyther medled he so farre within the lande. But as it should seeme by Guydo, these Britons shoulde be some company that shoulde lyue vnder the tribute of the Saxons, the which for the manhood that they had heard reported of Cadwan, rebelled against the Saxons.

¶ Then it foloweth, when this Cadwan had thus continued his amitie with Ethelfride, it fortuned, that this Ethelfride for hatred or otherwise, put from him his wyfe being great with childe, and tooke to him another. Wherfore this woman being remediles, calling to minde the great loue that was betwene her husbande and Cadwan, she went vnto him and most instantly besought him to reconcile hir Lorde and husbande, that she might be restored to his companie. But for that Cadwan, after many meanes and requests made, coulde not bring it about, he therefore tendring her necessitie kept her in his Court vntill she was delyuered of a man childe, whome she caused to be called Edwyn. And soone after was the wyfe of Cadwan delyuered of a sonne, whome the father named Cadwalyn. But the Authour of the Flowre of histories sayeth, that these two children were borne long before this time. The which should seme to be true, for so much as this Cadwalyn was of lawfull age to gouerne this lande when his father dyed, the which he coulde not do if he had bene borne but now, and of this ye may reade more in Fabian, in his fift booke and. C. xxviij. Chapter.

¶ But to returne to the storye of Cadwan: About the. xiiij. yere of his reigne Quinchelinus that was brother vnto Kyngilsus, and ioyntly ruled the West Saxons, sent vpon an Easter day a Ruffian called Eumerus, to slea Edwyn king of Northumberland. This Cutthrote ruffian came to a Citie beside the water of Darewent in Darbishire, & wayted his tyme, and at the last finding the king finally accompanied, entending to haue runne through him with a sworde enuenomed: But one Lylla the kinges trustie seruaunt, beyng without eyther shilde or other weapon to defende his Maister, start betwene the king and the sword, and was striken through the body and dyed, and the king also was wounded with the same stroke: and after also he woũded another which was a knight, and then was he taken, and confessed by whom he was apointed to woorke that treason. The knight and the kinge that were wounded, lay long sicke before they were healed. And the night following the Queene was deliuered of a Daughter, the which King Edwyn caused to be Christened of Paulinus Archebishop of Yorke, in token that he woulde fulfill such promise touching the receyuing of baptisme as he before had made. And she was named Ensleda.

¶ And after Whitsontide then next folowing, Edwyn beyng scantly whole of the wounde, assembled his hoste, and made toward the kinges of the West Saxon, and after a great and sore fight, he vanquished and ouerthrew them. But for all this victory he forgat to be thankefull vnto God, the geuer not onlye of his health, but also of the same victory. And afterwarde he receyued letters of exhortation from Boniface then Bishop of Rome, to take vpon him baptisme: And the sayd Bishop likewise exhorted the Queene, and sent vnto her a Glasse to looke in, with a combe of Iuory richely garnished, and a shirt for for the king wrought in sundrie places with letters of Golde: But all this prevayled nothing at all.

¶ How be it, it was not long after, that the king assembled his counsaile, and by theyr agrement he was of the sayde Paulinus baptised within the sayde Citie, the .xi. yere of his reigne, and the yere of our Lorde .627. He was the first Christian king that reigned in that Countrie. And after him, many of his Lordes and subiectes were also Christened of the sayde Paulinus, and the Flamyns or Bishops which were worshippers of false Goddes, were conuerted and made the Ministers of Christes Fayth. In token whereof, they armed themselues as knightes, and destrydde good horses, where before by their law, they might vse no armour, nor ryde but onely on a Mare. Fabian.

Edwyn the first christian king of Northumberland.

¶ From this tyme forwarde by the terme of .vj. yeres, during the lyfe of king Edwyn, Paulinus christened continually in both the Prouynces of Bernicia, and Deyra, in the Ryuers of Gueny, and Swale, which he vsed for his Fontes, and Preached in the Shire of Lyndesey, and builded a Churche of Stone at Lincoln, the which of same is supposed to be the Minster Churche. And in this tyme was so great peace in the kingdome of Edwyn, that a woman might haue gone from one towne to another without griefe or anoyaunce. And for the reliefe and refreshing of wayfaring men, this Edwyn ordeined at cleere Welles and Springes, certeyne Cuppes or Dishes of Iron and brasse, and caused the same to be fastned vnto them with small cheynes, and no man was so hardy to take away any of those Cuppes, he kept so good iustice, and therewith was knightly of his deedes.

¶ He was the first that wanne the Isle of Eubonia, now called the Isle of Man. And by his meanes Orpewaldus, or Corpewaldus the sonne of Redwaldus king of the East Angles, or Norphis, to whom Edwyn had fled for succour, was conuerted to the true fayth, & a great part of his men with him.

Eubonia now called the Isle of Man.

¶ And about this season began the kingdome of Mertia or middle England, vnder the strong Saxon or Pamyne called Penda, which Lordeship conteyned Huntingtonshire, Herefordshire, Glocestershire, and other, and that was the greatest of all the other kingdomes. And at that tyme reigned in diuerse partes of this land seuen kinges: Sibertus among the East Saxons: Redwold king of East Angles, nowe called Esser, Norffolk, Suffolk, and Cambridgeshire: Ethelbert king of Kent: Ethelwolphus king of Sussex: Kingilsus, and Quinchelinus king of West Saxons: Penda, of Mertia, and Edwyn of Northumberland.

¶ And for that this Edwyn excelled the other kinges, they enuied at him, and specially Penda king of Mertia, the which prouoked Cadwan king of Britons against him. So that they two assembled a great hoast against Edwyn, and lastly met in a place called Hatfield, and after sharpe and sore fight on both sides, there Edwyn was slaine, when he had reigned ouer the Northumbers, .xvij. yeres. Fabian.

¶ When these two kinges Cadwan, & Penda, had thus ouercome the king, and slaine both him & many of his people, they became so cruell to men of that countrie, ỳ they destroyed therin great numbers of people, not sparing, men, women, children, religious persons, nor other. Wherfore Paulinus the Archebishop, beholding their cruelnesse, tooke with him the Queene, and Enfleda her daughter, & fled by water into Kent. And because the Bishoprich of Rochester chester was then voyde, by reason that Romanus the last Bishop was deade: Paulinus was there ordeyned and made Bishop of that See, and there dyed, and also as Reynulph sayth, he left there his Pall, and the Archbishoprick of Yorke was void. xxx. yeres after. But the Queene which was named Etherberga, sayled into Fraunce, and became there a Nonne, and lykewise her daughter Enfleda kept her possession, and was after Abbesse of Stemshalt in the Vale of Whytbie.

¶ After the death of Edwyn, Osricus that was the sonne of Elfricus, which was brother to Ethelfridus, tooke vpon him to be king of Deyra, and Eanfricus the eldest sonne of Ethelfrida, was made king of Bernicia, both the which reuolted from Christes fayth, and became Mysbeleuers. For the which the wrath of God shortly after fell vpon them, for they were both slaine in the yere folowing, of the aforenamed Cadwan and Penda. Osricus.

¶ And when the sayd two kinges were thus slaine, Oswalde the second sonne of Ethelfride began his reigne ouer the prouince of Bernicia, as chiefe of that kingdome of Northumberland, and had the rule of Deyra likewise, whereof when Cadwan was ware, he gathered his Britons, and thought to haue slaine him, as he had before slaine his brother Eanfricus. But when Oswalde was warned of the great strength that Cadwan had, he made his prayers to God, and besought him meekely of helpe to withstand his enemye for the saluation of his people. Then after he had thus prayed, the two armyes met in a fielde named at that tyme Denysborne or Denyslake, where was foughten a strong battaile, and in the ende Cadwan was slaine, and his people chased, the number whereof did farre exceede Oswaldes hoste. And thus ended the sayde Cadwan when he had reigned ouer the Britons. xxij. yeres, leauing after him a sonne named Cadwallyne. Oswalde. Cadwan slaine.

Mahomet, of Arabia, at this time when there was great confusion of things both in the East and West, then began his errour, he came out of a base stock, and being fatherlesse, one Abdemonaples, a man of the house of Ismaell bought him for his slaue, and loued him greatly for his fauour and wyt: For which cause, he made him ruler of his merchandise and other businesse. In the meane season, his master dyed without childzen, leauing behinde him much ryches, and his wyfe a riche Widowe of fiftie yeres of age, whome Mahomet maried, and when she dyed, he was made heire, and greatly encreased in ryches: And for his magicall artes, was had also in great admiration and honour of the foolish people. Wherfore by the counsayle of Sergius, he called himselfe the Prophete of God, and shortly after, when his name was published, and then taken to be of great authoritie, he deuised a lawe or kinde of Religion, called ALCARON, in the which he tooke some parte well neere of all the heresies that had bene before his time, With the Sabellians he denyed the Trinitie; 625 Mahomet. Cadwallyn, the sonne of Cadwan, after the death of his father tooke vpon him the gouernement of the Britons, and he was valiaunt and mightie, and warred strongly vpon the Saxons, which were neere about him, and he wanne from them both Castelles and Townes, and drove them back into the lande toward London: whereof, hearing Penda king of Mertia, assembled his Saxons and made towarde the sayde Cadwallyn: But he was in the ende distressed, and glad and fayne to seeke and purchase his fauour and friendship, and to lyue vnder his tribute.

Penda.

¶ And after this Penda was in great fauour with Cadwallyn, insomuch as he tooke parte with him against the other Saxon kings. And about this time Kyngilsus one of the kings of the West Saxons, was by the preaching of Berinus conuerted to the right beliefe, and christened of him at the Citie of Dorchester, within .vij. Myles of Oxforde. And Oswald king of Northumberland, or rather king of Bernicia, was his Godfather, & wedded his daughter afterwarde. And then that Citie was geuen to the Bishop, to the ende that he shoulde there ordeyne his See, where the sayde Berinus sate xiiij. yeres after, and there was buried, vntill Beda Bishop of Winchester trãslated his body to the City of Winchester, albeit, the Chanons of Dorchester said, that ỹ body of Beryne was not taken thence but another in the stead thereof, & yet in token that it was not remoued thence a Beare of a wonderfull worke stood of late daies ouer that graue where this holy man was first buried. It should seeme that this Citie of Dorchester, is now called Dorset.

¶ About this time Sigebertus or Sigilbertus king of the East Anglis set vp certaine scooles in diuers places, and ordeyned ouer them Scoolemasters and Vshers, as he sometime had seene in Fraunce. And after the opinion of many writers one of them was by him erected in Grantbridge, being then the head Citie of his dominion, now called Cambridge, the which in processe of time grew to be a famous Vniuersitie, as it is now at this day. And the sayde Sigebert was conuerted to the faith of Christ, by that holye man named Felix a Burgonnion: and finally the sayd king betooke his kingdome vnto his Nephew Egritus, & became himselfe a Monke in an Abbey which he himselfe buylded.

¶ But when Penda king of Mertia warred after in that Countrie, the sayde Sigebert was against his wyll pulled out of the foresayde Monastery, and and went in armes, or as some write vnarmed with a whyte rod in his hande nycely, and so was slaine, and well neere all his hoste that came with him to that Fielde. Sigesbert slaine.

¶ About the. viij. yere of the reigne of Cadwallyne, a Saxon reigned in Kent named Ercombertus, who helde that principate. xx. yeres nobly. And among other of his famous deedes, he renued and quickned againe the faith of Christ, that in some places of his kingdome was sore apalled. For he destroyed the Temples of false Gods thorough all that Countrie and ordeyned by the aduice of his Clergie the time of Lent to be fasted. He wedded the daughter of Anna king of East Anglys, named Serburga, of whome he receiued a daughter & named her Eikendoga, the which after was a Nonne in a Monastery in France. Ercõbertus. ¶ About this time, as it were about the. viij. yere of Cadwallyne, dyed Kyngilsus king of the West Saxons, when he had reigned with his brother and alone. xxxj. yeres. And Kenwalcus his sonne was king after him, the which at the beginning of his reigne would not be christened, and forsooke his wyfe the daughter of Penda, and tooke to him another. Wherfore Penda to be auenged for his daughters cause, gathered his host and chased Kenwalcus out of his kingdome, and kept him thence three yeres. In the which time, he was with Anna king of the East Anglis and was christened of Felix, and after by the helpe of the sayde Anna recouered his kingdome. Kenwalcus.

¶ When Kenwalcus was thus restored to his lande, he made a Bishops See at Wynchester, and ordeyned there a Bishop named Agilbert, a Frenchman borne, but he came out of Ireland. The which when he had sitten there a certaine of time, he was deposed and put from thence, but the cause why, I know not, and in his place was set one named Wyn, of whome sayeth Polichronichon, the Citie tooke the name of Wynchester, as it were Wynnes Citie. But he was also deposed: And then was Leutherius Bishop, and after Leutherius succeeded Cedda: And after him Theodorus Archebishop of Cauntorbury ordeyned two Bishops to the Prouynce of West Saxon. The one at Winchester, and to that was subiect two Countyes, Southrey and Southhampshire. And the other See he ordeyned at Sherborne, to the which were subiect sixe Counties, that is to saye Barkeshire, Wyltshire, Somersetshire, Dorsetshire, Deuonshire, and Cornewall, but in Wylliam the Conquerours time, the See of Sherborne was turned to the See of Sarisbury, as was also the See of Ramnesbury. Agilbert. Wyn, of whõ the towne of Winchester tooke his name.

¶ It was not long after but that Kenwalcus warred with the king of Britons, the which fought with him at a place called Whyte Gosneborough, and was of him there ouercome. Then Cadwallyne assembled a newe hoste of Britons, and met with Kenwalcus at a place called the hill of Pent, where after a long and sore battaile, the Britons were put to flight. White Cosneborough.

¶ Ye haue heard before how Oswald was made king of Northumberland, the which continued his lyfe in iustice and vertue as a king should do, by the space of. ix. yeres: But Penda king of Mertia, who to him and to all christian men had great disdeyne and enuie, about the. ix. yere of Cadwallyne made warre vpon Oswald, and slue him in a field called Meserfelde, where after his death (as Fabian sayth) God shewed for him many miracles. But Oswalde. Meserfelde after one yere of his death Oſwy his yonger brother recouered the kingdome, and buried his head in the Churchyarde of Lyndeſar, for the bodye was conueyed by the Pagans, and deuyded in ſundrie peeces.

¶ When Oſwy had a ſeaſon ruled his kingdome, he by vnlawfull meanes procured the death of Oſwyn king of Deyra. This Oſwyn was the ſonne of Eaufricus eldeſt brother of Oſwald, which Oſwyn was good of condition and therewith both meeke and mylde, and being thus ſlaine, as is afore ſayde, the ſayde Oſwy tooke to him as felow of that kingdome his brothers ſonne Odylwald, the ſonne of Oſwald. This Oſwald gaue vnto Cedda Biſhop of Wyncheſter before named, a grounde in a place of the North Countrie in the high hilles called Laſtyngery, for to buylde an Abbay vpon, which he there buylded, and after taught his brother Chymbillus how he ſhould rule and gouerne that place.

Oſwyne. ſlaine.

Penda.

¶ Nowe Penda kinge of Mertia, which forgat not the ſtrengthening and fauouring that Anna kinge of Eaſt Anglys had ſhewed to Kenwalcus his daughters huſbande, and his enemye, and therefore deſirous to be reuenged on him, gathered a power of men of warre and went againſt the ſayde Anna, and ſlue him in plaine battaile.

¶ After the which victory, the ſayd Penda, beyng puffed vp with pryde, and glory, went forward with his hoſt into Northumberlande, entending to ſlea Oſwy, as before he had ſlaine his brother Oſwald. Wherof when Oſwy had knowledge, he aſſembled his power and made towardes him. And for affinite of mariage that was betweene their children, and other cauſes as after ſhall apere Oſwy offered vnto him many great offers, to the intent to haue had him to haue ſtayed from battaile, and to haue had peace with him.

Oſwy.

¶ When Oſwy perceyued the obſtinacie and pryde of Penda, and ſawe that by no reaſonable meanes he coulde moue him to peace, he ſayde, ſeeyng this Paynym will not receyue our giftes and proffers that we haue offered vnto him, we will nowe offer it to him that can receyue them. And foorthwith he made his vowe vnto God, that if he had the victorye ouer his enemies, he woulde offer his daughter Elfleda vnto him, with ſufficient poſſeſſions for to buylde. xij. Abbeys. And ſhortly after, he toyned in battaile with Penda, in the countrey of Leedys, not farre from Yorke, which battail was ſo fore fought that the lyke was not ſeene many yeres before: But in the ende Penda was ſlaine, and. xxx. of his chiefe Capitaynes, and yet he had three tymes the number of people that Oſwy had. And thoſe that eſcaped the ſhot and ſword, were for the greateſt part drowned in the Ryuer Wynwed, which was nere vnto the place of that battaile. And among the Priſoners that were taken at this fielde, the wife of Penda was one, and her ſonnes Uncle named Egfridus was another. Fabian.

Penda ſlain

¶ Then Oſwy yelded his thankes vnto almighty God, and according to his former promes, he offered his daughter Elfleda beyng of the age of three yeres vnto God, and tooke her to the Lady of Hilda, Abbeſſe of Hertſey, or Hertes Iſlande. And after that the ſayde Hilda remoued to the Abbey of Stremſhalt in the vale of Whitby. xxx. Myle from Yorke, where ſhe was after Abbeſſe, and ſo was Elfleda alſo. And Oſwy as he had promiſed gaue landes and rentes to builde. xij. Abbeyes, whereof ſixe were in Bernicia, and ſixe in the Prouynce of Deyra.

¶ This

¶ This aforenamed Penda had dyuerſe ſonnes, as wryters repoꝛt, that is to ſay, Wolferus, Weda, Egfridus, beſyde other not mencioned. To this ſeconde ſonne Weda, Oſwy had beforꝛe time maryed a daughter of his by conſent of Penda his father: Wherefoꝛe, by the helpe of Oſwy his father in law he was made king of South Mertia, the which Lordſhip is ſeuered from the North Mertia by the ryuer of Trent, & it conteined by the recoꝛde of Beda fiue thouſand houſholdes. This Weda alſo pꝛomiſed when he maryed the ſayd daughter of Oſwy, that he would become a Chꝛiſtian man, the which he perfourmed after the death of his father. But when he had ſcantly reigned thꝛee yeres ouer the ſayde South Mertia, he was by treaſon of his wyfe ſlaine (as ſayth Fabian) but he ſheweth no cauſe. And after that kingdome fell to Wolferus the other bꝛother, the which had wedded the daughter of Ercombert king of Kent, named Ermenilda. This Wolferus was ſhoꝛtlye after chꝛiſtened, ſo that he is accompted foꝛ the firſt Chꝛiſtined king that reigned in Mertia, and was father to Kenꝛedus, and to Wereburga. Wolferus. Ercombert king of Kent.

¶ And foꝛ that it is long ſithen I ſpake of Kenwalcus king of Weſt Saxons, it is to be noted that after he had ouercome the Bꝛitons (as beforꝛe is ſhewed) and at that tyme had not perfited the Biſhops See of Wincheſter, he then buſied himſelfe thereabout. And accoꝛding to the will of Kingilſus his father, he gaue to the ſuſtentation of the ſayd See, all the land which lay within .vij. miles of the ſayde Citie (as ſayth the floure of Hiſtoꝛies) and finiſhed it ſomedeale to his purpoſe, but farre from that it is nowe. Kenwalcus. Kingilſus.

¶ Soone after that Kenwalcus had ended this woꝛke, he made warre vpon Wolferus of Mertia. But in that iourney foꝛtune was not friendlye vnto him, foꝛ he loſt thereby and wanne nothing of his entent and purpoſe.

¶ It was not long after, but Ercombert king of Kent dyed, and his ſonne Egbert was king after him. ix. yere. And ſhoꝛtly after chaunced great moꝛtalitie and death thꝛoughout this land of Bꝛiteyn, the which continued and encreaſed moꝛe and moꝛe during the life of this Cadwallyn, and the lyfe of Cadwallader which folowed him. In the which ſeaſon oꝛ beginning of this moꝛtalitie and ſickneſſe, dyed many Biſhops in this lande, inſomuch that Vitalcamus then beyng Biſhop of Rome oꝛdeyned Theodoꝛus Archebiſhop of Cantoꝛbury to haue the rule of the Churches of Bꝛiteyn. Somewhat beforꝛe this tyme, Benet that was in good fauour with king Oſwy, and deſcended of riche kindꝛed, foꝛſooke ſeruice and houſe and all his kindꝛed, and became a Monke. This Benet was he that firſt bꝛought the craft of Glaſing into this land, and tooke to his ſcholer Beda, when he was but .vij. yeres of age, and taught him during his lyfe. Moꝛtalitie. Glaſing firſt bꝛought into this land.

¶ And here foꝛ that ſpeciall mencion is made a little beforꝛe that Benet was the firſt that bꝛought into Bꝛiteyn the Arte and craft of making of Glaſſe, I thought it well to adde this note theꝛvnto, which I find wꝛitten in Reynulph in his fourth booke and fourth Chapter. That in the tyme of the reigne of Tiberius Emperour of Rome, which was not long after Chꝛiſtes incarnation, a certeyn craftes man had found out the Art of myrture and melting of Glaſſe in ſuch ſoꝛt, as he made the ſame malliable, that is to ſay, to abide the Hammer as Tynne and other metalles do: And he came to the Emperour thinking to haue receyued ſome reꝛwarde, and ſhewed it vnto him. The Emperour when he ſaw it, cauſed ſome of his awone Glaſſes to be ſet and bꝛoken, Reynulph. Tiberius Emperour of Rome put to death him þ inuẽted glaſſe to abyde the Hammer.

and the Artificer forthwith amended them. And when the Emperour had well conſidered of the man and of his cunning, he demaunded of him if there were any man liuing beſide himſelfe that could do the like, and he ſimply anſwered, none that he knewe or euer heard of, and the emperour aunſwered, neither ſhalt thou euer do it againe, for this Art would make golde and other precious metall to be of no valure: wherefore he commaunded him to be behedded, and it was done, which certainly was a tyrannous deede, namely for that he would attempt to ſuppreſſe the giftes of God.

Glaſſe made to abide to Hammer,

¶ Nowe I will returne againe to Oſwy: the which when he had long reigned ouer the Norththumbers, he made Cedda that was Abbot of Lastingay, Archebiſhop of Yorke, more of wyll then of good ſkill, and put out Wilfride the Archebiſhop of that See: But it was not long after but that Cedda was depriued of that dignitie, by the authoritie of the Archebiſhop Theodorus, as he depriued other at that tyme, which came to their benefices againſt the lawes of the Church, and made him by great inſtaunce after this, Biſhop of the Weſt Sarons. And about the.xxx. yere of the reigne of Cadwallyn, Ciſſa that was father to Jne king of Weſt Sarons builded the Abbey of Abingdon. Fabian.

Monkes religious.

¶ In theſe dayes the Monkes and Clergie of Briteyn ſet all their minds to ſerue God, and not the worlde, and were wholy giuen to deuocion, and not to filling of the Paunch and pampering of the bodye: wherefore they were then had in great reuerence and honour, ſo that they were then receyued withall worſhip. And as they went by the ſtreetes and wayes, men that ſawe them, woulde runne to them and deſire their bleſſings: and well was him then that might geue vnto them poſſeſſions, and to builde them houſes and Churches. But as they encreaſed in ryches of worldly treaſure, ſo they decreaſed in heauenly treaſure, as in the dayes of Aluredus ſomedeale began, and ſithen that time hath ſprong not all to the pleaſure of God. Then they applyed nothing that was worldlye, but gaue themſelues to preaching and teaching of the worde of our Sauiour Jeſu Chriſt, and folowed in lyke the doctrine that they preached, geuing good example to all men. And beſides that, they were vtterly voyde of couetouſneſſe, and receyued no poſſeſſions gladly, but were inforced therevnto. Fabian.

Monkes had in great reuerence.

Decay of Religion.

¶ At this time Oſwy king of Northumberlande dyed and Edfridus hys ſonne was kinge after hym and reygned fiftene yeares, after hys father had reygned with hys felowes Oſwyne and Oſwalde, twentye and eyght yeares.

¶ Then dyed alſo Kenwalcus king of Weſt Sarons, about the.xxxix. yere of Cadwallyne, when he had reigned ouer them.xxx. yeres, and his ſonne Kenewynus ſucceded him, but entred not into poſſeſſion before Sexburga his mother had ruled that Prouynce one yere.

¶ Ye haue heard before howe Wilfride was depoſed & put out of the See of Yorke, wherfore he went to Rome and complayned vpon him to Agathon then Biſhop of that See, and was well allowed in ſome things. But the king and Theodorus had there ſuch Procters and friends, that he fayled of his purpoſe, wherefore he returned to the South Sarons, and after he had preached among them.xb. yeres, he then taught them the arte or craft of Fiſhyng.

The arte of Fiſhing.

¶ Egfridus

¶Egfridus or Edfridus king of Northumberlande, claymed the lande that Ethelred king of Mertia helde, for the which diuers assemblies of intreatie were had, but they tooke none effect, wherefore eyther partie gathered his strength, and met vpon a playne, neere vnto the Ryuer of Trent, where was foughten betwene them a long and sharpe fight: In the which among a great number on both parties, was slaine the brother of Egfride named Elswinus, but yet the saide Egfride had the better. Then after this battail, meanes of peace was againe made, so that finally Egfride had great sommes of money in recompence of his brothers death, and so the sayde two kings agreed and rested afterwards in quiet.

¶Sone after this time, Theodorus for diuers causes kept a Synode or Counsaile of Bishops and other men of the Church, at Hatfielde: By authoritie of which counsaile (sayth Fabian) he deuyded the Prouynce of Mertia that Serwolphus then ruled alone, into fiue Bishoprycks, that is one to Chester, the second to Worcester, the thirde to Lichefielde, the fourth to Cedema in Lyndesey, and the fift to Dorchester. Theodorus holdeth a Synode. Hatfielde.

¶About the.xlvj. yere of Cadwalyne, Kenewinus king of West Saxons had occasion of warre against the Britons, so that they met neere vnto the West See, where after a sharpe skirmishe, the Britons were chased. And sone after Edfridus king of Northumberlande made warre vpon the Pictes or Scottes, because they fauoured & ayded the East Anglys against him. But in the ende by colour of fliyng back, they brought Edfride into a streyte among hilles and mountaines, and slue him there with a great parte of his people. And after his death a bastarde brother of his, named Alfridus, the bastarde was king of Northumberlande and reigned among them xviij. yeres. Egfrids slaine.

¶And shortly after, dyed Cadwalyne king of Britons, when he had reigned.xlviij.yeres, and many other things are written of him by Gaufride, but neyther by Reynulph nor by any other authour of good authoritie, and therefore I passe them ouer. Cadwalyn dead.

Ferquhard called Ferquhard the second, the sonne of the late king Ferquharde was made king of Scottes, and reigned.xviij.yeres. This man in his priuate lyfe was verie liberall aboue his power, but when he was authorised king, he became a cruell coueteous and glottenous Tiran, wherefore he was striken of God with a vile and peinfull sickenesse, whereof he dyed. 646 / 12

Maldwyn the sonne of Dowald was authorised king of Scottes, and reigned.xx. yeres: he made peace with the Pictes and Saxons, and at the last was murdred of his wyfe for suspicion of Adultrie. 665 / 31

Cadwalader, began to rule the Britons and also the West Saxons. He made warre vpon Lotharius king of Kent, and destroyed much of that Prouince, and wanne the Isle of Wight, and gaue the fourth part to S. Wilfride, in the which fourth part were accompted three hundred housholds. 683 / 1 The Isle of Wight.

¶The whilest that Cadwalader was busied in one part of Kent, his brother named Mulkyn with a certaine of knights were besieged, and lastly brent in another parte thereof. In reuengement whereof, Cadwalader of newe destroyed the more parte of the sayde Prouynce. And the sayde warre continuing Lotharius aforenamed was wounded and dyed, after whome Edricus was king, and reigned but a short tyme.

¶ Then Cadwalader made warre vpon the king of Southser named Athelwalde, and slue him in plaine battaile, and after made his Prouynce subiect to him.

¶ When Cadwalader had ruled the Britons, and also the west Sarons by the terme of three yeres, he then (as sayth Reynulph Monke of Chester) of pure deuotion renounced the pompe and pride of the world, and went on pilgrimage to Rome, where of Sergius then Bishop of Rome, he was confirmed, and after made a whyte Monke, and so continued all his lyfe tyme.

Nicholas Brodugan.

¶ But other write as namely Nicholas Brodugan in his Epitome, that king Cadwalader reigned ouer Briteyn in great peace and tranquilitie. xij. yeres. And then there happened so great a death among his people, that in maner the lyuing did scarsely suffise to burie the dead, and therefore he fled into little Britteyn, whose Cosyn Iuor and Iue, being repulsed out of Englande by the Sarons, went into Wales, where among the Britons, they and their posteritie remayned Princes. And now vpon this great death and cruell warres among the Sarons, the Scottes thought to slip the Coller of obedience, and entered into league with Charles then king of Fraunce, the articles whereof folow in the historie of Achaius king of Scottes.

¶ And here endeth the lyne and gouernement of the Britons, nowe called Welshmen, which tooke that name of their Duke or leader called Walle, or Gallo, or else of a Queene of Wales, named Galaes, or Wales. But how soeuer that name came first to them, nowe they are called Welshmen, which sometime were named Britons, or brutons, and descended first of the Troyans (sayth Fabian) and after of Brute, and lastly of Mulmucius Dunwallo: Albeit they were mingled or medled with sundrie other Nations, as Romaynes, Pictes, and others. And now they be English, that in their beginning were named Sarons or Anglis.

Wallo or Gallo.

Welshmen

¶ And after the departure of Cadwalader, this Realme was called Englande, and the Inhabitantes therof were called Anglis, or English men. And this happened 1972. yeres, or as sayth Fabian 1822. yeres after that Brute first arriued in this Islande: And after the conquest of Celar 735. yeres: And from the entring of the Sarons vnder their leaders Hengist and Horsus in the tyme of Vortiger 235. yeres.

¶ Thus then apereth by the former processe of this worke, that the last yere of Cadwalader, was the yere of our Lord fyue hundreth. lxxxvj. which maketh the yere of the worlde foure thousand, fyue hundreth. xlvij. So that as Fabian sayth, the Britons had the rule of the more part of this land, reconing from Brute vnto this tyme, a thousand. viij. C. xxij. yeres. And now the Sarons or Anglis began fully to reigne, and to haue the whole dominion of this Realme.

AFter the departure of Cadwalader (as Fabian sayth) this land of Briteyn was in great dissention, by meane of variaunce betwene the Britons and Sarons, and the sayde contencion continued. xj. yeres. And beside this, the great death and mortalitie before mencioned, behemently and greatly encreased, and by reason thereof folowed great scarcitie, whereof ensued sued hunger, and vniuersall famine through the Realme: So that by the occasion of one thing and other, the people of this Realme were wonderfully minished and decayed, and that so many and so much (as sayth Gaufride, and also the English Chronicle) the quicke bodies suffised not to burye the dead. Famine. A pitifull and horrible plague.

EUgenius the fift of that name was king of Scottes, and reigned foure yeres. In his tyme, as sayth the Historie of Scotland, he warred vpon Edfride king of Northumberlande, and slue him in battayle. 685 / 3

IEwe, or Ivas, discending of the blood of the Saxons, was ruler or king of west Saxons, next after that Cadwalader had renounced the pompe of the worlde. He ruled the west Saxons verye honourably, and mainteyned such warre against the kentish Saxons, that they of Dorobernia or Cantorbury, graunted him to haue peace, and also gaue vnto him for a recompence of the death of Mulking brother to Cadwalader before slaine, three thousand pounde. 687 / 1

¶ In the. rj. yere of the reigne of this Iewe, chaunced the wonder & meruaile that is written in Polichronica, in his fift booke, and. rrj. Chapter, and he allegeth Bede for his Authour, of one Brigthwaldus, the which after that he had beene a long while dead, was restored againe to lyfe, and tolde manye thinges of great wonder to many men. Whereby he caused great almose, and many deedes of charitie to be done. Brigthwaldus raised frō death to lyfe.

¶ In the. rvj. yere of this mannes reigne, Ethelredus before mencioned, which was king of Mertia, forsooke his worldly honor, and became a Monk at Bardeney, when he had long tyme ruled the men of Mertia. 701 / 16

¶ In the. rriij. yere of this Iew, Colredus then king of Mertia assembled his people, and warred vpon Iew. Wherof when Iew had knowledge he likewyse gathered his people together, and they met to both their harmes at a place called Wodensburgh: where after long fight, eyther of them sped so vnhappely, that it was not knowen whether part had greatest dammage. 708 / 23

¶ Nowe when Iew had ruled the west Saxons nobly by the space of rrrvij. yeres, by the importunate labour of his wife Ethelburga, he renounced his honourable estate, and tooke on him the wede of a poore man, and became a Pilgrime to Rome. And Ethelburga his wife made her selfe a Nonne in Barking. vij. myles from London. 721 / 37

¶ Also some Authours write that this Iew was the first king that graūted of euery house that had fyre burning in it a penny, to be payed to the Bishop of Rome & his successors, and it was called Rome shot, or Peter pence. Rome shot, Peter pence.

¶ And as Fabian sayth, when he should renounce his estate and gouernment, he resigned the same vnto Ethellardus his Nephewe. This man also as sayth Cooper, builded the Colledge or Cathedrall Church of Welles, and the Abbey of Glascenbury. Wellles College.

EUgenius the first of that name, reigned. x. yeres in Scotland. He made peace with the Northumbers, and hated exstremely the Pictes. 688 / 3

AVberkeleth, a cruell Tyrant, reigned in Scotland two yeres, and was slaine by one of his seruaunts, as he was goyng with an army against the Pictes. 698 / 13

EUgenius the. vij. was king of Scottes. rviij. yeres. He was mightye of body, and of honest maners: he made peace with the Pictes, and caused the 700 / 15

Actes

A worthie note.

Actes of his auncetours to be put in wryting, and commaunded that Historiographers should be found of the common cost.

716 / 31 Modrack was king of Scotland, and reigned. xxj. yeres. In his tyme the foure diuerse Nations reigning in Albion, had peace betweene themselues, that is, the Britons, the Anglis, the Scottes, and the Pictes.

¶ And about this tyme Germanie receyued the fayth of Christ.

724 / 1 Ethelard the Nephewe of Iewe, reigned ouer the west Saxons: Of this Man is little written, sauing that he reigned fiue yeres, and then dyed, leauing behinde him none issue of his body. And in his tyme, the reuerend and holy Priest Beda, was famous, who wrote his booke called Anglica Hystoria to Offrike king of Northumberland.

Beda that reuerend father.

729 / 1 Cutbert the Nephewe of Ethelarde, reigned ouer the west Saxons next after his sayd Uncle, of whome also is little mention made, sauing that in the first yere of his reigne, holy Beda dyed, who in his tyme wrote lxxviij. bookes. And this Cutbert when he had reigned. xxj. yeres, departed out of this worlde also. This man made often warre vpon Ethelwalde of Mercia, and sped therein dyuerslye.

Beda dyed.

733 / 47 Edfine the sonne of Eugenius the seuenth, reigned in Scotland. xxx. yeres: This man was geuen to iustice and peace, and kept the league that was made with the Britons, Englishmen, and Pictes.

745 / 1 Sigebert the Cosyn of Cutbert, reigned ouer the west Saxons. He was cruell and tirannous to his subiects, and turned the lawes and customes of his forefathers, after his awne will and pleasure. And because a noble man of his Realme named the Erle Combranus, did somedeale sharpely aduertise him to chaunge his maners and to be more prudent and temperate towarde his people, he therefore maliciously caused him to be put to most cruell death.

Tirannie.

¶ Now for as much as this king Sigebert continued in his malice and cruell condicions, and would not amend, his subiects conspired against him, and depriued him of all kingly dignitie: so that he fell after into great desolation & miserie, for being on a season found in a wood or desolate place, wandering alone without all comfort: he was by a Swynheard or villaine, murdred & slaine, in the reuengement of Earle Combranus death, whom Sigebert being king had before most cruelly caused to be put to death in the same place: vnto the which Earle the sayde villaine had beene sometimes belonging. And thus was Sigebert deposed and murdered, when he had reigned two yeres.

A plague due to a tyraunt.

748 / 1 Kenulph of the lyne or blood of Cerdicus the which Cerdicus was the first king of the west Saxons, tooke vpon him the rule and gouernment of the sayde west Saxons. The vertue of this man passed hys fame: For after that he with the agreement and consent of his people had deprined Sigebert their king from his regall authoritie, he then first of all appeased dyuers murmures and grudges that kindeled among his subiects, for the sayde depriuation, and so set his Lordeship in great quietnesse, and rest touching touching their ciuile diſcorde.

¶ About the. viij. yere of the reigne of this Kenulphus, Offa ſlue a Tyraunt named Beorredus, who before had ſlaine Ethelwald king of Mertia. After whoſe death the ſayde Offa, Nephew to the ſayde Ethelwald, reigned as king of that Prouynce. 756 / 8

¶ Of this Offa is tolde many things, whereof ſomething I entende to ſhewe. He had warre with the Northumbers, and them for a tyme ſubdued. He alſo had warre with Ethelrede king of Eaſt Anglis, and with Egbert otherwiſe called Pren king of Kent, whome he tooke priſoner, and led him bounde with him into Mertia. Egbert king of Kent impriſoned.

¶ Then after theſe victories, Offa buylded the Church of Winchecomb. In the time of the which buylding, and in the preſence of. xiij. Biſhops and many other great eſtates, he diſcharged the ſayde Egbert of impriſonement, and ſet him at libertie, for ioy whereof the people there preſent, made ſuch a ſhouting and cry of reioyſing and gladneſſe, that al the Church rang thereof. Winchcōb Churche. Egbert king of Kent enlarged.

¶ This king had ſuch diſpleaſure to the Citizens of Caunterburie, that he remoued the Archebiſhops See, by the agreement of the firſt Adrian then Biſhop of Rome, vnto Lichefielde. He furthermore chaſed the Britons or Welſhmen into Wales, and made a ſtrong Dyke betwene Wales, and the vtter boundes of Mertia, or middle Englande, the which to this daye is named Offdiche. And after he builded there a Church, which long time after was called Offkirck: he alſo buylded the Abbey of Saint Albons. Beſides this it is written of him that he maried one of his daughters to Brigthricus that was king of weſt Saxons. And for that in his time there was variance betwene him and the Frenchmen, and that paſſage and traffique of Marchaunts was forboden: therefore he ſent the famous Doctor Anſelmus vnto Charles the great, then king of France to intreat of peace. Which Charles had the ſayde Anſelmus euer after in ſuch fauour, that he became hys Diſciple. Fabian. The Archebiſhops See of Caunterburie remoued to Lichfielde. Paſſage of Merchantes forbodden.

¶ But nowe let vs returne to Kenulphus, who before time had often warre with Offa, and alſo had with him many conflicts, but laſtly they were agreed. About the. xj. yere of this Kenulphus, Egbert king of Northumbers, renounced his kingly dignitie, and became a Monke. 759 / 11

¶ And finally, when Offa had reigned ouer Mertia. xxxix. yeres. as ſaith Guydo, he left the kingdome to his ſonne, who alſo was named Kenulphus, or as ſome write Egfurtus, and went himſelfe to Rome.

¶ And the foreſayde Kenulphus king of the weſt Saxons kept ſtrongly his Lordſhip againſt the power of all his enimies, and had his ſubiectes in due order of obedience. Laſtly, he was ſurpriſed with the loue of a woman that he kept at Merton, whoſe companie he haunted more ſecretly, then ſtoode with his honour. Whereof hauing knowledge, a kinſman of Sigebert late king, entending to reuenge the deposing and murthering of his kynſman, awayted the tyme, and beſet the houſe where Kenulph and his Paramour were ſmally accompanied. But ſo ſoone as the ſayde Kenulph had eſpied his enemies, he ſet vpon them, and as Reynulph ſayeth, though they were in number. lxxx. yet fought he with them a long whyle, but in the ende he was ſlaine of Clito his enemie. Lechery. Murder. Clito.

¶ It was not long after or worde ſprang of the kinges death: wherfore Offricus

Offricus then beyng maister of the kinges Souldiers and garisons, armed himselfe, and tooke with him a certaine of the sayde Cheualrye, and pursued the sayd murderers, and at the last encountered with them, and slue the sayde Clito their Capitaine, with the more part of his companie. And that done, he retorned to Werton, and there tooke the Corps of Kenulph, and with great solemnitie conueyed it to Winchester, where it was with all reuerence buried, when his father and he had ruled.xxxj.yeres.

761 Eugenius the.viij. was king of Scottes, and was slaine of his Lordes for his couetousnesse, filthy lust, and cruelty, when he had reigned three yeres.

764 Fergus the thirde was made king of Scotland, and reigned three yeres: He was a foule dronken glutton, and so outragiously geuen to Harlottes, that he neglected his owne wife, and brought her to such penurye, that shee was faine to serue other noble women for her liuing. Wherefore, she murdered him in his bed, and after slue her selfe also.

768 Solnathius reigned in Scotland. xx. yeres, and then dyed of the Goute. In his tyme rebelled Banus of the Isle of Tyne, and Gillowham of Galloway, which were brought to due obeysaunce.

778 Brithricus of the blood of Cerdicus, began his reigne ouer the west Saxons, in the yere of our Lorde.viij.C.lxxviij. This Man before tyme had maryed one of the daughters of Offa king of Mertia, as before is touched, by whose ayde and power, he put out of his rule Egbert the sonne of Alcumundus, the which Egbert at that day was an vnder king or ruler in the Lordeship of west Saxons, which Egbert was discended of the blood of Genulphus, of whome some part of the story is declared in the.xxv. Chapter of the fift booke of Polichronicon. And after he was thus of Brithricus expulsed, he sayled into Fraunce, and there exercised himselfe in the feates of warre with the knightes of Charles court the French king during the life of the sayde Brithricus.

Polichroni.

779 ¶ About the second yere of this Brithricus, was seene in great Britayn a wonderfull sight: For sodeynly as men walked in the streete, Crosses lyke vnto blood fell vpon their clothes, and blood fell from heauen lyke droppes of raine.

A straunge & terrible sight.

788 ¶ This after some expositors, betokened the comming of the Danes into this lande, the which entered shortly after. For as sayth Reynulph, about the.ix.yere of Brithricus the Danes first entered this land. In defence wherof, this said king sent forth his Steward of his houshold, with a small companye, which shortly was slaine. But by the strength of Brithricus and the other kinges of the Saxons, they were compelled to auoyde the land for that time.

The first entering of the Danes.

¶ Brithricus thus well and knightly ruling his lande, his wife named Ethelburga, not contented with him as she ought to be, sought diuerse wayes and meanes howe she might bring her Lorde out of lyfe, so that finally shee poysoned him with many other of his family: wherefore she fearing punishment, fled into Fraunce, and by such frendship as she there had, was well cherished in Charles Court the French king surnamed the great.

Ethelburga.

Poysoning.

¶ Of her it is tolde, that when he had information of the vnstablenesse of this womans condicions, he at that season beyng a widower, and at a time talking pleasantly with her, sayde: Nowe I put to your choyse, whether ye will

will haue me vnto your wedded Lord, or else my sonne standing here in your presence: and him that you choose, him shall ye haue and enioy for your husband: But she chose the sonne, and left the father. Then sayd the king, if thou haddest chosen me, thou shouldest haue had my sonne: but for that thou hast forsaken me, thou shalt haue neyther of vs. And after he closed her in an Abbey, where in processe a lewde man kept with her such companie, that shee was voyded that place, and after demeaned her selfe so viciously, that in processe of tyme she fell in such pouertie, that she dyed in great penury & misery.

¶ Nowe because of the misdemeanor of this Woman, that shee had thus vnnaturally slaine her Lorde and husbande, the king of Anglis, and specially of west Saxons, would not suffer their wyues to be called Queenes, nor yet suffer them to sit by them in places of great honour or kingly seate, by a long tyme after.

The names and preheminence of Queenes forbodden.

¶ Thus as before is shewed, dyed Brithricus, beyng empoysoned by his awne wyfe, when he had ruled the west Saxons. xvij. yeres.

A Chaius was ordeyned king of Scottes, and reigned. xxxij. yeres. In his tyme was made the solemne league betweene Scotlande and Fraunce, against the Saxons or Englishmen: which tooke such effect, that euer sithen that day, the Scottes haue more enclined to the French men, than to Englishmen. And here I haue entered the Articles of the sayd league as they are written by Hector Boecius in his Scottish Chronicle.

A league betweene Frãce and Scotland.

Articles betweene the Frenche men and Scottes.

¶ First that the Amitie and confederacie of French men and Scottes to be made for euer, both for the people present, and to come.

2 The Iniurie of Englishmen done to any of those people, shall be perpetually holden as common to them both.

3 When French men are inuaded by English men, the Scottes shall send their armie in defence of Fraunce, so that they be supported of mony and victualles by Fraunce.

4 When the Scottes are inuaded by English men, then the French men shall come vpon their awne expenses to their support.

5 And if any priuate person, eyther Frenchman or Scot support the English men, against any of them, with counsaile, money, or victualles, or remaine among them during the tyme of battayle: the doer thereof shall be holden a Traytor and an enemy to them both.

6 None of these two people shall take peace or truce with the Englishmen, but by the aduice eyther of other. Hector Boecius. x. Booke, iii. Chapter.

EGbert, or after the Englishe Chronicle Edbright, the sonne of Alcumundus, reigned ouer the west Saxons. This man as is beforesayd, was driuen out of the lande of Britayn by the force of Brithricus. But he hauing knowledge of his death, sped him out of Fraunce, and in so knightly wyse behaued himselfe, that he obteyned the gouernement aboue sayd, and was made king of west Saxons.

¶ Bernulphus king of Mertia had this Egbert in great derision, and vsed against him sundrie scoffes, and made of him trifling and rayling rymes, the which for a tyme he patiently suffered. But when he was somwhat stayed in his kingdome, and had proued the heartes of his subiectes, he at the last assembled his knightes and Souldiours, and gaue vnto Bernulphus a battayle

Bernulphus

Elindone. taple in a place called Elindone, in the Prouince of Hampshire. And albeit that in that fight was great diuersitie of number, as .bj. or .biij. againe one, yet Egbert had the victory: For his knightes were leane, pale, and long brethed, so that they might endure to fight long: But Bernulphus Souldiours were fat, corpulent, grosse and short breathed, and therfore could not endure.

¶ Here is to be noted, that after the death of Offa king of Mertia, or middle England (of whom somewhat is spoken in the story of Kenulphus) reigned his sonne Egfertus, and after Egfertus reigned Kenulphus, the which was father vnto Kenelme, and vnto the two fayre Virgines Quindreda, and Burgemilda. And after Kenulphus reigned the sayd Kenelme: And after Kenelme, Colwolphus, and after him Bernulphus before named.

¶ And nowe to returne to Egbert, who when he had as before is sayde ouercome Bernulphus, he sealed that Lordship into his awne hand: and that done, he made warre vpon the Kentish Saxons, and at length obteyned also of them the victorie. And lykewyse, he subdued the Northumbers, and caused the kinges of these three kingdomes to liue vnder him as tributaries, and ioyned them to his kingdome.

¶ This Egbert also wanne from the Britons or Welshmen, the towne of Chester, which they had kept in their possession vntill that daye. For the which victoryes thus by him obteyned, he shortlye after called a counsayle of his Lordes at Winchester, and there by their aduises, he was crowned king and chiefe Lord of this land, which before this day was called Briteyn: But nowe he sent into all the Costes of this lande his commaundementes and commissions, that from that day forwarde the Saxons should be called Anglis, and the land Anglia, in Englishe, England.

¶ About the .xxiiij. yere of the reigne of Egbert, Kenelme before mencioned the sonne of Kenwolphus was admitted for king of Mercia, beyng then but a childe of the age of .vij. yeres. The which by treason of his sister Quendreda was slaine in a thicke wood, by a tyraunt called Helbertus.

¶ In the .xxix. yere of the reigne of Egbert, the Danes with a great hoste entered the second tyme into this land, and spoyled the Isle of Sheppey in Kent, or nere to Kent. Whereof, when king Egbert had knowledge, he assembled his people and met with them at a place called Carrum: But he wan in that fight little worship, for the Danes compelled him and his knightes to forsake the fielde. And beyng encouraged by that victory, they drewe westwarde, and made a confederacie with the west Britons, that lined in seruitude: By whose power they assayled Egberts landes, and did much harme in manye places of his dominion and elsewhere, so that after this day they were continually abiding in one place of the Realme or other, vntill the tyme of Herdikenutus or Canutus fortis the last king of the Danes blood, so that many were maryed to Englishe women, and many that nowe are, or in tyme passed were, are discended of them. And albeit they were many and sundrye tymes chased and driuen out of this land, and chased from one country to another, yet that notwithstanding, they euer gathered new strengthes & power, so that they abode still within the land.

The entrāce of the Danes.

¶ Of the king of these Danes, and of what people they be discended, dyuerse opinions of writers there be, which here I passe ouer, because afterward I purpose somewhat at large to say more therein.

¶ Nowe

¶ Nowe it foloweth, in the tyme of the persecution of these Paganes, and Danes, Egbert dyed, when he had well and nobly ruled the west Saxons, and the more part of Englande the terme of .xxxvij. yeres, and was buried at Winchester, and left behinde him a sonne named Ethelwolph, otherwise called Edelphus. 832 / 37

Onwallus, succeded Achaius in the kingdome of Scotland, and reigned fiue yeres. 819 / 25

Ongallus reigned in Scotland sire yeres, as he was going with an armie against the Pictes (in the quarrell of Alpine a Scot, which claymed the crowne of the Pictes) he was drowned in a ryuer. 824 / 30

Alpine the sonne of Achaius was made king of Scottes: He pursued the warre against the Pictes, and slue their king Feredech, but not long after he was vanquished and slaine by Bzudus king of Pictes, when he had reigned foure yeres. 829 / 35

Ethelwolph, or Edelphus the sonne of Egbert reigned ouer the Saxons or Anglis, in ỳ yere of our Lord. 832. This man in his youth was very willing to be a priest, and was entered into the order of Subdeacon. But after he was maried to Osburga his Butlers daughter, a woma of low birth, but in an old writte Chronicle, I find ỳ he was maried to Judith, daughter of ỳ French king, which was Lewes ỳ first, by whom he had foure sonnes, Ethelwald, Ethelbert, Ethelbzead, and Alurede, the which after their father, reigned as kinges of Englande, the one after the other as shall apere. 832 / 1 Ethelwolph

¶ This Ethelwolph after he had bene a while king, went to Rome, and tooke with him his yongest sonne Alurede, or Alfrede, and taryed there the space of a yere. In the which season he repayred the Saron schole, the which before tyme was there founded by Offa king of Mercia (as saith Guydo) but more truely by Iewe king of west Saxons, as sayth Mathew of Westminster. And for that he graunted of euery house in his kingdome a pennie, as in his story before is shewed: But this schoole was sore decayed, and the house thereof lately brent, the which this Ethelwolph newely repayred, and set it in much better order than before it had bene. A Schole at Rome builded by the Saxons. Peter pẽce.

¶ This king also to reforme the grieuous corrections that he sawe there executed to Englishe men for spirituall offences, as in wearing of Irons and Gyues, he graunted of euery house of his lande wherein fyre was brent a pennie, as Iewe before had done, for the mittigating of the sayd corrections. By the which it should seeme, that there was two pence graunted of euerye house throughout the land. For this Rome shot, or Rome shot as it was then called, was of euery house a penny and no more. And therefore it is mistaken of the writers, that alege the dede to the one king for the other: Howbeit, it may stande by reason, that Iewe made the first graunt, and this king confirmed the same. But the Author of Chronica Chronicarum sayth, that Ethelwolph graunted to Saint Peter the Peter pence, and speaketh no worde of Iewe, nor of none other. Euery house that had fire a peny. Rome shot, or Rome shot. Chronica chronicarũ.

¶ It is also shewed by Polichronica, that this king for the acquiting of the Churches of England, of all maner of kinges tribute, payed yerely to Rome three hundreth Markes: that is to saye, to Saint Peters Church, an hundreth Markes, to the light of Saint Paule, an hundreth Markes, and to the Bishop of Romes treaſure, an hundreth Markes. And ouer and beſydes all this, of his deuotion he gaue to the Church of Rome, the tenth part of his moueable goodes.

Deuotion.

¶ When Ethelwolph had thus ſped his buſineſſe at Rome, he retorned by Fraunce, where at that tyme was king of that land Charles the Balde, of whome he was ioyouſly receyued. And after he had diſported him there a ſeaſon, he maried the daughter of the ſayde Charles in the.xx. yere of his awne reigne.

Charles the Balde.

¶ Then Ethelwolph taking leaue of the Frenche king, tooke ſhipping and landed in England with his wife Judith by name. And for that he contrary to the lawe (made in Brithricus time) ſet his wife in the kinges throne, and magnified her like a Queene, the Lordes of his land aroſe againſt him, and tooke from him a great part of his dominion, and made his eldeſt ſonne ruler thereof, the which was done altogether in the reproch of Ethelburga, that ſlue her Lorde Brithricus as before is ſhewed. But in the end, the matter was appeaſed, and he to his kingly honour was reſtored. And in the yere folowing died the ſaid Bertulphus king of Mertia. After whoſe death, Burdredus was made king of Mertia, or middle England, who before had ſpouſed the daughter of this king Ethelwolph.

Judith daughter to Charles the French king.

The name & honour of Queenes reſtored.

¶ In the latter dayes of this Ethelwolph, the Danes did much harme in Lyndſey, and alſo in Kent, and from thence came to London, and robbed and ſpoyled the Citie. Wherefore Ethelwolph gathered his people, and at the laſt met with them in Southrey, vpon a downe called Oclea, and there diſcomfited them, not without ſhedding of great plentie of the Anglis blood, and forced them to take the Sea, ſo that afterward they landed in East Anglia, as ſhall appere. And nowe this good king ended his life when he had reigned.xxij. yeres.

835 / 4 KEnneth reigned in Scotland.xx. yeres, he mainteyned hys warre againſt the Pictes ſo fiercely, that he vanquiſhed them in diuers great battayles and ſlue their king, and laſtly chaſed them vtterly out of the bounds of Scotland. 1151. yeres (as ſayth the Scottiſhe Chronicle) after they began to haue dominion in that Countrie, and from the comming of the Scottes into Albion (after their opinion) a thouſande three hundred.xxj. yeres.

855 / 1 EThelwald the ſonne of Ethelwolph after his father reigned ouer the weſt Sarons or Anglis. This man was very wicked, and maried the woman which his father ſometime kept for his Concubine, or as ſome write his ſtepmother: But to be ſhort, there remayneth in ſtory no worthy thing written of him, but that he reigned not aboue one yere, & then dyed, but howe he came to his death as teſtifieth Reynulph it is vncertaine, except it be as one writer ſayeth that he was ſlaine of the Daniſh princes, Hunger and Hubba.

856 / 1 DOualde the fift of that name (a vicious and wicked Prince) reigned in Scotlande.vj. yeres. In his tyme Osbret or Osbright and Ella which were kings of the Anglis and Britaines made warre vpon the Scottes, tooke their king and ſubdued all the Countrie from Struueling to the Iriſh Seas, and from the water of Fryth and Clyde to Cumber, with all the ſtrengthes thereof. The Engliſhmen had the landes betwene Sterling and Northumber-

Scotland conquered.

Northumberlande. This was Clyde March betweene the Scottes and Britons one the one side, and the water of Frith named the Scottish Sea March betweene them and the Englishmen on the other side: and Sterling common March to three people. Britons, Englishmen, and Scottes. And in the Castle of Sterlyng the sayde king Osbright caused his first money to be coyned, which yet we call Sterling Money. And the Englishmen did there build a bridge of stone for passage ouer the water of Frith, in the midst whereof they made a Crosse, and vnder the same writ these two Uerses. Starling money.

I am free Marche, as passengers may ken
To Scottes, to Britons, and to Englishmen.

¶ Nicholas Bradyngham in his Epitome sayeth, that after Ethelwald their reigned one Osbright king of Britteyn, who conquered Scotland, and at the last an agreement was taken that from thencefoorth the water of Frith should be the March betweene the Scottes & Englishmen in the East parts, and should be named the Scottish Sea. The water of Clyde to Dunbriton, to be Marche in the west part betweene Scottes and Britons. And at Dunbriton was a Castle called Aclude, and now Dunbriton. So that the Britons had all the landes from Sterling to the Irish Seas, and from the water of Frith.

EThelbert the seconde sonne of Ethelwald reigned ouer the greater parte of England. And in his time the Danes with more strength entered the west part of this land, and robbed and spoyled the Countrie before them, vntill they came to Winchester, and tooke the Citie by strength, and did therein what they would: but the king made such prouision, that by him and his Dukes they were forced to forsake the Citie. And as they went toward their Shippes, they were fought withall, and a great parte of them slaine and taken. 856 / 1

¶ Of this king, nothing else is left in memorie, but that he dyed when he had reigned fiue yeres, and was buried at Sherborne, leauing after him none issue.

COnstantine the second, a good and verteous Prince, reigned in Scotlande. xiij. yeres. 860 / 1

ETheldred the thirde sonne of Ethelwald tooke vpon him the gouernment of the west Anglis. And in the beginning of his reigne the Danes landed in East England, called Northfolke and Suffolke: but they were compelled to forsake that Countrie, and so to make againe into their Shippes, in the which retire they were foughten withall and many of them taken and slaine, and then they sayled Northward, and landed in Northumberlande, where the two kinges that reigned there, met with them, and gaue them battaile, their names were Osbright and Ella, and there was a strong fight: But the Danes with the help of such as inhabited in the Countrie, wanne the Citie of Yorke and held it a certaine time. 863 / 1

Danes landed in Northfolke & Suffolke.

¶ Then the people of Northumberlande, varied within themselues, and were more readier to ayde and helpe the Danes, then to lyue vnder the gouernment of the king of west Saxons. For here is to be noted, that all such kings as reigned there after Egbert, were tributaries, and therefore op-preſſed the people that lyued vnder them.

¶ Wherfore Etheldredus hering of the ayde and comfort that the Danes had there, aſſembled his people and ſped him thetherward, and ſent vnto the aforeſayd two kings that had the rule of that Countrie, commaunding them alſo to prepare their people againſt his comming. But howe it was, or the king came with his hoſte, the Danes ſo prouoked the Northumbers to battaile, that they met in playne fielde, and fought a long fight: But in the ende the Danes wanne the price, and ſlue both the aforeſayde kings with a great multitude of their people. After which victorie, they ſubdued much of the ſayde Countrie and deſtroyed the towne of Acliut, the which as ſayth Beda, was one of the ſtrongeſt townes of the North.

Acliud or Ackut, a Towne or City by weſt the arme of the Sea that departeth Englande and Scotlande, and it ſtandeth at the ende of the wall that was made to deuide Englande and Scotlande, and it is thought not to be farre from Carlile.

¶ When Etheldred had prepared all thing for the warre, and was ſet forward towarde the North, worde was brought vnto him of the great diſcomfiture of the Northumbers, and alſo of dyuers of the ſayde Danes, with other that were come to Mertia, and howe that they had wonne the Towne of Notyngham, which tydings letted him of that iourney, and ſo the Danes kept poſſeſſion of that Countrie, in ſuche wiſe that no Angle had rule therof vntill the time of Adelſtone, or as ſome write, vntill the time of Edredus, ſo that they helde it in poſſeſſion the terme of.xl. yeres.

¶ Then the Danes being thus poſſeſſed of the North Countrie, manned the ſame, and fortefied the ſtrong holds thereof. And the other companie of them came downe into Mertia or middle England and wanne a part therof with the aforeſayde Towne of Notyngham, and dwelled there the more part of the yere following.

¶ Wherefore king Etheldred with the ayde of Burdredus, then king of Mertia, layde ſiege vnto the Towne: the which when the Danes perceyued ſhould be wonne, they refuſed the towne & tooke the Tower or Caſtell, and defended it in ſtrong maner, in ſo much that they helde it vntill a peace or appointment was concluded betweene the two kings and them: which was, that they ſhould go free where they woulde, and carie with them their horſe & harneys without any pillage. And when this peace was thus made, eyther of the kings departed to their awne, and the Danes returned into Yorke and dwelled there the yere following.

¶ And in the yere following, a certaine number of the ſayde Danes, taking ſhipping in the North, purpoſed to ſayle into Eaſt Englande, and vpon the Sea, they chaunced to meete with a great Flote of Danes, whereof the Capitaines or chiefe leaders, were named Hungar and Hubba: The which by erhortation of the other comming out of the North, made all one courſe, and laſtly landed in Eaſt England or Norffolke, and in proceſſe of time came vnto Thetfoord.

Hungar Hubba.

¶ When Edmond king of the Prouynce heard hereof, he aſſembled an hoſte, and gaue vnto them battaile. But Edmond and his hoſte was forced to forſake the fielde, and Edmond with a fewe perſons fled into the Caſtle of Fremingham, whome the Danes purſued: But he in ſhort tyme after yelded himſelfe vnto the perſecution of the Danes. And for that this vertuous Man Edmond woulde not denie, or renie Chriſt, and his lawes, they therefore moſt cruellye bound him vnto a Tree, and cauſed him to be ſhot to death, and in the ende cauſed his head to be ſmitten from his bodye, and caſt

¶ Then his friendes with great solemnitie taried the body vnto the Abbey, then called Eglidon, or Eglysdon, and nowe called Saint Edmondes bury, and there buried him in the yere of our Lord. viij.C. lxir. Saint Edmods bury.

¶ But now to returne againe to the Danes. When they had as before is sayd martired this godly Man Edmond, and robbed and spoyled that Countrye, they tooke againe their Shippes, and landed in Southerey, and continued their iourney vntill they came to the towne of Reding, and wanne the Towne and Castle. Reding.

¶ And as Polichronicon sayth, the thirde day after they came thither, Hungar and Hubba, as they went in purchasing of prayes, were slaine at a place called Englefield, which Captaines of the Danes beyng thus slain the rest of them kept close together, in such wise that ỳ west Saxons could take of them none aduauntage. But within fewe dayes after, the Danes were holden so short, that they were forced to issue out of the Castle, and to defende themselues in plaine fielde. In the which by the comfort of king Etheldred, and of Alured his brother, the Danes were discomfited, and many of them slaine; whereof the other beyng ware, fled againe to the Castle, and kept them within the same a certeyne tyme. Hungar Hubba. Englefield. Danes discomfited.

¶ Then the king commaunded Ethelwold who at that tyme was Duke of Bareoke, or Barkshire, to attend with his people vpon that Castle, and to see that the Danes brake not out at large, while he went into other partes of that Countrie to subdue other of the sayde Danes. But when the Danes knewe of the kinges departure, they brake out, and tooke the Duke vnprouided, and slue hym and most of his people, and caused the rest to withdrawe themselues from that towne and Castle. Barkshire or Bareokshire.

¶ It was not long after, but that the king was certified of the death of Ethelwolde Duke of Barkeshire, and of the discomfiture of his people, and of the great victorie of the Danes: which vnto him were heauie newes. And foorthwith also, he heard that a Dane was landed named Ostricke, whome Polichronicon nameth to be the king of Denmarke, the which Ostricke in a short tyme had gathered together by the helpe and assistance of the other Danes a great hoste, and were embattayled vpon Ashedowne. Ostrike. Ashedowne ¶ Unto this battayle Alured was sent for, to his brother the king with great spede, that he should set forward vpon the Danes. But before he could be ready, the hostes of the Anglis, and the Danes were ioyned together with great violence. And although the Danes had wonne the hill, and the christian men were left in the valley: yet by the grace of God, and manhood of themselues, the christian men recouered the hil of the Danes, and slue their Duke or king called Ostricke, and fiue of their Dukes, with many of their people, and chased the rest vnto the towne of Redyng. Ostrike slaine.

¶ Wherefore the Danes reassembled theyr people, and gathered a newe hoste, so that within. xv. dayes, they met at a towne called Basingstoke, and there gaue battaile vnto king Etheldred, and had the better. Then the king gathered his people, the which at that fielde were sore scattered, and seperated, and with fresh Souldiours to them accompanied, met the Danes within two Monethes after, at a Towne called Merton, and gaue vnto them a sharpe battayle, so that many people were slaine on both parties, that is to Basing Stoke. Merton.

say, aswell of the Christians, as of the Danes. But in conclusion, the Danes had the honour of the fielde, and the king of Anglis was wounded and faine to sauegarde himselfe by pollecy, because might and strength fayled him.

¶ After these two fieldes thus worne by the Danes, they obteyned and enioyed a great circuite of grounde, and destroyed man, woman, and childe, that to them were disobedient. And Churches and Temples they turned to the vse of Stables and other vile occupations. And to this great sorowe was yet added another.

¶ For where the king hoped well to haue recouered his losses by the ayde and helpe of his subiectes, aswell of other partes of the lande, as of hys owne which was the west Saxons, he sent his commissions into Northumberland, into Mercia, and East Anglia: But he had of them small or little comfort, & in effect it was no comfort at all, so that the Countrie of west Saxons was brought into great desolation. For the king was beset with enemies on euery syde, and besydes that, his knightes and Souldiours were tyred, and wearied with ouer watching and labour. The number of which aduersities and troubles entring, and deepelye sinking into the kinges minde, with his sore broose and hurt ensuyng of the wound taken at the battaile beside Merton, shortened his dayes, so that he dyed when he had reigned in great veration and trouble of the Danes. viij. yeres, without issue of his bodie, and was buryed at Winbourne: By reason whereof, the rule of the lande fell vnto his brother Alurede. Some write that he first founded the Cathedrall Churche at Exceter.

ALurede the fourth sonne of Ethelwolphe, and brother to Ethelbred reigned ouer the west Saxons. This Alured was borne at wantage, v. Miles from Orforde then a Towne of the king of the west Saxons, who as some write was. vij. yeres of age before he was set to schole: but for all that, he spent so well his tyme, that he exceeded all his brethren that were long set foorth to schole before him. And by the counsayle of a verteous and well learned Monke named Neotus, and other learned men of that tyme, he founded the Vniuersitte of Orford, and fraunchised the same with many great liberties and priuileges. But the historie of that Vniuersitie of Orforde seemeth to make it to be of a much greater antiquity, and to referre the beginning thereof vnto certaine Greeke Philosophers that came into this Iland with Brute and the Troyans, and afterwards placed themselues in a place not farre distaunt from Orforde, called corruptly Crekelad for Grekelade. The which Philosophers being afterwarde allured with the pleasaunt situation of the place, remoued from thence to the soyle where Orforde nowe standeth, and there taught the liberall Sciences. And the same schole being at the length decayed, and brought to extreme ruyne by ciuill warre and alteration of time: Alfred (say some) otherwise called Alurede as a seconde founder restored againe vnto the auncient state, who besides many other godly actes done for the encrease and maintenance of good learning, founded there a College, named the Myckle Vniuersitie Hall, nowe called the Vniuersitie Colledge: and in the same ordeyned a Gouernour by the name of a Master and a societie of. lxxbiij. felowes, whereof there were. xxbj. sustenance of the which number, he appointed a competent yerely reuenew to be payde out of the Kings Cofers, by his heires and successours for euer, the which payment did still continue, as the monuments and auncient wrytings of the sayde College doe testifie, vntill the comming of William the Conquerour, who was the first that vpon displeasure conceyued against the students and scholers there, withdrewe the sayde payment.

¶Also he translated manye lawes, and namely the lawe of Mertia, and other out of the Britishe speeche into the Saxon tongue. He was also verye cunning and skilfull in building and making of Plottes, and excellent in hunting. He was of goodly stature and the best beloued of his father of all his other children. In his youth he was somewhat giuen to the pleasure of the flesh, which hindered him from many a verteous purpose, for the repressing whereof, he euening and morning and oftentimes in the night season woulde resort vnto Churches and there deuoutly praye a long season, and at the last he fell into an extreme sickneſse called Ficus. For it is sayde that he desired of God that his flesh might be chastised with suche a sickneſse, whereby he might serue God the better, and yet not to be vnapt to worldly busineſse. And when he was cured of the aforesayde sickneſse, then he fell into another more grieuous than that, the which continued with him from the .xx. yere of his age, till he was .xlv. But yet notwithstanding he wedded a noble woman named Ethelwyd, aby whome he had two sonnes, Edward surnamed the Elder, and Egelward, and three daughters: Elfleda that after was Lady of Mertia, Ethelgotha which was made a Nonne, and the third was called Elfrida. And he caused all his children as well daughters as other to be brought vp in science and learning, and for that purpose reteyned the learned man Asserius and Meneuia and other. Ficus.

¶Nowe after this Alured was admitted king, he considering the great daunger that his lande was in, gathered vnto hym his Lordes, and those whom he coulde not winne without strife, he wanne by strength and power: So that shortly, he assembled a great hoste, and in the seconde Moneth that he was made king, he met with the Danes on Wylton hil on the South part of Wilye Bourne, and there gaue vnto them a great battaile, but not without great daunger and losse of men on both partyes. Fabian.

¶Mathew of Westmynster, Author of the flowres of stories, sayth that the victory fell vnto the Danes, because Alureds army was much fewer in number than the other were: For the force of the nobles and people of the west Sarons was then sore minished and abated, by reason of .ix. battailes that had bene foughten against the sayde Danes the yere past on the Southside of Thames, beside diuers roades and skirmishes made by their horsemen. After the which victorie, the Danes returned to London and wintered there, and thether came also vnto them, Buthredus king of Middle England, and friendly compounded with them for mony and tooke a truce.

¶Then he renued his people, and in sundrie places fought with the Danes in the first yere fiue tymes: By meane whereof his people were so sore minished and weakened, that he was forced to take peace with his enimies, vpon condicion that they should auoyde the Countries and Prouinces that he had dominion of.

¶Upon which agreement firmelye concluded, the Danes for a tyme

voyded theſe Countries, and drewe towards London, and reſted them about that coaſt the greateſt parte of the yere folowing: and from thence to Lyndſey in robbing and ſpoyling the Townes and Villages as they went, and holding the common people in ſeruitude and bondage, and ſo continued the ſpace of two yeres and more. But before the thirde yere was ended, they went vnto Repindon, and there put downe or ſlue Burdredus then king of Mertia, and they delyuered the kingdome vnto a ſeruant of his named Colwolphus, vpon condition that he ſhould kepe it to their vſe. And then they beſieged a towne thereby called Hambourgh, and aſſaulted it right ſharply. After the which aſſault the inhabitaunts of that Towne of Hambourgh fled vnto Wincheſter. Fabian. But this ſtorie in all pointes agreeth neyther with Huntyngdon, nor the Aucthour of the Flowres of ſtoriesand other auncient Wryters.

Colwolph⁹

¶ Then the king made againe peace with the Danes, as he had done oftentymes before, and in truſt thereof he roade with the fewer people, whereof the Danes hauing knowledge, layde buſhementes for him, and ſet ſo nere him, that they ſlue a great part of his companie, in an euening as he rode towarde Wincheſter. But Polidore wryteth, that this was done in a Manour of the kinges not farre from London, whether the kinge came at that tyme to recreate himſelfe with hunting.

¶ And for this treaſon, Alured was ſore amoued againſt them, and in as ſecrete maner as he might, he aſſembled a choſen companie of knightes, and Souldiours, and as Guydo ſayth, fell vpon them ſodeynlye and diſtreſſed a great number of them, and left them not til he had chaſed them vnto Cheſter, or as ſome ſay to Exceter, and there kept the Danes ſo ſhort, that he conſtreyned them to geue to him pledges to kepe the peace, and to dwell no lenger there then they could prouide ſhipping to ſayle into Denmarke.

The Danes diſtreſſed.

¶ After the which agreement, the king returned to Mertia, or middle England. And for that he heard that Colwolphus was dead, to whome the Danes had taken that Lordſhip to keepe, he therefore ſeaſed that kingdome and ioyned it to his awne. By reaſon whereof the kingdome of Mertia surceaſed, which had continued from their firſt king named Penda vntill ꝑ time.

Penda.

¶ And in the fift yere of the reigne of Alured, the Danes (as affirmeth Polichronicon) ſayled from Werham toward Exceter, in the which iourney they loſt. C. x. of theyr ſmall ſhippes by a tempeſt on the Sea: But ſome of them remayned and occupyed the kinges towne of Chipnam, and the Countrey thereabout, and chaſed the Anglis and put them to flight, or made them as ſubiectes vnto them. And ſo ſore their power encreaſed, that the Anglis loſt and decayed dayly, and they preuayled the more a great deale, by reaſon of the landing of a Prince of the Danes, called Gytrus, which was named king of Denmarke.

Gytrus.

¶ King Alured beyng thus ouercome with a multitude of enemies, did lead an vncerteyne, troubleſome and vnquiet lyfe, and hauing very fewe folkes about him would walke about in the Wood Countrye of Sommerſetſhire, and had ſkant to liue withall, but lyued of ſuche as he and his people could get by hunting and fiſhing.

A poore lyfe of a king.

¶ How be it, at the length he was well comforted, and ſhewed him ſelfe more at large, ſo that dayly reſorted to him men of Wiltſhire, Somerſetſhire, and and Hampshire, vntill that he was well and strongly furnished. Then as sayth a wryter called William of Malmesbury de Regibus, the king put himselfe in a great ieoperdie: for he put on him the garment of a Minstrell, and with his Instrument of Musicke he entered the tentes and Pauilions of the Danes, and in shewing to them his pastime, with ieastes and songes, he espied all their slouth and idlenesse, and also heard much of their counsayle, and after returned againe vnto his company, and tolde to them all the maner of the Danes. A straunge enterprice of a king.

¶ Then the king with a chosen companie fell vpon them by night, and distressed, and slue of them a great multitude, & chased them from that coast. And when he had thus chased the Danes, by counsayle of his knightes, he buylded there a Tower, and named it Edeling, that is to say, a Tower of noble men: Out of the which Tower he and his souldiours made many assaultes vpon their enemies and did to them much griefe and domage, and at the last clerely auoyded the Countrie of them betweene that and Selwoodes. Edelyng.

¶ This Edeling standeth in a greene Waresse or Mooze, so that men can not come at it without Ship, or Boate, and it conteyneth no great ground, but yet therin is Uenison & other wilde beastes, and foule, & fish great plenty.

¶ Thus king Alured dayly pursued his enemies, by the helpe of God and his Subiectes, who heering of his victories and manfull deedes, drewe to him continually out of all Coastes: By whose power & strength he helde the Danes so short, that he wanne from them Winchester, and many other good Townes, and compelled them at the last to sue for peace, the which was concluded vpon certeyne conditions, whereof one and the Principall was, that theyr king named as before is sayde, Gytrus, shoulde be Christened, and a certeyne of his Dukes with him. And for that the king would haue the Danes banished out of the West partes of Englande, he graunted to him East Anglia, to abide and dwell in. Peace taken with the Danes.

¶ Then this Prince of Danes, according to the couenauntes, was christened at Winchester, (or as Mathew of Westminster sayth, at a place called Alre, not farre from Edeling aforesayde) and. xxx. of the greatest of his Dukes with him. And to the Danish Prince, king Alurede was Godfather at the Font stone, & named him Athelstane. And after he had a season feasted the sayd Danes, he according to his promes gaue vnto their king the Countrie of East Anglia, which then conteyned, Norffolke, and Suffolke, and a part of Cambridgeshire. And also, as sayth Polichronicon, he graunted to the Danes that were christened, the Countrey of Northumberlande. And the other that would not be christened departed the land, and sayled into France, where they rested them with their cosyns and kinsmen, and at those dayes they wasted and spoyled the Country of Fraunce in most despitefull maner. The Danes christened. Athelstane.

¶ When this Danishe king Athelstane, had the possession of the Countries aboue mencioned, then were all such Anglis, as inhabited there vnder his obedience. And albeit that he helde the sayde Prouynce as in fee of the king, and promised to dwell there as his liege man, yet that promise notwithstanding, he continued lyke a Tyraunt, by the terme of. xi. yeres full, and in the. xij. yere he dyed.

¶ About the. xv. yere of the reigne of Alured, the Danes which before as ye haue heard, sayled into Fraunce, returned nowe againe into England, and landed landed in Kent, and at the last came to Rochester, and besieged that Citie, and lay there so long, that they builded a Tower of Tymber, and not of Stone, against the gates of the Citie. But by the strength of the Citezens that tower was destroyed, and the Citie defended vntill king Alured reskewed them. The which had made such purueyaunce for the distressing of them by water, and land, that they were so nere trapped, that for feare they left their Horses behinde them, and fled to their Shippes by night. But when the king was thereof ware, he sent after them, and tooke. xvj. of their Shippes, and slue many of the sayde Danes. After this iourney the king returned to London and repayred certeyn places of the same, which the Danes had hurt & febled.

¶ And in the. xxj. yere of the reigne of this king, the Danes landed in foure places of this Realme, that is to say, in the East England, & the North, and in the West in two places. But by reason the king before their landing had warning of the death of Athelstone the Danishe king of East England, and of other complaintes of the Danes, he therefore went thether himselfe, and in the tyme of his there beyng, the aforesayd newes came to him.

Athelstane dead.

¶ And so soone as he heard thereof, and that some of the Danes were landed in that coast, and knewe well that the further that they drewe into those partes, the more they shoulde be ayded and strengthened: he therfore sent messengers in all hast vnto Etheldred Erle or Duke of Mertia and the borderers thereabout, to make resistaunce against the Danes which landed in the west. And that done, the king sped him towarde his enemies and set on them so egerly and sharpely, that in the ende he droue them out of East Anglia. And then they landed in Kent, whether also the king and his people folowed, and likewise draue them from thence. Howbeit, of anye speciall fight or battaile, authours make no mention. After this againe the Danes tooke shipping and sayled into Northwales, and there robbed and spoyled the Britons, and from thence returned by Sea into Est England, and there rested them, for so much as the king was then gone westwarde.

Etheldred.

¶ In this meane tyme, the aforesayd Danes had wonne the Towne of Chester, but the Countries adioinyng therevnto, came so sore and so thicke vpon them, that the Danes were compelled to keepe them within the sayde Towne or Citie, and to defende themselues therein as well as they coulde. But their holding and keeping of that Towne continued so long, that they were compelled to eate their Horsses for hunger. And at the last by apointment they gaue ouer the Towne, and went thence to Northumberland.

¶ And in the while that the king with his hoste sped him thetherward, they leauing their strong holdes & Castels garnished with men and victuall, tooke againe shipping, and set their course in such wise that they landed in Sussex, and so came to the Towne of Lewes, and from thence toward London and they builded a Tower or Castell nere vnto the Ryuer of Lewes. But the Londoners hearing of their doings, made out a certaine number of men of armes, who hauing the ayde of the Countrie, put the Danes from that Tower, and afterward did beate it downe to the grounde.

Londiners.

¶ And shortly after, the king came downe thether, and for that he thought that the sayde Ryuer would be a meane to bring enemies eftsones into that Countrie, therefore he commaunded the streame to be deuyded into dyuers streames, so that by reason thereof, where a Ship might haue sayled in tyme passed, then a little Boate might scantly rowe. And now by reason of the presence of the king, the Danes were enforced to flie and to auoyde that Countrie, and from thence tooke againe their way toward Wales, and kept along the Ryuer of Seuerne, and vpon the border thereof they builded them a Castell nere vnto Wales, and so rested them there for a time. And three yeres after this land was vexed with three maner of plagues, the one was warre with the Danes, the other was death and pestilence of men, and the thirde Mozeyn of Cattell. The which troubles & aduersities notwithstanding, the king honourably and valiauntly resisted his enimies, and gaue God hartye thankes whatsoeuer came, and sustayned it with great humilitie & patience.

Three great plagues, warre, pestilence mozeyn of Cattell.

¶ And finally, this martiall Prince continuing in all prowes and vertue, at the last dyed, when he had ruled this lande. xxviij. yeres, and first was buried at Wilton, and after certaine yeres remoued and caryed vnto Winchester, leauing after him a sonne named Edward the Elder, for the other brother called Egelward dyed before his father.

EDward surnamed the Elder, the sonne of Alured began after his father to gouerne the Realme of England. This man was not so well learned as was his father, but in honour, fame, and martiall prowes, he was nothing inferiour. Howbeit, Wyllian of Malmesbury in the. xiij. Chapter and second booke of the story of kinges, affirmeth that he was excelently learned, and folowing the diligence of his father king Alphrede, caused his base sonne called Ethelstane, who afterwards succeded him, to be well instructed in the Latyn tongue. He was also very profitable to the common weale in building and repayring many Castels, Townes, and Cities, which were rased and broken by the Danes, he adioyned to his Lordship all this lande, sauing only Northumberland, which was possessed of the Danes. By his first wyfe he had a sonne named Ethelstane the which was king after him. But the Authour of the flowers of Histories sayth, that he begat Ethelstane of a Concubine named Egwine. By his second wyfe he had two sonnes, Edredus, and Edwynus, and. vij. daughters. And of the thirde wife, he receyued two sonnes, Edmond, and Edred, and two daughters, Edburga, and Edgina.

¶ But because there is diuersitie among writers touching the names of his wiues and children, and also of the number of them, he that findeth fault with the Author whom I follow, may read Mathew of Westminster in the lyfe of Edward the sonne of Alphred, and Reynulph in his first booke, and fourth Chapter, and there he shall see howe, and wherein they disagree, and so try out what is most probable and lykely to be true: But yet that the reader may haue some present tryall hereof, I will shewe what the Aucthour called Mathew of Westminster, which compiled his story at the commaundement of Richard the seconde, writeth hereof, whose wordes are these.

Clito Ethelwoldus. ¶ In the fift yere of his reigne, Clito Ethelwoldus a neere kinsman of his (for he was Cosyn germaine vnto him on the fathers syde, but as Polidore sayth his brother) rebelled against him, and occupied the towne of Winborne besydes Bathe, and tooke thence by force a Nonne thinking to marry her, and went thence vnto the Danes dwelling in Northumberland, and procured them to ryse against king Edwarde. But the king pursued him so sharpely, that he constrayned him to leaue that Countrie, and so he sayled into Fraunce, and left the Nonne behynde him, the which the king caused to be restored againe to the house that she was taken from.

Clito with his company landed in England. The next yere folowing, the sayd Clito with his companie landed in East England, and gathered to him the Danes of that Countrye, and with their ayd destroyed and pilled the Countrie about Crekinford, and Crickland. And then he passed the ryuer of Thames, and spoyled the land vnto Bradenestoke or rather Basingstoke, and so from thence returned againe into East Anglia afore sayde. But where mine Authour hath here Crekynford, and Cricklande, Reynulph hath Crecanefordе otherwise called Kreklade, whome I do rather alowe.

¶ Now the king folowed still his enemies, and spoyled their landes which they helde by composition of him from the Ryuer of Owse, to the border of Saint Edmondes lande, commaunding the knightes of his hoste, that none should drag or tary after his armye, for feare least the enemies should snatch them vp. But the Kentish men trusting to much in their owne strength, came not away as the king commaunded: Wherefore the Danes wayting their praye, fell vpon them by bushments, and slue a great number of them, wherewith wherewith the king was sore discontented.

¶ Sone after, both the Armies met, where after long and cruell fight, Clyto with a great number of the Danes were slaine, and the residue constreyned to flie, and to crie and seeke for peace, the which was graunted vnto them vpon certeyne condicions, namely, that they shoulde keepe them within the boundes to them limitted, & besydes that to pay yerely a certeine summe of money in way of Tribute. After which peace so stablished with them, the king repayred Cities, Townes, and Castels, that by the sayde Danes were battered and broken.

¶ And in the. viij. yere of his reigne, king Edward repayred the walles and also the Citie of Chester. To the which were great helpers, Etheldredus Duke of Mertia, and Elfleda his wife, daughter of Alured, as before is shewed, and sister of this king Edwarde. And after the king builded a strong Castle at Hereforde in the edge of Wales. And he enlarged so greatly the walles of Chester, that the Castell which before time was without the wall, is now within, and the sayde Citie of Chester is at thys day much more bewtified and enlarged.

¶ In the. xij. yere of his reigne the Danes repentyng them of theyr couenantes before made, and mynding the breach of the same, assembled an hoste and met with the king in Staffordshire at a place called Toten hall, and soone after at Wodnes field: At which two places the king slue two kinges, two Earles, and many thousandes of the Danes that then occupyed the coūtrye of Northumberland. And soone after, dyed the noble man Etheldredus, Duke or Earle of Martia or middle England, after whose death, the king forsomuch as he had often proued her wisedome, tooke the rule of that countrie to his wife Elfleda (London onely excepted) the which he tooke vnder his awne rule.

¶ In the. xiij. yere of this king, a great naue of Danes which in the time of Alured were driuen into fraunce nowe returned againe, and sayled about the west countrye, and landed in dyuerse places, and tooke prayes, and went to their Shippes againe. And at one tyme among other, they robbed and spoyled at a place called Irchinfielde, and tooke a Britishe Bishop, and caryed him to their shippes, and finally raunsomed him at. xl. pound. But assoone as king Edward had knowledge of their beyng in that place, he assembled his people and made towardes them by lande, and sent another armie by water to encounter with the Danes Shippes vpon the Sea: whereof the sayd Danes hauing knowledge, fled to Irelande, and by that meanes both escaped the king by land, and his naue by Sea.

¶ Then the king for the strengthening of that country made a Castell at the mouth of the water of Auene, and another Castle at Bokingham, and the thirde nere therevnto, that is to say, on eyther side of the Ryuer of Owse one. And after this he returned into Northamton shire, and Bedfordshire, and fought there with the Danes of those Countries, and at the length subdued them and their leader or Duke called Turketillus.

¶ In the. xvij. yere of this king, Elfleda Lady of Mertia, gathered together her knightes: And where the Britons or Welshmen brake into the land about Brekenocke, she with her people withstoode them, and among other prisoners and prayes, tooke there the Queene of Welshmen.

Cocester, Wigmore, Temesford

¶ And the yere folowing, king Edward builded or newely reedefyed the Townes of Tocester, and Wigmore, and destroyed the Castell that the Danes had made at Temes foord. And the sayde yere the noble Ladye Elfleda wanne the Towne of Darby from the Danes, where they put her in suche aduenture, that foure knightes which were called the Gardians of her body were slaine fast by her.

¶ And in the. xviij. yere of his reigne dyed that noble Princes Elfleda, in the Moneth of June, and was buryed in the Monasterye of Saint Peter, which her Lorde and shee before tyme had buylded within the Towne of Gloucester, which Monasterie was after throwne downe by the Danes.

¶ When Elfleda was dead, her daughter named Elfwyna helde the Lordship of Mertia for a season: But for that the king considered it to be a thing ouer chargeable for her gouernement, he therefore discharged her thereof, and ioyned it to his kingdome, but not all without some strife. For dyuerse Townes she kept of the king for a tyme, as Notyngham, Tomworth, Derby, and other, he supposing that the daughter would haue defended them, as the mother by her lyfe had done, but at the last they came all to the kinges subiection.

¶ When king Edward had reconciled the aforesayde Townes, he then builded a new Towne, right against the olde Towne of Nottingham, on the South syde of the Ryuer of Trent, and made a Bridge ouer the sayd Riuer betweue the sayde Townes. And as sayth Reynulph, the yere folowing in the sayd Citie or Towne of Nottingham, there were two kinges, that is to say of Scotland and Wales, that yelded themselues vnto king Edward. And sundry Auethours, as Marian the Scot, William of Malmesbury, Henry of Huntington, and other, doth shew that this king Edward subdued the kings of Scotland, and of Combrys, about the. ix. yere of his reigne. And of the sayde Authours it is also witnessed, that about the. xx. yere of the sayde Edwardes reigne, the sayd kinges of Scotlande and Combrys, chose king Edward for their chiefe Lorde and Patrone, which should be aboute the season before erpressed.

King Edward possessed all Scotland.

¶ Then this noble Prince, after all thinges were set in order as aforesayde, he builded on the North parte and in the ende of Mertia, a Citie or Towne, and named it Thilwall, and strengthened it with knightes. And after he repayred the Citie of Manchester, which was sore defaced with the warres of the Danes. After which notable deedes by this puyssant prince finished, with the mariage of his children, and many other thinges which I passe ouer for length, this noble Prince sickened, and dyed when he had victoriously reigned ouer the greatest part of this lande. xxiij. yeres, and was buried at Faringdon, leauyng after him dyuers sonnes, as is before rehersed, of the which Ethelstane was the eldest.

¶ Marion the Scot in hys Chronicle doth wryte that thys Edwarde subdued Constantine king of Scottes, which reigned in his tyme, and that he helde the Realme of Scotland vnder the obedience of the aforesayde king Edward, the space of. xxiij. yeres.

ATheſtane, or Adelſtane, the ſonne of Edward the elder, after the death of his father tooke vpon him the gouernement of this Realme. He was a worthy Prince, valiant, and politique in all his actes and doinges.

¶ And after this conqueſt, the ſayde Conſtantine ſo humbled himſelfe vnto the king, that he reſtored him to his former dignitie. Wherefore, the ſayde Conſtantine ſayde in the prayſe of a king, that it vvas more honour to make a king than to be a king.

The right honour of a King.

¶ It is alſo witneſſed by Reynulph, and other, that this Athelſtane, or Adelſtane, ſhould marry one of his ſiſters named Edith vnto Otho the firſt of that name Emperour of Almaine, and (as ſome wryte) receyued from him many precious Jewelles: But of this ſpeaketh nothing the Chronicles of the Romaynes. Howbeit, it is ſhewed there, that the aforeſayde Otho had a wyfe named Alunda, which as before is ſayde in the ſtory of king Edward the elder, might be the daughter of the ſayd Edward, & of Edgina his ſecond wife, and ſiſter vnto this king Athelſtane. But Vincencius ſayth, that Henry Duke of Saxony, which was father vnto the firſt Otho, ſent vnto Athelſtane, requiring of him his ſiſter to marry vnto his ſonne Otto: By which reaſon it maye be truely ſayde that Otho or Otto maryed the eldeſt ſiſter of Athelſtane, but not Edith.

Otho Emperour of Almaine.

Of the aforeſayd Jewels ſent by Otto, one was a precious veſſell of ſtone called Onychites, which was of ſuch cleerenesſe and alſo ſo finely and artificially wrought, that it appered to mans ſight that grene corne had growne within it, and moued and waued as corne doth ſtanding in the field: Moreouer in it appered Vynes burging and bearing of fruite, and men alſo to fight, mouing and ſtirring. He alſo receiued the great Conſtantines ſwoord, wherein was grauen in great letters of Golde the name of the owner: and the hiltes thereof were couered with great plates of Golde, and one of the Nayles was faſtened to the Croſſe of the ſayde ſword, that crucified and nayled Chriſt to the Croſſe. Fabian. But Reynulph ſayth otherwiſe. He alſo receyued the Speare of Charles the great, which after the opinion of ſome

Writers, was the Speare wherewith Longeus opened Chriſtes ſide. And the Baner of Saint Mozice, with a part of the holye Crolle, and a parte of the Crowne of Thozne that our Sauiour Chriſt was crowned with. Of the which Jewels, king Ethelſtane gaue part vnto S. Swithines of Wincheſter, and ſome he gaue vnto the Abbey of Malmeſbury. And ſome wryte that this Athelſtane was the firſt annointed king at his coronation. Fabian.

Athelſtane ꝓ firſt annoynted king of Bꝛiteyn.

¶ Now it followeth in the Hiſtozie, how Conſtantyne king of Scottes, foꝛ all his humilitie, and foꝛ all the pꝛincely fauour that he had ſhewed vnto him by king Athelſtane, foꝛgetting altogither both fayth and loyaltie, as the maner and cuſtome of the Scottes is, reuolted and bꝛake couenaunt wyth the king. Wherefoꝛe king Athelſtane aſſembled his knights and power, and made towarde Scotlande, and in his waye he turned to the Towne named Saint Johns of Beuerley and offered there his knyfe vpon the Altare ſaiyng, that if he returned with victozie, he woulde redeeme his knyfe with a noble pꝛice, and that being done, he marched foꝛward on his iourney, and in concluſion, diſcomfited the Scottes, and bꝛought them againe into due ſubiectiõ. And after accoꝛding to the pꝛomiſe befoꝛe made, he returned to Yoꝛke, and ſo to Beuerley, where he redeemed his knife woꝛthily as befoꝛe he had pꝛomiſed by endowment and great pꝛiuileges graunted vnto that towne.

¶ And Reynulph in the vj. Booke, and vj. Chapter, ſayeth that king Athelſtane after he had ſubdued the Scottes being then with his Lozdes and familiers, neere vnto the Caſtle of Dunbarre, pꝛayed to God that in that Countrie he might leaue ſome remembꝛance oꝛ token, that thoſe that were then liuyng, and alſo ſuch as ſhould come after, might know that the Scots by right ſhould be ſubiects to Engliſhmen. And foꝛthwith he toke his ſwoꝛd in hande and ſmote vpon a great ſtone ſtanding neere vnto the ſayde Caſtel, with which ſtroke the ſtone did cleaue an Elle in length, which in the tyme of Edward the third was there to be ſeene, as Fabian ſayeth.

ye may beleue this if ye will.

¶ Ye haue heard befoꝛe, that king Athelſtane, after the death of Sithericus king of Noꝛthumberland, ſeaſed that lande oꝛ Pꝛouynce into his owne hande, and put out his ſonne: which after allyed himſelfe with Conſtantine king of the Scottes and maryed his daughter. By whoſe pꝛouocation and ſtirring, he gathered a company of Danes, Scottes, and other, and entered the mouth of Humber with a ſtrong Nauye. Whereof king Athelſtane when he had knowledge, did in all goodly haſte pꝛepare his armie, and at length met with him and his people, at a place called Bꝛimfoꝛd, where Athelſtane obteyned a great and notable victozie. Foꝛ after the king by the helpe of God had defended the ſubtile aſſault made vpon him by night by his enemies, he in the moꝛning by the helpe of his bꝛother Edmond, and Oddo the Archbiſhop chaſed his ſayd enemies, and ſlue there Conſtantine king of Scottes, and fiue petye, oꝛ vnder kinges, and. xij. Dukes, with the greateſt part of all the ſtraungers that were there gathered at that time: The which battaile ſhould be done by the meaning of the ſayd Reynulph, about ꝓ laſt yere of his reigne.

Conſtantine kinge of Scottes ſlain

¶ It is alſo wꝛitten of dyuerſe Auctheurs, that the king after this victoꝛye, ſubdued alſo the Noꝛth Bꝛiteynes that dwelled at Hereford, and there about, and compelled them to pay him yerely thꝛee hundꝛed pound of Siluer rrb. C. head of Neate, and. rr. pound in Golde. But Guido ſayth, that the king cauſed at Hereford Citie, to come befoꝛe him all the rulers of the Noꝛth

Bꝛiteyn,

Britayn, and there had with them ſuch communication, that he forced them to graunt vnto him as a yerely tribute. xx. pound of Golde, three hundred pound of Siluer, and. xxv. C. heade of Neate, with Dogges, and Hawkes to a certeyne number. After which victories, he went vnto Exeter, and repayred it and the walles thereof ſufficiently. Tribute.

¶ John Lidgate a Monke ſometyme of Saint Edmondes bury, made a goodly treatiſe of this king Athelſtane, ſhewing that he was in ſo great perſecution of the Danes, that he was conſtrayned to call at Wincheſter a great counſayle of his Lordes. Where, after long debating of the matter, and dyuerſe Imbaſſades and meſſages ſent about by the king, and the Danes: It was firmely concluded, that the king ſhould prouide him a Champion to fight with Colybrond or Colbrond, a Gyaunt and Dane, which the Danes had appoynted for theyr Chiefteyne. Wherefore the king in ſearching through his landes for ſuch a knight, and none could finde, was in great daunger and diſtreſſe of heauineſſe. And forſomuch as he well perceyued, that mannes power fayled, he by the aduice of his Lordes Spirituall, and Temporall, fell to faſting and prayer, and continued therein by a certeyne of tyme wyth perfect and charitable deuotion. John Lydgate. Colbrond a Giant which was a Dane.

¶ In the tyme of which fayd abſtinence, a viſion was ſhewed vnto Athelſtane, comforting him, and alſo commaunding him, that earely vpon the nert morning, he ſhould ſtande at the North gate of the Citie of Wincheſter, and there he ſhould finde amongeſt the number of the poore people, a man clothed in Palmers wede whome he ſhould chooſe for his Champion. This man was Guy of Warwike.

¶ After which viſion thus to him ſhewed, he did accordyng, and founde a man of goodly ſtature, & ſomedeale ſtriken in age, and apparelled as he was tolde in the viſion. Wherof the king firſt gaue vnto God his heartie thankes, and after made requeſt to this man, that he would take vpon him this Combate for the defence of the lande: And the man layd for himſelfe many cauſes and conſiderations, as well for his age as otherwiſe, that he ought to be hold excuſed to take vpon him ſuch an enterprice. Howbeit, after much diſcourſing at the laſt he graunted the king to fulfill his requeſt and commaundement.

¶ And at the day aſſigned and appoynted, he met in the fielde with the aforenamed Gyant, called Colbrond without the Gate of the Citie in a Medowe, called Hide Mede, where betweene them two was foughten a long and cruell fight, ſo that the king was in great feare of his Champion. But finally by the helpe of God, the man wonne the honour of that fight, and ſlue that Gyant that was of exceding ſtature, & alſo of great and paſſing ſtrength. Hyde Mede beſide Wincheſter. Colbrand the Giaunt ſlain by Guy of Warwike.

¶ Which victorie by the man thus obteyned, with the helpe and fauour of God: the king then with his Baronny fet the Man into the Citie of Wincheſter with ſolempne Proceſſion, & conueyed him vnto the Cathedrall Church of the ſame, where he thanked God with great deuotion, and offered there the Ire with the which he had ſlaine the Danes Champion. After which oblation with due reuerence, and other obſeruaunces by him and other finiſhed: The king cauſed him to be conueyed vnto his Court, where he tarryed that night with much entreatye. And in the morning earely he made ſuch meanes that he would needes depart, and that in the ſame apparell that he came thether. When the king was aduertiſed that this man would ſo haſtely depart, whome he entended to haue holden with him in his Court, and to haue en- Guy of warwicks Ire.

dowed him with riche poſſeſſions: He commaunded him to be brought vnto his preſence.

¶ And when he ſawe that he could not cauſe him to tary, he requyred him to ſhew vnto him his name: wherof alſo he beſought the king to pardon him. Wherfore the king conſidering his haſty departing, with many other thinges in him to be conſidered, was then the more deſyrous to haue of him ſome knowledge. And therfore the king was earneſt in his deſyre and requeſt, and would haue no nay, but that he ſhould declare his name: Then the man perceiuyng that without the kinges diſpleaſure he could not depart without diſcloſing of his name, ſayde, he might not diſcouer his name within the walles of the Citie, without the offence of his conſcience.

¶ Wherfore, the king graunted to go with him vntill he were in the brode fieldes: Upon which graunt thus made, the king commaunded dyuerſe great giftes to be to him preſented, which all he vtterly refuſed. Shortly to conclude, the king with a certeyne of his Lordes conueyed this ſayde man vnto the Townes ende: And when he was thether come, he there requyred him of the performance of his promes. And then the man kneling on his knee, beſought the king of his eſpeciall grace, that he woulde put apart his Lordes and other, ſo that he might ſhewe his name vnto him onely.

¶ Which beyng done, he beſought him that he would kepe his name ſecret for the ſpace of. xxiij. houres: the which the king graunted vnto him, and then he ſayd, that he was his naturall liege man, and ſubiect, and that his name was Guy of Warwike. Of which tidynges the king was very ioyous, and offered him then of newe, many riche rewardes and giftes: But all was in vaine, for he would receyue nothing, ſo that the king and he laſtly departed with weping eyen. And after the ſayd Guy of Warwicke purchaſed in a Wilderneſſe a lodging in an Hermitage, where, by the terme of two yeres and more, he dwelled and kept an hard life. And he heering that Dame Felice his awne wife fed dayly. xiij. poore men for Chriſtes ſake, he went thether ſondry tymes, and fet there his Almoſe, his ſayde wife then liyng at the Caſtell of Warwike, not knowyng of any man what he was, vntill at the laſt, he was viſited with ſore ſickneſſe, and that he knewe well he ſhould dye: Wherefore he ſent his wedding ring vnto his wife, requyring her in all the haſte to come and ſpeake with him, which ſhee obeyed in humble wiſe, and ſped her vnto the ſayde Hermitage with all womanly diligence, and founde him dead at her comming, whome ſhee beſprent with many a ſalt teare. And as ſhee was enformed of the Meſſenger, at the tyme when he dyed, he determined to be buryed in the ſame place, and euen there ſhe did bury him. And moreouer, as ſayth the aforeſayde Aucthour, he admoniſhed his ſayd wyfe, by the ſayd meſſenger, that ſhe ſhould prouide, for ſhe ſhould die within. xv. dayes next after: which ſhee alſo obeyed, and made ſuch prouiſion that ſhee was buried in the ſame place. All which matter the ſayd John Lydgate affirmeth, that he tooke out of a certeine booke of Giraldus Cambrenſis, otherwiſe called Silueſter Giraldus, which wrote many thinges of the Princes of Englande, as Reynulph alſo and others doe witneſſe.

Guy of Warwick.

Guy of warwike dead.

¶ All which ſayd treatiſe is ſhewed at length in meter of. viij. ſtaues, by the diligent labour of the ſayde John Lidgate, the which I haue here omitted for breuitie ſake. This Athelſtane by the recorde of ſundrie writers, brought brought againe this land into one Monarchy, and reigned as king thereof xvj. yeres, and was buried at the Monastery of Malmesbury, leauyng after him no childe, & therefore the rule of this land fell vnto Edmond his brother.

EDmond the brother of Athelstane and sonne of Edwarde the Elder, reigned next after his brother.

¶ In the first yere of his reigne, the Danes of Northumberlande rebelled against him: And for to make their partie the stronger, they sent for a Prince of the Danes named Aulaffe, then being in Irelande, the which brought with him another prince or ruler of ỹ Danes named Reignald, with a great hoste of Danes and other straung Nations, and entered the foresayd Countrie, and warred vpon the next borders, in wasting and spoilyng the inhabitaunts of the same.

Danes rebelled.

Reignald a Captaine of the Danes.

¶ When king Edmond had knowledge hereof, anone he assembled hys people, and sped him towarde the Countrie, and at the last fought with the sayde two Princes of the Danes, and chased them from Towne to Towne, vntill he forced them with all their company of straunge Nations to forsake vtterly that Prouince, and further he did beate downe the Countrie of Comberlande, that had much fauoured and ayded the sayde enimies against him, and tooke therein great prayes, and deuyded the spoyle amongst his knights. And that done, eyther for the good seruice that Malcolyne king of Scotlande had in his voyage done vnto the king, or for the truth & allegeance that he in tyme following should beare vnto him, or for both, the king gaue there to the sayde Malcolyn the Countrie of Comberland, and sealed the residue of the Lordship of Northumberlande, and ioyned it vnto his awne kingdome. But yet the Danes returned againe in the time of Edred the next king, as after shall be shewed, so that as yet the ende of his kingdome, is not to be accompted. But Polidore alloweth not them that ascribe the vanquishing of the Northumbers vnto this Edmond, affirming that to haue beene Athelstanes deede, who also subdued the Scottes: and so as it seemeth is of opinion that the kingdome of the Northumbers, ended in the sayde Athelstanes tyme.

Malcolyne king of the Scottes had for his seruice done to king Edmond, geuen vnto him the Countrie of Comberland

¶ This king Edmond had a noble woman to his wyfe named Elgina, of whome he receyued two sonnes, named Edwyn and Edgar.

Elgina the wife of king Edmond.

¶ This king Edmond, as sayeth Henry Archdeacon of Huntingdon, had warre oftentymes with the Danes, who held many good Townes in middle England, as Lyncoln, Nottyngham, Darby, Stafford, and Leyceter, the which by his knightly manhood, he wanne from them, and he also amended many things within the Realme that had beene long time out of frame, by meane of the Danes: and as Polydore sayth, established many good lawes very profitable for the common wealth. Of the ende and death of this Edmond, there are diuers opinions, for Marianus the Scot sayeth, that while this king Edmond endeuoured himselfe to saue his Sewer from his enemy, that would haue slain him in a towne or place called Pulkre Church, the king in parting of the fray, was wounded to death, and dyed shortly after.

King Edmond slain.

¶ But Wylliam of Malmesbury de Regibus sayth, that the king being at a Feast at the foresayde Towne or place, vpon the day of Saint Augustine, espyed a Felon, sitting in the Hall named Leof, which he before tyme for his Felony had exiled, and therfore he lept ouer the table and plucked that theefe by the heare of the head to the ground. In which doing the sayde Felon, with a knife wounded the king to death, and also with the same knife wounded many other of the kings seruaunts, and at length was himselfe all to hewen in peeces. Eabian. If this be true, it should seeme that kings at those dayes were neyther so honorably garded nor accompanyed, nor yet kept so princely estate, as they now vse.

Felony

A straunge tale of the death of a king.

¶ But which of these two meanes was vsed in the kings death, it appereth not certainely, but all writers agree that he dyed when he had reigned. vj. yeres and more, and was buried at Glascenbury, the which before he had sumptuously repayred, and left after him two yong sonnes, as before is remembred Edwyn, and Edgar, but for that they were to yong to rule the land, therefore the rule there of was committed to Edredus their Uncle, and brother to their father.

Edwyn, Edgar.

944 / 5 Malcolme the first and the sonne of Constantine reigned king of Scottes xv. yeres, and at the last was slaine by conspiracy of certaine Traytors.

946 / 1 Eldred or Edred the brother of Edmond and sonne of Edward the elder, was made king, for ꝑ the children of king Edmond were thought to yong to gouerne.

This Eldred was annointed king of Oddo or Otho Archbishop of Cauterburie, in the Towne of kingstone vpon Tamys, and soone after, he warred vpon the Danes that then were entered into Northumberland (or after some writers, that then were there dwelling vnder tribute of the king) subdued before of Edmond his brother, and bet them downe, and caused them to holde and obey vnto their former couenaunts. And the Scottes then also began to varie, but he brought them vnto due obedience.

Rebellio of the Danes.

¶ After a certaine terme, the Danes of Northumberlande, which euer continued full of guyle and doublenesse, not being content to holde and keepe the couenaunts before made and promised vnto Edred the king, called vnto them their olde accessaryes and helpers, and bereued from the kings subiects the Citie of Yorke and other strong Townes and Castels, to the great hurte and anoyance of the Countrie, and vtter displeasure of the king.

Yorke taken by ꝑ Danes.

¶ Wherefore, he being therof aduertised, in goodly and conuenient haste, assembled his people, and sped him thether, and destroyed much of the land. And in that furie brent the Abbay of Rypon, which the Danes kept for a Fortresse and strength, and wanne from them muche of their strengthes which they before had wonne, and brought them again vnder his subiection.

Rypon Abbey brent.

¶ When this king Edred had thus sped his iourney and was returning into England, nothing suspecting the sayde Danes, a company of them by the exciting of Hircus a king or prince of the Danes, then folowed the kings hoste, and before he came at Yorke set vpon the kings rereward, and destroyed and slue many a man. For the which doing the king was sore amoued, and turned his people againe, entending to haue destroyed the Countrie vtterly.

Danes hasting to their Capitaine one named Hircus did again rebell.

¶ Whereof the Danes beyng ware, so lowly meked themselues vnto him, and presented vnto him such giftes, that the king refrayned of that great yre that he purposed to them. But amongest other Articles that he bound them vnto, vnto, one was, that they ſhould baniſh and vtterly refuſe their foreſaid Duke or king called Hercus: which thing with dyuers and many other they graunted and firmely bound themſelues to keepe, as well by hoſtages taken, as by other ſurety, and the king returned into England, and ioyned this kingdome to his other. So that here is reconed the ende of this kingdome, which endured iiij. C. ix. yeres.

Danes that inhabited Northumberland were againe ouercome and put from gouernment for euer

¶ In the ſame yere that the king had thus ſubdued the Danes, a ſtrong ſickneſſe tooke him, ſo that he dyed, and was buried in the Cathedral Church of Wincheſter, in the .xxviij. yere of his age, & when he had reigned .x. yeres.

¶ Polidore ſayth, that when he had quieted the Realme, and vanquiſhed his enemies, he became a great benefactor vnto religious houſes, but ſpecially vnto the Abbey of Abindon, who thinking to pleaſe God therby, & to gratefy Ethelnoldus then Abbot there accompted for a very holy man, and at the requeſt of his mother Edgina, repayred the ſame Abbey, firſt founded by king Iua, as before is ſaid, and at that ſeaſon ſore decaied, and in maner deſtroyed.

EDwyn the eldeſt ſonne of Edmond, brother of Athelſtane, tooke on him the gouernement of this Realme. 955

¶ This Edwyn was crowned at Kingſtone beſide London of the Archebiſhop of Cantorbury: The which ſelfe daye of his Coronacion, brake ſodeynly from his Lordes, and entered into a ſecrete Chamber, and there occupyed himſelfe ſinfully, and raviſhed another mannes wife, beyng his nere kinſwoman, whoſe huſband as one Auctour doth teſtifie, the king had cauſed to be ſlaine before, for that he would haue the vnlawfull vſe of her bewtie, and not conſidering the allyaunce of affinite & kyndred betwene them. Some write that he committed the ſayd Act in maner openly lyke a brute Beaſt, and Guydo ſayth that Edwyn contrary to the lawes of the Churche, helde a woman as his Concubine. Wherefore Dunſtone who a little before was made Abbot of Claſtonbury, firſt moniſhed him of his fault, and afterwardes accuſed him vnto Odo Archebiſhop of Cantorbury, by whoſe power the kinge was cauſed to refuſe and forſake the company of the woman. For the which Edwyn bare great malice vnto Dunſtone, and at length by his extort power, he banyſhed him the lande, and forced him for a ſeaſon to kepe himſelfe in Flaunders. And for the malice that he bare towarde him, he did much diſpleaſure to all the Monkes of England, by baniſhment, and otherwiſe. Inſomuch, that at Malmeſbury he put out the Monkes, and ſet in ſecular prieſtes in their ſteede. Fabian.

Kingſtone or kings toune.

Dunſtone baniſhed.

¶ But Mathew of Weſtminſter wryteth, that Edwyn had to his Paramoure, the daughter of a noble woman of the Realme, and the mother alſo at his commaundement. And that on the day of his Coronation, he aroſe ſodeynly from the Table, as he was feaſting with his Lordes and Nobles, and departed vnto his preuy Chamber, where thoſe two gentlewomen were, to the entent he might dally with them, and ſatiſfie the ſenſuall appetite and beaſtlye pleaſure of the body. The which fact of his, ſore diſpleaſed all his ſayde Nobles: and therefore they ſent incontinent Dunſtone vnto him, to perſwade with him to returne againe, and to be mery with them at the table, who as he was by them commaunded, taking his kynſman Biſhop Cyneſius with him, entered into the kings Chamber, where they found the Crowne of

of the Realme, all of glystering Golde very riche and bewtifull, plucked off his head and hurled after a retcheleſſe ſorte on the ground a prety way from him: And the king himſelfe tumbling in the duſt betwixt the mother and the daughter, vnto whom the ſayd Dunſtone ſayd on this wyſe. My liege Lord, your Princes and Nobles haue ſent vs vnto you, to beſeech you to returne againe vnto your Hall, where is a meete ſeate for your Royall perſon and eſtate, and there to ſolace your ſelfe, and to make mery with them, and then blamed the lewdeneſſe and folly of the Women: and perceyuing the king ſo vnwilling to aryſe, he caught him by the hande, and ſo brought him backe againe with him vnto the feaſt Royall, ſtorming and chafing like a mad man. After this one of the Harlotets called Algina roſe vp in a great chafe and fume ſaiyng, how he was a raſhe and a ſawcie Meſſenger, that thus would preſume to enter into the kinges preuie Chamber, not beyng called. And ſo from thence forth, the ſame woman neuer ceaſſed to perſecute Dunſtone, till ſhe had brought him into the kinges deadly hatered, and highe diſpleaſure: And it foloweth in the ſame Writer, howe by the conſent of King Edwyn after ſhe had ſpoyled his Abbey of all his mouables, ſhee cauſed him at length to be baniſhed out of the Realme by the kinges commaundement. After the which baniſhment, he was faine to flie into Fraunce for his ſauſegard, during the tyme of his ſayde exile. And howe there were certeyn tormentors ſent beyond the Seas to haue put out his eyes, if they could haue met with hym.

¶ It is read of him, that he tooke ſuch precious Jewels as Athelſtane had receyued before from Otho the Emperour, geuen vnto Wincheſter and Malmeſbury, and gaue them vnto alyauntes and ſtraungers. And thus was he not onely vnkinde to Monkes, but alſo vſed ſuch tyrannie, and other vnlawfull meanes to his ſubiectes, that laſtly they abhorring his wicked lyfe, and deteſtable maners, rebelled againſt him, and ſpecially the inhabitantes of the Countrye of Mertia, or middle Englande, and alſo the Northumbers and put him clerely from all kingly honour and dignitie, the which depoſition greued him ſo much that he died for ſorow, when he had reigned foure yeres, and was buried at wincheſter, leauing none heyre of his body, and therefore the rule of the land fell vnto Edgar his yonger brother.

EDgar, the ſeconde ſonne of Edmond, and brother of Edwyn the laſt king, beyng of the Age of. xv. yeres, tooke vpon him the rule of this Realme. In the beginning of his reigne, he called home Dunſtone that before was exiled of king Edwyn. Then he made Dunſtone that was Abbot of Glaſcenbury, Biſhop of Worceter, and he ioyned and vnited together all the Prouinces and Lordſhips of England, and made them one Monarchie, and one Kingdome.

King Edgar vnited all the prouinces of this realme into one kingdome, where before they were deuided into ſeuen kingdomes.

¶ In many places he put away Clerkes and Prieſtes that liued viciouſly, or as ſome wryte that had wyues, and ſet there for them Monkes. And as ſayth Guydo, Reynulph, and other, he buylded and repayred to the number of. xl. houſes of Religion, whereof Abyndon, Peterborough, Thorney, Ramſey, & Milton were percell of them. And at Wincheſter, he put in Monkes, where before were maryed Prieſtes.

¶ The cauſe wherfore (as ſayth Fabian) was, for ſo much as the Prieſtes were were negligent in the deuyne seruice, and set Vicars in their places, while they liued at theyr pleasure in other places, and spent the Patrimonie of the Church after their sensuall will.

¶ Then king Edgar gaue to the Vicars the lande that before longed to the Prebendaryes, trusting thereby that they would do their dueryes: But it was not long after, but that the sayd Vicars were as negligent as the other, wherfore the king aduoyded the Priestes and placed there Monkes, though some of his Prelates were not contented therewith.

¶ This Edgar kept such iustice and did so sharpe execution vpon Malefactors, that neuer before his dayes were vsed lesse felonyes or robberyes then was in his tyme. And to the entent that he would haue the rauenous beastes destroyed throughout his lande, he caused Ludallus Prince of Wales, to yelde to him yerely by way of Tribute three hundred Wolues. By meane whereof, within foure yeres after, in Englande and Wales myght skantly be found one Wolfe alyue.

Execution of iustice hath worthy commendation.

The destruction of wolues.

¶ Polidore here noteth that the Welshmen, which could neuer willingly abyde to be gouerned of the Englishe Nation, founde the meanes at the length to make themselues a Prince of their awne Nation, as in this kinges tyme they had to theyr Prince and gouernour Ludallus, and long tyme after dyuerse other in dyuerse kinges dayes, which were tributaries vnto the kinges of England: But when they first obteyned this benefite of the sayde kinges, the sayde Polidore confesseth that he hath not found in any auncient Chronicle or autentike Wryter.

¶ It is written of sundrie Authours, that Kynadus king of Scottes despised Edgar, for that he was little of stature, whereof king Edgar beyng warned desyred the sayde Kynadus to dynner, and made to hun good countenance. After which dyner ended, he tooke the sayde Kynadus by the arme, and so with him helde company vntill they came to the Fields: where being dissieuered from their seruauntes: Edgar drewe from vnder his garment two swordes, and desyred Kynadus to take the choyce of them, and sayde vnto him, nowe thou hast good leasure to saye thy strength with mine, which before tyme thou hast so much despised: Nowe let vs proue which is more worthy to be subiect to other: It is not sitting for a Knight to make great boast at the boorde, and to doe little in the field.

Kynadus king of Scottes.

A chalenge made by Edgar vnto Kynadus the Scottishe King.

¶ When the Scottish king heard the king thus chalenge him, he remembred well his wordes before spoken, and perceyued that they were disclosed vnto Edgar, whereof being somewhat abashed, he answered so humbly and behaued him selfe so lowly and gently, and gaue vnto the king such pleasaunt wordes, that he forgaue the trespasse.

¶ This Edgar among other of his Politique deedes, vsed in the Somer tyme, to scoure the Sea with certaine Shippes of warre, and had a great number alwayes in a readynesse. And against the Winter, he prouided to lay vp the sayde Shippes in sure Hauens, and had readie in his awne seruice and in his Lordes, a certaine number of Souldiours that were alway ready to man the same, when the king had neede of them. And his Shipmasters were in wages with him throughout the yere, who euer attended vppon the Shippes, to see that nothing lacked that was necessarie. By meane wherof he kept his lande in great quiet from outward enimies. And in the Wynter

he vsed to ryde ouer the lande, and to vnderstande how his officers intreated the people. And if any were accused of extorcion or other crymes, and that duely proued against them, he did vpon all such, sharpe correction.

¶ And for so much as in his dayes, great multitude of Danes dwelled in dyuers places of England, which vsed many vices, and specially great drinking, whereof ensued dronkennesse and many other vices, to the euill examples and hurtes of his commons and subiects: He therefore ordeyned certaine Cuppes with pinnes or nayles set in them, and ordeyned and made a law, that whatsoeuer person dranke past the marke at one draught, shoulde forfeyt a certaine payne: whereof the one halfe should fall to the accuser, and that other halfe to the ruler of the Borough or Towne that the offence was done in, where the same should be examyned and tryed.

A pollecie for the shape of Dronkards.

A good president for the making of penall lawes, and bestowing of the forfeytures.

¶ It is tolde of this Edgar by dyuers Authours, that he vpon a season being at Chester, entred the ryuer of Dee, and there sitting in a Boate, tooke the rule of the sterne, and caused. viij. Kinges, which Guydo calleth Reguli, that is small or vnder kings, and commaunded them to rowe him vp and downe the Ryuer, vnto Saint Johns Church, which lately was an Abbey of black Monkes, and from thence to his owne Palace, in token, that he was Lorde and king of so many Prouynces.

King Edgar had vnder him seuen kings within this Realme.

¶ This Noble Edgar had two Wyues: By the first that was called Egelfleda the whyte, he had a sonne that was named Edward, who was after king, and slaine by treason as afterwards shall be shewed. And vpon his second Wyfe Elfrida or as the English Chronicle calleth her Estrild, he begat a sonne named Egelredus or Ethelredus, and after the Englishe Chronicle Eldred, which was king next after Edward the Martir, and of Wilfride, which of some is called a Nonne, he had a daughter named Edith, but shee was base and not in Wedlock. For as Guydo sayeth, this Wilfride, knowing that the king cast to her vnlawfull loue, put vpon her the habite of a Nonne, thinking thereby to withdrawe the kinges loue: But that notwithstanding, she was brought to the kings bed. For which deede he was greatly blamed of the Bishop Dunstane, and by him enioyned to doe therefore seuen yeres penance. And the aforenamed Wilfride, after the childe borne, lyued vertuously, as sayeth Fabian. Of her daughter Edith, it is read that at lawfull age she was at Wilton shorne a Nonne.

Ethelfleda the mother of Edward, and wyfe of Edgar.

Edith the daughter of Wilfride. which Wilfride was a Nounc and Concubyne to king Edgar.

¶ Edgar, thus ruling the lande after the death of his first wyfe Egelfleda, worde was brought to him of the bewtie of a yong Damsell named Elfrida, or Estrild, daughter of Ogarus Erle of Deuonshire: wherefore he sent a knight of his Courte named Ethelwold, to espie whether the Mayde were of such bewtie, as shee was reported of, or not, charging him, if shee were so bewtifull, that then he should aske her to wyfe for him.

¶ But this knight hauing sight of this Mayden, was so wounded with the darte of blinde Cupide, that he forgate his truth and allegeance, which he did owe to his Master and souereigne, and returned, shewing to the king, that shee was nothing of the bewtie as she was reported to be, but of meane fayreneſſe as other women are. Wherfore he besought the king, considering she was her fathers Heyre and a good mariage, that he woulde be so good Lorde vnto him, as to write vnto her father, that he might haue her vnto Wyfe. The which the king graunted, and at the last he obteyned her and

¶ In processe of tyme the fame of this woman sprang so wyde, that at the last it came to the vnderstanding of king Edgar: wherewith the king notwithstanding, he were in his minde discontented with Ethelwold, which had so decepued him, yet kept he good countenance and made semblance as though he had nothing forced of that matter at all. Deepe dissimulation.

¶ And vpon a tyme, as it were in game, warned this Ethelwold that then was an Erle by reason of his wyfe, or otherwise, that he woulde one night come and lodge in his house, and appointed the tyme when it should be. The Erle being nothing contented with this monition, ranne home almost dead for feare, and prayed his wyfe of helpe in that tyme of neede, and that shee would in all that she might make her selfe as foule and as vnseemely as shee could, and shewed to her all the residue of the matter. Then the woman cast in her minde, the great displeasure that might ensue towardes her against God, to make that foule, which he had made goodly and fayre, and also to her Lorde and husbande against the king, thinking that he should cause her thus to do, to the entent to mocke and decepue him. Wherefore, in consideration of the premisses, shee trimmed and decked her selfe in most costly and shewing apparell. And ouer that, if Dame Nature had any thing forgotten or misprinted in her, she left not what might be done by womans help to haue it amended and reformed, and at the kings comming receyued him with all ioye and gladnesse. By which meanes, this yong amorous king was soone caught in the Deuils snare, so that he set reason aparte and folowed his awne sensualitie. And for to bring his purpose the better about, he kept forth a countenaunce as he had bene well contented with all thing, and desyred the Erle, that he would ryde with him on hunting, into the wood of Welwerley, that now is called Horsewood, where he awayting his tyme, strake the Erle thorow the body with his shaft, so that he dyed soone after. And then he maried this Elfrida or Estrild shortly, and had by her Egelredus. For the which deede sayth Reynulph, this Elfrida buylded a house of Nonnes at Warwell. But some write that it was for the slaying of her stepsonne Edward. Ethelwold was fowly decepued, for women are not trusty. Ethelwold slaine and murdered.

¶ Then Edgar, was crowned king at the Citie of Bathe, or as some write at Kingstone of Dunstone Archebishop of Cantorbury, and Oswolde Archebishop of Yorke, when he had ruled this land. vij. yeres, but Polidore sayth, that Dunstone was not at his sayde Coronation, but remayned yet a banished man. The cause why it was so long or this Edgar was crowned, was sayth Guydo, for his vnlawfull lechery, and specially for the offence done with Wilfride. For the which deede he was enioyned. vij. yeres penaunce, during the which tyme of penance, he was kept from the sayd annoyntment. Coronation. The simplicitie of kings in those dayes.

¶ It is also reported of this king Edgar, that he beyng vpon a season at the Towne of Andouer beside Sarisbury, and was enamoured of a Noble mannes daughter, which was of passing bewtye, made such meanes by force or otherwise, that the parentes were agreed that the king should haue his pleasure. But the mother beyng subtyll of wyt, bethought her of a wyle, and when night came, sent a seruaunt of hers, which was both comely and fayre, vnto the kinges bed. In the Morning, when the day began to ware cleere, the woman began to stirre, and would haue departed from the king: But the king stayed her, and asked the cause of her so hastie departing: The Women are wily.

woman aunswered, I must be at my worke with my felowes at mine houre, to kepe my talke. And when the king had questioned with her further, he learned that she was a bond woman, and she asked of the king freedome for that nightes seruice. The king at this had good game, and cherished that Damosell so after, that he made her Lady of Ladies. For these insolent and wanton deedes, it is sayd, that by the counsayle of Dunstone, he buylded and repayred so many Abbeyes and houses of religion as is before named. Fabian.

¶ Thus this noble Edgar, passing his tyme in vertue, and sometymes medled with vice, at the last had knowledge of the rebellion of the Britaynes or Welshe men: wherefore he assembled his knightes, and entered the land, and did them great harme and waste. And among other prayes, he spoyled the Countrey of Glamorgan and the Countrey of Ono: But the king dyed within ten dayes after, when he had reigned the full terme of.xvj.yeres, and was buryed at Glastenbury, leauing after him two sonnes, Edward the Martyr, and Egelredus by two sundry wyues. And here Fabian setteth foorth a story of a lewde and false Judge, the which the Reader may there finde set out at large.

Edward the sonne of Edgar, reigned after his father: And here ye shal vnderstand, that after the death of Edgar, great strife arose among the Lordes, for the admission of their king. For Elfrida or Estreld, with Alphride Duke of Mertia, made diuerse friendes to haue her sonne Egelredus promoted vnto that dignitie, a childe of seuen yeres of age, that she and he might rule the land together. But Dunstone with the ayde of other Bishoppes, and of the Erle of East England, or Esser, so withstood that doyng, that he crowned this Edward king at the Towne of kingstone, to the greeuous displeasure of the sayd mother Elfrida, and other of her affinitie.

Sickneſſe, hunger, moreyn and many other plagues.

¶ In the tyme of this Edward apered a blasing starre, after the which ensued many inconueniences, aswell to men as to beastes, as sickneſſe, hunger, moreyne, and other lyke calamities: But none of these thinges fell in the dayes of this Edward, but after his death. The aforenamed Alphride, Duke of Mertia, which in all thinges fauoured much the dedes of the Queene, put out the Monkes at Winchester, that king Edgar had ther set in, and brought in for them wanton Clearkes, or as Reynulph sayth, Clerkes with Concubines (or rather that had lawfull wyues.) But Dunstone, and the Erle of Esser withstood that doyng, and helde against the Duke and such as fauoured his partie: For the which arose great strife betwene the Prieſtes, and the Monkes of England. For the Clerkes that were before tyme put out by Edgar, sayd that it were a wretched and cursſed deede, that a newe common company vnknowen, shoulde put out olde landishe men from their places:

These I thinke were prieſtes with their wyues.

and it shoulde not be pleasing to God that had graunted the place to the olde dwellers, neyther ought any good man to alowe such doyng, for the yll ensample that thereof might ensue. The Monkes sayde, that Christ allowed neyther the olde dweller, nor yet the person: But who so woulde take the crosse of penaunce vpon him, and folowe Christ in verteous liuyng he should be his disciple.

¶ For this matter was there holden a generall counsayle of Bishoppes, and all the Clergie of England, at winchester, but for all this the strife ceased not. In so much that a newe assembly of the Clergie and other was apoynted after at a place called the strete of Calue, where the counsayle was kept in an vpper loft. In thys counsayle Dunstone was grieuously despised and rebuked of some vnskilfull men (as sayth Fabian.) And while they were there in this great deuision and argument, which way should be admitted and alowed, sodeynly the Joystes of the loft sayled, and the people fell downe, so that many were slaine, and the people greatly hurt: But Dunstone with few other that tooke his part escaped vnhurt. This wonder and other caused silence among them that entended to mainteyne the aforesayd quarell, so that Dunstone had all his will.

Dunstone was sore against priests wyues.

Some write that this was done by a deceytfull practise, and after was taken for a miracle.

¶ But to returne to the tyme of the reigne of king Edward, he came vpon a tyme from hunting in the Forest, nere vnto the Castell of Corfe, in the West Countrie: where he losyng his companie and seruauntes, resorted vnto the Castle aforesayde, where at that tyme his Stepmother with her sonne Egelredus kept her houshold.

Corfe castel

¶ When the Queene was warned of his comming, anone she called vnto a seruaunt of hers, whome she much trusted, and tolde to him all her counsayle, shewing to him further, how he should behaue himselfe in the accomplishing of her will and minde. And that done, she went towarde the king, and receyued him with all gladnesse, and desyred him to tarie with her that night: But he in curteous maner excused himselfe, and for speede, desyred to drinke vpon his horse sytting, the which was shortly brought.

A traiterous deuice of a mother in law

¶ And while the Cup was at his mouth, the seruaunt strake him to the heart with a sword, or long dagger sharpe on both sydes. After which stroke by the king receyued, he set spurres to the horse, and thought to ryde to the place from whence he came, or else such a way as he thought to mete with his companie. But he bled so sore, that for faintnesse he fell from his horse, lyng one foote beyng fast in the Stirrop: By reason wherof, he was drawen of the horse ouer wayes and fieldes, vntill he came vnto a place then named Corfigate, where he was found dead. And for that the maner of his death was vnknowne, and also he for king not knowen, he was buryed vnworthely at the Towne of Warram, and there rested by the space of three yeres after. In which tyme and season, God shewed for him dyuerse myracles, as sight to the blinde, health to the sicke, and heering to the deafe, with diuerse other, as sayth Fabian. But Polydore writeth, that his Stepmother Elfrida caused the dead corps to be caryed in, and buryed in a secret place, where it was after found by miracle.

A vile murther.

Kinge Edward murthered.

¶ At the last the same Elfrida sore repenting her fact, entended to visite him by way of pilgrimage. But how or for what cause she entended inwardly I can not say, but the horse or beast that she rode vpõ, might not come nigh the place by a certeyne space, for beating, nor for any other thing that might be done for him by man.

Sepron now called Shaftesbury.

¶ But after this, by her meanes, or as Mathew of Westminster sayth, by Elfrius Duke of Mertia, or middle Englande, he was translated from thence to Sepron, that now is called Shaftesbury, and there buryed with great honour.

Ambrisbury Warwell.

¶ And as it is sayd for a testimony of her great repentance, she founded two Monasteries of women, the one at Ambrisbury, and the other at Warwell. In the which place of Warwell in her latter dayes, she refusing the pompe of the worlde, helde there a solitary and streyt life, and ended her life with great penance and repentance, and was there buryed when she was dead.

¶ Thus as ye haue heard, was this yong king Edward murdered, when he had reigned foure, or as some wryte three yeres, leauing behind him none issue, wherefore the rule of the lande fell to Egelredus his brother.

This Kenneth was slaine by meane of a Lady called Fenella, because he had poysoned Malcolme Prince of Comber.

Dunstones prophecies.

EGeldred or Etheldred the sonne of Edgar, and Elfride his last wyfe, after the death of Edward his brother reigned ouer this Realme. And in the beginning of this mans tyme, the grounde wared barrein and all the miseries before signified by the appering of the blasing starre in the dayes of Edwarde, now began to take place and encrease vpon the earth. This king as his other progenitors before him were, was crowned at Kingstone, of Dunstane, and Oswald, Archebishops. To whome as it is written in the lyfe of Dunstane among his propheries, Dunstane shoulde saye at the day of his coronation. Thou commest to this kingdom by the death of thy brother, in whose death Englishmen conspired with thy wicked mother, they shall not be without bloudshedding and swoorde, vntill there come people of an vnknowne tongue, and bring them into thraldome. And this trespasse shal not be clensed without long vengeance.

¶ This Egeldred was a man of goodly visage and tall of personage, but his nature was mixed with Lechery, crueltie, and dyuers other vices. It is also read that when Dunstane should christen him, as he helde him ouer the Fonte, he fyled the same with his ordure, and that then Dunstane sware by God and by his mother, this childe shall be vnkinde both to God and hys Churche. Fabian. Although myne Auctour wrote this as matter in that tyme whiche he thought to bee true, yet iudge you nowe thereof as you thinke best.

An angrie Bishop.

¶ In the second yere of his reigne, a cloude was seene in England in the morning tyme the which appered halfe lyke blood, and the other halfe lyke fyre, and chaunged after into sundrie colours, and at the last vanished away.

The Danes arriued in Kent, Cornewall, Sussex, and diuerse other places of this realme

¶ In the thirde yere of his reigne, the Danes allured by his cowardise, and chiefly for that he was vnskilfull of armes, arriued in sundrie places of his lande, as in the Isle of Thanet beside Kent, also in Southhampton, Cornewall, Cornewall and Sussex, and in those coastes much harme: and afterwards, some of them came to London, but there they were put of: howbeit, they destroyed a great parte of Chester and Chestershire.

¶And in the ende of the same yere, a great parte of the Citie of London was consumed with fyre, but how it began is not expressed. But ye shall understande, that at this daye the Citie of London, had most housing and buylding from Ludgate toward Westmynster, and little or none where the chiefe or hart of the Citie is, at this day, except in dyuers places were housing, but they stood without order. So that many Townes and Cities, as Cauntorbury, Yorke, and other, diuers in England passed London in building at those dayes, as I haue sene and knowen by an olde booke in the Guildhall in London named Domes day. But after the conquest it increased, and shortly after it passed and excelled all the other. Fabian.

London, a great parte thereof consumed by fire.

From the little Conduit in Chepe vnto Fleete bridge and Holborne bridge was the first and chiefest parte of the Citie of London.

¶About the.viij. yere of his reigne, the king maried Erle Egbertus daughter, named Ethelgina or Elgina. Of the which he begat a sonne, and named him Edmond, which after was surnamed Ironside, and two other sonnes named Edwyn and Ethelstane, and a daughter named Edgina.

¶In the.ix. yere of this king, for strife and displeasure that was betwene the Bishop of Rochester and him, he with his knightes besieged the sayde Citie: whereof Dunstane sent to the king, admonishing him, that he should refraine from that crueltie, and to suffer the Bishop and his Citie to be in peace. But this message abated nothing at all the kings courage. Then the sayde Dunstane sent vnto him an hundreth pounde in Golde, wylling him to refrayne of that enterprise, the which he receyued and brake vp his siege.

Golde was of more force then Dunstane.

¶About the.xj. yere of his reigne, Dunstane died, but it was not long after his death, before the Danes entred into many and sundrie places of the land, in such wise as the king was to seke to which coast he should go first to withstande his enimies. And in conclusion; for the auoyding of more harme, he was compelled to quiet them with great summes of money: But when that money was spent, they fell to new robbing of the people. Then the king graunted more money: But for all that the Danes robbed and spoyled the Countrie of Northumberland and at the last besieged London. The which their outrage troubled the king very sore because he thought they would now haue beene quiet.

Dunstane dead.

The Danes sore spoyled this realme.

¶And for the encrease of the kinges sorrow, Elfricus that then was maister or admirall of the kings Nauie, fled as a false traytour vnto the Danes. And after that was reconciled: and fled yet againe the second time vnto them.

Elfricus a Traytour.

¶Wherfore the king to be auenged on the father, commaunded the eyen of hys sonne Algarus to be plucked or done out of his head.

King Egeldred punished the sone of Elfricus in pulling out of his eyen for the offece of his father.

¶But while this persecution thus contynued, by meanes of Elphegus Bishop of Winchester, a peace was concluded for a tyme betweene the king and the Danes. And the Prince or chiefe Capitaine of them named Aulaff, was so exhorted by the sayd Bishop, that he became a christen man, to whom the king was Godfather, so that shortly after, the sayde Aulaff returned to his owne Countrie, without doing of any more hurte, so that for a whyle the warres of the Danes ceased. But while they rested, the bloudy Flure with brenning Feuers so vexed the people thorow the land, that many dyed therof.

Bloudy Flure, and brenning Feuers.

¶And now againe the Danes assayled this land, and did in diuers places great harme, so that for lacke of a good head or gouernour many things in the lande perished. For the Lordes were at such dissension one with another, that when they were assembled to speake or treate of peace betweene that one Lorde and that other, and if any good thing were deuysed for the hurt of their enemies, anone the Danes were warned thereof by some of the same counsaile: whereof were suspected Elfricus and Edricus.

Diuision and dissension among the Lordes.

¶ And to this sorrow was ioyned hunger and penury, amongst the commons, that euery one of them was constreyned to plucke & steale from other, so that what by the pillage of the Danes, and inward theeues and bribours, this land was brought into great misery and mischiefe.

A miserable realme.

¶ The king being thus wrapped in miserie, left not to gather of his subiectes what he might, as well by vnlawfull meanes as otherwise. For sayth Reynulph, he would for feyned or small causes disherite men of their possessions, & after cause them to redeeme their owne with great summes of money.

How one miserie begat another.

¶ And besides this, he gaue himselfe altogether to lechery, and to the filthy lust of the body: By which vngracious meanes, he brought this lande into such ruyne, that what he might not helpe by strength, he redemed with great summes of money. So that from the first entrie of the Danes, as witnesseth Reynulph in his. vj. booke and. xviij. Chapter, and Guydo and other Authors, and from the first tribute of ten thousand pound, he brought it at the last in processe of fiue or sixe yeres, to. xl. thousand pound. The which yeerely during his lyfe and after, to the comming of king Edward was leuied of his subiects, and named for the continuance therof Dane Gelt, which is to meane, money payde to the Danes, or Dane money.

Sinne and mischiefe come together.

A tribute called Dane Gelt.

¶ In the. xv. yere of his reigne dyed Oswald Archbishop of Cantorbury, and sone after dyed Ethelgina the Queene. And thus the land continued vnder the greuous Tribute of the Danes, and also the Englishe men susteyned of them great numbers of vilanies and iniuries, as partly hereafter shall appere. The king at this tyme by counsayle of his familiers, about the. xij. yere of his reigne maryed Emma the daughter of Richard Duke of Normandy: The which Richard was the thirde duke of Normandy, and the first of that name, and also was surnamed Richard without feare, or Richard the hardy, by whome he had issue Edward the Confessor, which after was king of Englande.

A miserable Englād

Emma the daughter of Richarde Duke of Normandy.

¶ By this mariage, Egeldred began to looke a loft, and thought much of himselfe, and toke vpon him with much more courage then before he had done. Wherefore he sent into all the good Boroughes, Townes, and Cities of his land, secret and streight commissions, charging all the rulers, that vpon a certeyne day, which was the day of S. Brice, at an houre assigned in euery place of this land, the Danes should be slaine, and so it was done. And as the common fame telleth, this murder began at a little Towne in Hertfordshire, within. xviij. Myles of London called Welwen: For the which deede it tooke the first name, because that the weale of that countrie (as it was then thought) was there first wonne. But who that doth well consider the sequele of the Storye, shall finde little wynnyng or weale that ensued of thys deede.

The Danes murdered.

¶ But before I proceede further, I will here touche somewhat of the pryde and abusion of the Danes, which they exercised in Englande, as I haue haue ſene in an olde Chronicle. The Danes by ſtrength cauſed huſbandmen to eare and ſowe their land, and to do all other vile labour that belonged vnto huſbandry, and the Dane helde his wyfe at pleaſure, with daughter and ſeruaunt. And when the huſband man came home, he ſhould ſcantly haue of his owne as his ſeruauntes had, ſo that the Dane had all at his commaundement, and did eate and drinke his fill of the beſt, when the owner had ſcant his fill of the worſt. And beſydes this, the common people were ſo of them oppreſſed, that for feare and dreade, they called them in euery ſuch houſe as they had rule of, Lord Dane: But in proceſſe of tyme, after the Danes were voyded the lande, this worde Lord Dane, was in diriſion and diſpite of the Danes turned by Engliſhe men into a name of oppriobry called Lurdane, which yet is not forgotten, for if one Engliſhe man will rebuke another, he will for the moſt part ſay, thou art but a Lurdane.

The crueltie of the Danes

Miſerable bondage and villanie.

Lord Dane, of the which ſprang this worde Lurdane.

¶ But nowe to returne to our firſt matter: Truth it is when the Danes were thus murdered throughout Englande, tydinges thereof ſprang into Denmarke: which kindled in them ſuch a fury, that the king thereof named Swanus, aſſembled ſhortly a great hoſte and nauie of Shippes. And within ſhort tyme after, he with his Danes landed in Cornewall. And by treaſon of a Norman named Hughe, which by fauour of Queene Emma was made Earle of Deuonſhire, the ſayde Swanus tooke Exceter, and after bet downe the walles.

Swanus king of the Danes entered into England.

¶ Then he entered further into the land: In which ſeaſon the king ſent vnto Edrycus, charging him to aſſemble the weſt Saxons, and to withſtand the further entry of the Danes: The which according to his commiſſion aſſembled the weſt Saxons, and made good countenance to withſtand the ſayd enemyes: But when the hoſtes ſhould ioyne, were it for feare or for treaſon, he fayned himſelfe ſicke, and fled from his people. The which for lacke of an head were faine to gene backe to their great hurt, and to their enemies great aduauntage and comfort.

¶ Wherefore the Danes, then reſorted to Sherborne and Wylton, and anone ſpoyled both thoſe townes, and there refreſhed them: But Swanus had vnderſtanding, that the king was comming towardes him with the power of his lande, he therefore departed thence, and returned with great pillage vnto his Shippes, and ſayled about the land, and at the laſt landed in Norffolke: Where he waſting and ſpoilyng the Countrie, came to the Citie of Norwich, the which he robbed and deſtroyed, and after went to Thetford, and did lykewiſe to that Towne, and fyred it, and ſpoyled all the Countrye nere there about.

Swanus fled to his ſhippes

Swanus lãded in Norffolke & ſpoiled that countrie.

¶ But ſoone after, a noble man of that Countrie called Duke Uſkatell, met with the hoſt of Danes, and gaue vnto them a hard and ſharpe battayle, and ſlue many of the enemies and put them backe. For this and for hunger that then aſſayled this land, Swanus returned to his Shippes, and departed againe into Denmarke, and taryed all the Winter folowing. In which ſeaſon he made great prouiſion to reenter the land of England.

Uſkatell a noble man of Norffolke, & named a duke gaue the Danes a foyle, & repaiſe, and Swanus fled into Denmark

In the. xrb. yere of the reigne of the king, the aforeſayde Swanus with a ſtrong army landed at Sandwich, and ſpoiled all the country nere vnto the Sea ſyde, and reſted him there, vntill he heard of an armie comming againſt him. And when he was ware thereof, he returned to his Shippes againe: and and heering that the king was farre Weſtwarde, he landed in Suſſex, and ſpoyled it wonderfull ſore, and there alſo he was warned of the comming of the Engliſh men, and then anone he tooke ſhipping againe. So that when the Engliſhe men had thought to haue met with him in one coaſt, then would he flie and land in another. And when the king prouided to meete with them on the Sea, eyther they would fayne themſelues to flie, or elſe they woulde with giftes blynde the admirall of the kinges Nauie.

Admiralles of the Sea were as it apereth blinded in this tyme.

¶ By which ſubtiltie and crafty meanes, they wery ed and tyred the hoſt of Engliſhe men. And where euer they went they ſlue, brent, and robbed, without all compaſſion and pitie.

¶ The king then beyng at Shrewesburie, a heering of the great fleight and crueltie of the Danes, called his counſayle to take aduice what were beſt to be done for the defence of his enemies. Where it was concluded, that the king to haue peace with the Danes, ſhould pay vnto them. xxx. thouſand pound. But while this was in doyng, the Danes deſtroyed a great part of Barkſhire.

A great tribute payed to the Danes.

¶ But when this peace was thus made, Swanus with his company returned into Denmarke. And the yere folowing, the king made Edrycus aforenamed, Duke of Mertia. Thus Edricus beyng but of baſe birth was made riche, he was of tongue falſe, and ſubtile of wit, ſoft and eloquent of ſpeeche, vntruſtie, and inconſtant of thought and promes, as of him ſomthing before is ſhewed, and after more ſhall apere.

Swanus returned againe into Denmarke.

¶ In the. xxvij. yere of the king, a Prince of the Danes named Turkillus landed in Kent. The which ſo grieuouſly warred in that countrie, that the Kentiſhmen were faine to make their peace, and ſo he departed. But yet the perſecution of the Danes ſeaced not: For in one countrie of England or other, they euer were robbing and pilling the Engliſh men. So that all the Countrye along the coaſt, from the North part of England, vnto the Iſle of wight, was by them eyther vtterly deſtroyed, or greatly empayred. And when the king entended to make prouiſion for to withſtande them, euer Edrycus would counſayle him to the contrary, ſhewyng him that he ſhould ſpend his treaſure, and trauayle his people in vaine. By meane whereof the Danes entered fiftie mile into England, and brent and deſtroyed diuerſe Villages, and Townes. So that they encreaſed and waxed paſſing riche, and the Engliſh men, nedy, bare, and poore. Thus continuyng this miſery, Swanus then being in Denmarke, and heeryng of the encreaſe of his people within England repented him of his former couenantes, and thought that the whole dominion of England ſhould of right belong to him. For the which he prepared his armie and nauie in moſt defenſable wiſe, and ſped him into England, and to the ryuer of Humber, and landed in Northumberland, where the Earle and ruler of that Countrye with all the other rulers of the ſame, ſware fealty vnto the ſayde Swanus, and promiſed to kepe that Countrie vnto his vſe. And when he had done his will in that Coaſt, he entred againe the water, and by the Ryuer of Trent, he paſſed to Gaynſburgh, and ſo by North Watling-ſtreete, and ſubdued the inhabitauntes of that Countrie, and forced them to geue him pledges. Which pledges, with alſo his nauie, he betooke vnto Canutus his ſonne, while he went further into the land. And he and his people kept on theyr Journey vntill they came vnto Mertia, killing and fleyng the men of that prouince, and reserued the women to vncleane liuyng, aswell the religious as the other, and tooke by strength Winchester, and Oxford, or rather Exceter, and did in them what him liked.

¶ And after he had thus passed the lande, he drewe the next way toward London: But in passing the Ryuer of Thames he lost some parte of his people, eyther for lack of a Bridge or for ieopardyng their passage vnaduisedly. And so in fine he came to London and besieged it, where at that tyme the king was. Wherefore Swanus left the Citie, and drewe into Esser, and againe by water passed into Kent and so towarde the Citie of Cauntorbury without any let, welding the Countrie at his will, and lastly besieged that Citie. The which manfully defended themselues against their enimies by the space of xx. dayes, and then was the sayde Citie taken by the treason of a Deacon named Almaricus, the which before tyme Elphegus then Archbishop of that See had preserued from death. Fabian.

Cauntorbury besieged by Swanus king of the Danes.

Almaricus a Deacon, a Traytour.

¶ Polidore affirmeth that the Danes besieged the Citie of London, and the Londoners though they were somewhat dismayed at the first, by reason of the sodaine feare, yet they so manfully defended themselues, that at the length they were not afeard to set open the gates of the Citie, and to go out themselues in great multitudes and fight with their enimies: And so valiantly behaued they themselues against them, that they slue many of them, and in fyne compelled Swanus or Sweno their king to get him awaye with the residue of his armie with such hastie expedition, that he ceased not trauailyng day and night vntill he was two dayes iourney from London, and then went he to Bath and there taried, where he was so sore distressed for lack of victuailes, that he was fayne to let Egelred redeeme the tribute, the which he had a little before graunted and bounde himselfe to paye. And hauing receyued of him a great summe of money for the redemption thereof, he returned into Denmarke, minding ere it were long to repayre to this lande againe with a greater armie then euer he had before.

Tribute redemed.

¶ Mathew of Westminster writeth also that after the saide Swanus or Sweno was in dispaire to winne the Citie of London, both because of the losse of his Souldyours that through rashnesse & misaduenture were drowned in the Thamys, and also the manly resistance made by the Londoners in defending themselues, he gate him awaye with speede, and went first to Wallyngford and then to Bathe, exercising much cruelties all the waye as they went, and lefte nothyng vndestroyed, and at Bathe rested him a space to refreshe his armie, whether Almarus then Erle of Deuonshire, with all the Nobilitie of the west Barons together with their seruantes and retynue, fearing his tirannie, came vnto hym and delyuered hym hostages, praiyng withall that they might, be at peace with him. And afterwardes, when he saw that he might nowe do what he woulde, and that no man durst chalenge the Crowne and fight with him for the same, he caused himselfe to be proclaymed king of England. But the sayde writer maketh mention neyther of the scarcitie of victualles that shoulde then be amongest the Souldiours, neyther of the redemption of the sayde tribute, nor yet of his sodeyn returne into Denmarke: But here to returne to mine Authour.

¶ In the .xxxiiij. yere of the king, when the Danes had wonne a great parte of the Countrie of weſt Saxon, they returned againe to London warde: whereof hering the Londoners ſent vnto them giftes and pledges.

¶ In all this ſeaſon I finde no mention that euer the king gaue vnto the Danes any notable battayle, but kept him in holdes and places for his owne ſauegarde, and to the ſmall benefite or aduauntage of his Realme. And at the laſt he was chaſed vnto the Iſle of Wight, where, with a ſmall company he kept himſelfe ſecret a great part of the Winter, and finally without battaile or comfort, ſayled ouer to his wyfe into Normandy, and there helde him a certeyne of tyme.

Swanus being certified that the King was fled began to vſe many exactions vpon the people of England.

¶ When Swanus was aſſerteyned of the departure of the king out of the land, he was enflamed with exceedyng pryde, ſo that he arrered exceedyng impoſitions of the people & grieued them wonderfully. And among other of his Tirannyes he demaunded a great ſumme of money out of S. Edmondes landes, which the rulers denayed, for ſo much as they claymed to be free of all kinges Tribute. Wherfore he entered into that territory, and waſted and ſpoyled the Countrie, and beſydes that, deſpiſed that holy martyr, and threatned the place of his Sepulchre: But the men of that countrie fearyng this Tyrant, gaue them to faſting and prayer, ſo that ſhortly after he was ſlaine or ſticked in an Euening amongeſt his knightes, with the ſworde or dagger of Saint Edmond in the Towne of Thetford, as ſayth Guydo, but Reynulph and other, in the Towne of Gaynesborough, where he dyed yellyng and cryng the thirde day after: But Saxo Grammaticus ſayth, that the ſayd Swanus or Sweno, beyng conuerted vnto the Chriſten fayth dyed at the length very repentauntly and lyke a good chriſtian man: And that he ſuffered Etheldred after that peaceably to reigne all his lyfe time as king of this lande by a compoſition betwene them.

And after builded a Church ouer the place of his Sepulture, and ordeyned there a house of Monkes, and endued them with fayre possessions. And afterward it was vsed that kinges of England when they were crowned, sent for an offering their Crownes vnto S. Edmonds shrine, & redemed them again with a condigne price. Fabian. The which Polydore thinketh not to be true.

S. Edmōds bury enclosed by Canutus sonne of Swanus.

Kinges of this Realme were accustomed to offer their Crownes to Saint Edmondes shrine, and to redeme them againe with a great summe.

¶ Nowe when king Egeldred was certified of the death of Swanus, he by the procurement of his friendes returned home againe to his awne: But the Nobles of the Realme condicioned with him, that he should reforme his olde maners. And for performance thereof, he sent his sonne Edward into Englande before him, and in the Lent folowing the king came himselfe, and with his people sped him toward Lyndsey, where Canutus was at that tyme resiant, not prouided for the kinges so hastie comming.

¶ Wherefore Canutus, beyng not purueyed to withstande the king, fled to Sandwich in Kent. And for that he there proued such persons, as before tyme his father and he had taken pledges off, and finding them not firme in their promyses, he caused all theyr noses and handes to be cut off, and then sayled into Denmarke, and returned the next yere with a great Nauye, and sayled about the land, and tooke prayes in the South countrye, whereof the kinges eldest sonne named Edmond, made prouision with the ayde of Edrycus to go against him.

Canutus the sonne of Swanus fled into Denmarke.

¶ But when he should haue met with Edrycus at a place assigned, and his hoste, he was of him deceyued, and therfore was compelled to geue place vnto his enemies. And as it was after knowne, the sayde Edrycus had promised his fauour and ayde vnto the sayde Canutus. By reason whereof Canutus entered the Countrie of West Saxons, and forced them to sweare to him fealtie, and to geue to him pledges.

¶ In this season, the king beyng at London, was taken with a greuous sickneſſe and dyed, and was buryed in the Church of Saint Paule, where at this day in the North Isle behynde the Quyer, apereth a token in the wall of his Sepulture, he reigned. xxvj. yeres, leauing after him two sonnes, Edmond, and Edward.

But the Scottes not contented to sustaine the Tirannie of their king Grime, rose vp against him, whereof ensued much trouble in Scotland. Malcolme vanquished and slue Grime, and tooke on him the kingdome, and reigned. xxxj. yeres. To him the Lordes of Scotlande graunted first the wardes and mariages of their heyres. And not long after Olamus, and Onetus, two Capitanes of the Danes inuaded Scotland, and vanquished king Malcolme, and subdued Murrey: But not long after, Malcolme repayred his army, and discomfited the Danes, and slue Onetus.

EDmond Ironſyde, the ſonne of Egeldred, or Etheldred, and alſo Canutus, the ſonne of Swanus king of Denmarke, did by the conſent of certeyne of their friendes on eyther ſyde, take vpon them the gouernement of this lande. The Londoners with the aſſiſtance of ſome Lordes of Englande fauoured Edmond: But the more part of the Lordes fauoured Canutus, and ſpecially the ſpiritualtie that before tyme had ſworne fealtie to his father. And he then beyng at Southampton ſwore vnto them, to be a true and good Juſtice, and to entreate the people ſoberly and righteouſly.

¶ Then Edmond beyng of the Archebiſhop of Yorke crowned at London and the ſolemnitie finiſhed and ended, he ſped him to Weſt Saxon, and ſubdued that Country. In which tyme Canutus drewe with his people to London, and would there haue entered: But that was forbodden him of the Londoners. For the which he layde his ordinance about the Citie, entendyng to haue entered perforce: But it was not long or he was faine to breake his ſiege and to depart thence.

Canutus aſſaulted the citie of London.

¶ When Canutus was put off from London, he drewe Weſtwarde, and in ſhort tyme after met with king Edmond in Dorſetſhire, beſyde Gyllingham, where betwene them was foughten a ſtrong and cruell battaile: But in the ende Canutus was ouercome, and compelled to forſake the fielde.

¶ After this, they met againe in Worceſter ſhire, or as Polydore ſayth, at Indouer in Wiltſhire, where they fought a more ſtrong and fierce battaile: For this was ſo ſtrongly foughten on both partes, that men could not iudge which part had the better, nor which the worſe: But as Reynulph ſayth, eyther of them departed from other, eyther for weryneſſe of fight, or for lacke of the day.

A cruell fight.

¶ But on the Morowe folowyng, both hoſtes met againe and fought egerly. The which fight continuyng, Edricus eſpiyng king Edmond to be at a vauntage of wynning of the fielde, ſodeinly pight a dead mannes heade vpon the head of a Speare, and cryed to the hoſte of Engliſh men, flye, flye, you Engliſh men and ſaue your ſelues, lo, here is the head of Edmond your king. But Edmond beyng thereof warned, ſped him to that part of the field, and behaued himſelfe ſo comfortably amongeſt his men, that by his knightly courage, his people recouered that which before they had loſt, and continued the battaile vntill night, and cauſed Canutus to flye that Countrie, and to returne againe towarde London.

Edricus a vile traytor.

¶ Then king Edmond beyng aduertiſed that Canutus was returned toward London, he folowed him and paſſed the Ryuer of Thamys, and deliuered the Citie from the daunger of the Danes, and after encountered the Danes at a place called Brentford within ſeuen myles of London, where he had with them a cruell fight, and at length diſcomfited them. Fabian.

Brentford which we nowe call Braineford.

¶ But becauſe the Author whom I here folow leaueth many thinges vntouched worthy of remembrance, which were done after the ſayde battaile foughten

foughten by Andouer, I haue here thought good to ſupplye his defect by Polydore, who wryteth hereof, as foloweth: When Canutus was this diſcomfited, he traueyled all night long to Wincheſter warde, and gate him to a place of ſafetie: But Edmond as ſome do write purſued him not, but turned to Sariſburie to reſcue the Citizens there beſieged of another company of Danes. Thether alſo ſhortly after came Canutus, where not farre from the ſame Towne they pitched a newe fielde, and as men hauing nowe gathered a new courage & refreſhed themſelues, fought very fiercely and egerly together, but with equall fortune tyll night came that parted them beyng weryed with long fighting. The next morning the Engliſhe men anone after the Sonne riſyng, ſtoode ready aranged in battaile ray, awaytyng the comming of their enemies, vntill Canutus came and ſet vpon them. Then fought they together verie fiercely, but doubtfully withall, and in ſuch wiſe that many went to wracke and were ſlaine on both ſydes. And when it drewe towardes the euening they gaue ouer on euen hande, neyther partie hauyng victory of other. On the next morowe both the hoſtes reſted themſelues, and tooke their repaſt, & gathered together the deade corpſes of them that were ſlaine the day before, and burned them as the maner was then to do. And all this while they neuer vnarmed themſelues. There were ſlaine at that time aboue .xx. M. on both parties. The night folowing Canutus diſlodged as priuely as he could, & marched towards London: The which city his Fleete had now in a maner beſieged by water. But aſſoone as this theyr fliyng was once diſcried by the day light, Edmond folowed him at the heeles, and with a little ado rayſed the ſiege: Wherefore, he entered the Citie triumphauntly, with great ioy and ſolempne pompe. Canutus beyng thus diſapoynted of his hope, hauing gotten great prayes and bootyes out of the Countries there about, departed thence to ſee his ſhippes which were newely entered into the Riuer of Rocheſter, called in olde tyme Medeganara, and nowe Medway, where the ſayde Canutus taryed a ſeaſon, partly to encreaſe his armie, and partly to learne by eſpyals the ſecret purpoſes of his enemies, the which he ſoone vnderſtoode. For Edmond whoſe nature was not to ſleepe hys matters, hauing aſſembled his power with incredible celeritie, lay in campe not farre from Canutus, & there made a long exhortation vnto his Souldiours, the effect wherof was, that they ſhould call to minde the number of battayles that they had foughten with the Danes already, and remember withall that the time nowe ſerued if they would play the men, to repreſſe their cruelty and violence: and therfore he moued them in moſt earneſt maner, that they would not ceaſe to purſue and vrge them, till they had with one battaile cleane banquiſhed and conquered them, that an ende might once be made of their long and great trauayles. The Souldiours beyng incenſed with this exhortation, and alſo wery of the intollarable pride and hautineſſe of their enemyes which dayly moleſted and prouoked them, went with a fierce courage to ſet vpon them. In like maner Canutus, who had commaunded his Souldiours before, to be dayly and hourely in a redineſſe againſt the comming of the Engliſh men, came into the field, and ioyned battail with them, where they fought more then foure houres together, but at the length the Danes began to geue backe. The which when Canutus perceyued, he commaunded his horſemen to reſcue them in the foreward. But whiles it ſo chaunced that ſome of them

gaue backe for feare, and some made no hast thether, the whole army brake aray, and then feare hauing the vpper hand of shame, they fled away. There were of the Danes slaine at that tyme three thousand and fiue hundred, of the which number many were Dukes, and Capitaynes of great birth: But of Englishe men. vj.C. at the most, and they all footemen. King Edmondes intent and purpose was to haue had the vse and fruition of that victory, that is to say, so narrowlye to haue pursued his enemies, that he woulde then haue cleane destroyed them, the which vndoubtedly had beene done, if fortune had not bene against him. For whiles after this great battayle he was in great consultation about the pursuyng of his sayde enemyes, he thought it would be greatly for his aduauntage, if he both rested himselfe the residue of the same day, and the night folowing, and permitted his Souldiours to do the lyke. And so this little time seemed sufficient vnto Canutus to saue himselfe, but not to Edmond. In like maner on the next morow, king Edmond assone as it was once day, mindyng to haue the spoyle of the fielde, brought his Souldiours out of the Campe, to the entent they should afterwardes pursue their enemyes, and the rather because he had intelligence howe they that were the day before dispersed, were nowe gathered together againe, and had passed the ryuer of Thamys, marchyng as fast as they could towardes Norffolke, and Suffolke. Wherefore king Edmond hasted thether with all he myght, to ayde his people there against his sayde enemies. And so vpon a watchworde geuen he set vpon them. And albeit some layde vpon the hindmost, and some stroke in the middest, aswell on the right hand as on the left, yet the Danes for all that gaue not backe. Euery Captayne encouraged his owne Souldiours to sticke vnto it manfully: But specially king Edmond admonished his Captaines that they should cause their Souldiours to kepe aray, ceassyng not to say vnto them with a loude voyce that the same day if they woulde play the men a little while, they should confirme vnto them all their former trauayles & victories, or else should be the beginning of most greuous sorowes and miseries, if they gaue neuer so little backe. By the which words the Souldiours were sodeynly so animated to fight, that the Danes began a little to shrinke and geue backe. The which when Canutus perceyued, by and by he set vpon the left wing of Edmondes hoste, the which were likeliest to do most harme, and so releued his distressed Souldiours, and that did he with such violence and manly courage, that he felled and layde on the ground as many as were in his way: By reason whereof it came to passe, that a great number of the English men nowe wearied with long fightyng, and hearing the rumor of the great slaughter of their company on euery syde, sodeynly fled away for feare. The which when king Edmond perceyued, he gate before them, and stayed them for a whyle: But when at the length his whole armye was quite disordered and out of aray, it was not then possible for him to set them in araye, and bring them into the fielde againe which they had once forsaken. Here the English men, when the streytes and passages were all stopped by theyr enemyes, so that none of them had any minde to make resistance, or hope to flye away and escape, were almost all slaine, specially such of them as were the best and worthyest Souldiours.

¶ Now king Edmond with a verie few with him, neuer ceassed iourneying Westward till he came to Glouceſter, whome Canutus chased the space of two houres, but could not ouertake him.

¶This loſſe and diſcomfiture, though it greatly weakened and diſmayed the Engliſhmen, ſpecially becauſe London and manye other good townes and places were then for feare, rebelled vnto the Danes: yet king Edmond vſed neuertheleſſe diligence in preparing a newe armie, and ſo did likewyſe Canutus, which at length came vnto his enimie by long and great iourneys. For they knewe well that if they did fight againe, they ſhould with one battaile trie who ſhould haue all. And king Edmond was nowe vtterly determined at the next conflict to put himſelfe in extreme haſard, and eyther to wynne all or loſe all. And therefore both the armies being nowe readie to fight, ſtood ſo nere together that the one might ſee the other, not farre from Seuerne ſide. At what tyme Edricus (as ſome reporte) began to perſwade with the two kings, that they ſhould common together before the beginning of the battaile, to ſee whether they coulde fall to any agreement betweene themſelues, becauſe he knewe right well that this thing ſhould be as much for the commoditie of the Danes as of the Engliſhmen. For now he that before time was wont to be the chiefe worker of all trechery and miſchiefe, begane to counterfeyt honeſtie, in going about to ſet an vnitie and peace, betwixt the two ſayde moſt redoubted and valiant princes. The which princes not miſlyking with his counſayle, for that preſent ſeaſon, refuſed not to follow it, albeit they thought it would be to ſmall effect and purpoſe. And ſo they communed together a little while, not without the great expectation of the beholders what would be the ende and come of it. But where vpon they concluded among themſelues it is altogether vncertaine. Some ſaye that peace was agreed vpō condition that Canutus ſhould haue Mertia or middle England, and Edmond all the weſt part of the realme.

¶And in this time Emma the wyfe of Egeldred, fearing the fortune of warre, ſent her two ſonnes Alphred and Edward vnto her brother Richarde the ſecond of that name and fourth Duke of Normandy.

Emma ſent her two ſōnes Alphred and Edward vnto her brother Richard duke of Normandy.

¶But Edricus, which as before is ſayde was euer ſubtile of wyt, conſidering the good fortune of king Edmond and his knightly courage, thought that at length he ſhould ouercome the Danes. Wherefore to ſaue his lande, and to bring about his malicious treaſon, he ſought the wayes and meanes how he might ſtand in his grace and fauour, and at length obteyned his entent, and ſwore to him to be his true ſubiect.

Edricus by ſubtiltie obteyned the kings fauour

¶When king Edmond had a whyle ſtayed at London, he then made toward the Danes that then were in Kent, and met with them at a place called Otford, and there diſcomfited them, and chaſed Canutus to the Iſle of Shepey. And there he tooke ſhipping and ſayled about the lande, and at the laſt entred into the Countrie of Mertia, and ſpoyled a parte thereof.

The Danes diſcomfited at Otford in Kent.

¶Then the two hoſtes met ſoone after at a place called Aſhedowne, where after a long fight Edricus with his retinue fled to the comfort of the Danes: By meane whereof king Edmond was put to the worſſe, for many noble men were ſlaine vpon his party: among the which the Biſhop of Lyncoln, and the Abbot of Ramſey were two, and were come thether to haue intreated a peace betweene the two princes. But when this was layde to the charge of Edricus, he by his vntrue meanes, ſo excuſed himſelfe, that no man myght charge him with any default.

Edricus againe as a traytor reuolted to the Danes.

Edricus had a ſubtile wit

¶ Thus this mortall warre continuing betwixt these two martiall princes, to the great desolation and mortalitie of the people, one of the knightes of the partie of king Edmond, gate him to an high place, where he might be somewhat heard of the hoste, and spake in this wise: daylie we dye, and no man hath the victorie: For Edmond maye not be ouercome for his great strength, and Canutus maye not be ouercome for fauour of fortune. What shall then be the fruite of thys continuall strife? none other but when the knightes bene all slaine on eyther partie, then the Dukes compelled by nede will accord, or else they must fight alone without knights. Then seing thys must be the ende, why do they not one of these two? If they accord? why is not this kingdome sufficient for twaine, that sometyme sufficed for.vij. If their couetousnesse and greedie desire of Lordships be so great, that eyther hath indignation to take and part with other, or else the one to be vnder that other, then let them fight alone, that will be the Lordes alone, least if all men fight, all men be slaine, by meane whereof no men shall be left to be vnder the Lordship or leading of Dukes, nor yet to defend kings against their strong enimies or nations. Fabian.

A good oration.

¶ Some sayth Polidore, whome it repenteth not me to follow, doe write that the matter was done after this maner. One of the Capitaines, whether it were Englishman or Dane, it is not knowne, hauing first licence graunted him to saye his minde, spake in the presence of both the kings on thys wise.

¶ O most doubtie and baliant Emperours, you haue nowe fought long ynough one against another: There hath beene bloud ynough shed betwixt you both. Your baliantnesse and the manly courage also of your Souldiours is sufficiently tryed. And yet can neither of you alwaye with good or euill fortune. For if it so chaunce that one of you haue the vpper hande of the other, he more fiercely pursueth his vanquished enimie: Agayne, if his fortune be to be ouercome, yet prepareth he a freshe battaile against his vanquisher. O what wilfulnesse is this of yours (noble Princes) that can not be ouercome and perswaded by reason? doe you more regard warre then peace? Whether rageth this your greedie desyre of Empire? If you fight for a kingdome, and that be your quarrell and the cause why ye thus warre one against another, deuide you then this most flourishing and wealthie Realme betwixt you, the which in times past was counted sufficient to maintaine. vij. kings: But if glorie doe pricke you to hasard the vncertaine chaunce of Empire or seruitude, deuise you some wayes by your selues whereby the matter maye be determined without any great slaughter or bloudshed which of you both shall haue the souereintie. Thus spake this Capitaine vnto them. But the latter sentence pleased king Edmond, and so did it Canutus also whome fortune fauoured. And so by his perswasions they accorded at the length to trie the matter in their awne persons by dynt of sworde, hetherto Polydore.

A truce taken.

¶ These wordes thus spoken, were right well allowed of both hostes, for at this time, a truce was made betweene both the princes for a certaine tyme, after which tyme ended, were it by the occasion of these wordes, or otherwise, the sayde two princes Edmond and Canutus, agreed to trie their quarels betwene them two onely.

¶ And for this was assigned by both their agrements, a little Ile then called called Oney nere vnto Glouceſter. In which place, at the daye and tyme appointed, the two Champions met without company or aſſiſtance within the ſayde Iſle, the hoſtes of both parties ſtanding without the Iſle, and there abyding the fortune of this combate. There eyther proued other, firſt with charpe Speares, and after with kyne and cutting ſwordes. What ſhall I of this make any longer proceſſe, when eyther had other well proued and aſſayed, by receiuyng of harde and ſore ſtrokes, by the firſt motion of Canutus, as moſt Writers teſtefie, they at the laſt agreed and kiſſed together as louers, to the great comfort of both the hoſtes.

A Combate betweene two Princes.

¶ And ſhortly after, by the aduiſe of both their counſayles they condiſcended and agreed vpon a partition of the lande, which immediatly was done to both their contentations, and they loued after, as two brethren, during their naturall lyues.

This realme was deuided betweene king Edmõd & Canutus.

¶ But the Serpent Idre, of enuy and falſe conſpiracie which euer burned in the heart of Edricus, was kindeled ſo ſore, that of pure force it muſt breake out into a light flame, ſo that what he might not accõpliſh by his awne perſon, he fulfilled by his awne ſonne, as teſtifie diuerſe Authors. For as affirmeth Guydo, this ſonne of Edricus awaityng his time, eſpyed when the king was at a houſe of eaſement to purge nature, and with a Speare ſtrake him into the fundament, and ſo into the body, whereof king Edmond ſhortly after dyed at Orenford. Notwithſtanding there is great diuerſitie amongeſt writers touching his death which for breuities ſake I omit. For Marian ſayth, that he dyed at London by naturall ſickneſſe.

Edricus his ſonne ſlue king Edmõd with a ſpeare as he ſate in a houſe of eaſement.

¶ The king thus being ſlaine, anone Edricus thinkyng thereby to be greatly exalted, ſped him in all haſt to Canutus, and ſaluted him as king, and ſhewed him of this treaſon, onely done for his loue.

¶ When Canutus had well conſidered the confeſſion of this Edricus, he lyke a diſcrete and righteous Prince, ſayde vnto him in this wiſe. Edricus, for that thou haſt for the loue thou beareſt to me, ſlaine thine naturall Lorde, which I moſt loued, I will exalt thine head aboue all the Lordes of England. And forthwith commaunded him to be taken, and his head to be ſtriken off, and pight vpon a Speares head, and after ſet vpon the higheſt gate in London. But the Auctheur of Polichronicon ſheweth in the .xviij. Chapter of his firſt booke that Canutus after the death of Edmond gaue vnto Edricus the Lordſhip of Martia or myddle Englande, and by his counſayle exiled Edwyn the brother of Edmond called the king of Chorles, and through his counſayle alſo executed many cruell deedes.

Iuſt reward for a Traytor.

¶ Finally, howſoeuer this noble Prince came to his death, it is agreed that he dyed, when he had reigned one yere, and ſomewhat more, and is buryed at Glaſtenbury, by his Grandfather Edgar, and left behynde him two ſonnes, that is to ſay, Edmond, and Edward, as ſayth Fabian.

CAnutus or Knot, by the death of king Edmond had the whole gouernance of the Realme, and forthwith he aſſembled a counſayle at London, and then was conſecrated and annoynted king, of Aluredе Archebiſhop of Cauntorbury, where among other thinges that were debated in that counſayle, a queſtion was moued, whether in the compoſition made betwene Edmond, and Canutus, any ſpeciall remembraunce was made for the children or brethren of Edmond for any portion of any part of the land.

Flatterers.

¶ Whereunto, it was aunſwered of the Lordes, naye, affirming furthermore with an othe (for the kinges pleaſure) that they to the vttermoſt of their powers would put off the blood of Edmond in all that they might. By reaſon of which aunſwere and promes, they thought many of them to haue ſtand in the great grace and fauour of the king, but it turned all otherwiſe.

Diſſemblers well rewarded.

¶ For many, or the more part of them, ſpecially ſuch as Canutus perceyued and knew, were ſworne before to Edmond and his heyres, and alſo were natiue Engliſh men, he miſtruſted and diſdeyned euer after. In ſo much, that ſome he exiled, and ſome were ſlaine, and ſome by Goddes puniſhment dyed ſodeynly, and came to a miſerable ende.

¶ But ſhortly after by the counſayle of dyuerſe of his Lordes, he outlawed Edwyne the brother of Edmond ſurnamed king of Chorles. But yet he was afterwarde reconciled to the kinges fauour, and laſtlye was ſlaine by one of his awne ſeruauntes.

Edmond and Edward the ſonnes of king Edmond, were ſent to Swanus king of Denmarke.

¶ Canutus alſo by the ſayde counſayle, ſent the two ſonnes of Edmond, named as before is ſayde Edmond and Edward, vnto his brother Swanus then king of Denmarke, to be ſlaine after the opinion of ſome writers: But he abhorring that deede, ſent them to Salamon then king of Hungary, as ſayth Guydo and other. Where in proceſſe of tyme Edmond dyed, and hys brother Edward maryed Agatha the daughter of Henry the fourth, then Emperour of Almaine.

¶ Of the which Edward and Agatha, proceded Margaret that after was king of Scotland, and Chriſtian that was a Nonne, and a ſonne named Edgar, and ſurnamed Etheling: or as Polydore writeth two ſonnes, Edmond and Edgar.

Canutus deuided the gouernement of this realme into foure partes.

¶ Canutus, after he had ſet certaine things in ſome order within ỹ realme, he then deuyded the ſame into foure partes. That is to ſay, the firſt and principall parte, which at thoſe dayes was weſt Saxon, he held vnder his owne guyding. Eaſt England the which conteyned Northfolke and Suffolke, he betooke to the rule of the Erle Turkillus a Dane, or as Polydore calleth him Thurgillus. Mertia he betooke (as ſome write) to the ſubtile Erle Edricus. And the fourth part which was Northumberland, he betooke to a Dane named Hircius. But lyke as the man of Indee, can at no time chaunge his colour, ſo this Edricus neuer chaunged his falſe maners. And notwithſtanding the great benefits that he daylie receyued of his princes, euen lyke as he had bene falſe and deceyueable to other princes before, euen ſo now he vſed himſelfe toward Canutus.

Edricus the falſe Traytour put to death.

¶ Wherefore he being accuſed and prooued faultie, was commaunded of the king to haue iudgement: The which was done immediatly, and his head for dyuers cauſes ſmitten off, and the ſame head with the body, for ſpite, caſt into a foule and filthie place. But Reynulph Monke of Cheſter ſayeth, that he was ſlaine by the kings agreement, within his palace at London, and his body with the head throwne after into the Towne Diche: Thus with ſhame he ended, that in falſhood and diſſimulation continued moſt of his life.

A Parliament.

¶ In the. xv. yere of his reigne, he called a Parliament at Oxenforde, where among other things, it was enacted, that Engliſhmen and Danes ſhould holde and firmely keepe the lawes of Edgar late king.

¶ And

¶ And in this tyme dyed Swanus, that was brother to Canutus king of Denmarke without issue, wherefore that land fell vnto Canutus. For the which cause, he with a strong armie sayled thether to take the possession, and to set the Countrie in an order, or after some writers, to appease and withstand the Vandales that then had pierced that lande, and done therein much harme. Wherein Goodwyn the Erle, whose daughter Edward the confessor after maryed with a certaine number of Englishmen, fell vpon the Vandales by night, and distressed them in suche wise that Canutus had of them his pleasure. For this deede the king had Erle Goodwyn euer after in good fauour and loued Englishe men more specially.

Swanus king of Denmarke dead and Canutus succeded him in the sayde kingdome.

Erle Godwin.

¶ But Polydore reporteth this storye touchyng the kinges goyng into Denmarke farre otherwise, after this maner. When the Parliament (sayth he) was ended, he determined with himselfe to reforme many misorders in the common welth, and to beautifie and furnishe the Realme with Nobilitie, and to do things that generally should redound to the great wealth and commoditie of all English men. But it so fell that he was sodeinly certified of the inuasion made by them of Norway into Denmarke, and desyred withall of his people there to come and ayde them with all speede. The which thing seemed vnto Canutus to be a matter of no small importance. For when Olanus king of Norway heard how the power of Canutus dayly encreased in such wise as he thought was daungerous for his estate, beyng afearde that he would make clayme vnto the sayd kingdome of Norway, which somtymes belonged vnto his auncestours, and therefore desyrous to cut off, and empeach his victories, he together with his brother Harolde, a right doughty knight, inuaded the Realme of Denmarke, destroiyng and wastyng the Countrie euery where as he went, dayly fighting and skirmishing with the Garrisons that lay in sundry places of that Countrie, in such wise that it was thought he would in short space winne all, if speedy resistance were not made to deliuer the Realme from such an iminent daunger. Wherefore Canutus mustered both Englishmen and Danes with a tryce, and hauing nowe all thinges redyly prepared for warre, tooke shipping, and the winde seruyng him well, was soner arriued in Denmarke then a man would haue thought, where he found his enemies in armes, and the Country wasted and destroyed on euery syde. Then commaunded he his Banners and Pennons to be displayed, and his Standard to be aduaunced and the army to follow, where euery thing was done as soone as it could be spoken.

¶ And here nowe were the Englishe men specially desyrous to do some noble deedes of armes, as well thereby to winne honour and shewe their manly courage and prowesse, as to purchase themselues the greater grace and fauour with their prince. Then met the two armies and fought so fiercelye together, that they filled the Element with great cry and noyse that they made. Long it was or it apered to whether partie the victory should encline. At the length the English men so fiercely assayled the enemies that they ouercame them. On the Morow Canutus pursuyng his enemies, tooke his iourney towardes Norway. And when he was entred into the Countrye, there met him incontinent Ambassadors, which were sent vnto him to intreat of peace, and submission, and to desyre him of a generall pardon, whome he heard very curteously, and after he had receyued Hostages of them, he pardoned doned them of all treſpaſſes and offences whatſoeuer they had done againſt him: And ſo was the kingdome of Norway recouered againe. Olanus deſpeyring nowe of victory fled for ſuccour vnto his father in lawe the Duke of the Eaſterlynges that he might lyue with him more ſafely in exile: The which Olanus whiles he went about to diſturbe the quiet ſtate of another mannes kingdome, loſt his awne: yet to ſay the truth, the ſame Eodly and innocent man loſt nothing at all, in aſmuch as in all theſe his aduerſities and troubles, he behaued himſelfe alwayes in moſt honeſt and verteous wiſe, and therefore was counted of all men a very holy man. And it foloweth a little after in the ſame wryter: In this battaile Canutus proued the Loyaltie and manly proweſſe of the Engliſhe men, whome for that cauſe, he euer afterwardes loued out of meaſure, and rewarded them with great giftes accordingly. And when the king had thus taken order with his affayres in Denmarke, he returned ſhortly into England. And ſoone after he maried Emma the wife lately of Egelredus, of the which he had a ſonne, & named him Hardycanutus, and after the Engliſh Chronicle, Hardyknought.

Canutus maried Emma ỹ late wife of Egelredus & had by her a ſonne named Hardicanut.

¶ But Polidore wryteth that this mariage was concluded on in the former Parliament. For Canutus hauing none iſſue, but onely two ſonnes baſe borne, and begotten of a Concubine of his named Aluina, of the which two ſonnes the one was called Harold, and the other Sweno: And deſirous to haue ſuche iſſue as might lawfully ſuccede him, maryed Emma the wyfe of Etheldred, which with her ſonnes Alfred and Edward were baniſhed the realme & lyued in Normandy with Richard her brother Duke of that countrie, vnto the which Duke the ſayde king maried alſo his ſiſter Heſtritha, at the ſame tyme.

Malcolme kinge of Scots ouerthrowne and brought to ſubiection to the king of England.

¶ In the.xvj. yere of his reigne, the Scots rebelled againſt him: wherfore he with a great armie entred Scotlande, and at length ouercame the king of that lande, named then Malcolme and brought them againe to hys ſubiection, as ſayth Marian the Scot. By reaſon of which victorie, Canutus was then king of foure kingdomes, of England, of Scotland, of Denmarke, and of Norway.

Leofricus, Egelnotus.

¶ Then as ſayth ſundry Authours, after that he had betaken this land of England to the guyding of Leofricus, Egelnothus and other, he then returned into Denmarke. And from thence he went in pilgrimage to Rome in the.xvij. yere of his reigne, and redeemed the Schoole of Sarons free of all former Tribute graunted as before in the ſtories of Iew and Offa is ſomedeale touched: which redemption of Tribute (as ſayeth Guydo) was called Rome Scot, as ye maye reade more in Fabian.

Rome ſcot redeemed.

¶ After his returne from Rome, he beganne ſomewhat to ſwell with pride: But to ſay truth, he was a king of great magnificence, and he vſed ſuch iuſtice mixed with temperance that in his daies, in the weſt partes of the worlde, there was no Prince of renowne lyke to Canutus and beſides that, he was greatly beloued and dread of all his ſubiects.

Canutus king of foure kingdomes.

¶ Thys king Canutus when he had reigned ouer this Realme.xix.yeres, he dyed and was buried at Wincheſter, leauing after him two ſonnes begotten vpon his wiues, the eldeſt named Harold, and the yongeſt Hardikanitus, the which while his father lyued, was made king of Denmarke. Fabian.

Canutus dead and left behinde him two ſonnes.

But Polydore ſayeth that Canutus dyed in Normandy, and was buried at Roane, at Roane, whoſe wordes are theſe: It was not long after, but Canutus was enforced to make great warre vpon Richard Duke of Normandy, becauſe he hauing no feare nor regarde vnto the Lawes, had cauſed himſelfe to be deuorced for a verie light and trifling matter from his wyfe Eſtritha ſiſter (as is aforeſayde) of Canutus, who being deſyrous to be reuenged vpon the ſayde Duke for the ſame iniurie, prepared a great Nauie and ſayled vnto Normandy. Nowe his armie was ſcarcely ſet a lande and encamped in the enemies Countrie when worde was brought him of the death of his ſonne Sweno Lieutenaunt or Lorde Deputie of Norway, whome he ſpecially loued, the which thing ſo wounded his hart with anguiſhe and ſorrow, that he fell into an Ague, whereof he dyed ſhortly after. Then (as it foloweth in the ſame Authour) his funerall obſequy being finiſhed at Roane: the Souldiours vpon ſafe conduyt and lycence graunted them to depart in ſafetie, returned home againe into England.

HArolde the baſe ſonne of Canutus and of Elgina, or Algina, after the death of his father reigned ouer England. This man for his nymblenelle and ſwiftneſſe of foote, was ſurnamed Harefoote. In his beginning there was great ſtrife among the Lordes, in a Parliament holden at Oxford, for that ſome were in doubt of his birth, and whether he were the kings ſonne or not, and ſpecially Erle Goodwyn which did the vttermoſt of his power to haue ſet him by, and to haue preferred his brother Hardikinitus the ſonne of Ethelred and Emma, or anye of the ſonnes of Ethelred and Emma that were in Normandy vnto that honor. But Leofricus whom Canutus ſo much loued and truſted, with the ayde of the Danes and Londoners, ſo ſtoutly withſtoode Goodwyne and hys ſonnes, that they fayled of their purpoſe.

Harold harefoote.

¶ Alſoone as this Harolde was crowned, he gate him in all haſte to Wincheſter, and there tirannically ſeaſed vpon all the goodes and treaſure which Canutus had left vnto the ſayd Emma, and then baniſhed her the lande. The which Emma ſayled then into Flaunders, and there of Baldwyn the Erle was reuerently and curteouſly receyued, and obteyned of him the Caſtell of Bruges, where ſhe made her aboade during the lyfe of this Harolde. The cauſe why ſhe went not into Normandy, was becauſe William then Duke there was by reaſon of his tender yeres and minoritie, not able to gouerne of himſelfe, but was vnder the tuition and gouernance of others.

Emma the Stepmother of Harold is baniſhed.

¶ This Harold continued his life and reigne with little fruite, and leſſe profite to the land, nor yet of the Subiectes, ſo that of him, either for vice that was in him, which learned men thought not meete to put in memory, or elſe for the rudeneſſe of his lyfe, and ſpending vainely of his tyme, which was not worthy of memory, nothing at all is put in remembraunce, but that he dyed at London, or as ſome write, at Orenford, and was buried at Weſtminſter, when he had reigned three yeres and odde Monethes, leauyng after him none heyre, and therfore his brother Hardikinitus which was king of Denmarke, was king next after him.

Hardikinitus

HArdikinitus, or Hardiknot, the sonne of Canutus, and of Emma, was made king of Englande: This man after the death of his brother Harolde was sent for into Denmarke, or as some write into Flaunders, where he was with his mother Emma, and was most ioyously receyued and crowned at London of Ethelnotus, then Archebishop of Cauntorbury: But he was of such a cruelty, that he sent Alfricus then Archebishop of Yorke, and Erle Goodwyn vnto Westminster, commaundyng them for the iniury by his brother Harolde done vnto his mother Emma, that they should drawe the Corps and dead body of the sayd Harolde out of the ground, or place where it was buried, and cause it to be throwne into the ryuer of Thamys, which was done according to his commaundement. The which Corps after, as sayth Guydo and other, was found by a Fisherman, and buried vnreuerently within the Church yarde of Saint Clement standyng without the Temble barre of London.

A cruell reuengemēt.

¶ And as Reynulph sayth, for a more cruelty, he caused first the dead hed of his sayde brother to bee smitten off from the bodye, and then throwen into the sayde Ryuer.

¶ This king also leuyed the aforenamed Tribute named the Dane gelt, and spent it to the little profite of the Realme, but gaue the same vnto Mariners and Shipmen, and to sundry lewde persons, he gaue great and vnsitting fees and wages, and was of such prodigality, that his Boordes and Tables were couered foure tymes in the daye, and the people serued with great excesse both of meate and drinke.

Dane Gelt.

Excesse of fare.

¶ Nowe for the leuiyng of the aforesayde Tribute, the Commons greatly grudged, so that in Worcester two of his seruauntes, which were assigned to gather that money, were there slaine. For the which murder the king was so sore displeased, that he brent a great part of that Towne.

Murther & mischiefe.

¶ Some Authours write that the king betooke all the rule of the lande vnto his mother Emma, and to the Erle Goodwyn, the which Goodwyn had maried the daughter of Canutus, gotten vpō his first wife Elgina: by whom many things were misordered, & specially by the subtilty of ꝑ Erle Goodwin.

Erle Goodwyn a subtill man.

¶ This Erle had many sonnes, as sayth Reynulph, in his 51 booke, and 11 Chap. By his first wife that was king Canutus sister, & not his daughter, he had one sonne: The which with the stroke of a horse was throwne into the Ryuer of Thamys and drowned: and the mother was smitten with a blast of lightning, and so dyed. Of whome it is there remembred that she was so vngracious, and of so vile conditions, that she set yong women to whoredome, for to gather by that vnlawfull meane riches. After which wife so dead, he maryed the seconde, of whome he receyued fiue sonnes, that is to say, Swanus, Harold, Tostitus, Wilnotus, Sirthe, & Leofricus, & a daughter named Goditha, which after was maryed vnto Edward the Confessor.

A plague among Erle Goodwyns wyfe and children.

¶ The two sonnes of Egelredus, that is to say, Alphredus, and Edward, which as ye before haue heard were sent into Normandie by Emma their mother came in the time of the reigne of this king into England to visite and see their mother, and brought with them a great number of Normans. Then this Goodwyn imagined in his minde, howe he might preferre his daughter Godith to one of these brethren, and thought with himselfe that the eldest would disdaine that mariage, and therefore he thought to ioyne her to the

ponger, and to make him king, and her Queene, and to that purpoſe he compaſſed the death of the elder.

A trapterly practice of Goodwyn

¶ And firſt Goodwyn practiſed with the Lordes of England, and ſayd, it was a great ieopardie for the lande, to ſuffer ſo many ſtraungers to enter the land without licence, wherefore it were neceſſary that they were reſtrayned in tyme. By which meanes he gate auctoritie to order the matter in ſuch ſort as to him ſhould ſeeme beſt, and that of his awne power, becauſe he was of moſt might next vnto the king: Wherefore he went and met with the ſayd Normans, and ſlue of them the greateſt number. For vpon Guyld downe, he ſlue alway. ir. and ſaued the tenth. And yet becauſe he thought there was to many of them liuyng, he eftſoones tithed them againe, and ſlue euerye tenth knight of them, and that by moſt cruell death, as windyng theyr guttes out of their bodies (as ſayth Reynulph) and among other, put out the eyen of the elder brother Alphred, and ſent him to Ely, where he dyed in ſhort tyme after: But Edward was conueied ſome other way, and was brought to his mother. But ſhe fearing the treaſon of Goodwin, ſent him ſone ouer the Sea againe.

Normans cruelly murdered by Goodwyn.

Alphred had his eyen put out and was ſent to Ely, and there dyed.

¶ When Goodwyn was after accuſed for this cruell deede, he excuſed him ſelfe, and ſware depely that he was forced of the king ſo for to do.

¶ Then it foloweth, that this Hardikinitus beyng at a feaſt or mariage dinner at Lambeth beſyde London, mery and iocund, while he ſtood drinkyng he fell downe ſodeynly and dyed, or ware dumbe, and lay vntill the. viij. day after, not without ſuſpicion of poyſoning as ſome wryte, when he had reigned two yeres and was buried at wincheſter, leauing after him none iſſue.

The death of king Hardikinutus.

¶ Here endeth the line or offſpring of Swanus, and all the other Danes that ruled in England, ſo that after this king, the blood of the Danes was cleerely extinct and put out from all kingly dignitie within this Realme of England. And alſo the perſecution of them ceaſed cleerely after this kinges death, the which had continued to reken from their firſt landing in the tyme of Brithricus king of weſt Saxon, and the ix. yere of his reigne, by the terme of. C C. Lv. yeres.

LEdwarde the ſonne of Egeldred or Etheldred and of Emma his laſt wife, reigned ouer the realme of England next after the death of Hardikinitus: The which Edwarde, immediately after the death of his brother in lawe aforeſaide, was ſent for into Normandy, and pledges layde for him, that he without fraude ſhould be made king. And then he came with a fewe ſtraungers. But Marian the Scot ſayth that ſome of the Lordes had ſent for Edward the outlawe, ſonne of Edmond Ironſide for to be theyr king, but after the affirmance of the ſame Auctheur, when he knewe that Edward his nephew was in poſſeſſion of the land, he would meddle no further.

This Edward was Edward the confeſſor.

¶ Then this Edward by the great aduice of Goodwyn Erle of weſt Saxon, and Leofricus Erle of Cheſter, was choſen king at London, and of Edſius, or Cadſius Archebiſhop of Cantorbury, and Alfricus Archebiſhop of Yorke on Eaſter Monday folowing conſecrated at Wincheſter, and in proceſſe of tyme after, he wedded Goditha the daughter of the Erle Goodwyn, which he had by his wyfe Thira, ſiſter vnto Canutus the ſecond, that of Guydo is called Editha, the which he entreated in ſuch wiſe, that he put her not from his bed, nor yet had carnally with her to do. Whether it were for hate of her kinne, or for loue of Chaſtitie, the truth is not ſhewed: But all Wryters agree that he continued his life without the vſe of Women.

King Edward maried Goditha the daughter of Erle Goodwyn.

¶ This

Dane Gelt discharged.

¶ This king discharged Englishe men of the great Tribute called Dane gelt, the which before is often mencioned, so that after his time it was no more gathered. And also he subdued the Britons or Welshmen that made warres within the boundes of the lande or fronters: But soone after their Duke or leader called Griffin, or Griffith, with the ayde of the Irishe men entered the Ryuer of Seuerne, and tooke manye praies, and departed againe without fight.

Griffyn a rebellion in Wales.

Emma the mother of king Edward accused of incontinency with the Bishop of Winchester.

¶ In the tyme of the reigne of this Edward, Emma his mother was accused to be familier with Alwyn or Adwyne, Bishop of Winchester. Upon which accusation, by counsayle of Erle Goodwyn, he tooke from her many of her Jewelles, and caused her to be kept very streightly in the Abbey of Warwell, and the Bishop he committed to the examination and correction of the Clergie: notwithstanding, Polidore saith, they were both committed to ward in Winchester. But his mother more sorowyng the defamation of Alwyne the Bishop, than her awne estate, wrote vnto diuerse Bishoppes, & besought them of iustice, affirming that she was ready to abyde all lawfull and most sharpest tryall.

¶ Then dyuerse of the Bishoppes made labour to the king for her, and for the Bishop. But Robert then Archebishop of Cantorbury, beyng with their labour discontented, sayde vnto them in this maner. My brethren Bishoppes, sayde he, howe dare ye defende her, that is a wilde beast and not a woman? she hath defamed her awne sonne the king. Fabian, and called her lecherous Lemman the Bishop, Christ her God. Polydore.

A beastly Bishop.

¶ But be it so, that the woman would purge the Priest, who shall then purge the womā, that is accused to consent to the death of her sonne Alphred, and procured venome to the empoysonyng of her sonne Edward? But how so it be, that she be giltie or giltlesse, if she will go bare footed for her selfe ouer foure ploughe shares, and for the Bishop ouer fiue ploughe shares brennyng, and fire hote: then if she escape harmelesse, he shall be alloyed of thys chalenge, and she also.

A cruell penance.

¶ This was of her graunted, and the day of purgation assigned: At which day the king and a great part of his Lordes were present, but this Robert the Archbishop made default and was not there, were it for pitie or otherwise. This Robert was a Monke in an house in Normandy, and came ouer by the sending for of the king, and was first made Bishop of London, and after Archebishop of Cantorbury.

It is most lyke that he durst not be there for shame that he awarded such a tryall to a kings mother

¶ Then shee was blindfolde, and led vnto the place betweene two men, where the Irons lay glowyng hote, and passed the, ir. shares vnhurt. Then at the last she sayde, good Lord, when shall I come to the place of my purgation. When they vncouered her eyes, and shee sawe that she was past the paine, she kneeled downe and thanked God. Fabian.

A great miracle if it were true.

¶ Then the king repented him, and restored vnto her, and the Bishop also, that which he before had taken from them, and asked them forgeuenesse: But the Archebishop of Cantorbury fled into Normandy.

The Archebishop was glad he was gone.

¶ Polydore writeth that king Edward was offended with his mother, for other causes aswell as for that she was suspected of the incontinent liuyng with the sayd Bishop: For it was layde vnto her charge that she was maried vnto Canutus beyng both a straunger and an enemy vnto the Realme: And that she succoured not her children in the time of their exile and banishment, and lastly because there went a brute that she should imagine their deathes.

that

¶ It was not long after, that king Edward gathered a strong naue at Southampton, or to saye more truely at Sandwich, forsomuch as he was warned that Swanus king of Denmarke entended to make warre vpon him. But Reynulph sayth that he gathered this Naue to withstande Harold Harfagar, then king of Norway which entended to haue entered England. But he was letted by the aforesayde Swanus, that shortly after made warre vpon the sayde Harold and other.

¶ It is also reported of this king that being on a time in a certaine extasie of minde or high contemplation in the time of seruice, he fell sodenly into a great laughter, contrarie to his wonted and accustomed maner. And when the standers by meruayled thereat, and asked of him what was the matter that he so did: he answered how the Danes and Norwayes were about by common consent to haue inuaded England with a great Naue, and as they were in a readynesse to hoyse vp their sayles and to set forward, one brought forth a Bolle full of Mede or Methe to drinke vpon a bone voyage: and after that came Bolle after Bolle, so that after drinke came dronkennesse, and after that iangeling, and then strife, and at the last fighting: in the which many were slaine, and the rest returned to their awne home, so that they are now dispersed and gone from their purpose, and I trust (sayth he) that in my time forrein Nations and straungers will neuer inuade and disquiet thys Realme againe.

Dronkennes causeth madnes and mischefe.

¶ In the .x. yere of his reigne (as sayeth Reynulph) and in the Moneth of September, Eustace Erle of Bolopgne came a lande at Douer, which Erle had wedded king Edwards sister. And it so came to passe, that when this Erle was landed he conueyed himselfe in so secret maner from his company that none of them could tell what was become of him, and they thought he had bene slaine in the towne: And in this search made for him, the hurly burly was such that a Citizen of the towne of Douer was slaine. By meane whereof the people arose, and in the questioning of this mans death, they came at length vpon the Erles company, and slue .xx. of his men, and wounded many mo: then the Erle appered and tooke his mens parte: But in the ende he was fayne to withdrawe himselfe with a fewe persons, and roade vnto the king then being at Glouceſter, or as Polydore sayth, at Cauntorbury, and made vnto him a greeuous complaynt of the men of Douer.

How a folish act begat a great fray.

¶ But Mathew of Westmynster reporteth this storie otherwise, saying: About this time Eustachius Erle of Bolopgne, who had maried king Edwardes Sister named Goda, landed with his treyne at Douer, where hys Souldiours as they sought for lodging after a proude and vndiscret maner fortuned to kyll a Townes man. The which outrageous fact when another Burgesse of the same towne perceyued, he kylled him againe that had done the murther. By reason wherof the sayd Erle and his company were greatly moued, and in their rage slue much people both men and women, besides children and olde folkes that were troden to death with men and horses. But when the straungers saw that the Burgesses came still mo and mo, flockyng on euery syde to rescue their neighbours, they toke their heeles like cowards and .xviij. of them beyng slaine in the flight, the rest fled to Glouceſter where the king lay. Howbeit, Polydore ſayth that this conflict was at Cauntorbury and not at Douer: But nowe to returne to the matter. After this ryot, Erle Goodwyn, forasmuch as to him was committed the rule of Kent, was charged to ryde thether, and to take wreche vpon the inhabitantes of that towne. But he withſayde that commaundement, and counſayled the king to ſend for the Wardeynes of the Caſtle of Douer, and the Rulers of the Towne, for to aunſwere vnto ſuch matters as ſhould be layd againſt them, and if they were guiltye, to puniſh them, or elſe not.

Erle Goodwyn ſent by the king to take order with the men of Douer for the death of ſtraungers.

¶ This Counſaile of Goodwyn pleaſed nothing the king, nor ſuch as were about him, wherefore many mo Lordes were ſent for. Among the which Leofricus Erle of Cheſter, & Seward Erle of Northumberland were two.

¶ After which aſſembly of the Lordes Erle Goodwyn had ſuch monition of ſome of the counſayle, that he withdrewe himſelfe from the Court, and gathered to him ſtrength of knightes out of dyuerſe ſhires, as weſt Saxon, and Kent, and houed at Beuerſton vntill his ſonnes came vnto him with mo people. Sone after, came vnto him his eldeſt ſonne Swanus, and brought with him a faire companie, that he had arrered in Orenfordſhire, and Glouceſterſhire: And Harolde his other ſonne with a felowſhip that he had aſſembled in Eaſt Englande and Huntingdonſhire, ſo that of theſe people were made a great hoſte.

Goodwin accuſed for vnlawfull aſſemblies.

¶ Then Goodwyn was accuſed to the king for gathering of ſo great an hoſte: But he excuſed him and ſayde, it was done to withſtande the Welſhe men, the which prooued contrary. Then he was commaunded to ſend away the people, and to come himſelfe with a certeyne number vnto the Court: but that he refuſed.

¶ Then the king and his Counſayle beyng at London, Goodwyn and Harolde, was againe ſent for, and charged to come to the Court with. xii. perſonnes to attend on them, and no mo, and to render into the kings handes all knightes fees that he and Harold his ſonne had within England. To this by them was aunſwered, that they might not come to the counſayle of Treachors & guilefull men, and that alſo with ſo fewe men in number they might not without perill or ſhame paſſe by the Country.

A lewde aunſwere of a ſubiect.

¶ Nowe during this tyme, a part of Goodwynes knightes withdrewe them, and his power began to deminiſhe, and the king in this meane ſeaſon had gathered a ſtrong hoſt. Then Proclamations were made that Goodwyn ſhould come to the Court, as before is ſayde, or elſe to auoyde the lande within fiue dayes. Wherefore, Goodwyn conſidering the ieopardie that he was in, tooke with him three of his ſonnes, that is to ſay, Swanus, Toſty, and Gurth, or Biorno, and ſayled into Flaunders, where he was receyued of the Erle Bladwyn, whoſe daughter Swanus his ſonne had before maryed, named Judith. And Harold and Leofricus, two of his other ſonnes with a fewe ſhippes ſayled out of Briſtowe into Ireland. Fabian.

Goodwyn an obſtinate rebell.

Swanus, Toſty, and Gurth, ſ three ſonnes of Goodwyn fled & their father into Flaunders.

¶ Of this foreſayde variance betwene the king, Erle Goodwyn, and his ſonnes, I finde much diuerſitye among writers: For Mathewe of Weſtminſter ſomewhat diſſenting from my Authour, writeth hereof as followeth. Erle Goodwyn beyng greatly moued for the ſleiyng of his men at Douer, aſſembled a great power out of Kent, Suſſex, and the Weſt Sarons. And ſo did likewiſe his eldeſt ſonne Swanus out of his Seignory or honour, that is to

is to wete, out of Oxfordſhire, Glouceſterſhire, Herefordſhire, Sommerſetſhire, and Barkeſhire, as did his ſonne Harold alſo out of his honour of Eaſt England, Grantbridge, and Huntyngdon. When king Edward was informed hereof, he alſo aſſembled a great army, becauſe he would be in a redineſſe to fight with his enemies if neede were. Then came Goodwyn with hys army into Glouceſterſhire, and ſent his meſſengers vnto the king to require him to deliuer Euſtachius and his company vnto him, and if he refuſed ſo to do, then to ſhewe him that he would proclayme open warre againſt him. Vnto whome the king beyng now in a redineſſe and well furniſhed of all things neceſſary for warre, ſent aunſwere againe, that he would not ſende him Euſtachius, chargyng the ſayd Goodwyn further, forſomuch as he had rayſed an army againſt him, and without his leaue and licence diſturbed the peace of his Realme, perſonally to apere at the Court at a day apoynted, and there to make aunſwere to the ſayde iniury, and miſdemeanour before him and his Counſayle. But as Goodwyn durſt not fight againſt the king, becauſe hee thought himſelfe to weake, ſo likewiſe would he not make his perſonall aperance as he was required. Wherefore, the ſayd king by the decree and ſentence of his Counſayle, baniſhed him the Realme, with his fiue ſonnes: who ſhortly vpon his baniſhement, with his wife Gina, and Toſtius or Toſtio his ſonne, and his wife Judith, the daughter of Baldwyn Erle of Flaunders, and two other of his ſonnes, that is to ſay, Swanus, and Gurth, taking wyth them great ſtore of treaſure, tooke ſhipping, and ſayled ſtreight into Flaunders vnto the ſayde Erle. His other two ſonnes Harolde, and Leofwinus, went vnto Briſtowe, and from thence gate them into Irelande. After that the king put away Edith the Queene, onely of diſpleaſure conceyued agaynſt her father, and appoynted that ſhe ſhould be kept in ſafe cuſtody in the Abbey of Redwell by the Abbeſſe there, without any honourable entertaynement, hauyng one gentlewoman only to wayt vpon her. Hetherto Mathew. &c.

¶ When the king was aſſerteyned that the Erle Goodwyn with his fiue ſonnes was in this maner departed out of his land, he ſhortly after called a Parliament, and by the auctoritie of the ſame baniſhed Goodwyn and his three ſonnes that were gone with him. And that done the king put his awne wife which was the daughter of Goodwyn called Edithe, a Lady of ſingular vertue and learning, into the Abbey of Warwell with one mayden to be ſafely kept, and tooke from her ſuch Jewels as ſhe had, as ſayth Marian. And ſo Goodwyn and his ſaid ſonnes continued two yeres baniſhed. In the which ſeaſon he or his retinue tooke dyuerſe tymes prayes in the Marches of England and in the ende drew to him ſuch ſtrength, that he was purpoſed to haue entered the land with force, and to haue warred vpon the king. But by mediatours that fauoured Erle Goodwyn, a peace was made betwene the king and him, ſo that in the ende he was receyued to grace with his ſonnes, and his daughter the kinges wife reſtored to hir firſt and former honour. And for this peace to be continued for Goodwynes part was deliuered for pledges, a ſonne of his called Wilnotus, and a ſonne of Swanus, named Hacum, or as Polydore writeth, two ſonnes of Goodwyn, named Toſto, and Biorna. The which two pledges, king Edward ſent to William Duke of Normandy to be kept. And Algarus the ſonne of Leofricus Erle of Cheſter, to whome the king had geuen the Erledome of Harolde, & he ruled it diſcretly in the tyme of his absence, and at his retурne, delyuered it to him againe, gladly and without grudge.

Goodwyn outlawed by the auctoritie of parliament, and his three ſonnes.

Goodwyn & his people became pirates and theeues.

Goodwyn againe reſtored to fauour.

William Duke of Normandy came into England, to visite and see the king.

¶ During the tyme of this Banishment of Goodwyn, William Bastard, Duke of Normandy, came with a good company into this land, and was honourably receyued, to whome the king made great cheere.

Emma the kings mother dead.

¶ And after he had taryed here a certeyne of tyme to his contentation, and pleasure, he returned to his awne with great giftes and rewardes. And Emma the kinges mother dyed shortly after, and was buried at Wincheſter. And Swanus the eldest sonne of Goodwyn went to Jerusalem, and from thence toward Licia, and dyed by the way of colde that he had taken in going barefoote. Then the Normanes that had geuen to the king euill counsaile against Englishe men, were by Goodwyn and his friendes exiled. Among which, Robert Archebishop of Cantorbury that had spoken sore against them was one, of whome Fabian speaketh.

The Scots rebelled.

¶ In the .xiij. yere of this king, the Scottes rebelled against him. Wherfore Seward Erle of Northumberland by the kinges commaundement gathered a great host, and entered that land, and behaued him so manfully, that in the ende he subdued the Scottes, and chased the king out of his Country, so that after king Edward gaue that kingdome vnto Malcoline, sonne of the king of Cambris, or Cumberland, to be holden of him and his heyres kings, as chiefe Lordes of Scotland.

How king Edward gaue ỹ kingdom of Scotland to Malcolyne, to hold the same Realme of him and his heyres, as chiefe Lords of Scotland.

¶ Upon Easter Monday the sayd yere, Goodwyn sittyng at the kinges boorde, with other Lordes in the Castle of Windsore, or as some report, of Wincheſter, it happened one of the kings Cup bearers to stumble, and to recouer againe, so that he shed none of the drinke: whereat Goodwyn laughed and sayde, nowe that one brother, hath susteyned that other, whereby he meant, that the one foote or legge had stayed the other from falling. With which woordes, the king marked him and sayde. Right so my brother Alphred should haue holpen me, had not Goodwyn beene. The Erle then conceyued that the king suspected him of his brothers death, and sayde vnto the king in defending his vntruth: Sir, I perceyue well that it is tolde thee that I shoulde be the cause of thy brothers death. So mought I safely swalowe this morsell of bread that I heare holde in my hande, as I am giltlesse of the dede: But he had no soner spoken the word, and put the bread in his mouth, but he was choked. Then the king commaunded him to be drawen from the boord by the legges, & so was he conueied to Wincheſter, & there buried. Fab.

A wise reply of a king.

A notable plague and iust iudgemēt of God.

¶ Mathewe of Westminster sayth, that the king when he sawe him fall downe starke dead before him, spake vnto them that were present, saiyng: haue away this dogge and traytour, and burye him in some common highe way, for he is not worthy of Christian buriall. Then his sonnes that stoode by drewe him from the Table, and vnwares vnto the king, buried him in the olde Abbey of the same Citie.

¶ But Marian the Scot sayth, that as Erle Goodwyn sate at the kinges Table on Easter Monday, he was sodeynly taken with a Palsey, or some other sickneſſe, and dyed the thirde day after: and his Lordshippes were geuen vnto Harolde his eldest sonne then liuyng, and Haroldes Erledome was geuen to Algarus the sonne of Leofricus, which was the Erledome of Orforde after some writers.

¶ It

¶ It was not long after that king Edward sent vnto the fourth Henry then Emperour of Almaine, Aldredus Bishop of Worcester with other noble men, praiyng him that he would sende into England his Cosyn Edward the sonne of Edmond Ironside, for so much as he entended to make hym as Heyre. The which request was fulfilled, so that he came into England sone after, the which as ye haue heard before was named Edward the outlaw. But as sayth Guydo and other, the yere after he came into England, he dyed at London and was buried at Westmynster.

Edward the sonne of Edmond Ironside, returned into Englād, and shortly after dyed.

¶ The yere following king Edward through euill counsaile exiled without gilt Algarus the sonne of Leofricus, the which did associate himselfe with Griffyn king or Duke of Wales, and destroyed the Countrie of Herforde, and did much harme to the Towne, and set the Mynster on fyre, and slue.vij. Chanons therof. Then the king sent Harold against him, the which chased the Welshmen into their awne boundes, and recouered the sayde Towne by appointment, holden by the sayde Algarus, and trenched it about and amended all hurtes before done by the Welshmen, and lastly reconciled the sayde Algarus and his company vnto the kings grace.

Griffyn prince of Wales, rebelled.

Algarus was againe reconciled to the kings grace.

¶ About the. xv. yere of king Edward dyed the Noble Duke Seward, ruler of Northumberlande of a Flixe, of whome Guydo reherseth dyuers notable actes whiche I passe ouer. Of him it is read that when he sawe well he should dye, he caused his armour to be put vpon him, and so armed and sitting in a Chayre, sayde, thus it becommeth a knight or man of honour to dye, and not lying in his bed as another meane man, and so he dyed and was buried at Yorke, or as Reynulph writeth died at Yorke and was buried in the Abbey of Galmahan which he himselfe had founded. And his Erledom was after geuen to Tosty sonne of Goodwyn.

Seward ruler of Northumberland dyed with a valiant courage.

¶ In the. xvi. yere of this king dyed also the good Erle Leofricus Erle of Mertia and of Chester, & was buryed in the Abbay of Couentrie the which before he and his wyfe Godina had builded. This man purchased manye great priuileges for the towne of Couentrye & made it free from any maner of Tolle, except onely of Horsse. For the which also to haue free, the common fame telleth, that after long request made to the king by his wyfe named Godina, he graunted her to haue it thereof freed, if that she woulde ride naked thorow the Towne, which she did, by meane whereof, it was freed.

Couentrie made free.

¶ But Gaufride sayth that this gentle and good Lady did not onely for the freeing of the said Citie and satisfying of her husbands pleasure, graunt vnto her sayde Husband to ryde as afore sayde: But also called in secret maner (by such as she put speciall trust in) all those that then were Magistrates and rulers of the sayde Citie of Couentrie, and vttered vnto them what good will she bare vnto the sayde Citie, and how shee had moued the Erle her husband to make the same free, the which vpon such condition as is afore mencioned, the sayde Erle graunted vnto her, which the sayde Lady was well contented to doe, requiring of them for the reuerence of womanhed, that at that day and tyme that she should ride (which was made certaine vnto them) that streight commaundement should be geuen throughout all the City, that euerie person should shut in their houses and Wyndowes, and none so hardy to looke out into the streetes, nor remayue in the stretes, vpon a great paine, so that when the tyme came of her out ryding none sawe her, but her husbande and such as were present with him, and she and her Gentlewoman to wayte vpon her galoped thorough the Towne, where the people might here the treading of their horsse, but they saw her not, and so she returned to her husbande to the place from whence she came, her honestie saued, her purpose obteyned, her wisedome much commended, and her husbands imagination vtterly disapointed. And shortly after her returne, when shee had arayed and apparelled her selfe in most comely and seemely maner, then shee shewed her selfe openly to the people of the Citie of Couentrie, to the great ioy and maruellous reioysing of all the Citizens and inhabitants of the same, who by her had receyued so great a benefite.

¶ Then Algarus his sonne was Erle after him. But Mathew of Westmynster wryteth that his wyfe Godina obteyned the sayde liberties of the Erle her husbande then Lorde of the sayde Towne.

¶ Harold the eldest sonne of Goodwyn was now in great authoritie, and ruled much of the kings armie. The yere folowing Algarus was accused by malice, and was banished the lande. Wherefore he fled againe to Griffyn Duke of Wales as he before had done, of whome he was ioyously receyued and mainteyned. The king being thereof informed, sent Harold into Wales to make warre vpon Griffyn, the which quit him in so knightly wise, that he chased the Welshmen, brent the sayde Griffyns palace at a place called Rutlane, and destroyed his nauie, and then returned into England about mydlent. But about the Rogation dayes the sayde Harold and his brother Tosty were sent thether againe with a strong armie: at which season they destroyed a great part of Wales, and in conclusion brought the Welshmen vnto due subiection, and forced them to geue pledges for the continuance of the same. And that done pursued so sore vpon Griffyn by the commaundement of the king, that in the ende, his owne people for to purchase their owne lyues slue him, and sent his head vnto Harold in the Moneth of August: so that after the death of this Griffyn, by the commaundement of the king, the Countrie of Wales was committed to the guyding of the two brethren of Griffyn, the which fauoured more the kings partie in the time of warre, than they did their brothers. And this warre in Wales thus brought to an ende, Harold by his pollecie reconciled againe Algarus Erle of Mertia to ỹ kings grace, so that he continued in his fauour during his lyfe after.

Algarus againe accused and banished the realme.

Griffyn prince of Wales slaine.

Algarus once againe reconciled to the kinges fauour.

¶ In the .xx. yere of the reigne of the king: Harold sayled toward Normandy to visite his brother Wilnotus and Hacun his Nephew, the which as ye before haue heard, were layd there for pledges for the peace to be holden vpon Erle Goodwynes side against the king. But he in his course of sayling was wether driuen by tempest into the Countrie or Prouynce of Pountith, where he was taken as a prisoner of the Duke there, and sent vnto Duke Wylliam of Normandy: The which forced hym to sweare that he in tyme folowing should mary his daughter, and that after the death of king Edward, he should keepe the lande of England to his behoofe, according to the will and minde of king Edward as some writers affirme. And it is further written that Harold to be in the more fauour of Duke Wylliam, shewed him that king Edward had in the presence of his Barony of England, admitted the sayde Wylliam for his heyre, and couenaunted with him, that if he ouer lyued the king, he would in safe wise keepe the lande to his vse. For the which which tydings and promiſe, the ſayde Wylliam graunted him his daughter to wife, which then was vnder lawful yeres of mariage with a great dower.

¶ And for to cauſe Harold to be the more conſtant in his promes, he deliuered to him Hacun his Nephewe and ſonne of his brother Swanus, the which he much deſyred, and kept ſtill Wilnotus the brother of the ſayde Harolde. After which couenaunts, ſufficiently ſtabliſhed and enacted: Harold departed from Duke William with great and riche giftes, and ſhortly after landed in England. And at his comming to the kinges preſence, he ſhewed to him all that he had done in the aforeſayd matters, wherwith the king was well contented, as affirmeth Fabian mine aucthour.

¶ Mathew of Weſtminſter reporteth the matter thus. Toſtius Erle of Northumberland, tooke his brother Harold by the heare as he was bringyng a Cup of wine vnto the king, and pulled him downe vnto the ground, all that ſtood by and behelde it merueylyng thereat. Then Harold againe deſirous to be reuenged vpon him for that vilanye, tooke him in his armes, and ſloong him on the pauement: But by and by the kinges Garde ranne betwixt them, and parted them. After the which altercation, Toſtius departed the Court in a great rage, and comming to the Citie of Herford, where Harolde had prepared a great feaſt againſt the kinges commyng, ſlue all his brothers ſeruauntes that he found there, and mangled and cut them in peeces, and into euery veſſell of Wine, Meethe, Ale, or any other kinde of drinke elſe, hee caſt eyther a legge, an arme, or ſome other peece of the bodyes ſo mangled, ſendyng the king woorde withall, that whenſoeuer he came to his brothers houſe, he ſhould be ſure to finde powdred fleſhe ynoughe to ſerue him, but if he would haue delicates, he muſt then be faine to prouide them himſelfe. The which mocke of his when the king heard thereof, he commaunded him for his ſayde deteſtable fact and lewdeneſſe to be baniſhed the Realme. But as Polidore writeth, he was offended with him, and ſayd vnto him as foloweth: Tolde I not thee before that this miſchiefe and inconuenience would enſue hereof vnto this Realme by thy meanes, if thou wenteſt to William of Normandy: But God eyther turne this harde deſteny from vs, or elſe if it muſt needes come to paſſe, graunt that it chaunce not in our dayes.

¶ This cruell deede ſprang wide, ſo that for it he was hated of all men, in ſomuch that his awne Tenantes, the men of Northumberland, of which prouince he then was Lorde of, aroſe againſt him, and in the ende chaſed him into Flaunders, with a fewe perſonnes then awayting vpon him.

¶ But the verteous king Edward not beyng contented with the commons doyng, conſideryng it to be done without his aduice or commaundement, ſent thether Harolde to do correction vpon the heades or Captaynes of the Northumbers: Wherof they beyng aſſerteyned, continued their ſtrength and met with Harolde, and his people, and made them to vnderſtand that they were freely borne, and freely norriſhed, and that they might not ſuffer the cruelneſſe of any Dukes. A ſtout ſpeech of ſubiectes.

¶ When Harolde had receyued this meſſage, and had well regarded the ſtrength of the Northumbers, he perceyued that without great effuſion of blood, he could not correct the miſdoers: Wherefore it ſeemed to him better to fauour the Country, then to take heede of the ſinguler profite of his brother, ſo that he returned to the king with this aunſwere, and purchaſed their pardon pardon of him, and also so laboured the king, that he assigned them another Duke or Erle that was named Malcharus. And Tostius his brother with his wife and children remayned in Flaunders during the kinges life.

The commō lawes of this Realme.

¶ This king also purged the olde and corrupt lawes, and picked out of them a certain, which were most profitable for the commons, and those were called the common lawes of this Realme, for the institution whereof, there happened many commocions and much trouble.

¶ And nowe for an ende of this story, this king dyed the fourth day of January, when he had reigned.xviij. yeres.viij. Monethes, and odde dayes, and was buried at Westminster, and left after him no childe, for he was accompted for a virgine when he dyed.

¶ It is written of him also that he was wont by touch of hand, to heale such as were diseased of the kinges euill, & that of him other kinges and princes of this Realme haue as it were by inheritance receyued the gift of healing that disease, by touch of hand and certeyne prayers, and ceremonies vsed withall, like as they receyued also the custome to halowe and consecrate Rynges on Good Friday, which were reputed good and auaylable against the Crampe.

HArolde the second sonne of Erle Goodwyn, and last king of Saxons. This man forgettyng his promes before made to William Duke of Normandy, tooke vpon him as king, and was crowned of Aldredus then Bishop of Yorke, or as some wryte, set the crowne on his awne heade without any consecration or ceremonies. Albeit, as Guydo affirmeth, some of the Lordes entended to haue made Edgar Adeling king, which Edgar as affirmeth the sayde aucthours, was sonne to Edwarde that was the sonne of Edmond Ironsyde, and named of some Edward the outlawe. But because this Edward was yong, and chiefly considering the strength and riches of Harolde, therefore Harolde obteyned the Crown. Howebeit Marian sayth, that king Edward before his death, ordeyned that Harolde shoulde be king after him.

¶ Soone after the king was crowned, he began to reuoke euill lawes, and customes, and established good lawes.

¶ In short tyme after that Harolde was made king, Tostie his brother which as aforesayde was chased into Flaunders, made him a Nauye of.lx. small sayles of Shippes, or as Mathew of Westminster saith, of.xl. and sayled about the Isle of Wight, and tooke prayes within the sayde Isle, and in diuerse places of Kent. And from thence he sayled into Lynsey, and did there much harme both with fire and sworde. But sone after he was chased thence by Edwyn, and Malcarus, Erles of Martia and Northumberlande: And then he sayled into Scotland, and finding little comfort there, he went from thence into Norway to desyre ayde of king Harolde, who there reigned at that tyme.

Tostius rowed about the Realme, and did much hurt.

¶ When

¶ When Toſtius was thus with his robbers chaſed, then Harold Harfagar king of Norway moued therevnto by Toſto, with a great Nauie of thre hundreth ſhippes and mo, entered the mouth of the riuer of Tyne.

¶ When Harolde of England had knowledge of this great Nauie of the Norwayes, he ſent vnto the aforenamed Erles of Mertia, and Northumberland, commaunding them to withſtand their landing, while he gathered his ſtrength. Then the aforeſayde Erles ſped them toward the Norwayes, and gaue vnto them a ſharpe and a ſtrong fight, but in the ende the Engliſhe men were put to the worſe, and were faine to geue backe, ſo that the enemies entered further into the land. The king heering of the diſcomfiture of hys people, made the more haſt towarde his enemies, ſo that within fiue dayes after he came to Semyſford Bridge. Semiſford Bridge.

¶ In this foreſayde place both hoſtes ioyned and fought a moſt ſharpe and cruell battaile, wherein was ouerthrowne manye a luſtie knight vpon the Engliſhe partie, but many mo vpon the Norwayes, ſo that in the ende Harold their king was ſlaine, and that of the hande of Harold king of England, as ſaith Guydo, and Toſtius was alſo ſlaine in the ſame fight. Olanus brother to the ſayde Harold Harfager, with Paulus Duke of the Iſles or Orkeies were there taken priſoners. The which ꝑ king cauſed to be ſworne vnto him that they ſhould keepe all ſuch promiſes as they there to him made, and tooke good pledges for the ſame, and after ſuffred them to returne from whence they came. Fabian.

Olanus the brother of Harold Harfager & Paulus ꝑ duke of ꝑ Iſles, taken priſoner.

¶ It is alſo ſpecially remembred of the ſayde Authour that one Knight ſtood vpon the aforeſayde Bridge, and with his Axe defended the paſſage, Maugre the whole hoſt of the Engliſhmen, and ſlue.xl. Engliſhmen or mo with his Axe, and might not be ouercome vntill an Engliſhman went vnder the Bridge with a Boate or Wherry and ſticked him vpward with his ſpeare through an hole of the Bridge. A valiaunt Knight.

¶ For this victory, Harold was highly enflamed with pride and alſo with couetouſneſſe, ſo that he deuyded not the prayes of his enimies among hys knightes, but he kept them to himſelfe, or gaue parte vnto ſuch knightes as he fauoured, and ſpared it from them that had well deſerued, by reaſon whereof he loſt the fauour of many of his Souldiours. Harold inflamed with pride and couetouſneſſe.

¶ In this time the daughter of Duke Wylliam, the which Harold ſhould haue maried, died within age, but not before Harold (ſayth Polydore) was king, wherefore Harold thought himſelfe the more diſcharged of his promes before made to her father. But William warned Harold of couenants broken, and mired threates with prayers and peticions. Wherevnto Harold anſwered, that a nice fooliſhe couenant ought not to be holden, namelye the beheſt of other mennes right and kingdome, without the whole aſſent of the Senatours of the ſame lande. And furthermore, a lewde othe might and ought to be broken, and ſpecially when it is compelled to be ſworne for neede or for dreede. Harold excuſes to William duke of Normandy.

Upon theſe anſweres receyued by Duke William from king Harold, in the meane while that meſſengers went and came, Duke William gathered his knightes, and prepared his nauie, and all other thinges neceſſary vnto the warre, and had the aſſent of the Lordes of his lande to ayde and aſſiſt him in his iourney. The like preparation alſo (ſayth Polidore) was made by William duke of Normandy maketh his prouiſion to come into England.

Harold

Harold to defende the realme from the inuasion of the Normans.

Alexander Bishop of Rome sendeth vnto William duke of Normandy a Banner to carry with him in his Ship against England.

¶ And moreouer he so informed the Bishop of Rome then named Alexander the second, that he confirmed him in taking of that voyage, and sent vnto him a Banner, the which he willed him to beare in the Ship that he himselfe should sayle in. And so hauing all thinges in a redinesse, he sped him to the sea syde, and tooke shipping in the Hauen of Saint Valery, where he taryed a long tyme before he could haue a meete and conuenient winde: for the which the Souldiours murmured and grudged, and sayd it was a madnesse and greatly displeasing vnto God, to desyre a nother mannes kingdome by strength, & namely when God withstandeth it by the working of his Elemẽt.

¶ At the last the wind came about, and he tooke shipping, and helde his course towarde England vpon this ground and title folowing.

The ground & chiefe cause of William duke of Normandies chalenge of the Realme of England.

1 The first and principall was to chalenge his right, and to haue the dominion of the land that to him was geuen of king Edward his nephew.

2 The seconde was to be reuenged of the death and cruell murther of his Nephew Alphred, and brother of king Edward, which he ascribed wholy vnto king Harolde.

A reuẽgemẽt for the banishing of Robert Archbishop of Cantorbury.

3 The thirde was, for to be reuenged on the wrong that was done vnto Robert, that was Archebishop of Cauntorbury, which as he was enformed was exiled by the meanes and labour of Harolde in the tyme of king Edward, as is afore sayde

The landing of William duke of Normandy.

¶ Duke William keping his course, at the last landed in Sussex, at a place called Peuenesley nere vnto Hastings. And in his going out of his ship, & taking the land, his one foote slipped, & the other stack fast in the sand: the which one of his knightes sawe, & beyng nere vnto him, sayd: now Sir Duke thou holdest Englande, and thou shalt soone be turned from a Duke to a King.

A good policy.

¶ The Duke entering further into the lande, made his proclamations that no man should take any prayes, or do any force to the people: for he sayd that it was reasonable that he should spare that thing that should be his awn.

Harold was now in the North parts

¶ At this time Harold was king in the North partes of England, and had knowledge of the landing of the Normanes, & he made all the haste towards them that he might, and gathered his strength out of the Countries as he came. But the Duke passed still forward, and at the last came to Kingstone, where he and his armie passed ouer the Thamys, and made such good speede that he came to London before the king, where he was holden out vntill he had put in good pledges, that he and his people should passe through the Citie without taryng, the which he did, and so went through the Citie, and passed ouer London Bridge, and so returned againe into Sussex.

An vnskilful messenger.

¶ King Harold entending to know the strength of his enemies sent spies into the Dukes hoste, the which made report vnto the king, that all Duke Williams Souldiours were priestes: For they had their vpper lippes and cheekes shauen, and the Englishmen at those dayes vsed the heare of their vpper lippes shad and not shauen. But Harold vnto that answered and sayde, they be no priestes, but are stoute and valyaunt knights.

Good counsail is not alwayes regarded.

¶ Then Gurth, or rather Biorno, one of the yongest brethren of Harold, counsayled him that he should stand a parte, and suffer him with other of his Lordes to fight with the Normanes, forsomuch as he was sworne vnto the Duke, and they were not, saiyng moreouer, that if they were slaine or ouerthrowne, throwne, that yet he might defende his quarell, and fight for his Country.

Three offers made vnto king Harold by William duke of Normandy.

¶ In this meane time, Duke Wylliam ſent a Monke vnto king Harold and made him three offers. The firſt that according to his othe he ſhould render the land, or delyuer it vp vnto him as his awne proper poſſeſſion, and that done, to take it againe of him, and to hold it of him as in Fee, and ſo to reigne vnder him for terme of his lyfe, and after hys death to returne it to hym againe, or to ſuch a one of his ſonnes as he would aſſigne it vnto.

¶ Secondly, to leaue the kingdome without any more ſtrife.

¶ Or thirdly in exchewing of the ſhedding of chriſtian mens bloud, that he would defend his quarrell in his awne perſon againſt the Duke, and they two onely to trie the matter by dent of ſworde.

¶ But Harold refuſed theſe offers, and ſayde he would trie his quarrell by dent of ſwordes, and not by one ſworde, and that he and his knights and Souldiours would defende their Countrie againſt all ſtraunge Nations, praying God to iudge the right betweene them twaine.

Good counſayle if it were true.

¶ When Duke Wylliam had receyued this aunſwere from Harold, and ſaw well that there was no meane, but to abide fortune in battaile, he charged his people that might watch, to occupie themſelues in prayer, and ſpecially the Prieſtes and the religious people, where the Engliſhmen gaue themſelues to drinking and ſurfeyting. Fabian.

Battail Abbey in Suſſex.

¶ Then vpon the morrow being Saturday, and the. xiiij. daye of October, both hoſtes aſſayled other in the place where ſtood the Abbay of Battaile in Suſſex. In the beginning of this battaile a Norman called Thilfer ſplayed a Banner before the hoſte of the Normans and ſlue an Engliſhman that came againſt him, and after that another, and ſo the thirde, and at the laſte was ſlaine himſelfe.

Thilfer.

¶ Then the Holberds ſmote together with a great ſhowt and cry, and they fought ſore a long ſeaſon. And the Engliſhmen defended themſelues manfully, and the better for that they kept them whole & cloſe together without ſcattering or ſpreding abrode. The which when Wylliam perceyued, he gaue a ſigne vnto his knightes, that they ſhould geue back, and made a countenance as though they did flie. Then the Normans enbatteled their footemen, & ſet Horſemen for winges on euerie ſide. By the which, while the Engliſhmen were diſſeuered, and ſoone out of array, the Normans turned againe vpon the Engliſhmen, and ſlue them downe on euerie ſide.

¶ This battaile was ſore foughten of the Engliſhmen, ſo that Duke Wylliam was thrise felled that day, by reaſon that three horſes were ſlaine vnder him. Laſtly, Harold was wounded in the eye with an arrowe, and fell to the ground and was ſlaine, and his people ſcattered, ſo that well was he that might ſaue him ſelfe by fliyng. Then Duke William buryed his men that there were ſlaine, and ſuffered his enemyes to do the ſame.

King Harold ſlaine and William the Conquerour had the victory.

¶ When the death of Harold was knowne to the Erles of Mertia and of Northūberland, the which for ſtreightneſſe of way could not bring their people to that field, or elſe for that they wilfully withdrew themſelues from Harold, becauſe he did none otherwiſe depart the prayes amongſt them & their knightes at the former field of the Norwayes: then they drewe the next way to London, and tooke Agatha Haroldes wyfe, and ſent her to Cheſter. And they they and Aldredus Bishop of Yorke with the Londoners, were agreed and promised eyther to other that they would make Edgar Atheling king, and defend his right to the vttermost of their powers. But that promes notwithstanding, when they heard of the great strength that dayly fell to duke William, and of his prouisions, they were faine to breake that apointment. And the sayde Erles submitted themselues, and gaue vnto him pledges, and became to him his liege men by homage and fealtie.

¶ And thus when Harold had ruled the lande, from the fift day of January to the.xiiij.day of October, he was slaine, when he had reigned nine Monethes and odde dayes, and was buryed at the Monasterie of Waltham, which he before had founded.

The ende of the gouernement of the Saxons.

¶ And here endeth the gouernement of the Saxons, the which continued from the first yere of the reigne of Hengest in the yere of our Lord.475. vnto this conquest, which was the space of.590.yeres.

NOwe for as much as it pleased almightie God to suffer this Duke to conquere so noble a land, and to be Lorde and souereigne ouer so many noble inheritours as then were, and nowe are within the same. I thinke it therefore conuenient to shew the dissent of the same Duke, and howe nere of blood he was vnto king Edward that last dyed.

The Pedegree of William Conquerour.

¶ Rollo who was first an Heathen, and after christened and named Robert, who maried Silla the daughter of Charles the Simple, sometime king of Fraunce, and had for her dower the Duchy of Normandy, which he ruled xiiij.yeres, and the sayde Robert had by Silla a sonne named William, the which afterward was called Longa Spata, that is to say, William with the long Sworde. This William was Duke after his father.xxv.yeres, and left after him a sonne named Richard, which was named Richard the Hardy, and was the thirde Duke, and reigned.lij. yeres and had by his wife a sonne named Richard the good, and Emma that was wyfe to Egeldred and mother to the last Edward the king. After him the good Richard was Duke, and reigned.xxviij.yeres, and left after him two sonnes, Richard, and Robert. The first sonne after two yeres, was slaine by treason of his brother Robert, so that Robert was then Duke, and reigned.ix. yeres: The which Robert was father vnto this Duke William, and begat him of his concubine, called Arlet. And this William was the seuenth Duke of Normandy, and ruled it before he conquered England.xxx.yeres. And thus it may apere that Emma was Aunte to Duke Robert, father of William Conquerour, and Emma was mother vnto king Edward, and so this duke William and king Edward of England were by the fathers syde cosyn Germaynes remooued.

A Summarie of the afore-ſaid Hyſtorie.

IN the former part of this Hyſtorye it may appere vnto you (that after the opinion of moſt writers) Brute did firſt inhabite this land, and called it then after his awne name Briteyn, in the. 2855. yere after the creation of the Worlde, and in the. 1108. yere before the birth of our ſauiour Chriſt. And the ſame land of Briteyn was conquered by C. Julius Ceſar, and made tributarye to the Romaynes in the fiftie yere before Chriſtes Incarnation, and it ſo continued. 483. yeres. And the Briteynes reigned without Tribute, and vnder Tribute, from Brute vntill the fourth yere of the reigne of king Cadwalader, which was in the yere of our Lorde. 686. And ſo the Briteynes had continuance of the Gouernement of this land the ſpace of 1794. yeres. And then was the kingdome of Briteyn deuided into ſeuen kingdomes. And Briteyn receyued the fayth of Chriſt in the ſeuenth yere of the reigne of king Lucy, which was in the. C. lxxvii. yere after the birth of Chriſt. And after the Britons, entered the Saxons in the third yere of Vortiger, and in the yere of our. Lord. 450. and they gouerned vntill the laſt yere of king Athelſtane, which was in the. 938. yere of Chriſt. And ſo the tyme of the Saxons firſt entraunce into this Realme, and the tyme of their Gouernement, was the ſpace of. 487. yeres. But yet in the time of the Gouernement of the Saxons, that is to ſay, in the. ix. yere of the reigne of king Ethelricus, which was in the yere of our Lord 787. The Danes entered into the Realme, and ſpoyled and perſecuted the people therein moſt grieuouſly: And at the laſt Sweno, or Swayn the Dane, obteyned the poſſeſſion and kingdome of this Realme, in the yere of our Lord. 1012. and he reigned thre yeres. And after him reigned Canutus his Sonne. xix. yeres. And after him Harold his ſonne thre yeres. And after him Hardikenitus the ſonne of Canutus, who reigned thre yeres, and was the laſt king of the Danes, for then the Danes were vtterly expulſed and dryuen out of the Realme, which was in the yere of our Lorde. 1042. And thus it may apere that the Danes reigned kinges of this Realme the ſpace of. xxviii. yeres. And it maye alſo apere, that from the time of the firſt entery of the Danes into this Realme, vnto their laſt expulſion, was. CC. lb. yeres. And finally, the Normanes entered this lande, and made a Conqueſt of this Realme, as before is expreſſed, in the yere of our Lord. 1067.

Which is ſithen vnto this preſent yere of our Lorde. 1568. the number of fiue hundreth yeres.

Briteyn firſt inhabited by Brute.

Conquered by the Romanes.

Briteynes receyued the faith of chriſt

Conquered and ouercom by the Saxons.

Conquered & ouercome by the Danes.

Conquered & quietly poſſeſſed by the Normanes.

To the Reader.

NOwe haue we paſſed the Hiſtorie of the Britons, Romaynes, Saxons and Danes that reigned ouer this noble Realme, in the which tyme by reaſon of the continual warres and manifold ſpoyles and conqueſtes, from time to time here practiſed, and long continued, the olde and auncient wryters of the ſaid Hyſtoryes, and all their worthy and learned monuments were in maner wholy deſtroyed & defaced, and therfore but by the helpe of Gildas, Gaufride, Bede and a fewe other, the remembraunce of the Gouernement, and of all the noble actes of this land had like to haue bene buried with vtter obliuion: But nowe, as we are come vnto the time of more reſt: ſo by Gods ſufferance ſhall follow a more large and ample hyſtory, praiyng moſt hartely the gentle Reader to beare with my rude ſtile and lacke of learnyng and knowledge, which if it were as great as my good will is, the ſame ſhould want no neceſsarye furniture: But he that performeth and freely offereth that which he hath, is (as you knowe) bound to no more: and thus much after this ſort, for this tyme with your fauour, may ſuffice.

The Hiſtorie of king William the Conquerour.

WILLIAM the Conquerour, Duke of Normandie, and baſtard ſonne of Robert the ſixt Duke of the ſame Dukedome, and nephew vnto Edward the Confeſſor late king of England as before is ſhewed, began his dominion ouer this Realme of England the .xv. day of October, in the yere of our Lord. M. lxvij. and was crowned king of the ſame at Weſtminſter vpon Chriſtmaſſe day next folowing of Aldredus Archebiſhop of Yorke: becauſe at that time Stigandus Archebiſhop of Cauntorbury, was then abſent, and durſt not come in the preſence of the king, vnto whome the king ought no great fauour, as hereafter ſhall apere.

William Conquerour crowned.

Some write that the ſayde Duke required the aforeſayde Stigand to conſecrate him, becauſe the office of conſecrating of kings had alwayes apperteyned vnto the Archebiſhops of Cauntorbury. But foraſmuch as he had aſpired vnto the crowne by violence and vnlawfull meanes, the ſayd Stigand would not be preſent at his coronation, nor in any wiſe aſſent therevnto. Some againe ſay that the Duke refuſed to be crowned of him, becauſe he was no lawfull Biſhop, inaſmuch as he receyued his Pall of Benet the tenth who was an vſurper of the Popedome, and not a lawfull Pope as they then tearmed him. And ſome againe make the cauſe of his reiection to be the corrupt life of the ſayde Stigand. Polidore writeth that immediatly vpon the ouerthrow of king Harold, duke William marched towards London, where Edwin Erle of middle England, and Marcarius or Marcatus Erle of Northumberland, earneſtly mindyng the conſeruation of their country, and to defende the libertie thereof, moued the nobilitie and commons to crowne Edgar Atheling, who onely was left aliue of the blood royall of the Realme. Vnto the which ſentence although many did accorde, yet there were ſome of diuerſe opinions concernyng this matter: But for all that, at the laſt they laid all their heades together and aduyſed them ſelues howe and which way they might honeſtly ſubmit them ſelues vnto the ſayde Duke. But afterwardes, when he was come to the Citie, they made an ende of conſultation, and euery man for feare ſubmitted himſelfe and receyued him as though they had bene right ioyous of his comming, deliuering him hoſtages, & prayeng him withall to receyue them to grace, and that they might be at peace with him: To whome the ſayde Duke aunſwered againe right curteouſly, making them many large and fayre promiſes, and that done, he was by them (although all were not like ioyfull at that ſolemnitie) crowned king vpon Chriſtmaſſe day as aforeſayde. But I finde written by one Thomas Thorpe Monke of Cauntorbury, among other things by him verie well noted and collected, of the beginning of the gouernance of william the Conquerour this ſtory folowyng.

wyng. After (sayth he) that the sayd Duke William had obteyned the victory, and had slaine king Harolde, and in like maner had taken the Citie of London, streight wayes he directed and bent his iourney towardes the Castell of Douer, to the entent he might conquere that also, with the other parts of Kent. The which beyng perfitely vnderstood: the Archebishop Stigand, and the Abbot Egelsyne, beyng then the chiefe potestates and gouernours of all Kent, vnderstanding all the kingdome and Realme to be in an euill case, and that where as before the commyng of the sayde William there were no slaues or bondmen, now that all, aswell noble as meane men were brought vnder the perpetuall seruyle yoke of the Normanes, by their neighbours daungers, taking an occasion first of their countries safegard & of their awne, gathered together at Cauntorbury the whole people and force of Kent, to whome they declared the daungers hangyng ouer theyr heades, the misery of their neighbors, the insolency of the Normanes, and the hardnesse of seruile condition: And the whole people rather desyryng to ende their hapelesse lyfe, then to beare the vnacustomed yoke of seruitude, with a cõmon consent decreed to meete Duke William, & to fight with him for their auncient lawes and libertyes. The aforenamed Stigand the Archebishop, and Egelsyne the Abbot, chosyng rather death in warre, then to see the miseries of theyr Nation, beyng hartened by the examples of the Machabees, were made Capitaynes of the Armie, and at the day apoynted, all the Kentishemen met at Swanescome, beyng hidden in the woodes, and wayted the comming of the aforesayd Duke William. And because sufficient wasinesse, and heed takyng in doubtfull cases doth no harme, they by their former talke were agreed among themselues, that when the Duke approched nere, all passages beyng shut vp, least any wayes he should escape, that euery seuerall person, aswell horsemen as footemen should carye a greene bough in his hand. The nert day after, the Duke comming into the fieldes and territories nere vnto Swanescome, and seeyng all the country ready set to hedge him in, and marking also a moueable wood with moderate pace drawing nere toward him, not without astonishment of his mynde, much marueyled at it. And assoone as the Captaynes of the Kentishemen espied Duke William enclosed in the middest of their armie, they caused their Trumpets to be sounded, and their Banners to be displayed, and threwe downe their Boughes, and with their Bowes beyng bent, and their swordes drawen, and with their speares and other kinde of Armour, beyng set in a readinesse, shewed themselues ready to fight it out. At the which sight Duke william with his adherentes & complices, not without cause were much amased. And he that a little before perswaded himselfe to haue helde all England in his fist, now doubted much of his awne lyfe. The Archebishop Stigand therefore, and the Abbot Egelsyne were incontinently sent foorth to Duke William on the part and behalfe of the Kentishmen, who did their message vnto him after this sort. Sir Duke beholde here the people and inhabitants of Kent commeth foorth to meete thee, and to receyue thee as their liege Lorde and gouernour, requiryng peace at thy handes vnder this condition, that all they and theyr posteritie may quietly and peaceably enioy their auncient libertyes, and that they may vse still their olde and accustomed lawes, otherwise they are nowe in a readinesse presentlye to bid thee battayle, beyng readyer here altogether to Stigand Archebishop of Cantorbury preserued the liberties of Kent.

A wise and very good policye.

Bolde and wise messengers.

leaue their lyues, then to depart from their auncient lawes and customes, or to submit themselues vnto slauish seruitude, which they haue not yet bene acquainted with. The Duke perceyuing himselfe to be entrapped, and in a streight, debating a while this matter with his wise Captaynes, noting also wisely that if he should sustayne a repulse or any hinderance at these peoples handes, which were accompted the key of England, that then all the bottom of threde which he a little before had sponne, were vntwisted, and that all his hope and securitie were turned into daunger, did not so willingly as wisely graunt all that which the Kentishmen demaunded of him, and sure pledges therevpon geuen from eyther parte to other. And then the ioyfull Kentishe men did conduct the gladded Normanes, and yelded to them the Countie of Kent and noble Castell of Douer, and so the auncient liberties of Englishe men, and their Countries, lawes, and customes, which before the comming of William Duke of Normandy, were equally held through the whole realm of England, now was onely in the Countie of Kent, and that by the industry of Stigand Archebishop, and Egelsyne the Abbot of the Monastery of S. Iustyns in Cauntorbury as aforesayd, and is vnto this day inuiolably obserued and kept, namely that tenure which at this day is called Gauell kynde. Thus farre William Thorne.

The names of the Gentlemen that came out of Normandy with William Duke of that prouynce when he conquered this noble Realme of England.

The which I haue taken out of an auncient record that I had of Mayster Clarencius King at armes.

Nowe when as king William had possessed the imperiall Crowne and Diademe of this Realme of England as aforesayde: He then as a conquerour altered and chaunged the whole state and gouernement thereof. And first by displasing of such as before had borne rule, he aduaunced the Lordes and people of his awne Nation vnto the highe and principall offices and dignities thereof, insomuch that Reynulph sayth, that there was skant left in England a Lorde that was an English man, and that then it was a shame to be called an English man. Polli. 7. Cap. 4. And after he caused a Proclamation to be made, that all former grauntes, liberties, and priuileges geuen or graunted by any Prince or king of this Realme aforetyme, should be from thence forth vtterly voyde to all constructions and purposes, except suche as should be renued and confirmed by him, by reason whereof, all degrees of people in the Realme, namely all fraternities, corporations, and bodies politique, were forced to become newe suters to him, and compelled to make newe fines at his will and pleasure: And by this meanes he gathered into his possession the greatest part of all the ryches and treasure of the lande, as well of the Clergie, as of the Laytie. That done, he chaunged the lawes of the Realme, and made such newe lawes as were profitable to himselfe, and grieuous to the people, and he caused those lawes to be set forth in the Norman language to aduaunce his awne tongue as a worthy and famous spech, and condemning ours as vile & barbarous: The which lawes are yet wyth vs in the same tongue.

King willi aduaunced his awne country men.

King willi gathered great treiure.

Lawes altered.

Whyle king William was thus occupied as aboue sayde, it so chaunced that the people of Normandie began to quarrell among them selues, and there was such parttakyng among them, that if it had not beene looked vnto in tyme, it had lyke to haue turned to the destruction and confusion of the whole Duchy. Wherefore king William for the pacifiyng therof was forced to gather an armie, and to leaue England for a while, and sayle into Normandie. And at his departure out of Englande, when he had set thinges in good order to his minde, he betooke the gouernement of the Realme to hys brother on the mothers syde named Odo, Bishop of Bayon, and in the Lent nert folowyng he sayled into Normandy, & led with him the chiefe Lordes & rulers of England, for feare they should haue made any commocion or sturre in the tyme of his absence, with all those also that lay for hostages and pledges. Among the which number, were the Erles Marcarus, or Norcatus, and Edwyn aforesayde, Dukes of Northumberland, and Mertia, and also Stigandus Archebishop of Cauntorbury, and Edgar Ethelyng. To the which Stigandus, king william shewed great reuerence and countenaunce of much loue, and hartie fauour, but all proued great dissimulation, as after appered appered by his depoſyng, and empriſoning at Wincheſter a long tyme. And beyng arriued in Normandy, he paſſed through the countrie triumphauntly, and like a conquerour. But Polidore ſayth that the cauſe of his goyng thether was, that for as much as he ſawe how that from thencefoorth he ſhould be altogether occupied about the affayres of this Realme, and ſettyng of orders in the ſame, he would firſt ſet ſuch a ſtay in his Duchy of Normandie, that nothing might lightly happen afterwardes, by reaſon whereof he ſhould be compelled to make his repayre thether againe.

The next yere when king William had ſped his buſineſſe in the ſayde Countrie, he returned into England with great pompe, and ſhortly after ſet a ſore tare vpon the Engliſhe men, yea, ſo grieuous was he vnto them, that he neuer ceaſed to burthen them with newe tares and impoſitions. Of the nobles he made ſo little accompt, that he ſeemed thereby howe he minded nothing elſe but their vtter deſtruction. By reaſon whereof in ſome partes of the land was there rebellion againſt him, namely in Deuonſhire, & in Northumberland, but at the laſt he compelled them by force to obedience, and delt very cruelly with them. Many both of the Nobilitie and Commons he depriued as well of goodes as of aucthoritie and rule, and conferred the ſame vnto the Normanes and that for very ſmall and light cauſes.

Taxes begat rebellion.

For theſe, and for other ſterne and cruell deedes done by hym, the ſayde Nobles were ſore moued againſt him. And for that cauſe many of them fled the lande, ſome into Norway, and ſome into Denmarke, and ſome into one Countrie, and ſome into another. Marcarus, or Marcatus, Erle of Northumberland, and Edwyn Erle of middle England, with Edgar Athelyng, and dyuerſe other, as Edgars mother, and his two ſiſters Margaret, and Chriſtian fled into Scotland. But another Chronicle (ſayth Fabian) wryteth that Edgar entending with Agatha his mother and his two ſiſters to haue ſayled into high Almayne or Hungary where he was borne, was by tempeſt of the Sea, dryuen into Scotland: where of Malcolyne or Malcolme then the thirde Scottiſhe king of that name, they were ioyouſly receyued. And in proceſſe of tyme, the ſayde Malcolyne caſt ſuch loue vnto the ſaid Margaret, that he tooke her to wife, as before is touched in the ſtory of Canutus. Of the which Margaret the ſayde Malcolyne receyued two daughters, and ſix ſonnes, whereof three, that is to ſay, Edgar, Alexander, and Dauid, were kinges of Scotland one after an other next after their father. And Wolde one of the ſayde daughters, was afterwardes maried vnto Henry the firſt of that name king of England, and the other daughter Mary was maryed to Euſtace Erle of Bolorgne. Of Wolde the firſt daughter, king Henry receyued two ſonnes, named William, and Richard, the which both dyed before their father, as after ſhall apere. And he receyued alſo two daughters named Wolde and Mary, which Wolde or Watwde was maried to Henry the fourth of that name, Emperour of Almaine. After whoſe death ſhe was againe maryed to Geoffrey Plantagenet Erle of Aungeow. Of whom diſcended Henry ſurnamed Shortmantell, afterwards king of England by the name of Henry the ſecond. And the other daughter Mary, was maryed to the Erle of Bloys, of whome diſcended Mawde, or Mary that was wife vnto king Stephen.

Edgar Athelyng & other fled into Scotland.

Wolde the daughter of the aforeſayd Margaret Queene of Scots was maryed to Henrie the firſt king of England of that name.

Nowe when king William had leuyed ſuche taſkes vpon the Engliſhe men men as is before sayde, and espied their grudging thereat, and also when he considered howe his Lordes were departed, he then had a neerer eye to the Lordes that remayned, and kept them a little strayter: But it was not long after, but that Marcarus was reconciled to the king, and yet after sayled and forsoke him againe. For this & other causes, king William highly aduaunced himselfe and his people with the possessions of this Realme, insomuch as they were greatly enriched, and the Englishe men in maner vtterly decayed. Then caused he foure Castels to be made, whereof two were set at Yorke, the thirde at Notingham, and the fourth at Lyncolne, and manned them all with Normanes, or as Polydore sayth one at Notingham, an other at Lyncolne, the thirde at Yorke, and the fourth at Hasting where he first landed. And this did he because that these foresayde places which were very commodius for the enemies, beyng thus manned and fortifyed might make all men afearde, & to beware how they went about to disturbe the state of the realme by any newe deuised treason. And to make the people more quiet, and lesse able to rebell, he caused all their weapons and armor to be taken from them, and ordeyned also that euery housekeper should be within his awne dores by eight of the clocke at night, and then to couer or rake vp his fyre, and go to bed. And because they should not passe that houre, he caused a Bell to be rong in euery towne and village iust at. viij. of the clocke, the which is vsed in most countries of England yet at this day, and is called in the Norman language, Couer le fue, which we now corruptly call Curfur.

King willia made foure Castles.

About the thirde yere of his reigne: Harolde, and Canutus sonnes of Swanus king of Denmarke, came and sayled into the North part of Humber with a strong nauie of two hundred sayle and more, and in all haste drew them towardes Yorke. Whether Edgar Athelyng came vnto them bringging with him such English men as had before fled into Scotland, by whom his power was encreased. Then the Normanes which had the rule of the towne and Castelles aforesayde, fearing that the Englishe men would ayde the Danes, and with the houses of the Suburbes of the towne, haue filled the towne ditches, set the Suburbes a fyre: Whereof the flame was so big, and with the winde so strong, that it tooke into the Citie, and brent a parte thereof with the Minster of Saint Peter. In tyme of which fyre the Danes by fauour of some of the Citizens entred the Citie. Eabian. and slue more than three thousande of the Normanes.

Swanus king of Denmarke with his Danes landed in the North.

But Polidore reporteth the matter touching this inuasion of the Danes farre otherwise as followeth: Whiles these thinges were done in England, the Englishe Lordes that were fled into Denmarke, ceased not to moue Canutus the fourth then king of that Countrie, to warre vpon the Normanes, and to inuent newe causes whereby they might the soner incense him thereunto, saiyng how the crowne of England ought of right to apperteyne vnto the kinges of Denmarke, as vnto them vnto whome the possession thereof had beene in tymes past no lesse profitable than honourable: and for that cause it should not stande with his honour, to suffer the same to be vniustlye possessed of a newe Lorde that had no right or iust title thereunto, specially sith the time selfe serued so well for the purpose, in the which the Norman was so farre as yet from benefiting eyther the Englishe Nation, or such as bordred on them, that he nowe played the open tyraunt, and was hated of them them all: And sayde further, that forsomuche as there was so great hope of victory and successe, specially if he would preuent his enemie, and take suche holdes and places as were very fit for his purpose, it behoued him not to stay or sleepe the matter. This done, Canutus beyng much moued with these and such lyke persuasions, determined with himselfe to make warre against the Normanes. And it foloweth in the same wryter: I am not ignorant howe it is reported in the Englishe Chronicle, that this warre against the Normanes was not made of Canutus, but of his brother Harold by his persuasion: The which thing Saxo Grammaticus a wryter of the Danish History doth not affirme, neyther is it likely to be true, because Harold was a quyet man of nature, and one that much desyred to eschew the trauayles of Martiall affayres and lyued not scarcely two yeres after he was made king, so that out of doubt it is, that he neuer durst be the auctheur of so great a warfare, neyther had he tyme or leysure therevnto. Hetherto Polidore. But to returne to the matter. It was not long after, but king William ouerthrewe them in battaile, and chased them to their shippes, and tooke so great displeasure with the inhabitants of that Prouince for reuolting to Canutus, that he destroyed the land lyng betweene Yorke and Durham in such wise, that.ix. yeres after it lay vnlaboured and vntilled, except the land of Saint Johns of Beuerley onely.

The Danes are chased to their shippes.

Yorke & the countrie rounde about vtterly destroyed.

And of the famyn that the people of that Countrie sustayned afterward, great wonders are reported: For it is written that they were for necessitie compelled to eate all kinde of Vermine, as Cattes, Rattes, Dogges, and such lyke, so harde and streit they were kept by the warre of the king. And in that yere also Holde, or Mawde the wife of king William was crowned Queene of England, of Aldredus Archbishop of Yorke, and was also deliuered of a fayre sonne named Henry, who was afterwardes king of England and called Henry the first of that name.

In the fourth yere of the reigne of this king, the Scottes with Malcolyne, or Malcolme their king entered Northumberland, and wasted and destroyd sore that Countrie, and slue therein much people, and many they toke prisoners, and helde them as bonde men.

After this, king William (whose greedy and couetous appetite and desyre of treasure beyng not yet quenched with the former great taskes or payments set vpon the people of this Realme) did by counsayle proceede further to enquire and search of all the Abbeyes in England, to vnderstand what ryches was in them, & after an Inuentary taken thereof, caused the same to be brought into his treasurie. And the same yere he caused the newe Forest to be made in the Countrey of Southamton, for the finishyng whereof he was enforced to pull downe diuerse townes and Churches. xxx. myles of length, and stored the same with wilde beastes, and then made sharpe lawes for the maintenance and encrease of them, as the losse of eyen, and other lymmes.

The building of the newe Forest.

And soone after there was a sinode or counsaile holden at Winchester of the Clergie of England. At the which counsayle were present two Cardinalles, sent from the second Alexander then Bishop of Rome. In this counsayle, Stigandus Archbishop of Cantorbury aforesayd, was depriued from his dignitie, and that for three causes, as Fabian sayth. First for that he had holden wrongfully that Bishoprike, while Robert the Archebishop was liuyng. The second, because he receyued the Pall of Benet the. x. Bysshop of Rome, who was compted an vsurper of the Papacie. The thirde, for that he occupied the sayde Pall, without the auctoritie of the Court of Rome. Polidore addeth a fourth cause, which was for that contrary vnto the Canons, he helde the Bishoprike of Winchester with the See of Cauntorbury.

Stigandus Archebishop of Cauntorbury.

And when Stigandus sawe himselfe brought into this thraldome, he then thought good to proue what the king who had before in the tyme of his prosperitie pretended so much frendship and good will towardes him, would do for him in this case. But where before he made him a louyng and friendly countenaunce, and did vnto him great reuerence, then he chaunged all his mildenesse into stoutnesse, and excused himselfe by the Bishop of Romes auctoritie, so that in the ende Stigandus was depriued of his dignitie, and afterwardes committed to perpetuall prison in Winchester, where he dyed shortly after his sayd deposition.

Dissimulation.

It was reported of this Stigandus, that he was so couetous and sparing, that he woulde spende nothing more than he needes must, and vsed to sweare by All halowes, that he had not one pennie to blesse himselfe withall: But that othe was not found true, for after his death, there was found a little key about his necke, by reason whereof there was founde great treasure vnder the earth in mo places than one, as sayth Fabian.

Bishoppes deprined.

In this counsayle also were put downe diuerse other Bishops, Abbots, and Priours, by the meanes of king William, and all to the entent that he might preferre Normanes to the rule of the Church, as he had preferred his knightes to the rule of the Temporaltie, and by that meane stand in the more suretie of his estate, and bring riches and treasure to his possession.

Wolstane bishop of Worcester.

In this counsayle also, Wolstane that then was Bishop of Worcester, was an earnest suter vnto the king for certeyne possessions fallen into hys handes by the death of Aldredus last Archbishop of Yorke, which were withholden from his See by the sayd Aldredus. But the king would not seme to vnderstand his sute, for hurting the Church of Yorke. Fabian.

And shortly after the king gaue that Archebishoprike vnto Thomas a Chanon of Bayon, who was the first that buylded the Mynster of Yorke, and sent for Lanfranke then Abbot of Cane, and gaue vnto him the Archbishoprike of Cauntorbury. This Lanfranke was an Italian borne, and a very good deuine, and right expert withall in the gouernement both of Spirituall and Temporall thinges. And soone after that he was made Archebishop of Cauntorbury, Thomas that before was chosen Archbishop of Yorke came vnto him to be sacred of him as the auncient vsage and custome was. Of whom Lanfranke required an othe, and required his profession in writyng concerning his obedience vnto the See of Cauntorbury. Thomas answered and sayde, that he would neuer do that, except he might therof here sufficient auctoritie and skilfull reasons, by the which it might apere that he should so do without any empechement or preiudice of his Church of Yorke.

Lanfranke.

Then the king callyng Lanfranke before him sayde, that the sayd Lanfranke trusted more in his cunning, than he did in good fayth or reason: But he aunswered so reasonably vnto the king, that in the ende, Thomas by the kinges commaundement was faine to come againe to Lanfranke to be sacred, and wrote his profession with his awne hand, of his obedience, and read it, in the which was conteyned, that he shoulde be obedient in all that belongeth to the worshipp of God and all Christian faith, which done he was sacred, and so departed. And shortly after Lanfranke required the like othe and profession of all the Bishops of England.

In the fift yere of this kinges reigne, Edwyn and Marcarus or Morcatus, Erles of Mertia and Northumberland, beyng in feare and daunger of their liues, voyded the kinges Court secretly, and rebelled for a little time: But at length it turned to both their harmes. For Edwyn was slaine as he went toward Scotland, or as some write in Scotland of his owne company, and Erle Marcarus, with the Bishop of Duresme named Egelwinus, tooke the Isle of Ely for their sauegard. But the king helde them so short, that in processe of tyme they were faine to yelde and submit themselues to the kings grace and mercie. Then he sent the Bishop to the Abbey of Abingdon, to be kept there as prisoner, where he was so daintily fed, that at the length he dyed for hunger. But some writers report, that he was so high hearted and loftie of courage, that after he knewe that he should remaine there as Prisoner, he would neuer eate meate more, and Erle Marcarus was had to the Tower of London. But Polidore sayth he scaped out of the Isle in a ship, and fled into Scotland, which was the cause why the king warred anon after vpon the Scots. For in the sixt yere of his reigne, he went with a great armie against them, and subdued Malcoline their king, and compelled him to do him both homage and fealtie. He also disherited Gospatrik Erle of Comberland, and exiled him the land, and gaue all Comberland with the honour of Carlisle to Raufe Meschynes, and made him Erle thereof. Also aboute this tyme, king William made the newe Forest in the Countie of Southhamton: And for the enlarging of the same, he ouerthrewe Townes and Churches a great number by the space of. xxx. myles, and replenished the same with Deere, and then made sharpe lawes for the encrease and maintenaunce thereof.

Marcarus & the bishop of Duresme fled to the Isle of Ely.

Egelwinus Bishop of Duresme starued with hunger.

The newe Forest.

1073 / 7

In the seuenth yere of king William, Thomas Archebishop of Yorke, not beyng content to be vnder the rule and obedience of Lanfranke Archebishop of Cauntorbury, appealed to the Court of Rome, so that the sayde two Archebishoppes apered both in proper person before Alexander Bishop of Rome. In whose presence Lanfranke, was so well fauoured, that where Thomas aboue named, and Remigius Bishop of Dorchester, were for iust causes depriued of their Croyses and Ringes, he by his fauour and meanes (as sayth Fabian) restored them to their former dignitie. The cause of Thomas his depriuation was, for that he had holpen Duke William towarde his iourney into England: for the which the said Duke promised him a Bishoprick if hee obtained victory. And the other was depriued for that he was proued a Priests sonne.

Lanfranke.

The primacye of Cauntorbury.

Then Thomas moued the cause of the Primacie of Cauntorburie, and of the subiection that to him should belong, and sayde that these two Sees were farre asonder, that is to say, Cauntorbury and Yorke, and that neyther of them by the constitution of Gregorie shoulde be subiect vnto another, but that the one is more worthie than the other, forsomuche as hee is of elder tyme. To this aunswered Lanfranke and sayde that the constitutions of Gregorie made no mention of Cantorbury, but of Yorke and London. Then the the Bishop of Rome remitted this matter to be determined before the king, and the Bishops of England, and he gaue the Pall to Lanfranke.

But because this worde or terme Pall is to many vnknowen, I will therefore here shew vnto you what thing it is. This Pall is an indowment that euery Archbishop must haue, and he is not in full aucthoritie of an Archbishop (by the Bishop of Romes ordinance) vntill he haue receiued the Pall, and it is a thing of white Sylke, the bredth of a Stole that the Priest was wont to weare at his masse, but it is of another fashion. And that ye may the better knowe it, if ye looke vpon the armes of any Archebishop, there ye shall see it set out in white with a great many of blacke crosses vpon it. What a Pall is.

Nowe when Lanfranke had thus finished his businesse at Rome, he with the other two Bishoppes returned into England, where this matter hangyng in variaunce betweene the sayde two Archebishoppes was had in communication. For triall whereof Bedes Histozy was brought foozth: wherein it appered, that from the first Augustines time, to Bedes last dayes, which was. C.xxxix.yeres, the Archbishop of Cauntozbury had the Primacie of all the Bishoppes in England. Fabian. 1074 / 8

When Thomas had heard all these allegations, he denyed all, and laid foz him the Epistle, in the which Gregozy Bishop of Rome demed that the Church of Yozke, and of London should be euen Peres, and neyther of them subiect to the other. The contention betweene the Archebishop of Cantozbury, and the Archbishop of Yozk, which of the should be chiefe.

To this was aunswered by Lanfranke, that he was not Bishop of London, noz this question was not moued foz the Church of London. But Thomas sayde that Gregozye had graunted to Augustyne power to haue vnder him all the Bishoppes of Englande, and that London at that day was the principall See of all England. Albeit that the Bishop of Romes minde was that betweene London and Yozke should be no diuersitie of honour, because they beyng Archebishoppes might lyue in an vnite to the good example of all other. And though Augustyne chaunged the See from London to Cauntozbury, yet Gregozy would not that Augustynes successoz should be aboue the Bishoppes of Yozke. For he woulde haue then set in his Epistle these wordes folowyng: I graunt to thee Augustyne and to thy successors: But foz that he would there should no such power stretch to his successours, therefoze he made no mention of them.

Lanfranke, to this aunswered and said: If that aucthozity were graunted to Augustine alone, and not to his successoz, it was a simple gift that the Bishop of Rome gaue to Augustine that was so familier with him, namely while Augustyne sacred no Bishop of Yozke while he lyued. For the See was full during his life, by reason whereof he put not his aucthozitie in execution. But priuileges of Bishoppes of Rome confirmeth this dignitie to Augustines successoz of Cauntozbury, and demeth that it is skill and good reason, that all the churches of England shoulde take light and knowledge at that place. 1075 / 9

By these reasons and other, Thomas was at length ouercome, and graunted gladly that the farther brinke of Humber should be the beginning of his Diocesse. And furthermoze it was there demed, that in all thinges concernyng the wozship of God and the fayth of holy Churche, the Archebishop of Yozke should be subiect to the Archebishop of Cauntozbury: So that if the The Archbishop of yozke iudged subiect to the Archebishop of Cãtozbury Archebiſhop of Cauntorbury would call a counſaile in any part of Eng land, the Archebiſhop of Yorke ſhoulde be thereat with all the Biſhoppes of his Prouince, and be alſo obedient vnto his lawfull heſtes. And at all ſeaſons when the Archebiſhop of Cauntorbury ſhould be ſacred, the Archebiſhop of Yorke with the Biſhops of his Prouince ſhould come to Cauntorbury and conſecrate him there. And if the Archbiſhop of Yorke ſhould be ſtalled or ſacred, then ſhall he come to Cauntorbury, or elſe where in Englande, where the Archebiſhop of Cauntorbury ſhall aſſigne him, and there to be ſacred of him, and he ſhall make to him an othe, with profeſſion of obedience.

Lanfrankes deuine glorp.

When Lanfranke heard this iudgement geuen, he reioyſed inwardly. And to the entent it ſhould remaine of recorde, that his ſucceſſors ſhould not neede to pleade that matter, he therefore cauſed it to be regeſtred in moſte ſubſtanciall wiſe. And beſides that ſent a Piſtle for that cauſe to Alexander the aforenamed Biſhop of Rome of all this doyng, with the profeſſion of Thomas the Archebiſhop aforeſayd. Of this Lantranke are by dyuerſe writers many notable thinges written, ſayth Fabian.

But at the laſt, when this Duke Walrefe had well vnderſtand the purpoſe that they went aboute, he went to Lanfranke and ſhewed him all the matter: By whoſe counſayle he ſhortly after ſayled vnto the king then beyng in Normandy, and diſcloſed the ſame vnto him, and put himſelfe wholy in his grace and mercy.

When the king had heard theſe tidyngs, he made good ſemblance vnto the Duke Walrefe, and ſped him the faſter into England: But howſoeuer it came to paſſe, the two ſayde Erles were warned of the diſcloſyng of thys matter, in ſuch wiſe as they gathered to them ſuch ſtrength that ỹ king could not haue them at his pleaſure, but as he was fayne by ſtrong hande to chace and outlawe them. And for that he fayled of his purpoſe of them, he impriſoned Duke Walrefe at Wincheſter, and laſtly cauſed him to be beheaded, more of tyranny than of iuſtice.

In the. xij. yere of his reigne was holden a great counſayle or Synode of the Clergie of the land in S. In the. xiij. yere of his reigne, after the death of Harman Biſhop of Sariſbury, ſucceeded Olmond, or Olſwald the kinges Chaunceloz, the which builded there a newe Church within the kinges Caſtell, and brought thether Clerkes that were garniſhed with vertue and cunning. And he himſelfe wrote and bounde bookes, that were ordeyned and made for the more deuout and ſolemne ſettyng out of the deuine ſeruice of the Church, as the ordinall and other, and it was then called Sariſbury vſe. And at this tyme the king king gaue the Erledom of Northumberland to Walter Bishop of Durham, who afterward was slaine by the men of Northumberland.

In the. xv. yere of his reigne, Robert the eldest sonne of king William the conquerour, because he might not haue the Duchy of Normandy, which his father had sometime assigned & geuen vnto him, and after for his wildenesse did resume it againe: He with the ayde and fauour of the French king Philip, & Lewes his sonne, toke prayes in that Duchy, and put his father to much trouble. In so much that at length the father & the sonne met in plaine fielde with two great hostes, and eyther with other fought a cruell Battail. 1081 15

Robert the eldest sonne of king William rebelled against his father.

It is read that during this battaile, king william was throwne from his horse, and in great ieopardie of his lyfe. Whereof his sonne Robert beyng ware, was so moued with pitie that he rescued his father, and deliuered him free from all the daunger of his enemies. But howe soeuer it fortuned with the king: The truth is, that many of his men were slaine, and his seconde sonne William Rufus sore hurt, so that in the ende king William was faine to refuse the fielde, and gat at that tyme none aduauntage of his sayde sonne. For the which dede and rebellion thus made by the sonne, the father accursed him after the opinion of some writers.

While king William was thus occupied in Normandy, the Northumbers rebelled, and slue in their rage Walter the Bishop of Durham, but the cause is not expressed, whose death Odo Bishop of Baion shortly after reuenged. After the aforesayde battaile in Normandy, king William returned into Englande, bringyng with him the sayde Robert his sonne, whome he incontinent vpon his returne sent with an armye against Malcolme king of Scottes, for that contrary to the league betwixt them, he had made in hys absence dyuerse roades into the borders of England. But when Robert vnderstood that the sayd Malcolme was retired into Scotland, he ceased to pursue him any further, and therefore retyred he vnto the water of Tyne, where he lay in campe a season, and there builded a forte, where as at thys day standeth newe Castell vpon Tyne: But the towne and wall was builded afterwardes by king John, who gaue many great priuileges and liberties vnto the same, which was before but a small fisher towne without walles named Pandon. 1082 16

New Castell vpon Tyne.

In the. xvij. yere of king William, there fell an vnhappy strife betwene Thurston Abbot of Glascenbury a Norman, and his Monkes, the cause whereof (in part sayth Fabian) was, that the Abbot despised and would haue set apart such song and offices as by Gregorie Bishop of Rome & Augustine his disciple, of olde tyme was to them assigned, and would haue compelled them to haue folowed the vse of William of Fescampe. And beside that, this Thurstone wasted and inordinatly spent the goodes of that place, in lechery, and by other insolent meanes, and withdrewe from the Monkes, their olde and accustomed diet. For the which causes, first began great wordes with chyding, and after strokes and fightes, so that the Abbot gate vnto him armed men, and fell vpon the monkes, and slue two of them at the high altare, and wounded. xviij. of them, and the Monkes with Formes and Candlesticks defended themselues in such wise, that they hurt many of ꝑ armed men. 1083 17

Thurstone Abbot of Glascenbury & his monks fought together.

After complaint was brought hereof before the king, by whose iudgement, Thurstone was againe returned into Cadonie, from whence he was brought, and the Monkes were spred abrode into dyuerse houses through England. But it is sayde that in the tyme of William Rufus, this Thurston obteyned the rule of the Abbey againe for the price of.D. pound.

In the.xix. yere of his reigne, king William rayſed a newe maner of Tare: For he cauſed to be gathered through England of euery hyde of land vj. ſhillinges. An hide of lande conteyneth fiue Yardes, and euery Yard conteyneth foure Acres, and ſo an hide of land conteyneth.xx. Acres, an Acre conteyneth.xl.perches of length, and foure in bredth, and foure Acres make a Yarde, and fiue Yardes make an Hide, and.viij. Hides make a knightes fee. By the which reaſon a knightes fee ſhould conteyne. C.lx. Acres, and that is accompted for a plough land for a yere.

A new tax.

An Hide of land.

A knightes fee in land.

And not long after he cauſed to be ſearched howe much lande eche of hys Barons helde, howe many knightes Fees, howe many townes, and what number of men and of beaſtes were within this land: whereof he commaunded a booke to be made, which alſo was done, and that afterward turned this land to ſundry griefes and plagues, as after ſhall apere.

A great and ſtrayght inquirie.

In the.xx. yere of his reigne, Canutus king of Denmarke, with the helpe of the Fleminges came with a great armie toward England: But by the prouiſion of the king, they were ſo feared, that they wer let of that iorney.

Canutus a Dane with ỹ helpe of the Flemings landed in England.

Then king William gaue to thre of his Chapleynes thre Biſhoprikes. To Monice he gaue London, to William he gaue Thetford, and to Robert he gaue Cheſter, which Robert was after remoued to Couentrie. Of this Robert repoꝛteth Reynulph that he ſcraped from one Beame of his Church in Couentrie fiue hundreth marke, to fill the hande of king William. For Leofricus that was Duke of Mertia in the time of Edward the Confeſſor, had adourned that Church, with great riches of Golde, Siluer & Jewelles.

Couentrie.

In this yere Edgar Atheling, which was reconciled to the kinges fauour, by lycence of the king, ſayled into Apulia.

Now began the afore ſayde plagues to ſpring: For great moreyne fell vpon brute beaſtes, and brenning Feuers among the people, and alſo great hunger and barenneſſe of the earth. Alſo in this yere great hurt was done in many places of the land by fyre, and ſpecially in the City of London, wherevpon the firſt day of July the Church of Saint Paule in London was brent, and all that was therein, as in a table hangyng on the North ſyde of the Quyere may apere. And it was in the tyme that Monice was Biſhop of London. And lykewyſe was brent a great part of the Citie of London at the ſame tyme.

Paules brent.

At this tyme king William beyng in Normandy prepared for warre againſt the French king: But ſhortly after he fell ſicke, and kept his Chamber at Roan a long tyme, wherefore Philip the French king beyng merely diſpoſed, ſayde that william lay in Childebed, and norriſhed his fat belly. The which wordes when they came to king Williams eares, he was much amoued therewith, and ſayd, when I am churched I wyll offer vnto him a thouſand Candelles light, with the which he ſhall holde himſelfe finally contented. The which promiſe, he after performed. For in the moneth of July folowing, when corne, fruite, & grapes were moſt flouriſhyng, he entered into Fraunce with a great armie, and ſet on fyre many Cities and townes on the weſt ſyde of Fraunce, and at the laſt came vnto the Citie of Meaux, and fyred it, and brent a great part thereof, with the Church of our Lady, wherein he brent a woman beyng closed in the wall of the sayde Church, as a recluse.

In this heate, or as some say by the leaping of a horse, king William tooke such a disease and sickenesse, that it was shortly after the cause of hys death. And when he felt himselfe thus grieued, he called his sonnes before him, and exhorted them in his best and most louyng maner, that they should charitably loue and fauour eyther other of them, and to holde together as louyng brethren, and so afterward made his testament and last will.

King willis had fiue children, & what came of them.

He had fiue children, Robert the eldest, to whome he gaue the Dukedome of Normandy, Richard, the second, who died in his youth, William Rufus the thirde, to whome he gaue the kingdome of England, and Henry the fourth that also succeded him in the same kingdome. And one daughter named Adela, who he gaue in mariage to Stephen Erle of Bloys or Bonony, who got on hir Stephen that after was king of England. But other write that king Henry the first maryed Wolde the daughter of Margaret Quene of Scottes, and by her had issue two daughters, named Wolde, and Mary. And Wolde was first maryed to Henry the Emperor, and after to Geoffrey Plantagenet, by whome she had issue king Henry the second. And Mary was maryed to Eustace Erle of Bloys, by whome she had issue king Stephen. So that king Henry the seconde came of the elder sister, and Stephen of the yonger sister. The which Wolde and Mary were the daughters of Margaret the wyfe of Malcolyne, or Malcolme king of Scottes, which was sister to Edgar Atheling, and of Edward the outlawe, which was the sonne of Edmond Ironsyde.

Charitie is most vsed in the extreeme pangues of death.

After that king William had aduertised his sonnes as aforesayd, and had made his last will and Testament, he then deliuered out of prison his awne brother the Bishop of Bayon, Marcarus Erle of Northumberland, Wilnotus the sonne of Harold, or as some do write he was the sonne of Goodwyn, which was sent to William by Edward the Confessor to remain for a pledge for his sayd father Goodwyn. And shortlye after these thinges with other were done, he dyed the .viij. day of September, when he had reigned king of England .xx. yeres, x. Monethes, and .xxviij. dayes, and in the .lij. yere of his Duchye, and the .lix. yere of his lyfe, or as Polidore wryteth .lxxiij. and in the yere of our Lorde. 1087.

The discription of king William the Conqueror.

¶ After his death, men spake of him as they do of other Princes, and said that he was wise and guileful, riche and couetous, and loued well to be magnified and praysed, a fayre speaker, and a deepe dissembler, a man of goodly stature, but something fatte in the belly, sterne in countenaunce, & strong in armes, and therewith courageous and bolde, and had greate pleasure in hunting and making of great feastes. But he passed all other in leuyng of Taskes, which condicion his subiectes construed three maner of wayes, and sayde, that eyther it was to excell all other in ryches, or else to withstand and defend his enmyes, or to staunche the appetyte of his couetous mynde. He builded two Abbeyes in England, one at Battill in Sussex, where he wan the fielde against Harolde, the which was called vntill the suppression thereof the Abbey of Battaile. And the other he set in Southwarke beside London, vpon the Southside of Thames, and named it Barmondsey. And he builded also one in Caen in Normandie where he was buried, and dedicated the same ſame vnto Saint Steuen.

And when all ceremonies apperteyning vnto the Funerall were finiſhed and done, and that he ſhould nowe be layd in his tombe, there ſodeinly ſtepped foorth one that reſiſted and woulde not ſuffer him to be buryed in that place, ſaiyng with a lowde voyce, how that the ground where they purpoſed to bury him, was percell of his auncient inheritance, which the Duke in his lyfe tyme had wrongfully taken from him perforce, and againſt his will for the buylding of that Abbey, and had neuer made him any recompence or amendes for the ſame, and therfore would not to die for it aſſent ne ſuffer that he ſhoulde there be buryed, oneleſſe he were firſt recompenced and agreed with accordingly, whereupon they were faine to ſee him recompenced before he could be enterred, ſo that maruell it was that ſo great and noble a conquerour as he was when he was aliue, could not after his death atteyne ſomuch ground as might receyue and couer his poore Carkas, without great adoo and buſineſſe.

The ſayde king had to Iſſue (ſayth Polidore) by Mawde his wife, Robert vnto whome he bequethed the Dukedome of Normandy: Richard, who dyed very yong: William Rufus, and Henry which were afterwardes kinges of England one after another. Of this Henry he propheryed before (as the fame went) that he ſhould rule both England and Normandy together after his brethren, vnto whome he gaue by teſtament a great part of his treaſure. He had alſo fiue daughters, that is to weete, Cicill which was made a Nonne, Conſtance whome Alley Duke of hether Briteyne maried, and Adela the wyfe of Stephen Erle of Bloys, mother to king Stephen, who reigned after the ſayde king Henry: The names of the other two are not remembred of writers, which dyed ere they were mariageable, one of the which as is before mencioned ſhould haue beene the wife of Harolde, if fortune had not beene againſt it.

It is alſo reported that when this king lay at the poynt of death, and ſhould now depart the world, he much repented him of the cruell handelyng of the Engliſh men, ſpecially becauſe he had bene by them ſo much encreaſed as well in honour as Empire.

And although this king helde Engliſhemen in great ſubiection, and as is afore ſayd ſuffered almoſt no Engliſhe man to gouerne or rule within the Realme: Yet it ſhould appere he ſomedeale fauoured the Citie of London, for at the ſpeciall ſute and requeſt of the right reuerend father in God William then Biſhop of London, the ſayde Conquerour in the firſt yere of his reigne graunted vnto the Citizens of London their firſt Charter and liberties, in as large forme as they enioyed the ſame in the tyme of Saint Edward the confeſſor that reigned before the Conqueſt. And the Citizens to ſhewe themſelues thankefull vnto the ſayde Biſhop for his great loue and fauour, did not onely accompt him as a deere and ſpeciall friend vnto them ſo long as he liued, but alſo after his death and buriall, beyng enterred in the middle Iſle of the weſt ende of Paules Church, they fixed on his graue ſtone this Epitaph folowyng.

William Rufus.

William Rufus, or William the Red, the thirde ſonne of William the Conquerour, began to reigne ouer this realme next after his father, the.ix. of September, in the yere of our Lorde. M. lxxxvij. Who beyng in Normandy at hys fathers death, departed thence before his funerall obſequy was finiſhed and done, and in all haſte addreſſed him into England, where he was ſooner arryued than he was looked for, and being come into the Realme, he by and by made Lanfranke then Archebiſhop of Cauntorbury (in whoſe friendſhip and faythfulneſſe he had repoſed no ſmall truſt and confidence) priuie to all his counſayle, prayng him withall to put to his helping hand, that he might be crowned king as ſhortly as might be, according to his fathers Will and Teſtament: The whiche was at the laſt brought to paſſe by the importune labour and ſute of the ſayde Lanfranke, who for his learning was highly eſteemed, aſwell with the Nobilitie as alſo of the Commons of the Realme, but yet not without much ado: For a great many bare better good will vnto his brother Robert than vnto him, becauſe he was of a more mylde and gentle nature, and beſyde that he was the elder brother, and therefore ought by lawe and conſcience to haue beene preferred: But yet the matter was ſo wrought by the wiſedome of Lanfranke, promiſyng all thinges in his name, that might by any meanes purchaſe him credite or fauour with the people, that all in maner aſſented vnto his coronation, and ſo was he by him the ſayde Lanfranke, with the aſſiſtance of diuerſe other Biſhoppes, whoſe names are all reherſed by Mathewe of Weſtminſter annoynted and crowned king at Weſtminſter, the firſt day of October, the yere of our Lord aboueſayd. 1087 1

Reynulph Monke of Cheſter that wrote Polichronicon ſayth, that Robert Curthoſe eldeſt ſonne of William the Conquerour, was at the tyme of hys fathers death in Almaine, gatheryng of a great hoſt againſt his father. And afterward heering that he was dead, and that he had preferred his yonger brother to the kingdome of England, was therefore greatly amoued, inſomuch that he layde halfe his Dukedome to pledge vnto his brother Henry to mainteyne warre againſt king William. The which thing done, he gathered a great army, and ſhortly after landed at Hamton.

Robert Curthoſe the brother of Rufus entered Englād wᵗ a great power.

When William Rufus had vnderſtanding thereof, he in all haſt ſent vnto him meſſengers, to whome he gaue in commiſſion to ſay as foloweth. Thy brother William prayeth thee to take no griefe with that he hath done, for he calleth himſelfe not king, but as vnder king to reigne vnder thee, and by helpe of thee that art greater than he, and his elder brother. And if thou conſider it well, he hath nothing miſuſed himſelfe againſt thee, for he hath taken vpon him the gouernement of this Realme for a tyme becauſe of thyne abſence. But for that he is now in authority and crowned by thy ſufferance, he he prayeth that vnder thee he maye so continue, paying to thee yerely three thousand Markes, with condicion ỳ who soeuer ouerliueth other, may enioy the kingdome. When Robert had heard this message vnto the ende, he wagged his head, as he that conceyued some doublenesse in this report. But for that he was liberall, and alowed more honour than he did his profite, as in other things folowing of his deedes it shall apere, therefore he lightly assented to all that was desired, and returned shortlye after into Normandy with pleasant wordes and many fayre promises without profite.

Robert Curthose was soone dispatched with faire wordes.

This yere in the beginning of Sommer, Odo Bishop of Bayon, which as before ye haue heard was deliuered out of Prison by William Conquerour, came into England, whom the king ioyfully receyued, and gaue vnto him shortly after the Erledome of Kent. But he tooke vpon him in processe of tyme to rule, in such wise as the king grudged at his doyng. And for this the king and his vncle fell at vnkindenesse, so that he withdrewe himselfe from the king, and alyed him with the bishop of Duresme, the Erles of Northumberland, Shrewesbury, and others. The which beyng confederate together, conspired against the king, and made his brother Robert Curthose against him, and wrought many thinges to his displeasure and hurt. And amongest all other damages by them done, Roger de Mount Gomorik, Erle of Shrewesbury, destroyed the Countrie and northwest parts of England to Worcester towne, by the ayde and helpe of the Welshemen: But in the ende, the Welshemen were so feeble and weake, that a fewe knightes discomfited a great armie of them.

The Lordes conspired against king William Rufus.

Rebellion.

When king William perceyued that almost all the Normanes tooke part against him, he then beyng forced by necessitie, drewe to him the Englishe men, and fauoured them by giftes and easy lawes: So that by theyr strength he did in the ende reconcile the Erle of Shrewesbury, and chased some other of his enemies, and shortly after occupyed the strong Castelles and holdes in Kent, belongyng to Bishop Odo his forsayd vncle, and in the ende compelled him to yelde himselfe and to forsweare England. And that done he besieged Rochester, wherein the Bishop of Duresme, the Erle of Northumberlande, and other noble men were gathered, and wan it at the last by yeldyng, so that his enemies were vnto him reconciled also, and in like maner was his brother Robert, who then again taking his leaue of the king returned into Normandy.

Robert Curthose was againe reconciled vnto his brother Rufus.

Lanfranke deade.

About this tyme Robert Curthose Duke of Normandy entendyng to take his voyage into the holy land, layed his Dukedome to pledge vnto hys brother William for ten thousand pound. For the leuiyng whereof, kyng William set a taske vpon his commons and subiectes, and raysed a farre exceeding summe, vnder colour of the same, so that Bishops melted their plate, and the tempozall Lordes spoyled their Tenantes for the payment thereof. But as some wryte these thinges were done a good space after.

At this tyme also, the king of Scots brake the peace before made with William Conquerour, and wasted and tooke prayes in the Country of Northumberland thumberland. Then the king prouided a Nauie, and sayled thether in the Winter tyme: But by the tempest of the sea, halfe his Nauie or a great part thereof was drowned, and many of his knightes were lost for colde and hunger. But yet in the ende after diuerse skirmishes and bickeringes, by mediation of friendes, a peace was concluded: So that Malcolyne or Malcolme then kyng of Scottes should be obedient to king William, vnder the same othe that he was before tyme sworne vnto his father, and king William should geue him yerely in the way of a fee. xij. Markes of Golde.

In the fourth yere of his reigne, and the fift day of October, a passing great tempest chaunced in sundrye places of Englande, and specially in the towne of Winchecombe. For there by tempest of thunder and lightning a part of the steple of the Church was throwne downe. &c.

A great tempest.

Also this yere by force of the sayde tempest there was great hurte done at London, insomuch as Reynulph sayth, it blewe downe there. vj. hundreth houses, and other like mischiefes were done in sundry places by the sayd tempest. And the same tyme was the roofe of Bowe Church in London blowen downe which killed two personnes, as Fabian sayth.

In the fift yere of his reigne, he went into Northumberland, and repayred such holdes and Castelles as the Scottes by their warres had eyther rased or else hurt and appayred, and caused a newe Castell to be made at Carlyll and repayred the same Towne which the Danes two hundreth yere passed had destroyed. In the same yere the maine roofe of the great Churche of Sarisbury was consumed and brent with lightnyng. And after the king returned vnto Glouceſter, where he was grieuously vexed with sickneſſe, so that he thought he should haue dyed. In the which tyme he tooke great repentaunce, and promised that if he might escape, he would amend his liuyng and become a new man: But after that he was restored to health, that promes was soone forgotten. In this yere also the king gaue to Anſelme the Archebishoprike of Yorke. Fabian.

In the. vj. yere of his reigne were exceedyng floodes, whereof the like had not in many yeres before beene seene. And after that ensued a wonderfull frost, which frose the great streames in such wise that Horſſe and Cart passed ouer them. And in the ende when the Iſe melted and brake, the payse and weight with the passage thereof brake many a strong bridge both of timber and stone.

About this tyme, the Welshmen with their king or Duke named Rees, brake out vpon the Engliſhe men in the border where standeth the Castell of Brekenoke, and there made masteryes for a while: but in the ende hys people were chased and slaine, and he wounded vnto death, so that he dyed the third day folowyng. This Rees is accompted to be ỹ laſt king of Wales, for after this day they were so quayled and brought to subiection, that they were vnder more stedfast obedience of the kings of England then they were before tyme: howbeit they rebelled full often as after shall appere.

Rees king or Prince of the welshe men rebelled, & was slaine.

And in the yere folowyng, king William to haue the Countrie in more quyet, hewed downe muche of the Wood, and builded in sundrie places of Wales strong Castelles and pyles, by meane whereof, they were plucked more and more to obedience and quyetneſſe, and specially in the dayes of Edward ward the first, and Edward the thirde.

Wales brought to quietneſſe.

Malcoline kinge of Scots again rebelled.

At this time Malcoline, or Malcolme king of Scotland came vnto Glouceſter, to commen with the king of dyuerſe matters, and to make a finall agreement. But becauſe king William would haue deemed him in his Court, therefore the ſame Malcolyne departed from the king in great diſpleaſure, for the which and for other cauſes the warre betweene England and Scotland was renyued, ſo that ſhortly after the ſayd Scottiſh king with his retinue fought with an Erle named Robert Moubraye, which then was Erle of Northumberland, and there was ſlaine with his eldeſt ſon Edward. How he was ſlaine Hector Boethius ſheweth in the. xij. booke of the Story of Scotland on this wiſe: When they within the Caſtell were now ready to yelde and brought to extreeme neceſſitie, and in maner famiſhed for lacke of victualles, a certaine aduenturous and couragious Engliſhe knight beyng mounted on a very ſwift Gelding, hauyng a ſpeare in his hande, at the ende whereof were faſtened the keyes of the Caſtell, rode vnto the kinges campe, makyng ſemblant as though he had bene come to giue vp the Caſtell vnto the king. When the Scottes ſawe this, they drewe together, and for ioye made a great ſhowte and noyes, thinking their long trauayles and paynes had nowe bene at an ende, and then brought him where the king lay, who heering this noyes came out of his tent to knowe what the matter was. The Engliſhe knight when he ſawe the king, helde downe his ſpeare as though he woulde haue deliuered him the keyes: And whileſt euery mannes eyes and mynde was fixed thereon, he in the meane time ſodenly thruſt his ſpeare into the kinges left eye, and ſo wounded him therewith, that he there preſently fell downe ſtarke deade: and that done, he foorthwith daſhed his ſpurres into his horſe and fled into the nert woodes, and ſo eſcaped. And it is ſayde that when king Rufus heard of this aduenturous deed, he ſent for the ſayde knight, and gaue him certeyne of his landes and reuenewes in Northumberland, and commaunded him euer afterwardes to be called Perſeye, becauſe he had perced or bored out the kinges eye, of whome (ſayth he) that familie tooke their beginning, which haue bene ſence that tyme Erles of Northumberland. When the king was ſlaine, the Scottes departed and went euery man his way, and ſo the ſiege brake vp and ended. Edward the ſayde Scotiſhe kinges ſonne was ſlaine before in a ſkirmiſhe at the ſame ſiege. Hetherto Hector Boethius.

For ſorowe whereof, Margaret Queene of Scotland, and ſiſter vnto Edgar Atheling (as before in the ſtory of William the Conqueror is ſhewed) died ſoone after. Then the Scottes made Donwalde or Dunkard the brother of Malcolyne their king, and put by his ſonnes. But king William made Edgar the ſonne of Malcolyne king of Scottes, and he did vnto him homage for the ſame kingdome.

Edgar the ſon of Malcolyne made kinge of Scots who did homage for the ſame.

Polidore ſetteth out theſe warres and the cauſes therof, and ſuch things as chaunced in Normandy betwixt king William and Duke Robert his brother, and the rebellion of the Welſhemen that folowed ſhortly after on this wiſe: When the buſineſſe of Scotland (ſayth he) was thus quieted, Robert Duke of Normandie who alwayes bare a grudge to the king his brother, for that he was by him defeated of the Crowne, ſent Ambaſſadors vnto the ſayd king, & by the ſame charged him with periury for that he had not firmely kept and holden the cõditions of peace that were agreed vpon betwixt them, wherewith Rufus beyng highly displeased, reysed forthwith a great armie, and sayled into Normandy, purposyng so to trye the matter with him, that he would rather hazard his estate at once, then thus dayly be troubled and vnquieted by him: Howbeit his wrath beyng shortly after asswaged, he sought not to fight with him by and by: but after he had once or twice lightly ouerrunne the Countrie thereabout without any great damage or hurt doyng, he fell to a communication with him, where after long conference, they were at the length both contented by the intreatie of their friendes, to commit the effect of all matters in controuersie betwixt them, to the hearyng and arbiterment of certeine most graue and honourable personages, who (the causes and allegations of both the sayde parties, first deliberately heard and debated) gaue sentence for the Duke, awarding that the king should pay him a certeyne summe of money in the name of a mulcte or penaltie, for that he had thus contrary to the league betwixt them ouerrunne and wasted his Countrie. But when the king vnderstoode their awarde, he was by and by in a great chafe, and sayde that he would in no wyse stande vnto it: Therefore both the sayde partyes beyng greatlye mooued eyther with other gaue ouer talking and fell to fighting. The king toke perforce the Castell of Bure, and Robert by the aide of king Phillip of Fraunce, set vpon those Holdes and Castells which king William helde in Normandy, by vertue of the former composition betwixt them, and first of all he wanne by assault the Castell of Argenton, wherein he toke prisoner Roger Lieuetenant or deputie of Poitiers, and with him .lxxx. men of armes, and with like successe also wan he the Castell of Ulmes. At the length the king considering with himselfe howe there needed a greater force to subdue his aduersaryes, and spedily to finishe the warres that were comming vpon him, commaunded in all hast an armye of .xx. thousand men or thereabout to be leuyed in Englande, and spedily to be conueyed ouer vnto him: nowe when all this multitude were assembled and come together at Hastinges in Sussex at the tyme appoynted, where the kinges Shippes lay at Anker to receyue them, and that they were nowe in readinesse and willyng to depart: The kinges Agent met them there also, geuyng intelligence vnto the Capitaines that they should signifie vnto the rest, howe the Princes pleasure was of a speciall desyre he had to spare hys people, and deliuer them from further paynes and trauayles of warrefare by them to be sustayned, that euery Souldiour there prest should pay ten shillynges, and therevpon to be discharged from that voyage, and to returne home againe, the which thing the more part of them was better wyllyng to do, then to commit themselues vnto the daungers of the sea, but the intent and purpose of the Prince was to fight against his brother, rather with a golden weapon, than with one of yron or steele, thinking vnder pretence of those warres to gether such a masse of money of his subiectes, as should both be sufficient to bye peace, and also to enryche him selfe. Therefore when both the armyes were nowe in a redinesse to fight, and that king William had found the meanes so to pacify Phillip the French king with gifts & rewards, that he would no more ayde the sayde Duke, then by and by the whole staye and strength of his warres was quite fallen downe, and for wantyng the French kinges ayde, he was of necessitie compelled to sue vnto the king his brother for peace and at the length obteyned it.

When king William had thus finished the warres of Normandy after his mynde, he forthwith returned into Englande, where anon after chaunced vnto him greater businesse than he had before. For the Welshemen hearyng of the variaunce that begunne to growe betwixt him and his brother, armed themselues mindyng to rob and pill the Countryes adioynyng vnto them after their accustomed maner. And so entryng into the Marches, they burned houses and villages, draue away Cattell, tooke prisoners, and slue aswell Normanes as Englishe men: and finally rased townes and Castels where so euer they came. When the king was hereof enformed, he assembled a power in all haste to helpe his distressed people, and to kepe the countrie from vtter spoilyng and wastyng, and hauing vsed great speede in his iourney, he set vpon them on a sodein: But for all that the Welshmen did not onely manfully abide the brunt of the assaultes, but also enforced the king to geue back & retyre, and that with no small losse and domage, wherefore being now three dayes iourney on his way, in his retyre he determined with himselfe to yelde vnto fortune for the tyme present, and so departed vnto London to prepare a stronger power. After whose departure, the Welshe men waxed so prowde and gathered such a courage vnto them, that they besieged the Castell of Mount Gomericke of all the fortes and Castelles in Wales the strongest, and afterward notwithstandyng it was for a whyle manfully defended by the kinges garison attempted to race it, and at length hauyng beaten downe the walles thereof they toke it, and very cruelly slue all that they found therein: But the king being this while letted by treason newly sprong vp against him in his awne land, & determinyng first to suppresse that before he prepared any resistance against them, went into Northumberland where the Authours of this newe conspiracie put themselues in armes against him: For Robert Erle of that Countrie who had oftentymes before required the king to consider the good seruice he had done what tyme he beyng generall of the armie, the Scottish king was slaine in maner afore sayde, and perceyuyng the king not to be so redye to reward him for that worthie deede as he looked he should haue bene, was therewith so moued, that beyng sent for by the kinges letters, he openly refused to go vnto him. And in the meane season ceased not priuily to deuise howe and which way he might depriue him of the Crowne: But the conspiracie beyng by chaunce shortlye after disclosed, the king toke dyuerse of the Conspirators vpon a sodeine and put them to death: But Robert for that he knew himselfe guiltie, and therefore feared least he should be punished according to his deserts, fled away, whom the king pursued to the Castell called at this day the Castell of Banburghe, whether he was gotten for succor with his wife and children, which the king forthwith besieged, and because the same beyng most strongly defended aswell by nature as mans industrie and policie seemed impregnable, he began to close it with a wall of Plankes or Bordes, so that no man might enter in or issue out of it. But when Robert distrusting his state and case, or at the least wyse the fidelitie of his friendes, sawe the boorde worke begon, he priuely conueighed himselfe out in the dead of the night, but yet not so priuilye but the kinges scout perceyued it and pursued after, and beyng constreyned to go vnto Tinmouth, he there tooke sanctuary in the Churche of saint Oswine the martyr, out of the which he was by and by drawen by violence, and taken prisoner, and so brought vnto the King: Nowe when the rest that were within the Castell ceased not yet to make resistance and to defende themselues, the king to beate a greater terror and feare into them, caused Robert to be brought before the Castell gate that they within might see him, and made proclamation withall, that vnlesse the sayde Castell were yelded, foorthwith his eyes should out of hand be plucked out of his head, the which thing they beholding and fearing alwell their awne partes as the Erles, at the last yelded themselues and gaue vp the Castell, of whom part were banished, and some had their eares cut off, and other some one of their eyes put out to make the rest to beware by their example, and so sent home: but Robert was had to the Castell of Windsor, and there cast in prison: When this businesse was at an ende, king Rufus bent all his whole force against the Welshemen, who still continued in their outrage besides all measure, and addressyng himselfe wyth his armie with all hast to Wales warde, when he sawe that the Welshemen would at no hand geue him any opportunitie to fight with them, but hid themselues in woodes of purpose, he then began to waste and destroy the countrey next adioining, and attempted to passe through those places euen where most daungerous and hardest passage was, to the intent he might come where the enemies were, and fight with them. But contrarywise, the Welshemen kept either the mountaynes or woodes, who beyng sufficiently prepared and furnished for the tyme, set vpon the kinges armie, sometymes here, and sometimes there, euer as they espyed any aduantage, in such wise, that they either wounded or slue very many of them. The which was the cause that the king desirous to be aduenged on them, pursued them more feruently then circumspectly, through mountaynes and marishes more to his losse and damage, than to the losse and anoyance of his enemies: who after he had lost many of his men and horses, and saw there was no hope for him to do any good there gaue ouer his purpose againe, and made an ende of those warres. Hetherto Polidore.

In the .vij. yere of the reigne of king William, Anselme that was Archbishop of Yorke was remoued to Cauntorbury as affirmeth one Chronicle: But Reynulph and Guido say, that Hugh Lupus Erle of Chester beyng sick and diseased, in the .vj. yere of the reigne of William Rufus, sent into Normandie for Anselme then Abbot of Berry or Becey for three causes. The first, to visite and see him, and to be reconciled of him, as the man that he moste trusted. The second cause was that he should relieue some Abbeys of England, whom the king had vexed with grieuous tribute. And the third, that he should found an Abbey in Chester, which place he after buylded, and made one Richarde his Chapleyn first Abbot there, and soone after he was made Archebishop of Cauntorbury: whereby it appereth that the sayde See was voyde ouer the terme of three yeres. And at this tyme, England and Normandy were sore visited with the plague of pestilence, and the same was so great, as some write, that many lay vnburyed, and the tillyng of the ground was put off for that yere, and thereafter ensued great and extreme hunger.

men fightyng, and flames of fyre brennyng, and shotyng out of the Element, and other monstruous thinges, as sayth Fabian.

1096 / 10 In the .x. yere of this king, strife and dissention fell betweene hym and Anselme Archebishop of Cauntorbury, because Anselme might not be suffered to call his Synodes, and correct his clergie but as the king would. The king also chalenged the inuestiture of Bishoppes, and tooke of the Spiritualtie and Temporalty great taskes and tributes, the which he spent vpon the walling of the Tower of London, and the making of Westminster Hall as some wryte. But John Rastall sayth in his Chronicle that it is not lyke to be true that the great Hall of Westminster that is now, was buylded by this king, but rather in the tyme of king Richarde the second. For sayth he, the Armes that are there both on the timber and on the stone worke, which is the three Lyons quartered with the flower de luce, and the white Hart for his badge, were the armes of king Richard. For there was neuer king of England that gaue the flower de luce which was the armes of Fraunce before king Edward the thirde. And therefore it manifestly apereth that the great Hall which is nowe, was not builded by Rufus, except it were that he made the foundation thereof: But if Rufus made any Hall there, it was that which is aboue the stayers that we nowe call the white Hall. And beside all this, the kinges seruauntes grieued and pilled Englishe men vnreasonably. And to this miserie was ioyned the couetousnesse of Reynulph that was sometime Chapleyn vnto William Conqueroure, the which at this day was the kinges procurator, and gathered his taskes ouer all England. He was so couetous and so euill disposed, that he would leuy three taskes for two. He pilled the riche, and bare downe the poore, and caused many men to lose their landes for small causes, and therefore the king did greatly fauour him. And by hys meanes, Bishoprikes were bought and solde as commonly as other marchandices. Also at this time priestes vsed bushed and breyded heades, long tayled gownes and blasyng clothes shinyng, and golden Girdelles, and rode with guilt Spurres, with vsyng of dyuerse other enormities. All which vices Anselme would haue corrected, but he lacked assistance of his brethren the Bishops, for the which cause and other he departed the land: Wherewith the king beyng miscontented, sent after him suche personnes as robbed and spoyled him, and intreated him in most cruell maner. For the which deede, Raufe Bishop of Chichester blamed the king, and also rebuked all such Bishops as had refused the party of Anselme, & had fauoured the king in causes concernyng the aforesayde variaunce. And furthermore he withstoode the king and his officers in takyng of fynes of priestes for the cryme of fornication, for which causes the king with the sayd Raufe was sore amoued, and discontented, and obteyned such fauour that he suspended many Churches of his dioceſſe. But in the ende, Raufe demened him in suche wise that he had his awne will, and his Churches enlarged and freed that before were stopped with Thornes. And the king gaue vnto him the fynes of prieſtes within his Dioceſſe, and endued the See of Chichester with many great giftes.

And vpon a tyme as king William was ridyng towarde his disport of huntyng, sodeynly a messenger came vnto him, & sayde that the City of Cenemona or Constancia in Normandy was besieged of the French men: wherefore he without long tarryng or aduisement, tooke the streight way to the

But he would do nothing after their counſayle, but ſayd ſuch as him loued would ſurely folowe, and ſo went to Ship, ſetting aſide all perils.

The maiſter of the Ship was afrayde, and ſaw the weather ſo darke and clowdie, and the Sea ſomewhat rough by reaſon of the ſouth wind that then blewe, that he counſayled the king to tary vntill the wynde would blow more fauourably: But he commaunded him to make all the ſpeede he coulde vpon paine of his lyfe, ſaiyng that he neuer heard that anye kinge was drowned. And ſo he paſſed the ſea and landed in Normandie a good while before there was any bruite of his comming, and there gathered vnto hym his knightes.

A noble courage of a king

When the Captaine of the Siege (whoſe name was Helias) knewe of the kinges landyng, he feared, and anone began to breake the ſiege: But by treaſon he was taken and brought to the kinges preſence. To whome the king ſhewed ſuch pitie, that he ſuffered him to be at his libertie, which after the opinion of William de Regibus, was done more of pride than of compaſſion. Polidore wryteth that when the capteyn was brought vnto the kinges preſence, he ieſted at him as one that had no courage nor mannes ſtomack. Then the ſayde Capteyne turning him vnto the king ſayde boldely againe. Sir king, thy fortune is nowe to take me priſoner, but if I were at libertie I would make thee to vnderſtand that I were not a man ſo little to be paſſed on as thou makeſt me. And with that the king commaunded him to be ſet at libertie and then ſayd vnto him, now go whether thou wilt, and do the worſt thou canſt againſt me: But (ſayth he) it is not red that he euer attempted any thing againſt the king afterwardes.

In the .xj. yere of his reigne, at a towne called Fincheſter in the country of Barkeſhire, a Well caſt out blood as before it had done water. And after by the ſpace of .xv. dayes great flames of fyre were ſeene in ſundrie places, and at ſundry tymes. This yere alſo the two Erles of Shrewesbury and of Cheſter who were both named Hugh, by the kinges commaundement entered with their knightes the Iſle of Angleſay, which was the chiefe refuge of the Welſhe men, and ſlue there a number of them, and ſhewed there ſuch crueltie beſydes, as the like had not bene heard of before, for vnto ſome they put out their eyes, to ſome they cut off their noſes, handes, legges, or armes, and ſome againe they gelded, ſo that no kinde of cruelty was left vnpractiſed.

Then betwene them was a mortall fight, in the which Hugh Erle of Shrewesbury was ſtryken with an arow in the eye, and dyed within .viij. dayes after. But as ſayth Guydo, the Danes were chaſed, and the Engliſhe men had the victory, but as other do wryte there was no notable thing elſe there done beſides the death of the ſayde Erle.

Hugh Erle of Shrewesbury ſlaine.

King William at this tyme was much in Normandy, becauſe that Robert his his brother was all this while in the holy land, of whose actes some mention shall be made in the story of Henry the first. And William had much paine to rule the Normanes, for they rebelled often against him.

Robert Losaunge that sometyme had bene Abbot of Ramsey, and then by the gift of a thousand pound to the king, was made Bishop of Thetford, repented him after, and bewayled that vnskilfull deede, and tooke his way to Rome, and did for it his adioyned penance, and after returned into England, and turned his See from Thetford to Norwiche, and founded there a fayre Monastery of his awne goodes, and not of the patrimonie of Christes Churche: But therein resteth a doubt, for he was first Abbot and then Bishop, sayth Fabian.

After that king William as before is sayde, was returned out of Normandie, many wonderfull prodigies and tokens were shewed in England, as the swellyng or risyng of the water of the Thamys, in suche wyse that it drowned many townes, and did much harme by out passyng of his boundes in dyuerse places about London and else where, with dyuerse other thinges which I passe ouer.

In the .xiij. yere of his reigne and the beginnyng thereof the thirde day of August as sayth Reynulph, or as some other write vpon Lammas day, thys king William beyng at his disport on huntyng within the newe Forest, now called the Forest of Windsore, or rather as Reynulph sayth in the new Forest in Hamshire beside Sarisbury by glaunsyng of an arrowe, which a knight named Sir Walter Tirell a Frenche man did shote at a Deere, and hit the king, and wounded him to death, so that he gaue but one grone and dyed presently, when he had reigned .xij. yeres, xj. monethes lackyng. viij. dayes. And it is written by John Hardyng, that king Rufus to enlarge the aforesayde Forest did pull downe foure Abbeyes, xviij. parishe Churches, and all the townes to them belongyng. Water Hennyngforde wryteth, that in the place where the king was slaine had beene a Church in olde tyme, the which Church with other in his fathers tyme was pulled downe, and destroyed for the enlargyng of his said Forest, and that in the same Forest by a like chaunce was slaine also a little before Richard the kinges nephew, sonne vnto Robert Duke of Normandy of a knight of his awne.

The death of king William Rufus.

After this deede, the sayde Walter escaped and saued himselfe, for fewe they were that pursued after him. And so the king thus wounded was layde in a horse Litter, and conueyed to Winchester, and was there buryed in the Church of Peter and Paule.

Henry of Hūtingdon

Of this William, reporteth Henry of Huntingdon and sayth that though this man were light in some things, yet he was stedfast and stable of his promise, so that what he promised good or euill it should be performed, & though he were named couetous, yet it should apere by this that foloweth, that he sometymes shewed himselfe liberall: For thus wryteth he of hym.

Upon a certaine time, when the Abbot of an Abbey in England was dead, two Monkes of the same place, the which before had gathered money together, made their friendes to king William, and offered large offers either of them to be promoted to that dignitie. There was also a thirde Monke, the which of meekenesse and humblenesse folowed the other two, to the entent that vpon him that the king should admit for Abbot, he would haue geuen attendance, tendance, and as his Chapleyn to haue returned with him. The king called before him the two Monkes seuerally, and either out profered other: And at the length he cast his eye abyde, and espyed the thirde Monke, the which he supposed had come for the same cause. Then the king called him and asked him, if he would geue any more than his brethren had profered to be Abbot. But he aunswered to the king and sayde, that he would offer, neyther yet gene for it one penny, nor woulde haue so great a charge by any wrongfull meane. When the king had well considered of this thirde Monkes aunswere, he sayd that he was best worthie to be Abbot, and to haue the rule of so holy a charge: and so he gaue vnto him that promocion, without taking of hym one pennye.

Money bidden for Ecclesiasticall promocions.

This king William was variable and inconstant of his behauiour, very couetous, and therewithall cruell, and burdened the people with great taxes. Furthermore he neuer maryed but vsed concubines continually, wherefore he dyed without issue legittimate, when he had reigned as aforesayd fully .xij. yeres, and almost xj. monethes.

Of this king it is written that he was wastfull and sumptuous in hys apparell, an example whereof is brought in by a certaine writer to the great reproofe of excesse of apparell vsed in these our dayes. For when his Chamberleyn on a tyme brought him a newe payre of Hosen, he demaunded of him what they cost, who aunswered three shillings, wherat the king beyng somewhat moued, commaunded him to prepare him a paire of .xiij. shillinges iiij. pence. Nowe if kinges were then thought to exceede that bestowed a Marke vpon a paire of hosen, what is to be thought of many meane men which in our tyme bestow so much of one payre as that king did vpon twentie.

Henrie the first.

HEnrie the first of that name, and the fourth sonne of William Conquerour, which for his learnyng was surnamed Beauclercke, toke vpon him the first day of August the yere of our Lorde M. C. the gouernement of this Realme of England, and was crowned king thereof very shortly after at Westminster, of Thomas Archebishop of Yorke, or as Polydore and some other say, of Mawrice Bishop of London. 1100 1

Coronation of king Henrie the first

His elder brother Robert Duke of Normandie was at that season not yet returned from the warres of Siria, and therefore had he the better opportunitie to bring is purpose aboute. For many there were both of the nobles and others which fauoured the sayde Duke, and woulde haue haue done their endeuour to haue crowned him king if he had bene present: And for this cause he found the meanes, what by geuyng of great rewardes, and what by fayre wordes and large promises to preuent him: But no one thing moued the whole Realme more to agree vpon him, then the faythfull promise he made to abholishe his fathers lawes, which were deemed of the people to be both against equitie and conscience. But first of all, so soone as he hearde of his brother Rufus death, he seazed vpon his goods and moueables, whereby he became the stronger, and better able to go thorowe with this enterprise.

This king in his youth had so well applied his study, that he was well sene in the seuen liberall sciences. And he at his entery reformed the ministers of the Church, and the dignitie of the same which had bene corrupted by his brother and he restored againe and vsed saint Edwardes lawes with the amendment of them, besydes the reformation and amendment of sundry and diuerse other abuses in the common welth.

Reynulph bishop of Duresme.

Wantonnesse banished out of the kinges Court which betokened good gouernment.

He banished out of his Court niceneſſe and wantonneſſe, and committed Reynulph Bishop of Duresme, a man hated of all men for oppression, bribery, and diuerse other notable crymes, and a chiefe Counsaylour and perswader also of the king his brother in all his lewde and vngodly attemptes to the tower of London, the which before as you haue heard was so great with his brother William: and he sent for Anselme that was Archebishop of Cauntorbury, which before was fled for the feare and wrath of William Rufus, and gaue the Bishoprike of Winchester then miserablye spoyled vnto Gyfford, a right graue and learned man, and conferred also the rule and gouernement of such Abbeyes as had bene of long tyme vacant vnto Monkes. Furthermore he remitted all such taxes and paymentes as had bene by hys father and brother newely rayſed vpon the people.

Measures made and reformed by king Henry the first.

This king corrected and reformed the olde and vntrue measures that were vsed in this Realme, and caused a yarde of the length of his awne arme to be made and vsed (and the same thing at this day is most meetest to be reformed, for now almost no countrie kepeth eyther weight or measure one with the other to the great hurt of the Realme) and lykewise he reformed manye thinges that before his tyme had bene abused. Also he abhorred the excesse of meates and drinkes, and vsed to fight more with good counsaile than with the sworde.

In the second yere of his reigne, Robert his brother that by all this time had bene occupied in warres vpon Christes enemies, hauing worde of the death of his brother William, and howe his brother Henry had taken vpon him as king, returned into Normandye, and there made preparation for to come into England.

Robert the eldest sonne of William Conquerour once againe claymeth the Crowne.

In this time also Reynulph Bishop of Duresme brake out of the tower of London, and went to Robert Duke of Normandy, who stirred and pricked forwarde the same Duke Robert in all that he might to warre vpon his brother Henry, so that he assembled a strong armye of knightes, and tooke shipping, and shortlye after landed at Portesmouth. But by mediation of friendes, a peace was made, and that in such condicion, that he should haue yerely three thousande Markes payed vnto him as a tribute, as before was promised hym by William Rufus his brother, with condicions of succession and other thinges the which for length I passe ouer.

Thus Robert beyng contented, contrary to the mindes of his Lordes, after a while that he had disported himselfe in England, he returned to Normandie, where of his Lordes he was for this and other vndiscrete dedes by him before done, as after shall be shewed, little, or lesse and lesse set by. For albeit by his fathers lyfe he had offended, and vtterly displeased him as before is touched, yet by his manhood and manfull deedes, he wanne the heartes of the people, specially for the worthie actes he did at the winnyng of the Citie of Acon vpon the miscreantes and Turkes. Robert duke of Normãdy.

This Robert was wise in counsayle, strong in battaile, and also right liberall, and in hys returne from Hierusalem hee maryed the daughter of William, or as Polidore sayth, Roger de Auersana Lorde of Apulia, with whome he receyued great summes of money for his dower, the whiche by meane of his liberalitie was not long vnspent. Then fortune began to frowne vpon him, and set his awne Lordes against him, who sent vnto king Henry of England, and moued him to come into Normandy against his brother, and they would deliuer vnto him the countrie and Duchie of Normandie, and take him for their chiefe Lorde and gouernour: whereunto as sayth the English Chronicle, king Henry soone consented. Fortune frowneth many tymes vpon Princes.

But or euer this warre began betweene them, this king Henry had maryed the foresayde Molde or Mawde the daughter of Malcolyne or Malcolme king of Scotland, and of Margaret his wife daughter of Edward the outlaw as is expressed in the beginning of William Conquerour. Of the which Mawde, he receyued two sonnes, and two daughters, that is to say, William, and Richard, Mawde and Mary.

Polidore sayth, he begat of his first wyfe William, which was after drowned in the sea, and Mawde the Empresse. And a concubine a daughter named Mary, & a sonne called Richard, the which were likewyse drowned. And of a nother concubine Robert, whome he created Erle of Glocester: But Hector Boethius wryteth, howe there was issue betwixt them these folowyng, William, Richard, Enfemia, and Mawde.

About this tyme the Church and Hospitall of Saint Bartholomewe, in west Smithfielde of London was begon to be founded by one of the kinges Mynistrians named Rayer, and after perfourmed by Rychard Whytyngdon Citezen & Alderman of London, a man of worthie fame. This place of Smithfield was at that tyme a layestow of all dong and filth, and the place where felons and other transgressors of the kinges lawes were put to execution. The Hospitall of Saint Bartholomewes first founded.

After this Duke Robert of Normandie came into Englande to his brother, and he was here honourably entertayned, and in the ende at the request of his sister the wife of king Henry, or rather (as Polydore wryteth) beyng ouercome with the fayre wordes of his sayde brother, he released vnto hym the aforenamed tribute of three thousand Markes: but by euill tales, and couetousnesse of seignorie, this brotherly loue lasted not long, but such a baryaunce fell betweene them, that king Henry with a strong armie sayled into Normandie, and helde his brother with so sharpe warre, that he chased him from one country to another, and wanne from him the Citie of Roan, Cane, Ualoys, and all the good townes of Normandy, and at the last constreyned him to seeke helpe of the French king, and after of the Erle of Flaunders, but but he fayled of them both. Then fayth Polidore, when he considered with himselfe how vnable he was to match with the king his brother, and saw also how he was distressed on euery side, by reason wherof diuerse of his Lordes and Subiectes forsooke him, and tooke parte with his sayd brother, and that his enemyes dayly encreased, and his power decreased, and waxed lesse and lesse, he determined with himselfe no longer to trye the matter by battayle and force of armes, but to repose all hope of pacification in brotherly charity. And because he thought it would little preuaile to send any Ambassadors for the matter, he beyng accõpanied with a few persons went himselfe into England, the said king then lying at Northamton, where the Duke made humble sute vnto him, that he might be at peace with him, vsyng all the persuasions he could to induce him therevnto, and submitted himselfe and his Dukedome and all that he had besydes, wholy to his order, grace, and mercy, with the which request and humble submission of his, the king was nothing at all moued, insomuch that he turned from him in a fume, mutteryng with himselfe certaine threatning wordes against him. And this straunge countenaunce shewed he, eyther because of his brothers inconstancye, whereof he had had often experience, or else for that he was nowe fully bent and mynded to pursue him with most extreme crueltie, euen to death or vtter destruction. When Duke Robert saw this, he detesting the prowde and stately behauiour of his brother, departed the Court and returned into Normandy with all conuenient speede, fully determinyng, rather than to suffer his honour thus to be desteyned, to put him selfe in daunger either of death, or else of perpetuall seruitude. For he well perceyued, it booted not to put any longer hope or trust in brotherly loue. Therfore with such power as he could make, he gaue battaile vnto his brother Henry, who folowed him with a newe armie, in the which battaile he was taken prisoner and sent ouer into England, and put into the Castell of Cardiffe in Wales, where he remayned as prisoner so long as he liued, and when he was dead, he was buryed at Gloucester.

Mathew of Westmynster writeth that at the first he was not streightly kept as a prisoner, but was permitted by the kinges licence to hawke, hunt, and vse al other pastimes what he would for his disport & recreation, hauyng his keper with him, and was also allowed such apparell & dyet as was conuenient for his estate, vntill at length he practised to haue conueyed himselfe away: And beyng taken againe (as sayth the aforesayde writer) he by the kinges commaundement had both his eyes put out, but in such wyse that the balles of them were saued. Touchyng his death it is further reported of the same Author, how king Henry hauyng on a time made a scarlet Robe with a hoode (as the fashion then was) for himselfe, & puttyng it on to assay whether it was meete for him or no, and perceyuyng the sayd hoode to be somewhat to little for his head, bad the yoman of his Wardrop to sende it vnto his brother Robert, because (sayth he) his head is somewhat lesse then mine. And when the Messenger that brought it was demaunded of Duke Robert whether any had euer worne it before or no, and the sayde messenger vnaduisedly shewed him what the king had done and sayd: Then sayd Duke Robert, nowe may I well thinke that my most wretched lyfe hath bene ouerlong prolonged sith the iniurious king my brother hath so little regard of me, that he clotheth me with his cast apparell, and after that he would neuer eate nor drinke, but Nowe when king Henry had fynished his warres in Normandy he returned into England, and at that tyme Robert of Bolisme which was the eldest sonne of Hugh of mount Gomericke Erle of Shrewesbury arose against the king, and manned his Castelles of Shrewesbury, of Brugges, of Irondell, and of Tekynhill, and incouraged the Welshemen against the king. But the king pursued the sayd Robert so egerly, that within. xl. dayes he wanne all those Castelles, and slue many of his men, and gate the fauour of the Welshemen by giftes and pleasant wordes, and also compelled the sayde Robert to forsake England: the which sayled into a corner of Normandye, and kept him there secretly, vntill such tyme as William Erle of Cornewall came thether vnto him, which William was also Erle of Morton in Normandy. When these two Erles were met, they gathered to them a great strength of Normanes, and did great harme within the Pronynce. Wherefore the king sailed thether and made sharpe warre vpon them, in the which he lost manye of his men: But in the ende hee put from them their strength, and tooke them both Prisoners, and so kept them duryng their lyues. And that done he set that Countrie in good rest and peace, and after returned into England. After which returne the king made sharpe lawes against theeues and other that vsed vnlawfull doynges. In the which lawes was conteyned, losyng of lyfe, of eyes, of stones, and other members of man, as the fault and offence required.

And shortly after, Anselme Archebishop of Cauntorbury assembled a great counsail at London of the Clergie of England: By authority of which counsail, diuerse Abbottes & other were put from their dignitie, for that they had taken before tyme their Abbeyes by vnlawful meanes. And among all other decrees one was, that priests should forgo theyr wiues, as saith Fabian.

Then strife fell betwene the king and Anselme, for that that he would not suffre the priestes that had taken inuestiture of the kinges handes, which before was forbidden vpon paine of cursing. But Giralde Archebishop of Yorke for the pleasure of the king, sacred such Bishoppes: Wherefore Anselme beyng discontented, departed the land, and went to Rome to complaine of this and other thinges to the Bishop thereof, which then was named Paschall the second. And about this tyme Sir Robert le Fitzham Erle of Glocester buylded the towne of Tewkesburye, and there was buryed, and also buylded the Castell of Bristow.

In the sixt yere of the king, the Countrie of Flaunders was sore blemished and hurt by meane of the sea, so that the Fleminges were enforced to seeke for succour and place of dwellyng, and required of the king to haue lycence that they might inhabite in the East part of Twede, the which to them was graunted. But after a certeyne of yeres they were remoued into west Wales, where they remayned a long while, but after they spred all England ouer.

In the. vij. yere of his reigne, vpon a Fryday at night in the first weeke of cleane Lent, was seene a straunge and wonderfull starre betweene the South and the West, the which nightly apered at an houre, and continued so by the space of. xxv. dayes. Anselme returned from Rome.

This yere also Anselme by the kinges agreement returned from Rome, and shortly after called a conuocation at London, in the which by the Bishop of Romes auctoritie, it was newly enacted and confirmed, that no temporal man after that day should make any inuesture with Crosse and Ryng.

In the .viij. yere of his reigne, the fourth Henry Emperour of Almaine, the which was affianced to Moldе the eldest daughter of this king Henry, when she was of the age of fiue yeres, emprisoned Paschall Bishop of Rome and dyuerse of the Cardinalles.

In the .ix. yere of his reigne, the Archbishop Anselme professed Gerard Archebishop of Yorke to the yoke of obedience, as he was before taught by Lanfranke his predecessor. And the .x. day of August folowyng, he sacred fiue Bishoppes at one tyme, as of Winchester, of Sarisbury, of Exceter, of Herford, and Glamorgan. And king Henry ordeyned a bishops See at Ely, and to the Bishoppes See at Lyncolne he gaue his awne towne of Spaldyng, for he had minished that See by the erection of Ely.

In the .x. yere dyed Anselme Archebishop of Cauntorbury, after whose death the See was voyde fiue yeres, and the goodes of the Church spent to the kinges vse. And when he was prayed to helpe the Church that was without an head and a pastour, he vsed to aunswere that his father and also his brother had accustomed to set there the best proued men that they coulde finde, and to the entent that he might do the same, he toke the more tyme and leysure. And with such mylde aunsweres he put off the tyme, and filled his Cofers with the great summes of the Benefice. And at this tyme, the king maried his brother Roberts bastard sonne, to Mabell daughter and heyre of Robert Fitzham, and made him the first Erle of Glocester, who after buylded the strong Castell of Bristow.

About this tyme (as sayth the Frenche Chronicle) a controuersie began betwixt the king, and Lewes king of Fraunce sonne vnto Philip the first. This Lewes was surnamed Lewes the great, eyther for the bygnesse of his person, or else for the greatnesse of his dedes. This Lewes sent vnto king Henry beyng in Normandy, and gaue vnto him monition to do his homage for the Duchy of Normandy, and also that he should restore vnto him, or else beate downe the Castell of Gysours, and also make recompence and restitution vnto him for the hurtes and harmes that his Normans had done in those partes. But all this of king Henry was denied, and shortly after skirmishes and bickerings began betwene the sayde two Princes, king Henry then lyng at the said Castell of Gysours, and Lewes at a place called mount Calue. But this encreased in such wise, that shortly after, eyther of the Princes sought for places of more rowme, and their knightes met sundrie times. But of any notable battaile betwene them I find no remembrance although the same warres continued two yeres. In the ende of which two yeres William the eldest sonne of king Henry, beyng a childe and within age, contented so well the minde of Lewes, that he refrayned from his warre for that time.

In the .xiij. yere of his reigne, at Shrewesbury, and at Notyngham was a great earthquake from the morowyng vnto night. The Riuer of Trent in the moneth of June flowed not for the space of a mile so as sayth Guydo, that men might there haue gone drieshod ouer it, as though the water had bene gone another way, and this continued the space of one whole day. And soone after appered a blasyng starre, wherevpon folowed an hard Wynter, great death of the people, and scarcetie of victualles by the great Mozeyn of beastes that ensued. And in this yere also the king founded the Abbey of hide without the walles of Wincheſter, that of olde tyme was within the walles, and first founded by king Alphzed called the new Abbey of Wincheſter. The Citie of Wozceſter was in this yere almoſt all consumed with fyze. And in this time began the Parliament in England first to be instituted and ozdeyned foz reformation and gouernement of this Realme. The maner whereof as I haue found it set foozth in an olde Pamphlet, I entende at large to set foozth in the reigne of king Edward the third, where and when Parliaments were yerely and ozderly kept.

In the.xiiij. yere of his reigne he subdued the Welshemen (sayth Polydoze) and that not without great slaughter of them, which befoze by often breakyng out into the frontiers and marches of Englande, wasted those Countryes very soze.

About this time also (sayth the same wzyter) Henry the fourth of that name Emperoz, vnto whom Mawde the kinges daughter was fianced, sent vnto king Henry foz his wife, beyng now able to company with a man, who to pzepare a conuenient dowzy foz her, sealsed a great payment vpon the people to be leuyed by the Acre, that is to say vpon euery Acre of land that any man helde a certaine pozcion: By reason whereof he gathered a great masse of money, the which he sent with her to the afoze sayd Emperour.

In the. xv. yere of his reigne, the king entended to haue pzomoted Fabzicius, Abbot of Abyngdon vnto the See of Cauntozbury but in a sinode oz counsaile of Bishoppes kept at Winsoze, the kinges minde was chaunged, and to ꝑ See was then admitted Raufe that was befoze bishop of Rocheſter

And the same yere one Thurſton was chosen Archebishop of Yozke, the which denyed his pzofession of obedience, that he should owe vnto the See of Cauntozbury, wherefoze at length he was depzined of his dignitie. But after by labour that he made to Paſcall Bishop of Rome, the sayd Bishop of Rome wzote to the king that he should restoze him againe to the sayd See: By the which meane he was restozed, but yet disdeyned he to do his lawfull obedience vnto the sayde Raufe Archebishop of Cauntozbury. Then the strife was againe remued which Lanfranke befoze had appeased, and at the length bzought in argument befoze the Bishop of Rome. The which at the kinges request pzomised that he would nothing do, noz ozdeine that should pzeiudice the Archebishop of Cauntozbury, oz the dignitie of his Church. But in conclusion the sayd Bishop of Rome gaue such a defuse sentence in this matter, that he left the strife vndetermined. And when the kinges pzocuratozs and the Archbishops of Cauntozburies also were absent, were it foz mede oz foz fauour, the Bishop of Rome was so bent, that he forsooke the olde rule vsed befoze his dayes, and sacred the sayd Thurſton himselfe, and gaue him the Pall. Foz this dede the king was soze discontented with Thurſton, and forbad him the entery of his land. Wherefoze the Bishop of Rome wzote shortly after to the king, willing him to suffer Thurſton to occupie the See peaceably, oz he should be accursed, and suspended by the dignitie of the office of Cauntorbury, and so Thurston quietly enioyed his See by that meanes.

1116 — In the. xvij. yere of his reigne, the warre againe betweene him and 17 Lewes the French king was renued, and the occasioner thereof, as sayth the French Chronicle, was Thibauld Erle of Charters or Champaigne, which Warres a- gaine renued with Frances Thibauld was grieued by the French king, and for necessitie requyred ayde of the king of Englande, to whome the king as his kinsman sent ayde and succour. And afterward the king sayled ouer with a strong army, and sent a noble man named Stephen into the Lordship of Brye, to defend it against the French king. When Lewes vnderstoode that king Henry was landed in Normandy with so great a power, he in all the hast assembled a great and strong power, and came towardes him. But there were such strong Holdes so well manned with Normanes, and also so great and deepe riuers that the Frenche king coulde not come at king Henry. But at the last he wanne a towne named Lingues in Cause, in the which towne was a bridge to passe ouer the ryuer of Thee, and so into Normandy.

When a certeyne of the knightes of Lewes had thus wonne the towne aforesayde, the sayde Lewes with his people sped him shortly after and rescued his foresayde knightes, and then spoyled and robbed the Towne which was riche, bicause it had beene in rest and quiet many yeres before. He also slue and tooke prisoners all the Normans there dwelling, and put in their steed Frenchmen. And that done, he sped him towardes king Henrie, the Male assise Castell. which was at a Castle called Male assise, & there made prouision for the defence of the Frenchmen. And when he had garnished and furnished it to hys pleasure and contentation, he then departed from thence. And shortly after the French king came thether with his whole army of Frenchmen, and after many sore and cruell assaultes, he wonne the sayde Castell, and bet it downe to the grounde. After which victorie, as sayth the French Chronicle, there chaunced to the French king manye misfortunes. For shortly after among manye other mischaunces, a Noble Capitaine of his named Angueran de Chaumounte, the which had done much harme in Normandy to king Henry and had wonne there sundrie Castels and strong holdes, dyed sodeynlye. And in short time after Baldwin Erle of Flaunders, a man of great strength, and puyssaunce as he besieged a Castell was wounded in the face, and died within fyre dayes after. Then Fauques Erle of Aungeros, in whome also hys 1117 — Lewes affied muche and trusted, married his daughter vnto William the el-
18 dest sonne of king Henry, and refused the French kings parte, and ayded and assisted king Henry in all that he might, so that daylie the power of Henry encreased, and the French kings minished. Finally, these two Princes met with both their armies in plaine field and fought a deadly and cruell battayle, where in the ende the French king was ouercome, and lost muche of
A cruell battaile. his people, & was compelled to flee vnto a place called Audeley for his safegarde. But this ouerthrowe of the Frenchemen is by them excused in the most fayrest maner, so that they (as Fabian sayeth) excuse themselues and saye, that king Henry set vpon Lewes when he was not ware, and hys knights at that tyme were all out of order & aray: and also that king Henry had a farre greater number then the French king had, with other wordes in the praise and commendation of themselues, which is to their rebuke.

But Reynulph of Chester sayth that king Henry ouercame the French king king in the playne field royally.

Now it followeth in the ſtorie, when theſe two Princes were agreed, William the ſonne of king Henry did homage vnto the French king for the landes of Normandy, by the agreement of his father: for the king thought himſelfe to good to be vnder the obeyſaunce of the French king. Then king Henry cauſed his free men of Englande and of Normandy, to doe homage lykewiſe vnto his ſonne Wylliam. 1118 19 Homage.

And ſone after Fauques before named, left his Erledome of Angers, in the guyding of king Henry, and went himſelfe into the holye lande, and wylled in his Teſtament, that if he returned not againe, that then the ſayde Erledome ſhould remayne vnto his ſonne in lawe Wylliam, ſonne of king Henry which had maried his daughter.

About the twentie yere of the reigne of king Henry, Queene Molde or Mawde his wyfe dyed in Normandy, the which in her youth, was ſet by her father the king of Scottes, into a Nonnery and there did weare and vſe the vayle and habite of a Nonne. For the which cauſe when king Henry was agreeable to take her vnto his wife, this matter fell in great diſputation, and Anſelme then Archebiſhop of Cauntorburie was ſore againſt that mariage for a tyme: But afterwarde it was ſufficiently proued that ſhee was there wearyng the habite but neuer profeſſed the order. And hir father had ſo deuiſed it to the entent to aduoyde vnworthy wooers. 1119 20

When king Henry had continued in Normandy almoſt three yeres, he tooke ſhippyng at Harflete in Normandy, and ſayled happely into England the ſame day, that is to ſay, the. xviij. day of Nouember. And ſhortly after William Duke of Normandy with Richard his brother, Mary his daughter, Richard Erle of Cheſter, with his wyfe the kinges nece, and the Archedeacon of Herforde and other to the number of one hundreth & three ſcore perſonnes, tooke ſhippyng at the ſame port, and were all drowned, a Boocher only excepted: which miſfortune chaunced partly by the violent rage of tempeſt, and partly by the ouerſight of the maiſter and other, which in the night had quarelled among themſelues, by reaſon whereof they ranne vpon a rock as ſayd the Boocher. From this daunger William Duke of Normandy eſcaped, and was in the Shipboate nere vnto the land: but when he heard the lamentable cry of his ſiſter, he commaunded the Rowers to returne and ſaue her, which done by what miſfortune I can not tell, after ſhe was receyued into the Boate, were it by tempeſt, or ouercharging of the Boate, or otherwiſe, they were all ſwallowed of the ſea, ſo that none of them was after found, but part of their goodes. A pitifull chaunce.

In the. xxi. yere of his reigne, king Henry made the Parke of Woodſtock beſyde Oxenford, and walled it with ſtone, beſydes other pleaſures to the ſame belongyng. And about this time Fauques Erle of Angers returned out of the holy land, and maryed the ſiſter of her that before he had maried vnto William Duke of Normandy, vnto the ſonne of Robert Curthoſe, and gaue with her the Erledome of Cenomanna. And ſtrife began to kindle betwene king Henry and the ſaid Fauques, for the withholding of the dower or ioynter of his firſt daughter maryed vnto William the kinges ſonne, and for the cruell handlyng of Duke Robert of Normandy, whom the ſayd Fauques loued intyrely. 1120 21 Woodſtock parke. In the .xxiij. yere of the king, Raufe Archebiſhop of Cauntorbury died, and a Clerke named William was placed in the See after him. And the king in this yere began the foundation of the Abbey of Readyng. And John Cremenſis a prieſt, Cardinall of Rome was ſent from Calixt the ſeconde of that name then Biſhop of Rome, for certeyne matters concernyng the ſaid biſhop of Rome. In which tyme of his beyng here, he made ſharpe proceſſe againſt ſuch prieſtes as had eyther wyues or elſe kept concubines, and rebuked them by open publication, and otherwyſe, ſo that he gat himſelfe thereby ſmall or little fauour. But this Cardinall was ſo feruent in the correction of other mennes vices, that he forgat to looke vpon his awne life. For in the night or euenyng of the ſame day that he had blowen his horne, and ſayde, that it was a moſt deteſtable offence before God, to aryſe from the ſyde of a ſtrumpet, and then to ſacre the body of Chriſt, he himſelfe was taken with a ſtrumpet to his open ſhame and rebuke, but he excuſed the matter (ſayth Mathew of Weſtminſter) ſaiyng that he was no prieſt but a corrector of prieſtes.

In the .xxb. yere of his reigne was called a counſail at London, where the ſpiritualtie conſented that the kinges officers ſhould puniſh prieſtes that had Concubines. But the ſayd officers tooke money and ſuffered the Prieſtes to liue at their pleaſures. Which offence at this day is ſo clerely renounced of all Spirituall men, that there are no fynes at all taken nowe, neyther yet correction neceſſary done for the ſame, neyther duely puniſhed any other where in England, except it be in one houſe called Bridewell in London, where alſo (as ſome ſay) there is but to much fauour ſhewed, chiefely to ſuch as can make any friendes.

In the .xxbij. yere of his reigne, the Gray Fryers came firſt into this Realme of England, and had their firſt houſe buylded at Cauntorbury. And about this tyme alſo dyed Henry the fourth Emperour of that name, which (as before is touched) maryed Moulde the daughter of king Henry. After whoſe death the ſayd Empreſſe came vnto her father in Normandy. Nowe when king Henry was aſſerteyned of the death of Henry the Emperour, for ſomuch as he had none heyre male, he cauſed ſoone after the moſt part of all the Lordes ſpirituall and temporall in England, to ſwere in his preſence that they ſhould kepe the land of England to the vſe of Matylde the Empreſſe, if he dyed without iſſue male, and that ſhe then ſuruyued.

In the .xxbiij. yere of the king, Geoffrey Plantagenet the ſonne of Foulques Erle of Angeow, maryed Moulde the Empreſſe. Of the which two diſcended Henry the ſeconde, which after Stephen was king of England. And after the king was returned into England, he releaſed vnto the Engliſhmen the Dane gelt, which was by his father and brother receyued and taken.

In the .xxx. yere of his reigne dyed the Erle of Flaunders, and as Reynulph ſayth, king Henry was by the agreement of the Frenche king made Erle, as next heyre and inheritor vnto the ſayde Erledome.

1131 / 32

In the .xxxij. yere of the king dyed Robert Curthoſe the kinges brother, the which he had kept as priſoner in the Caſtell of Cardiffe from the fourth yere of his reigne, whoſe dead carkaſſe was buryed at Glouceſter.

1134 / 35

In the .xxxb. yere of his reigne, was borne of Moulde the Empreſſe, Henry ſhortmantell, or Henry the ſeconde, and about thys tyme was by the king founded the Biſhoprike of Carlill, and a great part of London brenned.

Now

Now for a finall ende of this story, king Henry in the beginning of the xxxvj. yere of his reigne, he beyng in Normandye fell from or with his horse, whereof he tooke his death. But Raynulph sayth, that he tooke a surfet by eatyng of a Lamprey, and thereof dyed, when he had reyned full. xxxv. yeres and odde monethes, and was buryed at Redyng Abbey whereof he was the founder, as he was also of the Abbey of Ciceter the which Mathew of Westminster calleth Ciremester. 1135 36

King Stephen.

Tephen Erle of Boloigne, sonne of the Erle of Bloys and Adela daughter to king william the Conquerour, and nephewe vnto king Henry the first, tooke on him the gouernaunce of this Realme of England, the second day of December. 1135. through the counsayle and ayde of many Lordes of England, contrary to their othe made to Mawde the Empresse. 1135 1

This was a noble man and hardy. But yet contrary to his othe ỹ he made to Molde or Mawde the Empresse as afore sayde, hee tooke vpon him the Crowne of this Realme, and was crowned on Saint Stephens day in Christmas weeke at Westminster of William Archebishop of Cauntorbury, which Bishop in lyke maner had made the lyke othe vnto the sayde Empresse, in the presence of the king her father as before is touched: In punishment of which periury as men suppose, the sayd Archebishop dyed shortly after. King Steuē crowned.

The Lordes also of the whole realme as aboue said had made like othes, and committed the lyke periury, and therfore scaped not punishment. A great part of this periury (as sayth one aucthour) was this: One Hugh Bygot Steward sometyme of king Henry the first, immediately after the decease of the sayde Henry came into England, and before the sayde Archebishop and other Lordes of the land, he tooke wilfully an othe, and sware that he was present a little before the kinges death, when king Henry admitted and chose for his heyre to be king after him Stephen his nephew, because Molde his daughter had displeased him: whereunto the Archebishop & the other Lords gaue to hasty credence. But the sayde Hugh escaped not vnpunished, for he dyed miserably in a short tyme after. Periury. Wilfull periury punished

When king Stephen was crowned he sware before the Lordes at Otenford that he would not holde in his hande the Bishoprikes and benefices that were voyde, and that he would forgeue the Dane gelt as king Henry before him had done, with sundrie other thinges. And because this Stephen feared the comming of Mawde the Empresse, he therefore gaue licence vn- Dane gelt.

But yet Polydore wryteth, that whileſt king Stephen made himſelfe readie to ſet vpon the Scottiſhe armie, who were come to defende the borders of the Countrie: Dauid perceyuing himſelfe to weake, and not able to withſtand his power, ſent his Ambaſſadors vnto him to entreate a peace, which at the length was graunted him vpon condition that he would be content to delyuer his ſonne in hoſtage for the ſure performaunce and holding of the Articles and couenants concluded betwixt them, the which was done. Then in his returne homeward he toke Alexander Biſhop of Lincolne & kept him in durance vntill he had giuen vnto him the Caſtell of Newarke. And then he chaſed Nigellus Biſhop of Ely. But ſayth Polidore, after he had thus finiſhed the matter with the Scottes, in hys returne againe into England he went to Wales and there beſieged and wanne Ludlow the head towne of thoſe partes, the which he founde poſſeſſed of his enimies, where Henrie prince of Scotland as he was in fight neere vnto the towne walles, was ſodeynly of the aduerſaries that were within the towne plucked from his horſſe with a crooked engine of Iron, and therewith had beene taken vp into the towne, if God had not ſo prouyded that the king came foorthwith and reſcued him in that preſent daunger.

About this tyme alſo he tooke ſuche diſpleaſure with his louing friend,
Roger biſhop of Sariſbury Roger Biſhop of Sariſbury, for that he ſuſpected him as he did all thoſe that had lately buylded any Fort or Caſtell to fauor the Empreſſe part, that he caſt him into priſon vntill the ſayd Roger had rendred vnto him his two Caſtels: of Vlſes and Sherborne the which himſelfe had builded. For the which the ſayde Roger in remembring the great ingratitude of the king, tooke ſuche thought that he dyed ſhortly after, and left behinde him in readie coyne in his ſayde Caſtels fourtie thouſand Markes, which after his death came to the Kings Cofers, and with that treaſure (ſayth Reynulph) he found the meanes to marry his ſonne Euſtace to Lady Conſtance the French kinges ſiſter.

About the fourth yere of his reigne, Dauid king of Scottes repenting 1138 him of his former agreement made with the king, entred of newe within the 4 boundes of Northumberland about the ryuer of Thayſe towarde the Prouynce of Yorke, and brent and ſlue the people, and ſpoyled the Countrie in Scottes rebell. moſt cruell wiſe, not ſparing neyther man woman nor chylde. Againſt whom Thurſton Archebiſhop of Yorke ouerthrew the king of Scottes. Thurſton Archebiſhop of Yorke by the kings commaundement was ſent, who with his power did acquite himſelfe ſo valiauntly, that he ouerthrewe the hoſte of the Scottes, and ſlue ten thouſand of them, and in fine compelled them to withdrawe againe into Scotland. Reynulph.

1139 In the firſt yere of his reigne, and in the Moneth of July, Mawde the 5 Empreſſe with her brother Robert and other of her friends entred the lande at the hauen of Portesmouth, and from thence went to Arundell and tooke

the Caſtell there. Then Robert Erle of Glouceſter leauing her in the ſayde Caſtell, hauing with him onely ten horſemen, with ſo many Archers on horſbacke, paſſed through his enimies Countries and ſped him to Glouceſter, as well to ſignifie vnto the people the landing of his ſiſter the Empreſſe, as to cauſe an armie to ayde hir. And though the ſame towne were at his comming manned with the kings power: Yet when the townesmen vnderſtood that he was come, they of their owne accorde put the kings Garriſons out of the towne and receyued him, that done the ſayde Erle not onely aſſembled an armie there, but found the meanes alſo that the places and Countrie adioinyng, willyngly ſubmitted themſelues vnto the Empreſſe.

Now when king Stephen who then layde ſiege to Wallyngford Caſtel vnderſtood that the Empreſſe was landed, he incontinent brake vp his ſiege, and with his whole power ſpedely addreſſed himſelfe to the towne of Arondell and beſieged the Caſtell. But when he had there continued his ſiege a certaine ſpace, and nothing was yet done accordyng to his expectation, ſome of them which were ſecrete friendes and ayders of the Empreſſe, ceaſſed not to beate into his head that the ſame Caſtell was impregnable, and therefore his lyng there was but in vaine, ſayyng further, that it were beſt for him to leaue his ſiege and ſuffer her to iſſue out, and to go to ſome other holde or place where he might more eaſily come by her, the which was done to this only ende, that ſhe beyng now in the caſe that ſhe was, not able to hold out any longer for lacke of victualles, might eſcape the preſent daunger ſhe was in, and flie to ſome other place of more ſuretie, where ſhee might make her ſelfe more ſtrong againſt her enemies. And ſo Stephen folowyng this deceyueable counſayle, departed incontinent with his armie ſo farre that the enemies ſhould not feare to iſſue out whether they would. The which thing the ſayd Empreſſe perceyuyng, departed thence in the dead of the night, and ſo kept on her iourney to Briſtowe, whether there came to her ſhortly after her commyng great ſuccours out of all partes of the Realme: The whiche when king Stephen was enformed of, he repented him (but to late) that he had folowed the former euill counſayle. Wherefore he haſtened him towards Briſtowe to the entent to lay ſiege to the towne, and there to encloſe his enemie if he might by any meanes. But the Empreſſe hearyng of his comming, and vnderſtanding his purpoſe, departed thence, and went firſt to Glouceſter and then to Lyncolne, where ſhe victualled the towne, and ſo fortefied it with men and munition, that ſhe might ſafely there tary till eyther ſhe were reſcued by the Erle her brother and others of her friendes, or elſe by the fauour and ayde of the Commons, be reſtored to her right without bloudſhed & battayle, and king Stephen depoſed. But he beyng aduertiſed what was there by her done, purſued after withall haſte and beſieged the ſame Citie.

After which ſeaſon the Erle Robert, and Reynulph before named with a great power of Welſhemen, and the power of the Empreſſe, came againſt the king intendyng to rayſe the ſiege. Where when both armies were redye to ioyne. The Erle Reynulph of Cheſter ſpake to his knightes and ſayde, I requyre you, that I that am cauſe of your perill, may be the firſt that ſhall enter into perill. Then aunſwered Erle Robert and ſayd, it is not vnworthie to thee that aſkeſt the firſt ſtroke and dignitie of this fight: for vnto thee it is fittyng, for nobleneſſe of blood and vertue of ſtrength in the which thou paſfeat other men: But the kinges false othe moueth men to warre and fight, wherein we muſt nowe eyther winne the mayſtry or be ouercome. And hee that hath none other ſuccour, is conſtreyned to defende himſelfe by knightly and ſtrong dedes of armes and of manhood, and ſo ſhall we nowe ioyne with them that are blemiſhed with guile & wickednelle, as Robert Erle of Mellent, the Erle alſo of Albemarle, and Simon of Hampton, the which is a man of great boaſt and ſmall might.

The oracion of Erle Baldwin.

Then king Stephen prepared to ſet forward his people, and Erle Baldwyn had wordes of comfort to the kinges people, and ſayde: Unto men that ſhall fight there are three ſpeciall thinges to be conſidered. The firſt is the quarrell, leaſt men fall into perill of the ſoule. The ſecond is the number of men of armes, leaſt men be ouerlayde and oppreſſed with to great a multitude. And the thirde is, the luſtineſſe, courage, and ſtrength of knightes, that the matter quayle not for lacke of ſtoute, hardie courage, and aſſured fightyng in the tyme of neede.

Thre things are requiſite to ſuch as fight in battayle.

As touchyng which three poyntes, I truſt we be well ſped. And furthermore if we note well what enemies we haue. Firſt we haue againſt vs Robert Erle of Gloceſter, who vſeth great threates, and performeth ſmall deedes. In mouth and countenaunce lyke a Lyon, but in heart a very ſheepe. He is glorious in ſpeeche, and darke in vnderſtandyng. There is alſo Reynulph Erle of Cheſter, a man without reaſon, and full of fooliſhe hardineſſe, redy and prompt to all conſpiracie, and vnſtedfaſt in al his deedes and attemptes: haſtie and furious of heart, and vnware of perilles. He aſſayeth oft to atchieue great deedes, but he bringeth none to effect. And what he fiercely and freſchely beginneth, he cowardly and fayntly forſaketh, as infortunate and vnhappy in all his dedes, and is ouercome in euery place, for he is a companion with baniſhed men and ſculkers, and the mo of them that are in a company, the ſooner they be ouerthrowne: and feeble they be in fightyng, for eyther of them putteth his truſt in his felow, whyle he hymſelfe is ouerthrowen.

A terrible Battaile.

But, before he could finiſhe his wordes, the crie of the enemies with nopes of Trumpettes, and neeyng of horſes were heard on euery ſyde, the battayles approched and ioyned together, and forth flew the arrowes, and a griſely and cruell fight was vpon both ſydes ſo long as it endured. By reaſon of which fight and the ſlaughter thereof, the greene fielde was turned into a perfite red, ſo that many a pale and wanne viſage was there ſene yelding vp of the ghoſt, with armes and legges diſſeuered and departed from the bodyes. A long while this fight ſtood in doubt, whether partie ſhould obteine victory. But in the ende king Stephens partie gaue backe and fled, but hee valiauntly abode in the fielde with a fewe of his knightes and was taken, and ſo he was brought vnto the Empreſſe: the which commaunded him to be conueyed vnder ſure keepyng vnto Briſtow, where he was kept as a priſoner, from Candlemas vnto holy Rood day then next enſuyng.

King Stephen taken priſoner.

When the Empreſſe had wonne this victorye, and had committed the king to warde, as before ye haue heard, ſhe was not therewith a little eralted, but thought in her mynde, that ſhe was in a ſuretie of the poſſeſſion of the whole Realme: But ſhe was deceyued, for the Countie of Kent tooke partie with king Stephen. And after this victory ſhe departed thence, and toke the towne of Ciceſter, and afterwardes went vnto Wincheſter, where ſhee was solemply receyued of the Bishop and the people with procession, and from thence came to Wilton, to Oxford, to Reding, and to Saint Albones, into the which Cities and townes she was ioyfully receyued withall honour, but especially was she welcomed of Theobaldus then Archebishop of Cantorbury, and many of the nobilitie besydes. Lastly, she came to London for to enter the state of the land, and while she remayned there, the Quene king Stephens wyfe made earnest labor for the deliuery of the king her husband, promising that he should surrender the land into her possession, and he to become a religious man, either else a pilgrim to his lyues ende. But all was in vaine, for she could purchase no grace as then vpon no maner of conditions.

The triumphing of Mawde the Empresse.

A large promise which was neuer purposed to be performed.

The Citizens of London also made great labour that they might vse the lawes of king Edward the Confessor, as they were graunted by William the Conquerour, and not the lawes of her father, which were of more streightnesse, whereof in no wyse they could get any graunt.

The Empresse was somewhat to streyght laced.

For this the Citizens were discontented, and knowyng that the Countrye of Kent which fauoured king Stephen would strength theyr party, purposed to haue taken her. But she beyng thereof warned, departed in haste, and left behinde her her store of houshold, and so fled vnto Orenford, where she abode, but her people was deuyded and scattered. And in this while she sent vnto Dauid the king of Scottes and her vncle for to ayde her, who in all haste came vnto her, and so went to Winchester, where she layde siege to the Bishoppes Tower, the which, the Bishop beyng the kinges brother at that tyme helde with great strength.

The fleyng of the Empresse.

Then the Queene with the ayde of her friendes, that is to say, of Kentishe men and other, made a strong hoste, whereof was chiefe Capitayne a knight named Guylliam Ypres. When the Empresse heard of the great strength of the Queene, and sawe that her awne dayly minished rather than encreased, was in such feare that she caused her selfe to be caryed in a horse Litter to Glouceſter as though shee had bene dead. But Erle Robert her brother was taken soone after, and put in prison, and Dauid king of Scots heeryng of this returned into Scotland.

A wise and couragious woman.

Then meanes was made vpon either side for the deliuery and exchaunge of prisoners, so that in ỹ end it was agreed, that the king should be deliuered for Erle Robert. But before this agreement was fully concluded, great losse and mischiefe was done within this Realme euery way, for the Empresse pilled and spoyled on her partie, and the Queene by manaces and promises borowed and tooke vpon the otherside, and the Souldiours stale, extorted, and spoyled vpon both parties, so that riche men were made needy, and the poore oppressed on euery side.

Prisoners exchaunged.

Pilling and spoyling of the Realme.

In this meane while the Empresse returned againe to Orenforde, and victualled it and manned it in her best maner. And lastly the king was deliuered vpon holy Rood day in Haruest, and soone after he compassed Orenford with a great armye, from the tyme of Michaelmasse vnto Christmasse nert folowyng, at which tyme and season, the Empresse vsed a newe guile for constraint and necessitie of victuall.

then constreyned by neede (as afore sayd) apparelled her and her company in white clothing, which a farre of semed like snow, and so vpon a plumbe going together as neere as they might, escaped the daunger of their enemyes, and so came first to the pyle or Castell of Sherebourne, and then to Wallingford. And from thence in short time, she departed with a small company into Normandy vnto her husband.

So soone as the Empresse was thus departed from Oxenford the towne was yelded vnto the king, where the king had much of the Empresse stuffe, aswell harnesse as other stuffe of household. Then the king entended to haue pursued her, but tidynges came vnto him that Reynulph Erle of Chester with an hoste of Welshemen was commyng towardes him: But by mediation of friendes this Reynulph in the ende was reconciled to the king, and was with him fully agreed. But shortly after sayth Reynulph, in a Parliament holden at Northamton, he was taken of the king by a traine, and not deliuered againe before he had geuen vp the Castell of Lincolne.

About this tyme as certeyne write, the Iewes then beyng in England crucifyed a childe named William in the Citie of Norwiche in derision of the Christian religion. And in the time of Henry the second, about the .vj. yere of his reigne (as sayth Reynulph) they crucifyed another at Glouceſter.

In the .xij. yere of his reigne, king Stephen was againe crowned at Lincolne after the geuyng vp of the sayd Citie where neuer none of his predecessors had bene euer crowned before.

Robert Erle of Glouceſter made also new warre vpon the king, at Wilton, so that he was in great perill, and like to haue fallen into Roberts daunger, and escaped but verye narowly. And there was taken a Barron of the kinges named Sir William Martell, for whose raunsome and deliuery, the king gaue after to the sayd Erle the Castell of Sherborne. And that done, the sayd Erle Robert began to buyld a strong Castell at Faringdon: Whereof the king beyng enformed, assembled his knightes and sped him thetherward, by meane whereof the worke was for that tyme empeached and let. These thinges done (sayth Polidore) the rage of warre ceased for a tyme. In the meane while, the king went vnto London, and there helde a Parliament, in the which he spake vnto his Nobles and Prelates as foloweth.

Robert Erle of Glouceſter well rewarded of the king.

Where you haue hetherto (my most deare and trusty Lords all) followed me as chiefe and head Capitaine in defending your libertie, I desire you that you will not nowe forsake me but do the lyke hereafter, and continue as loyall and faythful vnto me your souereigne liege Lord, as you haue hetherto bene: for as concerning me, though I haue not yet (I confesse) done my duetie in the princely regiment committed vnto me, accordingly yet certes it hath not bene for want of good will, but for that time hath not serued therunto, neyther can I now accomplish the same without your ayde and assistance. And because you shall not thinke that hetherto little or nothing hath beene done of any importaunce: you shall vnderstand that our enimies are already so weakened by my meanes, that will they nyll they, they must needes yeeld them shortly to our grace and mercie. There remayneth onely that you will for your partes helpe to maintaine those warres which by oure consent and counsayle were first begonne and taken in hande by mee, for the defence of the common wealth. And manye other wordes spake he vnto them of lyke sentence,

ſentence, to the entent to moue them to contribute to the afore ſayde warres as the preſent neceſſitie ſhould require.

When he had thus ſpoken euery man promiſed wyllingly to ayde him with that they might, aſwell for their awne ſafetie, as for the defence of the common libertie of the Realme. The Biſhops and Prieſtes alſo, becauſe it was not lawfull for them to fight, were contented yet to ayde him with money. For the which thing, he being deſyrous to gratefie them againe, cauſed it to be ordeyned and enacted in the Parliament, that whoſoeuer from that daye forwarde layde violent handes vpon any that was within holy orders, or did arreſt any ſuch, for what cryme ſoeuer it were, or take them priſoners without the ordinaries proceſſe and expreſſe commaundement, ſhould be accounted accurſſed, and neuer to be abſoyled againe, but of the Biſhop of Rome.

In the.xv. yere of his reigne, the Ryuer of Thamys was ſo ſtrongly ouer froſen that Horſe and Carte paſſed ouer vpon the Iſe.

It is alſo written by Robert a Chronicler that king Stephen conceyuing great diſpleaſure againſt the Citie of Worceſter, becauſe they receyued the Duke of Glouceſter and Mawde the Empreſſe, did therefore cauſe the ſame Citie to be ſet on fyre and brent to coles.

1151 17

In the. xvij. yere, Reynulph Erle of Cheſter dyed, and was the fourth Erle after the Conqueſt, and his ſonne Hugh was Earle after hym, which was a man of great ſtrength and power. And in the ſame yere (as ſayeth Guydo and other) dyed Geoffrey Plantagenet huſband of Mawde the Empreſſe. After whoſe death, Henry ſhort Mantell that was the ſonne of the ſayde Geoffrey and Mawde, was made Duke of Angeow and Normandy, who in fewe yeres after maried Elianour the daughter of the Erle of Poytowe, the which Elianour was before maried vnto Lewes king of France, and from him deuorced for neereneſſe of blood, when he had receyued of her two daughters named Mary, and Alice, as ſayth the French Chronicle. And ſo this Henry was Erle of Angeow by his father, and Duke of Normandy by his mother, and Erle of Poytowe by his wyfe.

The death of Geoffrey Plãtagenet.

It was not long after, that Euſtace the ſonne of king Stephen, wyth aide of the French king, warred vpon Henry Duke of Normandy, the which (as ſome write) was practiſed by Stephen his father, to the intent to let or ſtop him that he ſhould not come into England to clayme his inheritaunce. But Duke Henry defended himſelfe ſo knightly, that the ſaide Euſtace wan thereby lyttle honour and leſſe profite.

In olde Chronicle ſheweth that king Stephen entended to haue crowned the ſayd Euſtace his ſonne king of Englande by his dayes, but the Byſhoppes refuſed that deede by the commaundement of the Biſhop of Rome.

1152 18

In the.xviij.yere, the king layde ſiege vnto the Caſtelles of Newbury, of Walyngforde, and of Warwike & Warwell, the which had bene kept by the Empreſſe friendes, from the time of her departure vnto that day, and hoped of reſkues by Henry Duke of Normandy. But the king then wan the Caſtelles of Newbury and of Warwell, but Warwike and Wallyngford defended themſelues vntill the commyng of Henry the Duke, the which in the ende of the ſayde yere with a great armye entred England, and firſt wanne the Caſtell of Malmeſbury.

The landing of Henry Duke of Normandy.

And thence he went to London, and wanne the Tower, aſmuch by pollecy and by fayre promises, as by strength. And such stuffe of victuall and armour as he found therein, he sent to Walingford. And that done, he went to the towne of Walyngford, and wanne suche holdes as were thereabout, and diuerse other townes and Castelles mo. Then king Stephen with his power drewe towarde the Duke. And finally, by meane of mediators, as Thibalde Archbishop of Cauntorbury and other, both Princes to common of peace, met nere vnto the water of Urine, or Urne. But as fast as some laboured for peace, so fast other laboured to haue warre, so that at that communication the peace was not concluded.

After the king and the Duke were departed, the king went toward Ipswitch in Suffolke: And the Duke tooke the way towarde Shrewesbury, where he wanne the Castell of the sayd towne. From thence he went to Notyngham, and wan that towne, but would not meddle with the Castell, because he thought it to strong to be woonne. Wherefore the Souldiours that held the said Castell, seeing that the towne toke parte with the Duke, brake out in the night, and set the towne on fyre, and brent a great part thereof.

A peace concluded betwene king Stephen and Henry Duke of Normãdy.

Henry Duke of Normãdie proclaymed heyre apparant.

In this meane tyme Eustace the sonne of king Stephen, was by misaduenture drowned, and was buried at Feuersham in Kent, in the Abbey ỹ his father before had builded, howbeit for al this Thibald Archbishop of Cãterbury let not to labor & conclude the peace betwene the king & the Duke, and endeuored himselfe therin so diligently, that with the assistance of other of the Nobles, in the yere following a peace was concluded at Walingford, vpon diuerse conditions: wherof one was that the king should continue as king during his life, and that immediately after the conclusion of this peace, the sayd Henry should be proclaymed in all the chiefe cities & townes of England for heire apparant, & be king after the death of the said Stephen, & that the king should take him for his sonne by adoption & rightfull heyre vnto the crowne. To the which conenauntes iustly to be holden, the king was first sworne, and then his base sonne William and after his Lordes spirituall and Temporall, and so went both vnto London, where they were roially receiued. And when the king had feasted the Duke, and geuen vnto him riche gittes, he tooke his iourney toward Normandy. But the English Chronicle sayth that the accord was made vpon the deuision of the land betweene them, that is to say, that both should reigne together, and either of them to enioy halfe the lande. But how that deuision was made, or which part of the land eyther of them should holde, no mention thereof is made. And the former accorde should be concluded. viij. dayes folowyng the Epiphany of our Lorde in the towne of Orford: and the king dyed in the moneth of October folowyng, when he had reigned. xviij. yeres. v. monethes and. xviij. dayes, leauyng no lawfull issue behynd him, and was buryed in the Abbey of Feuersham whereof he himselfe was founder.

Duke Henry returned into Normandy.

Of diuerse authours, as Reynulph and other, it is recorded that this Stephen lyued in great veration and trouble all the time of his reigne.

And as before ye haue heard in the latter ende of the story of king William the Conquerour, that king Henry the second, and king Stephen, came of two sisters, after the opinion of some writers which were the daughters of king Henry the first who had maryed Molde the daughter of Malcolyne king of Scottes, whereof the elder was named Molde maried to Geoffrey

Plantagenet

Plantagenet of whome he begat king Henry the ſecond: And the other ſiſter named Mary was the mother of king Stephen: So alſo is it to be vnderſtand, that by king Henry the ſeconde returned the blood of the Saxons to the crowne of England, and ſo it did by Stephen, but yet more properly by king Henry the firſt, as by the diſcent of his mother expreſſed before in the ende of the ſtory of William Conquerour may apere. By which reaſon it foloweth, that the blood of William Conquerour reigned ouer England but lxviij. yeres, one moneth and .xvj. dayes, if it be accompted from the firſt yere of king William Conquerour, vnto the laſt yere of king Henry the firſt: But if we reckon it to the ende of the reigne of king Stephen, then was it .lxxxvij. yeres, and .xij. dayes.

By king Henry the ſecond the blood of the Saxons was reſtored againe.

Henrie the ſeconde.

HEnry the ſeconde of that name, ſonne of Geoffrey Plantagenet Erle of Angeow, and of Holde or Mawde the Empreſſe daughter of king Henry the firſt, began his reigne ouer the Realme of England the xxv. day of October M. C. liiij.

The diſcription of king Henry the ſecond.

This king was ſomedeale red of face, and broad breaſted, ſhort of body, and therewith fat, the which to aſſwage he tooke the leſſe of meates and drinkes, and much exerciſed himſelfe in huntyng, hawkyng, and ſuch lyke paſtimes. He was harriſh of boyce, but yet eloquent and well learned, and alſo noble and valiaunt in knyghthood, wiſe in counſayle, but dread ouermuche deſtinies. He was free and liberall to ſtraungers, and heard and holdyng from his familiers and ſeruauntes. And whome he loued or hated entierly, hard it was to turne him to the contrary. He loued reſt and peace, to the ende he might the rather folow his pleaſure, with mo vices reherſed by Gerald and others, the which for length I paſſe ouer.

Henry the ſecond a couragious prince.

Howbeit as Reynulph witneſſeth he was not barren of all vertues, for he was of ſo great a courage, that he would often ſay, that all the worlde ſuffiſed not to a couragious heart. And he encreaſed his heritage ſo mightily, that he wanne Irelande, anone after his coronation by ſtrength, and tooke the king of Scottes priſoner, and ioyned that kingdome of Scotlande to hys awne. From the South Ocean, vnto the North Iſlandes of Orcades, he cloſed all the landes as it were vnder one dominion, and ſpred ſo largely his Empire, that we read not that any of his progenitors had ſo many Bzourynces and Countreys vnder their gouernance and rule. For beſyde the Realme of England and Scotland, he had in his rule Normandy, Gaſcoyne, and Guyan, Angeow and Poyters: and he made ſubiect to him Aluerne and other landes. And by Elianor his wyfe he obteyned as in her right, the Erle-dome of Tolous.

Ireland ioyned to the crowne of England.

Henry the ſecond greatly enlarged his dommion.

King Henry the ſeconde had by Elianor his wife tr. children.

Of the which wife he receyued fiue ſonnes, and thre daughters, the which fiue ſonnes had to name, William, Henry, Richard, Godfrey, and John, but what the firſt was called is not remembred of wryters. The eldeſt of the maydens was named Holde or Mawde, and was maryed to the Duke of Saxon, the ſecond Elianor, maryed to the king of Spaine, and the thirde named Jane, maryed to the king of Sicile.

Princes are ſubiect to eyme.

This Henry was proſperous in his beginnyng, and infortunate in the ende, and ſpecially in the laſt fiue yeres of his reigne, for in the firſt of thoſe fiue yeres, his ſtrength began to miniſhe: The ſecond yere he loſt a voyage in Irelande: In the thirde, he loſt Aluerne, warryng agaynſt the King of Fraunce: In the fourth yere he loſt Bziteyn, and in the fifte the Citie of Cenomanna, and Turon, with many Holdes to them belongyng.

When tidynges was brought vnto this Henry of king Stephens death, he fortuned to lye at the ſiege of a Caſtell which was withholden and kept from him by the frenche king. And beyng aduertiſed by his counſayle forthwith to breake vp his ſiege, and to haſten him into England to take poſſeſſion of the Crowne, leaſt happely any ſtyrre or buſineſſe might ariſe by protractyng of ꝑ time: he vpon the affiance that he had in his rightfull cauſe aunſwered againe, that no man durſt be ſo hardie as to attempt any thing agaynſt him. And ſo though he were dayly counſayled to the contrary, yet would he not depart before he had wonne the ſayde Caſtell. That done, he ſped him into England, and was crowned at Weſtminſter of Theobald Archbiſhop of Cauntorbury, not without great ſolemnitie and reioyſing of the people, the Sonday before Chriſtmas day. 1154. At the which coronation he made a very ſweete and comfortable oration vnto the people, and ſo louyngly ſpake vnto them both generally and priuately, that euery man conceyued thereby great hope of his good gouernment to come, and that they ſhould haue a very good and gracious Prince of him.

The coronation of king Henry the ſecond.

In the firſt yere of his reigne, after he had choſen certeyne graue, wiſe, diſcrete, and well learned men in the lawes of the Realme to be of his priuie counſaile, and had by their aduice reformed the ſayd lawes, then becauſe iuſtice and equitie ſhould no lenger be oppreſſed by ſuch malefactors, as being called out of foreyn countryes by king Stephen to ſerue him in his warres, were not afeard to commit all kinde of miſchiefe, vnder pretence of a libertie permitted to Souldiours by the law of armes in warre tyme: he made proclamation, that all ſuch ſtraungers whatſoeuer they were, ſhould auoide the Realme by a day aſſigned, vnder a great paine: But eſpecially the Flemings whereof at that tyme there was a great number come hether, whome he hated more then any other Nation. That done, he raſed diuerſe Caſtelles that before in the tyme of King Stephen were buylded, eyther for diſpleaſure of the owners, or for that they ſtood not commodiouſly and for his purpoſe: Or elſe for feare leaſt they ſhould at any time be forteſyed of his enemyes againſt him. Furthermore, he baniſhed many of the Lordes and gentlemen that were highly in king Stephens fauour. And from ſuch as by purchace, gift, or otherwiſe helde any landes, ſometimes belongyng to the Crowne, he tooke the ſayde landes and ſeaſed vpon them in whoſe handes ſoeuer they were.

Straungers auoided out of the realme.

Caſtelles deſtroyed and raſed to the ground.

Lordes and gentelmen are baniſhed.

Landes that belonged to the crowne are taken in agayne.

The birth of Henry the first sonne of king Henry the seconde.

In the beginnyng of the seconde yere which was the yere of our Lorde M.C.lv. Quene Eleanor his wyfe was brought a bed of a man childe whom he called Henry.

This yere he went downe into the North Countrie, and so to Yorke, where he stalled into his handes certeyne Castelles and Fortes which had bene a great while possessed of priuate personnes: But especially the strong Castell of Scarborough. After this he tooke from the Scottishe king the Countrie of Comberland, and then went he to Northumberlande, and recouered that Countrey wholy, notwithstanding that it was geuen vnto king Dauid of Scotland by Mawde the Empresse his mother, because the sayde Dauid tooke part with her against king Stephen, the which countries were at that season in the handes and possession of Malcolme who succeded the said Dauid: But because he would not seme altogether vngratefull vnto him, that had so well deserued of his mother, he permitted the sayde Malcolme still to enioy and reteyne the Erledome of Huntingdon, the which, as is before sayde, king Stephen gaue vnto Henry the eldest sonne of Dauyd: But yet on condicion that he should sweare to do homage and fealtie vnto him for the same Erledome.

Straunge & wonderfull sightes,

In the thirde yere of his reigne, about the moneth of October were sene in the Firmament wonderfull sightes, that is to say two Sunnes. And in the Moone was there sene also a red Crosse. Of this wonder sheweth the Author of Chronica Chronicarum, saiyng that about this tyme in Italy there appered three Sunnes by the space of three houres in the West. And in the yere folowyng apered three Moones whereof the middle Moone had a red crosse ouerthwart, which is there set out and noted for a prodigie and token of the Schisme that afterwardes fell amongest the Cardinalles about the election of the Bishop of Rome Alexander the thirde, the which Schisme endured almost.xx.yeres.

Adrian the fourth an English man made Bishop of Rome, and his iudgemēt of ỹ Papacy.

About this tyme Adrian the fourth of that name called Nicholas was Bishop of Rome, borne at Saint Albons or nere there aboutes, and as Reynulph writeth was a bondman of the Abbey, who because he desyred to be professed a monke in the sayde Monastery, and could not be receyued, went shortly after beyond the seas, where he profited so much in learnyng that the Bishop of Rome made him first Bishop of Alba, and afterwardes Cardinal, and at the last after the death of Anastasius Bishop of Rome, he was chosen Bishop of Rome. And beyng aduaunced to the Popedome, he gaue many great priuileges to the sayd Abbey. At the length he dyed beyng choked with a flie in his drink, who a little before his death affirmed that there was no kinde of life more miserable than the Papacie, he that desyreth to knowe more of this Bishop, may reade the seconde booke and first Chapter of William of Newbrowghe.

Hugh Mortimer a rebel, submitteth himselfe and is pardoned.

The same yere also Hugh Mortimer a very prowde and hawtie man fortified dyuers townes and holdes against the king, as Gloceſter, Worceſter and the Castle of Bridgenorth. And when he sawe the kings power bent against him, he humbly submitted himselfe, and had his pardon.

The birth of Richard after called Richard Cuer de Lion.

Richard, surnamed (for his manhood) Cuer de lyon, in English, Lyons hart, was this yere borne at Oxford, in the kings Palace there, which as is before sayde was buylded by Henrie the first, and afterwards geuen by Richard Duke of Cornewall brother vnto king Henrie the thirde, vnto the order of the Carmelites then newly come into this Realme, to make them a house to inhabite in, which was called as it is yet at this day ỹ white Friers.

After this sayeth Polidore, the Realme of Englande was verye quyet and king Henry at peace, aswell with his owne subiectes as with other forrein nations, vntill worde was brought him that his brother Geoffrey made a great sturre and businesse beyonde the sea, the originall cause wherof was this. Geoffrey Plantagenet his father lying on his death bed, left behinde him three sonnes, that is to say, Henry, Geoffrey and William, and ordeyned by his will and last testament that whensoeuer his eldest sonne Henry should chaunce to be in full possession, as well of the Realme of England, as of the Dukedome of Normandy, that then and from thencefoorth, his brother Geoffrey to haue and hold as in his owne proper right and inheritance the whole Countie and Erledome of Anioye: And in the meane season, vntill it fell vnto him, to haue the possession of these three Townes following, that is to saye, Chinon, Lendum and Mirabellum, bicause that when God should call for his father he hauing the aide of the aforesayd three townes might the easier come by his right, and not be lightly kept from the possession thereof. And fearing least his sonne Henry (who was then absent) woulde afterwardes breake this his will and testament, he compelled diuers noble men and prelates that then were present to promise him vpon their othe that they would not suffer his body to be enterred before they had receiued a corporall othe of his sonne Henrye for the firme and inuiolable performance thereof. The whiche othe Henry afterwardes tooke (though full sore against his will) more to auoyde the great infamy and dishonour that should haue else ensued vpon the denial thereof, then otherwise. But not long after when by the death of king Stephen, he was crowned king of England, being inflamed with ambition, and following the nature of all couetous persons, who the more they haue, the more they desire, he so vsed the matter with Adrian the fourth then Bishop of Rome, that he was by him dispensed of his aforesayde othe. And being so dispensed withall, contrarie to all right, equitie, law and conscience, he then little regarding his fathers will, made warre vpon hys sayde brother, and in short time subdued him: & so spoyling him of his rightfull inheritance sealed the sayde Erledome into his owne handes. Howbeit, he gaue him afterwardes certaine other landes in recompence, bicause he should not lack lyuing to maintaine his estate. But the sayde Geoffrey being thus vnnaturally intreated of his brother lyued not long after. Polidore.

All this while there was priuie grudge and hart burnyng betwene king Henry of England and Lewes of Fraunce, neyther could the same be otherwise quenched, then by oft renuyng of amitie and frendship betwixt them, the which yet was euermore but coloured and dissembled on both parties for the tyme, insomuch that it would burst out againe vpon the least occasion that might be. The chiefe cause of this mutuall grudge was for that Henry maried Aleanor, from whom the said Lewes as is beforesaid, had bene before deuorced, after he had had two daughters by her. This Aleanor was nere and

For confirmation whereof, it was agreed betwixt the sayd two Princes, that Henry the second sonne of king Henry, but the eldest then aliue, beyng a child of. viij. yeres of age, shoulde mary the daughter of Lewes the. viij. named Margaret beyng then but three yeres olde. The which daughter the sayde Lewes receyued of his seconde wife Constance the daughter of the king of Spaine: and this conclusion of peace & mariage was (as both Polidore and William of Newbrough do affirme) the. viij. yere of ỹ reigne of king Henry.

This yere also was the Citie of Cauntorbury almost all brent and consumed with fyre, although Fabian sayth that it was in the sixt yere.

The same yere also dyed Theobalde Archebishop of Cauntorbury. This man was a great fauourer of good letters and learned men, but especially he loued (for what qualities I know not) Thomas Becket a Londoner borne, the sonne of one Gilbert Becket, & of a woman of Siria. Insomuch that he not onely made him Archedeacon of Cauntorbury, but also was a meane vnto the king that he was made Lorde hauncelour of England. Of the which Theobald it is also written, that immediately after his election to the Archebishoprick, he went to Rome, and there receyued his Pall of Innocent the second, and was made of him Legate. And hereof it came that al other Archbishoppes that succeded him were euermore called Legati nati.

The same yere Queene Aleanor was brought a bed of a daughter named Mawde. And shortly after the death of the sayde Theobald, Thomas Becket aforesayd, was by the kinges procurement chosen and consecrated Archebishop of Cauntorbury, that is to say the .ix. yere of king Henry.

And this yere the Queene was brought a bed at Roan of a daughter which was called Aleanor, after her mothers name.

About this time king Henry caused all the States and Prelates of his Realme to sweare fealtie to his sonne Henry, a Prince of great towardnesse: And of all other, Thomas Lorde Chauncelor and Archebishop of Cauntorbury was the first that tooke the othe, with reseruation of the fealtie all ready made vnto the king his father so long as he lyued.

Fealty sworn to the kinges sonne in the life of his father.

Not long after the sayd Archebishop resigned the office of the Chauncelorship, and gaue vp the great Seale into the kinges handes, the which the king tooke in very euill part.

The yere folowyng which was the yere of our Lord. M. C. lxiij. and the x. yere of the reigne of the king, there fell great variance betwene the king and the sayde Thomas Becket, insomuch that the kinges minde was nowe cleane alienated from him: The occasion and ground of which variance shall afterwardes be declared.

1165 12 William king of Scottes doth homage and fealtie to king Henry.

The.xij. yere of his reigne dyed Malcolme king of Scottes, next after whome ſucceded his brother William, who as ſone as he was crowned went to London and there did homage and fealtie vnto king Henry, as Malcolme had done before. But Reynulph in his.vij.booke, and.xxiij. Chapter ſetteth forth the maner and doyng of this homage as foloweth. This yere (ſayth he) the.xij. day before September, William king of Scotland by the aſſent of his Lordes and Barons came vnto Yorke where then king Henry was with his Nobles, and there ſware fealtie and made his homage vnto the ſayd king Henry of England. And alſo the ſayd king William did then and there confeſſe and acknowledge by his letters patentes that he and his ſucceſſors, men of Scotland, ſhould do homage, allegeance and fealtie to the kinges of England, as often as they ſhall be requyred therevnto. And in token of this ſubiection, the ſayde king of Scotland offered his Hat, and his Saddell vpon Saint Peters aulter in the Church of Yorke, which are extant there to be ſeene at this day. And moreouer the Lordes of Scotlande there preſent at that time, tooke their othe in ſolempne maner, that if the king of Scotlande would withdrawe him at any tyme from the ſayd fayth and loyaltie, that then they would ryſe againſt him, and ſo remaine his enemyes, vntill he would returne and reconcile himſelfe.

Geoffrey the kinges ſonne maried to Cõſtance the daughter of the Duke of Britayn.

About this time dyed Conanus Duke of Britayne without iſſue male, leauyng behinde him one onely daughter named Conſtance, which though ſhe were then vnder age and not yet mariable, king Henry found the meanes to mary his ſonne Geoffrey vnto, and ſo was his ſtrength and dominion not a littell encreaſed thereby.

In the.xiij. yere of his reigne dyed Mawde the Empreſſe the kinges mother, a woman as well for her wiſedome and pollecye in warres, as all other her notable qualities incomparable.

Mawde maried to ỹ duke of Saxony.

This tyme alſo the kinge maryed his daughter Mawde vnto Henry Duke of Saxony.

King Henry with his ſon, ſayleth into Britayne.

After this the king beyng at peace with all forreine nations from the.xiij yere of his reigne the ſpace of two yeres and more, becauſe he would not idely conſume the tyme, neyther yet ſuffer his ſouldiours by feaſtyng, banquetyng, and other vnſittyng paſtymes, which they are commonly wont to geue themſelues vnto in peace tyme, which ſhould withdrawe their myndes from martiall affayres, taking his ſonne with him, made a voyage into Britayne, where he ſpent a great part of his time in ridyng about and viewyng of the Countrie, and in fortifiyng of townes and holdes, and finally in hauyng of familier conference and friendly talke with the noble men there. Then departyng from thence he went into Normandy, and there alſo tooke order with matters of that Countrie accordyngly. Theſe thinges done, in the beginnyng of the next ſpring, he returned into England, but not without ſome miſfortune vpon the ſea: For one of his Shippes was drowned by tempeſt, wherein as it is reported were three hundreth perſons which were all drowned. And after his returne he went to Windſore, where he made his abode and kept his Chriſtmas, and the greateſt part of all the Nobles of the realme were there with him. And thether came alſo king William of Scotlande

Now to returne vnto Thomas Becket: the cause of the aforesayd varyaunce and discention betwixt the king and him was as it is written of diuers Authours of good credite, that certein wicked persons of the Clergie whose murders, robberyes, and grieuous transgressions against the lawes of the Realme, beyng declared to the king by his Iudges: The king therewith was not a little agreeued, and for reformation therof, called a Parliament in the. ix. yere of his reigne at Northampton, requiryng to haue established by authoritie thereof, that due punishment might be executed vpon such transgressors of the Clergie of this Realme accordyng to the auncient order of the lawes: notwithstanding the prerogatiue and priuelege which the ecclesiasticall persons claymed, saiyng that they were exempt from all temporall iurisdiction. Thomas Becket then beyng Archebishop of Cauntorbury, vnderstandyng the king to go about to set lawes, preiudiciall to the priuelege of the Clergie, would not agree therevnto, desiryng the king that vnder Christ our newe king, and vnder the newe lawe of Christ he woulde not bring in anye newe proceedyngs agaynst the ordinances and decrees of the auncient holye fathers: And if he would, he sayde that he neither ought to sustaine it, nor would not. The king beyng moued therewith, alleageth againe and exacteth the olde lawes and customes of his Grandfather, obserued and agreed vpon by Archebishops, Bishoppes, Prelates, and other priueleged persons, requiryng likewise of him, whether he would agree to the same, or else now in his reigne condempne that, which in the reigne of his Grandfather was well alowed. And those constitutions are in number, xxviij. or xxix. whereof certeine folowe.

Lawes and constitutions ordeyned by king Henry the first.

Al ecclesiastecall persons are subiect in all criminall causes to the temporall law.

4 No Archebishop nor Bishop, nor person being of any Ecclesiasticall dignitie, to attempt to go ouer the Sea out of the Realme without the kings knowledge and permission, and in so doing, yet notwithstanding to be bound, tarying in any place to procure no damage eyther to the king or to ỳ realme.

they were borne and brought vp.

¶ Beſides theſe conſtitutions there were many other which I paſſe ouer, for that the afore reherſed articles are the chiefe. And now let vs returne to the matter betwirt the king and Thomas Becket aforeſayd.

The king as is aforeſayde, conuentyng hys nobles and Clarkes together, required to haue the punithment of the aforeſayde miſdoers of the Clergie. But Thomas Becket would not conſent therevnto. Wherfore the king demaunded of him whether he woulde conſent with hys Clergie, that the cuſtomes then ſet foorth in the realme (meaning the firſt parte of the aforeſayde decrees) ſhould be obſerued. To the which the Archbiſhop conſulting together with his brethren, giueth aunſwere agayne, that he was contented the kings ordinances ſhould be obſerued, adding this withall Saluo ordine ſuo, that is, ſauing his order. And ſo in lyke maner all the other Biſhops after, being demaunded in order, anſwered with the ſame addition Saluo ordine ſuo. Onely Hillarius Biſhop of Chicheſter, perceyuing the king to be exaſperate with that addition, in ſtead of Saluo ordine ſuo, was agreed to obſerue them bona fide. The king hearing them not ſimplye to agree vnto him but with an exception, was greatly offended, who then turning to the Archbiſhop and the Prelates, ſayde: that he was not well content with that clauſe of theirs Saluo ordine ſuo, which he ſayde was captious and deceytfull, hauing ſome maner of venym lurcking vnder it, and therefore required an abſolute graunt of them, without any exception, to agree to the former ordynaunces. To thys the Archbiſhop replyeth that they had ſworne vnto hym their fidelitie, both lyfe, body and earthly honour: Saluo ordine ſuo: and that in the ſame earthly honour, all thoſe ordynances were comprehended. And to the obſeruing of them they would bynde themſelues after none other forme, but as they had ſworne before. The king with this was moued, and all his nobilitie, and that not a little. The day beyng well ſpent the king when he could get none other aunſwere of them, departed in great anger, geuyng no worde of ſalutation vnto the Biſhops. And likewiſe euery one of the Biſhops departed to his awne houſe. The biſhop of Chicheſter among the reſt was greatly rebuked of his felowes for chaungyng the exception contrary to the voice of all the other. The next day folowyng the king tooke from the Archebiſhop all ſuche honours and Lordſhippes as he had geuen him before, in the tyme that he was Chauncelour, whereby appered the great diſpleaſure that the king bare againſt him and the Clergie.

Hillarius Biſhop of Chicheſter.

The king ſheweth himſelf diſpleaſed with Thomas Becket.

Not long after this, the king remouyng from London, vnknowyng to the Biſhoppes, ſayled ouer into Normandy, where the Biſhop of London called Gilbert, not long after reſorted to him to craue his fauour: and gaue him counſayle withall to ioyne ſome of the Biſhoppes on his ſyde, leaſt if all were againſt him, peraduenture he might the ſooner be ouerthrowne. And thus the greateſt number of the Biſhoppes were by this meanes reconciled againe vnto the king, except the Archebiſhop and a fewe other Biſhoppes. The king thinking to trie all maner of wayes, when he ſawe neither feare, nor threates coulde turne them, he did then aſſay them with gentleneſſe, but it would not ſerue. Many of the Nobles labouring betwirt them both, exhorted the Archebiſhop to relent vnto the king, but it would not be. Bishop of Chester did the same afterwarde, his owne household dayly called vpon him, but no man could perswade him. At length he hauing vnderstanding, partly by them that came to him, what danger might happen not onely to himselfe, but to all the other of the Clergie, vpon the kinges displeasure, and partly also considering the obedience and kindenesse of the king towardes him in times past, was content to geue ouer to the kinges request, and came to Clerendon to the king, reconcilyng himselfe about the addicion which had displeased the king so much. Whereupon the king beyng somewhat mitigated, receyued him with a more cheerefull countenaunce (but yet not so familiarly as before) saying that he would haue his ordinances and proceedinges after that forme confirmed in the publique audience and open sight of his Bishoppes and all his Nobles. After this, the king beyng at Clarendon, there called his Nobilitie and Prelates before him, requiryng to haue that performed, which they had graunted in consenting to the obseruing of his Grandfathers ordinances and proceedyngs. The Archebishop of Cantorbury suspectyng somewhat in the kinges promise, drewe backwarde, and now would not, that before he would: And to perswade him to obedience: First came vnto him the Bishop of Sarisbury, and of Norwich, who for olde matters were in daunger to the king long before, weping & lamentyng to the Archbishop, desyryng him to haue some compassion on them, and to remit this pertinacye to the kyng, least if he so continued, through his stoutenesse to exasperate the kinges displeasure, haply it might redound to no small daunger, not onely to them which were in ieopardie all redy, but also to himselfe to be imprisoned, and the whole Clergie to be endaungered. Beside these two Bishoppes, there went to him other two noble peeres of the Realme, labouryng with him to relent, & condiscend to the kinges desyre. If not, they should be enforced to vse violence, as neyther would stand with the kings fame, and much lesse with his quietnesse. But he would not geue ouer. After this came to him two Rulers of the Temple called Templares, one named Richard de hall: another called Constance de Honerio with their company, lamenting and bewailyng the great perill, which they declared vnto him to hang ouer his head, and yet neyther with their teares, nor with their kneelynges would he be remoued. At the length came the last message from the king, signifiyng vnto him with expresse wordes, and also with teares what he should trust vnto, if he would not geue ouer vnto the kinges request.

By reason of which message, he either terrefied or else perswaded, was content to submit himselfe: Whereupon the king incontinent assembling the States together, the Archebishop first before all other begynneth to promise to the king obedience, and submission vnto his customes, and that cum bona fide, leauing out his former addicion, Saluo ordine, mencioned before, in steede whereof, he promised in verbo veritatis, to obserue and keepe the kinges customes, & sweare to the same. After him the other bishops likewise made the like othe. Whereupon the king commaunded certeine instrumentes obligatory to be drawen, of the which the king should haue one, the Archbishop of Cantorbury another, and the Archbishop of Yorke the thirde, requiryng also the sayd Archbishop to set to his hande and seale. To the which the Archbishop although not denyyng but that he was willyng so to do, yet desired respyte in the matter while that he beyng come hut newly to his Bishoprike might bet-

Thomas Becket repenteth his ouersight and ouersence to the king.

Alanus one of the foure writers of the lyfe of this Thomas Becket, recordeth that the Archbishop in his voiage toward Winchester began greatly to repent that he had done before, partly through the instigation of certain about him, but chiefely of his crosse bearer, who goyng before the Archbishop did sharpely and earnestly rebuke him, for geuyng ouer to the kings request, against the priuilege and liberties of the Church, polluting not onely his fame & conscience, but also geuyng a pernicious example to them that should come after, with many like wordes.

To make the matter short, the Archebishop was so touched vpon the same, with such repentance, that kepyng himselfe from company, lamentyng with teares, with fastyng, and with much penaunce, beatyng and scourgyng his owne body, did also suspend himselfe from all diuine seruice, and would not receyue comfort, before he had sent to the Pope, and had graunt that he should be assoyled of him, who directed to him againe letters by the same messenger that came from the sayde Archebishop. In which letters, he not onely assoyled him of his trespasse, but also with wordes of great consolation did courage him to be stoute in the quarrell he toke in hand. Vpon these letters of the Pope, Becket was not a little comforted & incouraged. The king heering of Thomas Beckets going back & how he denied to set his seale to those fashions which he cõdiscended vnto before, toke no litle displeasure against him, insomuch as he threatnyng to him banishment and death, began to call him to recoumptes, and to burthen him with paymentes, that all men might vnderstand that the kinges mynde was fore set against him. The Archbishop hereupon, whether more for the loue of ỹ Pope, or dread of his Prince, thought to make an escape out of the realme, and so crept out in the night with two or three with him, stealing from his household, & attempted to take the sea priuily, but the weather not seruyng him, he was driuen home againe. And shortly after that he was gone, his departure was knowne and noysed abroade: By reason of which noyes the kinges officers came to Cauntorbury, and purposed to haue sealed vpon his goodes on the kinges behalfe. But as it chaunced the night before their commyng, Becket returned and was founde at home, wherefore they did not proceede in their purpose. Nowe Becket well vnderstandyng the king to be fore bent against him, and perceyuyng that the Seas would not serue him, made haste to the Court, the king lying then at Woodstocke, where the king receyued him after a certeyne maner, but nothyng so familiarly as he was wont, taunting him iestingly and merily, as though one Realme were not able to holde them both. Becket, although he was permitted to go and come at his pleasure to the Court, yet he coulde not obteyne the fauour that he would, perceyuyng both in himselfe, and confessyng no lesse vnto others howe the matter would fall out, so that eyther he should be constreyned to geue ouer with shame, or stoutely he must stande to that which he had so boldely taken in hande. The Archebishop of Yorke in the meane time goyng betweene the king and Becket, laboured to make peace and loue betweene them: But the king in no case would be reconciled, onlesse the other would subscribe to his lawes. So that while the king would none otherwise otherwise agree, neither that Becket would in no wise subscribe, there was a foule discorde betwixt them. The king for his regall auctho*ri*tie thought it much that any subiect of his should stande against him. The Archbishop againe thinking himselfe to haue so good a quarrell as in the defendyng of the liberties of the Church, and also bearing himselfe bold vpon the letters of the Pope lately written vnto him, thought himselfe strong ynough against the king and all the realme beside. Wherefore the Archebishop trustyng to these thinges, would geue no place, but by vertue of his Apostolike auctho*ri*tie gaue censure vpon these lawes and constitutions of the king, condemnyng some, and other some approuyng for good and Catholike. Besides this there came also to the king Rotrodus Archbishop of Roan sent from the Pope to make peace betweene the king and the Archebishop. To the which the king was well content to agree, so that the Pope would agree to ratefie his ordinaunces. But when that could in no wyse be obteyned at the Popes handes, then the king thus beyng stopped and frustrate of his purpose by reason of Beckets Apostolike Legacie, beyng Legatus a latere: thought good to send vp to the Pope: and so he did to obteyne of him, that the same auctho*ri*tie of the Apostolike Legacy might be cõferred to another, after his apointment which was the Archbishop of Yorke: But that the Pope denied. Notwithstandyng at the request of the kinges Clergie, the Pope was content that the king shoulde be Legate himselfe, whereat the king tooke great indignation as (Houeden wryteth) so that he sent the Pope his letters againe.

The king disdayneth to be the Popes Legate.

And when the kings Ambassadors were returned with the aforesaid letters, & had declared the kings pleasure & request. The Pope at the last graũted, that the Legate should be remoued, & that the Archbishop of Yorke should be placed in that office after his owne request. And yet addeth this promise withall, that the sayd Becket should receyue no harme nor domage thereby.

Thomas Becket cited to appere at Northampton

Assone as the king had receyued the Popes letters to authorise the Archbishop of Yorke in the Legacie, he then caused Becket to be cyted vp to appeere by a certayne day at the towne of Northampton, there to make answere to suche things as should be layde to his charge. So when the daye was come, all the Peeres and Nobles with the Prelates of the realme vpon the kings proclamation beyng assembled in the Castell of Northampton great faulte was found with the Archebishop, for that he beyng cited personally came not himselfe, but sent another for him. The cause why he came not (Houeden sayth) was this, because the king had placed his horse and horsemen in the Archebishops lodging, which was a house there of Chanons, wherewith he being offended, sent worde agayne that he would not appere onlesse his lodgings were auoyded of the kinges horsemen. Wherevpon by publique sentence as well of the Nobles as of the Bishops, his moueables were adiudged to be confiscate for the king.

A iudgement geuen against Thomas Becket.

The Archbishop againe for his parte against the order and forme of that iudgement complayned, alleging for himselfe, that seing he was the Primate & spirituall father, not only of all other in the realme, but also of the king himselfe, he thought it not cõuenient, ỳ father so to be iudged of hys children, nor the pastor of the flock so to be cõdempned. And this was the first daies action.

A stoute replie of Thomas Becket.

The next daye following the king layde an action against him, for one that was his Marshall called John, for certaine iniurie done to hym, and required of the sayde Archbishop the repayeng againe of certayne money, which he as he sayde had lent vnto him in the tyme he was Chauncelour, the somme whereof was fyue hundreth Markes. This money the Archebishop denyed not but that he had receyued it of the king, albeit by the waye and tytle of gift (as he tooke it) though he could bring no proofe thereof. Whereupon the king required hym to put in assurance for the payment thereof, whereat the Archbishop making delayes, not well contented at the matter, he was so called vpon, that eyther he should be comptable to the king for the money, or else he should incurre present daunger, the king being so bent against him. The Archbishop being brought to such a strayte, and destitute of his awne suffraganes, could not here by no meanes escape, had not fyue persons of their awne accorde stepped in, being bound for him, euery one in one hundreth Markes, and this was vpon the second day concluded.

The morrow after which was the thirde daye of the Counsayle, as the Archbishop was sitting beneth in a conclaue with his fellow Bishops about him, consulting togither, the sayde Bishops labored by sundry wayes and meanes, and with verie vehement perswasions and learned arguments to wyll him to obedience and to submit himselfe to the king, the which persuasions for the length of them I doe here omit: But to conclude, when they had long spent their labour, good wyll and wisedome, to haue reduced him to good order, he would not condiscend vnto them, but sayde as followeth.

I bolde and stoute answere made by Thomas Becket.

I perceyue sayth he, and vnderstand that ye go aboute to maintaine and cherishe but your owne cowardnesse vnder the colourable shadowe of sufferance, and vnder the pretence of dissembling softnesse, to choke the libertie of Christes Church: who hath thus bewitched you, O vnsaciable Bishoppes? what meane ye? why do you so vnder the impudent title of forbearing, beare a double heart, and cloke your manifest iniquitie? What call ye this bearing with tyme, the detriment of the Church of Christ? Let termes serue the matter, why peruert you the matter that is good with vocables and termes vntrue? For that ye say we must beare with the malice of tyme, I graunt with you, but yet we must not heape sinne to sinne. Is not God able to helpe the state and condicion of his Church, but with the sinfull dissimulation of the teachers of the Church? Certes God is disposed to tempt you. And tell me I pray you, when should the gouernours of the Church put themselues to dangers for the Church, in tyme of tranquilitie or in tyme of distresse? Ye will be ashamed to denie the contrary, but in distresse. And nowe then the Churche lyng in so great distresse and veration, why should not the good pastour put himselfe in perill therfore? For neither do I thinke it a greater act or merite, for the auncient bishops of the olde tyme, to found the Church than with their blood, or then now for vs to shead our blood for the liberties of the same. And to tell you plaine, I thinke it not safe for you, to swarue from the forme and example which you haue receyued of your holy elders.

After these thinges were spoken, they sate all in silence a certaine space, beyng locked in together as aforsayde: But at the length to finde a shift to cause the dore to be opened, I woulde sayth the Archebishop speake with two Erles that are about the king, and named them who they were, which beyng called, opened the dore and came in with haste, thinkyng to heare some thing which shoulde appease the kinges minde, to whome the Archbishop spake in this maner. As touching and concernyng the matters betwene the king king and vs, we haue here conferred together. And forasmuch as we haue them not here present with vs now, which know better in the matter than we do, whose aduise we would also be glad to follow, therefore we craue so much respyte as vntill to morow, and then we will be redy to geue vp our answere vnto the king: with this message two bishops were sent vnto the king, which was the Bishop of London and the Bishop of Rochester.

London to helpe the matter, and to set quietnesse, addyng somethyng more to the message, sayde to the king, that the Archebishop craued a little delay of time to prepare suche writyngs and instrumentes, wherein he should set forth and declare his mind, in accomplishing the kinges desyre. &c. Wherfore two Barons were sent to him from the king to graunt him that respite or stay, so that he woulde ratefie that which the messengers had signified to the king. To the which the Archebishop aunswereth that he sent no suche message as was intimate in his name: but onely that the next day he woulde come and geue aunswere to the king, in that which he had to say. And so the conuocation of the Bishoppes dissolued, and they were dismissed home. So that the most part of them that came with the Archebishop and accompanied him before, for feare of the kinges displeasure seuered them selues from him. The Archebishop thus forsaken and destitute (as the History of him sayth) sent about for the poore, the lame, & the halt, to come in and furnish his house, saiyng, that by them he might soner obteyne his victory, than by the other, which had so slipt from him.

Thomas Becket vseth many delayes

On the next day folowyng, because it was Sunday nothing was done. So the day after, which was the second fery, the Archebishop was cited to apere: But the night before beyng taken with the desease of the Cholike, all that day he kept his bed, and not able as he sayd to aryse. Euery man supposed it to be but a feyned sicknesse, certeyne of the chiefe Nobles were sent to trie out the matter, & to cite him to the Court namely Robert Erle of Leycester, & Reginald Erle of Deuonshire. To whom the Archebishop answered, that as that day he was so diseased that he coulde not come, and thoughe he were brought in a horse Litter: so that day passed ouer.

Thomas Becket, is counsayled to haue a Masse of S. Stephē to defend him from his enemyes.

The morow after, certeine that were aboute him, fearing no lesse but that some daunger would happen vnto him, gaue him counsaile in the morning to haue a Masse in the honour of the holy Martyr Saint Stephen, to kepe him from the handes of his enemies that day. When the Morow was come beyng Tuesday, there came to him the Bishops and Prelates, counsailyng and perswadyng him couertly by insinuation (for apertly they durst not) that he woulde submit himselfe aswell for all other his goodes, as also his Archebishoprike to the will of the king, if paraduenture his indignation by that meanes might asswage. Addyng moreouer, that onlesse he would so do, periury should be layd against him, for that he vnder the othe of fidelitie had promised to kepe the kinges lawes and ordinaunces, and nowe woulde not obserue them. To this Becket aunswereth againe: Brethren ye see and perceyue well howe the worlde is set against me, and how the enemy riseth and seketh my confusion. And although these be dolorous and lamentable, yet the thing that grieueth me most of all is this: the somes of myne awne mother be prickes and thornes against me. And albeit that I do holde my peace, yet the posteritie to come will knowe and report howe cowardlye you haue turned your backes, and haue left me your Archebiſhop and Metropolitane alone in this conflict, and how you haue ſitten in iudgement againſt me (although an vnworthie ſinner) nowe two dayes together, and not that onely in the Ciuile or ſpirituall Court, but alſo in the temporall Court redy to do the ſame. But in generall this I charge and commaunde you all, by the vertue of pure obedience, and in perill of your awne order, that ye be not preſent perſonally in iudgement againſt me. And that ye ſhall not ſo do, I here appeale to our mother and refuge of all ſuch as be oppreſſed, the Church of Rome: and if any ſeculer man ſhall lay handes vpon me (as it is rumored they will) I ſtreightly enioyne & charge you in the ſame vertue of obedience, that you exerciſe your cenſure Eccleſiaſticall vpon them, as it becommeth you to do for your father and Archebiſhop. And this I do you to vnderſtand, that though the world rage, and the enemy be fierce, and the body trembleth, for the fleſh is weake, yet God ſo fauouryng me, I will neyther cowardlye ſhrinke, nor vilye forſake my flocke committed to my charge.

Thomas Becket appealeth to Rome.

Thomas Becket a man of great courage.

But the Biſhop of London contrary to this commaundement, did incontinent appeale from him. And thus the Biſhops departed from him to the Court, ſaue onely two, that was Henry Biſhop of Wincheſter, and Joſelyne of Sariſbury, who returned with him ſecretly to his Chamber and comforted him. This done, the Archebiſhop the next day addreſſed him to the Maſſe of S. Stephen with all ſolemnitie, as though it had bene an high feſtiuall day, with his Metropolitane Pall, which was not vſed to be worne, but vpon the holy day. &c. The office of his Maſſe began Sederunt Principes & aduerſum me loquebantur. &c. that is, Princes ſate and ſpake againſt me. &c. (The kinges ſeruants beyng alſo there, and beholdyng the matter) for this Maſſe Gilbert Biſhop of London accuſed Becket afterwarde, both for that it was done per artem magicam, & in contemptum Regis, (as the wordes of Houeden purport) that is both by art magique, and in contempt of the king.

Gilbert Biſhop of London appealed from Thomas Becket.

A Maſſe of S. Stephen.

Becket accuſed to be a coniurer.

The Maſſe beyng ended, the Archebiſhop puttyng off his Pall, his Miter and other robes, procedeth to the kinges Court, and taketh alſo the Sacrament priuily about him. And commyng towardes the kinges Chamber there to attend vpon ỹ king, as he was entering in at the dore, he taketh from Alexander his Croſyer, the Croſſe with the Croſſeſtaffe, in the ſight of all that ſtode by, and caryeth it in himſelfe, the other biſhops folowing hym, and ſaiyng he did otherwiſe then became him. Amongeſt other, Robert Biſhop of Hertford offered himſelf to beare his croſſe, rather than he ſhould ſo do, for that was not comely: but the Archbiſhope would not ſuffer him. Then ſayde the Biſhop of London vnto him, if the king ſhall ſee you come armed into his Chamber, perchaunce he will drawe out his ſworde againſt you, which is ſtronger than yours, and then what ſhall this your armour profite you? The Archbiſhop anſwereth againe: if the kinges ſworde do cut carnally, yet my ſworde cutteth ſpiritually, and ſtriketh downe to hell: But you my Lorde, as ye haue played the foole in this matter, ſo you will not leaue off your folly ſo farre as I can ſee, and ſo he came into the chamber. The king heering of his commyng & the maner thereof, tarryed not long, but came where Becket was ſet in a place by himſelfe with his other Biſhops about him. king beginneth with a great complaint against the Archbishop, for his maner of entering into the court, not as into a kings court, but as a traytor, shewing himselfe so like a traytor as hath not bene seene before in any christian kinges court: To this all there present gaue witnesse with the kings wordes. And so altogether with one crie called him on euery side Traytor. Wherevpon, great horror and feare was what should befall on him. The Archbishop of Yorke comming downe to his men, sayd he could not abide to see what the Archebishop of Cantorbury was like to suffer. Likewise, the Tipstaues and other ministers of the assembly comming downe with an outas against him, crossed them to see his hautie stoberneſſe, & the businesse that there was towards him. Certeine there were of hys friendes one or two, sitting at his feete, some comforting him softly, and bidding him to lay his curſſe vpon them: Other contrary, bidding him not to curſſe, but to pray and to forgeue them: and if he lost his life in the quarrell of the Church and the libertie thereof, he should be happy. Afterward one of them named Johannes Stephani, willing to speake something in his eare, but could not be suffered by the kinges Marshall, who forbade that any man should haue any talke with him. Then he, because that he could not otherwise speake vnto him, wrought by signes, making a crosse and looking vp with his eyes, and waggyng his lippes meaning that he should pray, & manfully stande to the Crosse. In the meane time cõmeth to him Bartholomew Bishop of Exeter, desiryng him to haue regard and cõpassion vpon himselfe, & also of them, or else they were all like to perish for the hatred of him, for there commeth out, saith he, a precept from the king, that you shall be taken, and so suffer for an open rebell, and who so hereafter taketh your part shall haue the like punishment. It is sayd moreouer, that Joselinus Bishop of Sarisbury, and William Bishop of Norwiche are to be had to the place of execution for their resistyng, and making intercession for you. When he had thus sayd, the Archbishop looking vpon the sayd bishop of Exeter said: Auoyde sayd he, hence from me, thou vnderstandest not, neither doest thou sauour those thinges that be of God.

The king calleth Becket traytor.

Iohannes Stephani.

Bartholmew Bishop of Exeter is reproued by Thomas Becket as Peter was of Christ.

The Bishops and Prelates then going aside by themselues from the other Nobles (the king so permitting them to do) tooke counsaile together what was to be done. Here the matter stoode in a doubtfull perplexitie, for eyther must they incurre the daungerous indignation of the king: or else with the Nobles they must proceede in condemnatiõ against the Archbishop for resisting the kinges sanctions, which they did not fauour themselues. In this straite necessitie, they denying what way to take, at length agreed vpon this, that they with a common assent shoulde appeale the Archbishop to the See of Rome vpon periurie. And that they shoulde oblige and binde themselues to the king, with a sure promise to worke their diligence in deposing the Archbishop vpon this condition, that the king should promise their safety, and discharge them from the perill of that iudgement which was towarde him. So all the Bishops obliging themselues thus to the king, went forth to the Archbishop, of whome one speaking for the reast (which was Hilary Bishop of Chichester) had these wordes. Once you haue bene our Archbishop, and so long we were bounde to your obedience: but now for as much as you once swearing your fidelitie to the king, doe resist hym, neglecting hys Iniunctions and ordinaunces concerning and pertayning to his terrene honor and dignitie, wherefore we here pronounce you periured, neyther be we bound to geue obedience to ỹ Archbiſhop thus periured. But putting our ſelues & al oures in the Popes protection do appeale you* to his preſence. And vpon the ſame aſſigned him his day & time to apere. The Archbiſhop anſwering again ſaid, he heard him wel ynough, And vpon this ſẽdeth vp to Rome in al haſt to the Pope, ſignifying to him by letters the whole matter, how and wherefore & by whom he was appealed: After the Archbiſhop was thus appealed to Rome as before you haue heard, he then ſitting w his croſſe wayting in the Court, at the laſt the king ſent by certain Erles and Barons commaundment to him (Robert the Erle of Leyceſter doing the meſſage) that he ſhould without delay come and render a full accompt of all things that he had receyued in fruits & reuenues of the realme, in the time he being his Chaunceloz, and eſpecially foz the 30000 Markes foz the which he was accomptable to the king. To whom the Archbiſhop aunſwereth, that the king knew how ofte he had made his reconning and accompt of thoſe things which he nowe required. Further and beſides, he ſayde that Henry his ſonne and heyre of the Realme, with all hys Barons and alſo Richarde Lucye his chiefe iuſtice tolde him that he was free and quit to God & holy Church from all receiptes and computations, and from all ſecular exactions on the kings behalfe. And ſo he taking this his diſcharge at their handes, entered into his office, and therefore other accompt beſides he woulde make none. When this worde was brought to the king, he required his Barons to do the lawe vpon hym: who iudged him to be apprehended and layde in priſon. This done the king ſendeth vnto him Reginald Erle of Cornewall and of Deuonſhire, and Robert Erle of Leyceſter, to declare to hym what was his iudgement. To whome the Archbiſhop aunſwereth, heare my ſonne and good Erle, what I ſay vnto you: how much more precious the ſoule is then the bodye, ſo muche more ought you to obey me in the Lord, rather than your terrene king: Neyther doth any lawe or reaſon permit the childzen to iudge and condemne their father. Wherefore to auoyde both the iudgement of the king and youres, and of all other, I put my ſelfe onelye to the Arbitrement of the Pope vnder God alone, to be iudged of him and of none other. To whoſe preſence here before you all I do appeale, committyng the ordering of the Church of Cantorbury my dignitie, with all other thinges apperteyning to the ſame, vnto the protection of God and his. And as for you my brethzen and felow biſhops (which rather obey man than God) you alſo I call and clayme to the audience and iudgement of the Pope, and hence I depart from you as from the enemyes of the Catholike Church, & of the auctority of the Apoſtolike See.

While the Barons returned with this aunſwere to the king, the Archebiſhop paſſing through the throng, taketh to him his Palfrey, holdyng hys Croſſe in the one hande, and the Bridle of his Palfrey in the other, the Courtiers folowyng after crying Traytor, Traytor, tary & here thy iudgement: But he paſſed on vntill he came to the vttermoſt gate of the Court, which beyng faſt locked, there he had bene ſtayed, had not one of his ſeruaunts called Peter, named Deiunctorio, fyndyng there a bunch of keyes hangyng by, firſt prouyng one key, and then another, at the laſt chaunced vpon the right key, and ſo opened the gate and let him out. The Archebiſhop went ſtreight way to the houſe of Chanons where he did lye, callyng in to him the poore where they they could be found. When supper was done, making as though he would go to bed (which he caused to bee made betwixt two Altars) he in the meane tyme priuily, while the king was at Supper in the Euenyng, prepareth his iourney secretly to escape away, chaunging his garment and his name beyng called Dereman, first went to Lincolne, from thence to Sandwich, where he tooke Ship, and sayled into Flaunders, & from thence iourneyed to Fraunce as Houeden sayth. But Alanus differyng in the order of his flight, sayth that he did not flie that night, for at supper tyme there came vnto him the Bishops of London, and Chichester, declaryng to him that if he would surrender vp to the king his two maners of Otford and Wingham, there were hope to recouer the kinges fauour, and to haue all remitted: But when the Archebishop would not agree therevnto, forasmuch as those Manours were belongyng to the Church of Cantorbury: And the king heeryng thereof, was greatlye offended. Insomuche that the next day, Becket was faine to sende to the king two Bishops and his Chapleyn to haue leaue to depart the realme. To the which message the king answered, that he would take a pause vntyll the next day, and then he should haue answere. But Becket not tarying for his answere, the same day conueyed himselfe away secretly, as is aforesaid to Lodouicus the French king. But before he came to the French king, Gilbert the B. of London, & William Erle of Arondel, sent from the king of England to Fraunce, preuented him, requiryng of the sayd French king in the behalfe of the king of England that he would not receiue nor reteyne within his dominion the Archbishop of Cantorbury. Moreouer, ỹ at his instance he would be a meanes to the Pope, not to shew any familiaritie vnto him. But the king of England in this poynt seemed to haue more confidence in the French king, then knowledge of his disposition. For thinkyng that the French king would be as a good neighbour to him, in trustyng to him he was deceyued. Neither cõsidered he with himselfe enough the maner and nature of the French men, at that time against the Realme of England, who then were glad to seke and take all maner of occasions to do some acte against England. And therefore Lodouike the French king vnderstandyng the matter, and thinkyng percase to haue some aduauntage thereby agaynst the king and Realme of England by ỹ occasion hereof: Contrary to the kings letters of request, not onely harboureth and cherisheth this Dereman, but also wrytyng to the Pope by his Almoner and brother, entreateth him vpon all loues, as euer he would haue his fauour to tender the cause of the Archebishop Becket. Thus the kinges Imbassadors repulsed of the French king returned, at what tyme he sent another Imbassade vpon the lyke cause to Alexander the Pope, then beyng at Sene in Fraunce. The Imbassadors sent on this message were, Roger Archebishop of Yorke, Gilbart Bishop of London, Henry Bishop of Winchester, Hillary Bishop of Chichester, Bartholomew Bishop of Exceter with other Doctors and Clerkes: Also William Erle of Arondell, with certeyne mo Lordes and Barons. Who commyng to the Popes Court, were friendly accepted of certaine of the Cardinalles, amongest the which Cardinalles, there arose also discention about the same cause, some iuggyng the Bishop of Caunterbury in the defence of the libertyes of the Church, as in a good case was to be mainteyned: Some thinking against that he beyng a perturber of peace and vnitie, was rather to be brideled for his presumption, then to bee fostered and encouraged therin. But the Pope partly bearing with his cause, and partly incensed therevnto wyth the letters of the French king, did wholy encline to Becket. Wherefore the Pope the next day folowyng sittyng in consistory with his Cardinalles, when the Ambassadors were called for, to the heeryng of Beckets matter, first begynneth the Bishop of London, next the Archebishop of Yorke, then Exceter, and through the Bishoppes euery one in their order to speake. Whose Orations beyng not well accepted of the Pope, and some of them also disdeyned: The Erle of Arondell perceyuyng that, somewhat to qualifie and temper the matter to the Popes eares began after this maner.

Oration of the Erle of Arondell which he made in French.

Although to me it is vnknowen (sayth he) which am both vnlettered and ignorannt, what it is, that these Bishoppes here haue sayde, neyther am I in that tongue so able to expresse my minde as they haue done: yet beyng sent and charged therevnto of my Prince, neyther can, nor ought I but to declare (as well as I may) what the cause is of our sendyng hether, not to contende or striue with any person nor to offer any iniury or harme vnto any man, especially in this place, and in the presence here of such a one, vnto whose becke and aucthoritie all the worlde doth stoupe and yeelde. But for this intent is our Legacye hether directed, to present here before you, and in the presence of the whole Church of Rome, the deuocion and loue of our king and maister, which euer he hath had, and yet hath still toward you. And that the same may the better appere to your excellencie, he hath assigned and appoynted to the furniture of this Legacie, not the least, but the greatest: not the worst, but the best and chiefest of all his subiectes, both Archebishoppes, Bishoppes, Erles, Barons, with other Potentates mo, of such worthinesse and parentage, that if he could haue found greater in all his Realme, he woulde haue sent them, both for the reuerence of your person, and of the holy Church of Rome. Ouer and besydes this I might adde to more, which your holinesse hath sufficiently tryed and proued all ready, the true and hartie fidelitie of this our Soueraigne towarde you: Who in his first entrance into his kingdome wholy submitted himselfe, with all that is his besydes, to your will and pleasure.

And truely to testifie of his maiestie howe he is disposed to the vnitie of the Catholique fayth, we beleue there is none more faythfull in Christ than he, nor more deuoute to God, nor yet more moderate in keeping the vnitie of peace wherevnto he is called. And as I may be bolde this to protest for our king and maister: so neyther do I deny touching the Archebishop of Cauntorbury, a man also not destitute nor vnfurnished with giftes and ornaments in his kinde of callyng, to be a man both sage and discrete, in such thinges as to him apperteyne, saue onely that he semeth to some, more quicke and sharpe than nedeth. This blot alone if it were not, and the breache betweene him and our king had not happened, both the regimentes together of the Temporaltie and Spiritualtie might quietly haue flourished, one with the other, in much peace and concorde, both vnder a Prince so worthie, and a Pastor so vertuous. Wherefore the case so standyng as it doth, our message hether and our supplication is to your vigilant prudence, that through your fauour and wisedome, the necke of this discention may be broken, and that reformation of vnitie and loue may by some good meanes be sought.

This Oration of his, although it was liked of them for the softnesse and moderation moderation thereof: yet it could not so perswade the bishop of Rome to condiscende to their sute and request, which was to haue two Legates or Arbitrers to be sent from him into England to examine and to take vp the controuersie betweene the king and the Archebishop. But the Pope beyng encensed as is sayde before, would not graunt to their petition, forasmuch as it should be (sayth he) prejudiciall, tendyng to the oppression of the Archebishop to graunt vnto it, he beyng not present. And therefore willed them to tary hys commyng, or else, he beyng absent, he would not he sayde in any case proceede against him. But they allegyng againe, their tyme to be expyred appoynted them of the king, hauyng besydes other lettes & causes, as they alleaged, said, they could not there wayte for the commyng of Becket, and so returned backe their cause frustrated without the Popes blessyng to the king. Within foure dayes after, Becket commeth to the Popes court, where he prostrating himselfe at his feete, brought out of his bosome a scroll conteinyng the customes and ordinaunces of the king afore mentioned. The Pope receiuyng the sayd scroll, and readyng it in the open heeryng of his Cardinalles, condempned and cursed the most part of those decrees of the king, which he called Consuetudines auitas, that is, his Grandfathers ordinaunces: Besides, the Pope moreouer blamed Becket, for that he so much yelded vnto them at the beginnyng, as he did: Yet notwithstanding, because he was repentant for his vnaduised fact, he was content to assoyle him for the same, and that the rather because of his great troubles, which for the liberties of the holye Church he did sustaine, and so with great fauour for that day they dismissed him.

The nert day, Alexander the Pope assemblyng his Cardinals together in his secret Chamber, appereth before them the Archbishop of Cantorbury, who made there a solempne Oration, and there and then resigned into the handes of the Pope the Archbishoprike of Cantorbury, & his Oration beyng ended, he was bidden to stand apart. The Pope then cõferring vpõ this with his Cardinalles, about the resignation of Becket, what was best to be done: Some thought it best to take the occasion offered, thinking thereby the kings wrath might easily be swaged, if the Church of Cantorbury were assigned to some other person, and yet the sayd Becket to be otherwise prouided for notwithstanding. Contrary, other again thought otherwyse, whose reason was: For if he ỹ for the liberties of the Church had ventured not only his goodes, dignitie, & authoritie, but also his life, should nowe at the kinges pleasure be depriued, like as it might be a president hereafter to others in resisting their king in like sort, if his cause were mainteyned: so contrary, if it were quayled, it should be an example to all other hereafter none to resist his Prince in the like case, & so might redound not only to the weakening of the state of the Catholike Church, but also to the derogation of the Popes authoritie. Briefly this sentence at length preuayled, that Becket receyueth his pastoral office at the Popes hand againe, with commendation & much fauour. But forsomuch as he could not be well placed in England, in the meane while the Pope sendeth him with a Monkes habite into the Abbey of Pontiniack in Fraunce, where he remayned two yeres, & from thence he remoued to Senon where he remayned .v. yeres, and so the time of his exyle continued in all .viij. yeres.

moued with wrathfull displeasure. Who vpon the same directed out certaine Iniunctions against the Pope & the Archbishop of Cantorbury, much like, & the same in effect that are before rehersed in the beginning of this Hystory.

And besides his Iniunctions, the king also set foorth his proclamation that all maner of persons both men and women, who soeuer were founde of the kindred of Thomas Becket, should be banished without taking anye parte of their goodes with them, and sent to him where he was, which was no little veration to Becket to beholde them. Moreouer, for so muche as he was then lying with Gwaryn Abbot of Pontiniack, to whome the Pope as is aforesayde had commended him, therefore the king writing to the same Abbot, required him not to retayne the Archbishop of Cauntorbury in his house, eyther else he would dryue out of his realme all the Monkes of his order. Wherevpon Becket was inforced to remoue from thence, and went vnto Lewes the French king, by whome he was placed at Senon and there founde of him the space of fiue yeres, as is aboue mencioned.

A proclamation against Thomas Becket and his kindred.

After the aforesayde Iniunctions and proclamation were thus set foorth, which greeued and troubled Becket not a little, then he for helpe resorted to the Pope, and obteyned of him letters to the king, and likewise the king agayne wrote to the Pope: And at the last the Archbishop in his owne name wrote to the king, and to sundrie of the Clergie, namely to certaine Bishops, who verie learnedly and plainely aunswered him, in suche maner as he had no hope of any good entertaynment in this realme. And in the ende he receyued a learned & worthy answere from the whole Clergie of England, (which for length I ouerpasse) so effectually & substancially written, as there could not be a better. But all this moued him nothing: And now that he saw himselfe to be of smal estimation among the Clergie of England, he therfore earnestly besought the Pope of aide & helpe against his aduersaries: and at the last he obteyned of him certaine curses & excommunications. And first he put his curse in execution vpon the Ministers of his church of Cantorbury, and then executed the same vpon certaine Bishops that had contempned hym, and lastly he procured two Legates to be sent from the Pope to the king to curse him and all the whole realme, if the king would not restore him againe to his pristinate state and dignitie.

Becket falleth to cursyng.

The king being thus vexed with the Archebishop, departed into Normandy, and shortly after into Fraunce to the French king, where then the Archbishop was present, and the French king perceyuing the king of England to be disquieted, and he desirous to procure peace, or at the leastwise pretending to set agreement betweene them, brought the matter to a communication among them. In the which communication the French king made himselfe as an Umpere betweene them. The king of Englande vnderstanding that the Archbishop would commit himselfe to his arbitrement, was the more wylling to admyt his presence. Wherevpon many being there present, the Archebishop (prostrating himselfe at the kings feete) declared vnto him kneeling vpon his knees that he would commit the whole cause, whereof the dissension arose betweene them, vnto his awne arbitrement, adding thereto as he did before Saluo honore dei, that is, sauing the honour of God. The king then as is sayde before was greatly offended at this worde Saluo honore dei, and also hearyng and seing the stiffenesse of the man, sticking so muche so muche to this worde Salue honore. &c. was highly therewith displeased, rebuking him with many grieuous wordes, as a man prowde and stubborne, and he also charged him with sundry & great benefites bestowed vpon him, as a person vnkinde and forgettyng what he so gently had done and bestowed vpon him.

And speakyng to the French king then beyng present: See Sir if it please you (sayth the kyng of Englande) whatsoeuer displeaseth this man, that he sayth to be contrary to the honour of God. And so by this meanes he will vendicate and chalenge to himselfe both that is his and myne also. And yet notwithstandyng, for that I will not seeme to do any thing contrary or preiudiciall to Gods honour, this I offer him: There haue bene kinges in England before me, both of greater and lesse puissaunce then I am: Lykewise, there haue bene Bishoppes of Cauntorbury many both great and holy men, what the greatest and most holyest of all his predecessors before him, haue done to the least of my progenitors & predecessors before me, let him do the same to me, and I am content. They that stood by, heeryng these wordes of the king cryed all with one voyce, the king hath debased himselfe ynough to the Bishop. The Archebishop staiyng a little at this with silence, what sayth the French king to him, my Lorde Archbishop, will you be better then these holy men? will you be greater then Peter? what stande you doubting? heare, now haue you peace & quietnesse put into your awne handes if ye will take it. To this the Archbishop answering againe: truth said he, my predecessors before me were much both better and greater than I, and of them, euery one for his tyme, although he did not extirpe and cut off all, yet some thing they did plucke vp and correct, which semed aduerse and repugnaunt agaynst Gods honour. For if they had taken altogether away, no such occasion then had bene left to any man, to rayse vp this fyre of temptation against vs as nowe is raysed, to proue vs withall, that we beyng so proued with them, might also be crowned with them, beyng likewise partakers of their prayse and reward, as we are of their labour and trauayle. And though some of them haue beene slacke or exceede in their duetie doyng, in that we are not bound to follow their example.

Thomas Becketes answere to the king of Englandes.

Peter, when he denyed Christ, we therefore rebuke him: But when he resisted the rage of Nero, therein we commend him. And therefore, because he could not finde in his conscience to consent vnto him, he ought in no wyse to dissemble with him, neyther did, by reason whereof he lost his life. By such lyke oppressions the Church hath alwayes growen. Our forefathers and predecessors because they would not dissemble the name and honor of Christ, therefore they suffered: And shall I to haue the fauour of one man suffer the honour of Christ to be suppressed. The Nobles standyng by hearyng him thus speake were greatly agreeued with him, notyng in him arrogancy and wilfulnesse, in perturbyng and refusyng such an honest order of agreement: But specially one among all the rest, who there openly protested, that seeyng the Archebishop so refused the counsayle and request of both the kinges, he was not worthie to haue the helpe of either other, whome as the kingdome of England had reiected, so the kingdome of Fraunce should not entertaine.

Alanus, Herbertus, and other of his Chapleynes that commytted to story the doyngs of Becket, do record (whether truely or no I can not say) that that after this, the French king sendyng for him, as one much sorowyng and lamentyng the wordes that he had spoken at the commyng of Becket, did prostrate himselfe at the feete of the Archebishop, confessyng his fault in geuyng that counsayle to him in such a cause, perteynyng to the honour of God, to relent therein, and to yelde to the pleasure of man: Wherefore declaryng his repentaunce, desyred to be assoyled thereof. So that after that the French king and Becket were great frendes together, insomuch that king Henry sendyng to the king, to entreate and desyre him, that he would not support nor maintaine his enemie within his Realme: The French king vtterly denyed the kinges request, takyng part with the Archebishop rather than with him.

Besydes these quarelles and grudges betweene the king and the Archebishop abone mentioned, there folowed yet moreouer a nother, which was this. Shortly after this communication betweene the kynges and Becket, the king of England returnyng againe from Normandy into England, which was the yere of our Lord M. C. lxvij. and the. xiij. yere of his reigne about Midsommer kept his Court of Parliament at Westminster. In the which Parliament through the assent of the Clergie, and the Lordes Temporall, he caused his sonne Henry to be crowned king. Which coronation was done by the handes of Roger Archbishop of Yorke, with the assistance of other bishops ministryng to the same, as Gilbert of London, Joselyn of Sarisbury, Hugh of Durefme, and Gualter of Rochester. By reason whereof, Becket of Caunterbury beyng there neyther mentioned nor called for, tooke no little displeasure. And so did Lodouick the French king, heeryng that Margaret his daughter was not crowned with her husbande, whereupon gatheryng a great army, he marched toward Normandy. But that matter was sone composed by the king of England, who sendyng his sonne to him in Normandy, intreated there, and concluded peace with him, promisyng that his son should be crowned againe and his daughter also. But the Archebishop not ceasing his displeasure, sent againe vnto the Pope, complaynyng vpon these foure Bishops, especially of the Archebishop of Yorke, who durst be so bolde in his absence, and without his knowledge or his licence to entermeddle to crowne the king, beyng a matter proper and peculier to his iurisdiction. At the instance of whom, the Pope sent downe the sentence of excommunication against the Bishop of London. The other three Bishops with the Bishop of Yorke, he suspended, whose sentence and letters thereof, for the auoidyng of prolixitie I here omit. This beyng done, the Archebishop of Yorke with the foresayde Bishops resorted to the king with a grieuous complaint, declaring how miserable their case stoode, and what they had suffeyned for fulfillyng of his commaundement. The king heeryng this was highly moued.

And in the meane season, the French king for his part, and his Clergie, and Courtiers slackt none occasion to insite and solicite Alexander the Pope, against the king of England, to excommunicate him also, seekyng thereby, and thinkyng to haue some aduantage agaynst the Realme: Neither was the king ignorant of this, which made him more ready to apply to some agreement of reconciliation. At length cōmeth downe from the Pope two Legates, the one the Archbishop of Roan, & the other, the Bishop of Nauerne, with direction, and full commission either to driue the king to be reconciled, or to be interdicted by the Popes censures out of the Church. The king vnderstanding him-ſelfe to be in greater ſtreights than he could well aduoyde, at length through the mediation of the French king, and of other Prelates & great Princes, he was content to yelde to peace and reconciliation with the Archbiſhop whome he receyued both to his fauour, and alſo permitted and graunted him free returne to his Church againe. Albeit concerning his poſſeſſions and landes of the Church of Cantorbury, although Becket made great labour therfore, yet the king beyng then in Normandy, would not graunt him that, before he ſhould repayre into England, to ſee how he would there agree with his ſubiectes. Thus peace after a ſort beyng concluded betweene the king and him, the Archebiſhop returned into England, where he was right ioyfully receyued of the Church of Cauntorbury: Albeit of Henry the yong king he was not ſo greatly welcomned. Inſomuch that he comming vp to London to the king, was returned and commaunded backe to Cauntorbury, and there bidden to kepe his houſe.

Roger Houeden maketh mention in his Chronicle, that the Archebiſhop vpon Chriſtmas day did excommunicate Robert de Brock, for cuttyng off the taple of one of his horſes the day before.

Hereof commeth y talke that Kentiſh men haue tayles.

In this meane time, the foure Biſhoppes before mencioned whome the Archbiſhop did excommunicate, as is aforeſayde, ſent to him humbly, deſiryng to be releaſed of their cenſure. To whome when as the Archebiſhop would not graunt clerely and ſimply, without cautels and exceptions, they went ouer vnto the king, declaryng to him and complaiyng of their miſerable eſtate and vncurteous handlyng of the Archebiſhop. Whereupon the king conceyued great diſpleaſure in his minde towarde the Archebiſhop. Inſomuche that he lamented oft and ſundry tymes to them about him, that among ſo manye as he had done for, there was none that woulde reuenge him of his enemye: By the occaſion of which wordes, certaine that were about the king, to the number of foure, heering the king thus complaine and lament, addreſſed themſelues in great heate of haſte to ſatiſfie the agrieued minde and quarell of their Prince: Who within foure dayes after the aforeſayde Chriſtmaſſe day, ſaylyng ouer into England, hauyng a forwarde and a proſperous wynde in their iourney, beyng in the deepe of winter, came to Cauntorbury where Becket was commaunded to kepe. Where after certeine aduiſement and conſultation had among themſelues, they preſſed at length into the Biſhops palace, where the Archbiſhop was ſittyng with his company about him: And firſt they aſſayed him with gentle wordes to ſee whether he would relent to the kinges minde, and come to ſome conformitie, and ſaid, that they had brought to him a cõmaundement from the king, which, whether he had rather openly there in preſence, or ſecretly, to be declared vnto him, they bid him choſe. Then the company beyng bidden to aduoyde, as he ſate alone, they ſayde: you are commaunded from the king beyond the Sea, to repayre to the king here his ſonne, there to do your dutye to him, in ſwearing to him your fidelitie for your baronage and other thinges, and to amend thoſe thinges wherein yee haue offended againſt him. Whereupon the Archbiſhop denyyng to ſweare, and perceyuyng theyr entent, called in his company againe: and in multiplyng of wordes to and fro, at length they came to the Biſhoppes which were excommunicate for the coronation of the king, whome they commaunded him in the kings name, that he ſhould abſolue and set free againe. The Archebishop aunswered that he neyther suspended nor excommunicated them but the Pope, wherefore if that were the matter that greeued them, they should resorte to the Pope, he had nothing to do with the matter. Then sayde Reginald one of the foure. Although you in your owne person did not excommunicate them, yet thorow your instigatiō it was done. Tow hom the Archbishop againe aunswered: and if the Pope sayde he, tendering the iniuries done to me and to my Churche, wrought this reuenge for me, I confesse it offendeth me nothing. Thus then sayde they, it appereth by your owne wordes that it pleaseth you right well, in contempt and contumely of the kings Maiestie, to sequester his Bishops from their ministerie, who at the commaundement of the king did seruice in the Coronation of his sonne. And seing ye haue presumed thus to stande against the exaltation of this oure souereigne oure newe king, it seemeth lykely that you will aspire to take his crowne from him, and to be exalted king your selfe. I aspire not sayde he to the crowne and name of the king, but rather if I had some crownes to geue him more, I would set them all vpon him, such good will I doe beare him, that onely his father the king excepted, there is none whose honor I more tender and loue. And as concerning the sequestring of those Bishops, this I geue you to vnderstand, that there was nothing done in that behalfe without the knowledge and assent of the king himselfe, to whome when I had made my complaint at the feast of Mary Magdalene of the wrong and iniurie done to me and my Church therein, he gaue me his good leaue to obteine at the Popes hand such remedie therein as I could, promising moreouer his helpe to me in the same. What is this quoth they that thou sayest? Makest thou the king a traitor & betrayer of the king his owne sen, that when he had commaunded the Bishops to crowne his sonne, he would geue thee leaue after to suspend them for so doing? Certes, it had bene better for thee not to haue accused the king of this prodition. The Archbishop said to Reginald one of the foure, that he was there present himselfe at that time and heard it, but that he denyed and swore it was not so: and thinke you said they, that we the kings subiectes will or ought to suffer this? And so approching neerer vnto him sayde, he had spoken ynough against his owne head: whereupon followed great exclamation and many threatning wordes. Then the Archebishop sayde, I haue sithen my comming ouer, susteyned many iniuries and rebukes, concerning both my selfe, my men, my cattell, my wynes & other goodes, notwithstanding the king writing ouer to his sonne, required him that I should lyue in safetie and peace, and newe besydes all other, you come hether to threaten mee. To this Reginald aunswered and sayde, if there be any that worketh you iniurie, otherwise then right is, the lawe is open, why doe you not complayne? To whom sayde Becket should I complayne? To the yong king sayde they. Then Becket sayde, I haue complayned ynough if that woulde helpe. I haue sought for remedie at the kings handes so long as I could be suffered to come vnto his speeche: but now seing I am stopped from that, neyther can finde redresse of so great vexations and iniuries as I haue and daylie doe susteyne, nor can haue the benefite of lawe or reason: such right and lawe as an Archebishop maye haue, that will I exercise and let for no man. At these wordes one of them burst out in exclamation and cryed, he threatneth: he threatneth: what, wyll you also interdict the whole Realme and vs altogether? Nay, that shall he not sayth another, he hath interdicted to many already. And drawyng more nere vnto him, they protested and denounced him to haue spoken wordes to the ieopardie of his awne head. And so departyng in great violence, and with many high wordes, rushed out of the doores: Who by the way returnyng to the Monkes, charged them in the kinges name to kepe him forthcomming that he should not escape away. What quoth the Archebishop, thinke ye that I will flie away? Nay, neyther for the king nor for anye man aliue will I stirre one foote from you. No sayd they, thou shalt not auoyde though that thou wouldest. And so they departed in hye clamour of wordes. The Archbishop, foloweth them out of the Chamber doore, cryng after them, here, here, here shall you finde me, laiyng his hand on his crowne. The names of these foure men, were these, Reginald Bereson, Hugh Morteuyll, William Thracy, and Richard Briton: But Fabian nameth them, William Briton, Hugh Morvile, William Thracy, and Reignold Fitzdre, who goyng to harnesse themselues, returned the same day againe: But fyndyng the Hall doore of the Palace of Caunterbury shut against them, they went to an inwarde backe doore, leadyng into an Orchard, and there brake vp a Windowe and opened the doore, and so entered into the place. The Monkes (beyng about Euensong tyme) had got the Archbishop into the Church, who beyng perswaded by them, caused his crosse to be borne before him, and so through the Cloyster by a doore which was broken vp for him, proceded into the Quier. The harnessed men folowed after, and at the last came to the Church doore, which doore the Monkes would haue shut against them, but (as their story sayth) the Archebishop would not suffer them. So they approchyng into the Church, and the Bishop meting them vpon the stayers, there he was slaine, euery one of them striking him with his swoorde into the head. And after they had thus slaine him they fled into the North countrie, and at length with muche a do, obteynyng their pardon of the Pope, through the kinges procurement (as some storyes record) they were enioyned in penaunce to go on pilgrimage to Ieruſalem. And thus an ende of the story of the life and death of Thomas Becket.

Richarde Prior of Douer succeded Thomas Becket and was chosen Archebishop after him, a man of an yll lyfe and an inordinate waster of the goodes of the Church.

Now when Becket was thus murthered, the king fearyng the Popes wrath and curſse to be layd vpon him (wherevnto Lodouike or Lewes the French king also holpe what he could to set the matter forward) sent to Rome the Archebishop of Roan with certeine other bishops and Archedeacons vnto the Pope, with his excuse, which the Pope would in no wise heere. And after, he sent second messengers, which some of the Cardinalles receyued, shewyng them that on good fryday (beyng then nie at hande) the Pope of custome was vsed to assoyle or to curſse, and that it was noysed that the king of England with his Bishops should be curſsed by name, and his lande enterdicted, and herevpon the kinges messengers were put in prison. Wherevpon certeyne of the Cardinalles shewed the Pope that the Messengers had power to sweare to the Pope, that the king should obey to his punishment and penance. Which was taken both for the king and for the Archebishop of

And shortly after, as sayth Fabian, Cooper, and other, the Pope Canonized Thomas Becket for a Saint & holy Martyr.

The kinges Ambassadors lyng as is sayd in Rome, could find no grace or favour a long tyme at the Popes hande. At the length with much a do, it was agreed that two Cardinalles should be sent downe, to enquire out the matter concernyng them that were consentyng to Beckets death. The king perceyuing what was in preparing at Rome, neither beyng yet certeine, whereto the intent of the Pope and the comnyng downe of the Cardinalles woulde tende, in the meane time addressed himselfe with a great power to enter into Irelande, geuing in charge and commaundement (as Houeden wryteth) that no bringer of any briefe or any letter should in his absence come ouer into England, or passe out of the Realme, of what degree or condition so euer he were, without speciall licence and assurance, to bring nothing that should be preiudiciall to him, or to the realme.

The king forbad that no bringer of any processe should come into England without lycence.

The afforesaid order being set and ordeyned, the king with foure hundreth great ships taketh his iourney to Ireland in the afforesayd yere of his reigne where he subdued in short tyme the whole lande vnto him, which at that time was gouerned vnder diuerse kinges, to the number of fiue. Of whom foure submitted themselues vnto the sayd king Henry: Onely the fift who was the king of Conacta, denyed to be subdued, kepyng him in Woodes and Marishes. And hauyng subdued that countrie, he by the helpe of the Archbishop of Armach, reformed their religion in three speciall poyntes. First, he ordeyned that the deuine seruice should be sayde and song, and the Sacramentes ministred after the English maner: Secondly he tooke order for tythes and other dutyes to be payde vnto the Curates and Ministers by the lay people. Thirdly, he ordeyned that euery man should make his testament and last wil in the presence of his neighbours, or at the leastwise cause it to be read before them.

The king taketh into Ireland with a great power.

In the meane season while the king was thus occupied in Ireland, the two Cardinalles sent from the Pope, Theodinus, and Albertus, were come to Normandy: vnto whome the king the next yere folowyng resorted about the Moneth of October. But before, duryng the tyme of the kinges beyng in Ireland, the Bishop of London, and Joselyne Bishop of Sarisbury had sent to Rome, & procured their Absolution from the Pope. The king returning out of Ireland by Wales into England, & thence into Normandy, there made his purgation before the Popes Legates as touchyng the death of the afforesaid Becket, to the which he sware that he was neither ayding nor comforting, but onely spake rigorous wordes against him, for that his knightes would not auenge him against the sayde Becket. For the which cause this penance was enioyned vnto him vnder his othe.

Penance enioyned to king Henry the second for the death of Thomas Becket.

1 First that he should sende so much money to the holye lande, as woulde finde two hundreth knightes or Souldiours for the defence of the lande by the space of three yeres.

2 Also that from the terme of Christmasse day then next folowyng, he should

3 Item, that if he would make his iourney into Spaine as the preſent neceſſitie did requyre, there to fight againſt the Saracens: as long tyme as he ſhould there abide, ſo long ſpace might he prolong his iourney to Jeruſalem.

4 Item, that he ſhould not hinder, nor cauſe to be hindered by hym any appellation made to the Pope of Rome.

5 Item, that neither he nor his ſonne, ſhould recede or diſſeuer from Pope Alexander, or from his Catholique ſucceſſors, ſo long as they ſhould recount him or his ſonne for kinges Catholique.

6 Item, that the goodes and poſſeſſions taken from the Church of Cauntorbury, ſhould be reſtored againe fully and amplye, as they ſtoode the yere before Thomas Becket departed the Realme, and that free libertie ſhould be graũted to all ſuch as were outlawed for Beckets cauſe to returne againe.

7 Item, that the foreſayd cuſtomes and decrees by him eſtabliſhed againſt the Church, ſhould be extinct and repealed, ſuch onely except, that concerned his awne perſon. ꝛc. beſides other ſecret faſting & almoſe dedes enioined him.

All theſe former conditions the king with his ſonne did both agree vnto, debaſyng himſelfe with great humilitie and ſubmiſſion before the ſayde two Cardinalles: by the occaſion whereof, the Cardinalles tooke no little pride, vſyng this verſe of the Pſalme, Qui reſpicit terram, & facit eam tremere, qui tangit montes & fumigant. That is, which looketh vpon the earth, and maketh it tremble, which toucheth the hilles and they ſmoke. ꝛc. Moreouer, it is mentioned in Hiſtories of the ſayd king that a little after, at what time William king of Scottes made a roade into the Realme, he returnyng out of Normandy into England, came firſt to Cauntorbury, and by the way ſo ſone as he came within the ſight of Beckets Church, lighting off hys horſſe, and puttyng off his hoſen and ſhoen, he went barefoote to his Tombe, whoſe ſteppes were found bloody through the roughneſſe of the ſtones. And not onely that, but alſo receyued further penaunce by euery Monke of the Cloyſter, that is to ſay a certeyne diſcipline of a Rod. Contention againſt for the primacie of Yorke and Cantorbury.

In this and ſuche caſes lyke, howe muche better had it bene if the primacie had remayned more nere in the kinges handes at home, whereby not onely much labour and trauaile had bene ſaued, but alſo the great and waſtfull expences bestowed at Rome might with muche fruite and thanke haue bene conuerted to their cures and flocks committed vnto them, and also percase their cause no lesse indifferently heard, at the least more spedely might haue bene decided: but to the purpose againe.

In this controuersy diuerse of the Bishop of Yorkes Clergie, suche as were of Gloucester, belongyng to the Church of Saint Oswalde, were excommunicate by the Archbishop of Cauntorbury, because they beyng summoned, refused to appere before him. At length, that is to say, the next yere folowyng, there was a Cardinall sent downe from Rome by the kinges procurement, who studied to set peace betwene the two Archbishops. So that the way of agrement was taken, by the meanes of the king at Winchester, that as touching the Church of Saint Oswalde in Gloucester, the Archebyshop of Cauntorbury should ceasse of his clayme thereof, molestyng the See of Yorke no more therein. Also he should absolue againe the Clerkes thereof whom he had excommunicated before. And as concernyng the beatyng of the Crosse and all other matters, it was referred to the Archebishop of Roan and of other Bishops of Fraunce, sothat for the space of fyue yeres an order was taken betwixt them, till they shoulde haue a full determination of their cause.

Shortly after this, the king purchased a dispensation of the Bishop of Rome for the voyage which he promised to make in proper person into the holy lande, to fight against the enemies of the Christian religion before two Cardinalles as is aforesayde: The which dispensiation was graunted vpon condition that he should builde three Abbayes in Englande. For the accomplishment whereof he put out of the house of Waltham secular Chanons, and placed in their steede reguler. And for the second he aduoyded the monks that were in the Abbey of Ambresburie, and set in their place Mynchions or Nonnes which he brought with him from beyond the Sea. And for the third he repayred after a homely sorte the Charterhouse of Wytham in the dioces of Bath and Welles.

Reynulph of Chester in his booke entiled Polichronicon, in his. vij. booke and. xxij. Chapter, sayth that thys king had long kept a bewtifull Damosell for his Paramour, whome he called Rosamond, and that the sayde king had buylded for her at his place of Woodstock beside Orforde a Bowre or chamber, which was so artificially wrought, and was such a laberinth and so full of turnings, dores, and wayes most curiously deuysed and made, that it was not possible without teaching to come to any that was therein, and that the same is called at this day Rosamonds Bowre: and he sayth that the cause of the making of the sayd Bowre, was for that the Queene could not abide the sayde damosell, and therfore would she haue done hir displeasure if she might haue come by her: and it is also written of some that at the last the Queene by a clewe or bothome of threede that was brought vnto hir, founde the way and came vnto hir, and that she lyued not long after, but dyed and was buried at Godestowe beside Orenford in the Chapterhouse there. And vpon hir Tombe was written this Epitaph.

Hic iacet in tumba, rosa mundi, non rosa munda

Which is Englished by Fabian in meter as foloweth.

In the .xxj. yere of his reigne, he cauſed Henry his ſonne to be the ſecond tyme crowned king, with Margaret his wyfe the daughter of the Frenche king, by Roger Archbiſhop of Roan, in a Parliament holden at Wyncheſter, as he had promiſed to her father that he woulde do, as before ye haue heard.

Henry ỹ ſon of king Hẽry the ſeconde againe crowned king of Englãd with his wife Margaret ỹ daughter of the French king.

And this yere the king deuided the realme into fiue partes, and ordeyned vpon euery part three Juſtices of Aſſiſe yerely to paſſe through the Realme, which now are called the Aſſiſes. The circuite or limittation of which Juſtices was thus diſpoſed. The firſt company had Norffolke, Suffolke, Cambridgeſhire, huntingdonſhire, Bedfordſhire, Buckinghamſhire, Eſſex, and Herfordſhire.

The ſecond company, had Lincolneſhire, Notinghamſhire, Derbyſhire, Staffordſhire, Warwikeſhire, Northamptonſhire, and Leyceſterſhire.

The thirde company, had Kent, Surrey, Southhamptonſhire, Suſſex, Barkeſhire, Oxfordſhire.

The fourth company, had Herfordſhire, Glouceſterſhire, Worceſterſhire, and Shropſhire.

The fift company, had Wiltſhire, Dorcetſhire, Sommerſetſhire, Deuonſhire, and Cornewall.

The ſixt companie, had Euerwikeſhire, nowe called Yorkeſhire, Richemondſhire, Lancaſter, Copeland, Weſtmerlãd, Northũberland & Cõberlãd.

But now theſe circuites are altered, & ſo are the number of the Juſtices.

In the .xxij. yere of his reigne, as ſaith Cooper, or as ſome other write in the .xxj. king Henry the ſonne, by the exciting of the king of Fraunce, Aleanor his mother, and certeyne of the Nobles, as Robert Erle of Leyceſter, and other tooke armes, and arrered deadly warre againſt his naturall father. Diuerſe ſtrong battailes were foughten, aſwell in England by the deputyes and friendes of both partes, as alſo in Normandy, Poytow, Guyan, and Briteyn, where they were corporally preſent: But the victory alway enclyned to the father. There toke part againſt king Henry the father, Lewes king of Fraunce, William, king of Scotland, Henry, Geoffrey, and John his awne ſonnes, Robert Erle of Leiceſter, Hugh of Cheſter, and other. But in the end, the ſonnes with their allies were cõſtrayned to bend to their fathers will, and to deſyre peace, which he gently graunted vnto them, and forgaue them their treſpaſſe. But William king of Scottes forfeyted and loſt the Erledome of Huntingdon, for taking of king Henry the ſonnes part againſt the father.

And beſides that, beyng diſcomfited and taken Priſoner at the Caſtell of Alnewike in Northumberland, he was compelled to yelde for his raunſome the Citie of Careleyll, the Caſtell of Bambourgh and the newe Caſtell vpon Tine, and ſwore for euer to be true vnto the king, and as well he as his ſucceſſors to do their homage as often as it ſhould be required. The cauſe of which warres was as ſome wryte, becauſe the king had empriſoned Quene Aleanor his wife for the loue of the Lady Roſamond mencioned before in the laſt yere, a Damoſell of incomparable beautie. But Fabian ſayth, that after the takyng of William king of Scottes, the ſayde William by the aſſent of his Lordes ſpirituall and temporall did homage to king Henry at his Citie of Yorke, where the ſayde William graunted by his Letters patentes, that he and his ſucceſſors kinges of Scotland, ſhould make their homage and fidelitie vnto the king of England as often as they ſhould be neceſſarily required. And in ſigne and token thereof, the king offered his Hat and his Saddell vpon the Aultar of Saint Peter in the Church of Yorke, which for a remembraunce of that dede, the ſayde Hat and Saddle were there kept many yeres after. And moreouer, the Lordes of Scotland tooke a ſolemne othe that if their king at any time would withdraw him from his allegiance, they would all ariſe againſt him, and be to him as enemies, vntill he were returned vnto his fayth and kepyng of his promiſe. And for the better confirmation of the ſayd compoſition, the king of Scottes beyng ſummoned, came afterwardes vnto the kinges Parliament holden at Northampton, and at another ſeaſon into Normandie.

1176 / 23 In the .xxiij. yere of his reigne, the king and his ſonnes were made agreed, and a new aliaunce by mariage was made with Lewes of Fraunce: For Adela his daughter was fianced to Richard king Henry his ſonne.

1177 / 24 In this kinges tyme there aroſe great diſcorde and variance at Rome for the election of the Biſhop thereof. For ſome of the Cardinalles choſe one Octauian: But other ſome, and the more part choſe Alexander. At which time the Emperour, to whoſe iudgement it was referred, when that Alexander diſdeyned to abyde his iudgement, he confirmed Octauian. Then did Alexander flee into Fraunce, and there excommunicated out of the company of the faythfull, both Frederick the Emperour, and Octauian the Antipape: And in a counſaile at Claremount, diſanulled the actes of the counſaile of Pauie. This Schiſme continued almoſt .xx. yeres: But ſhortly after Alexander Biſhop of Rome returned out of Fraunce into Rome, and was receyued of the people contrary to the Emperours minde. Then folowed ſundry and great warres betwene the aforeſayde Alexander and Fredericke, and therein was great effuſion of blood: But in the ende, Fredericke the Emperour was driuen to the worſe. And at the laſt by perſwaſion and entreatie of ſundrie noble perſonages, the Emperor ſubmitted himſelfe to Alexander Biſhop of Rome, and came vnto him to Uenice, where, of a long time the Pope would not ſpeake with him, but cauſed him to attend: But at the laſt a tyme was appoynted him to come to the Popes preſence, where he ſo behaued and humbled himſelfe, that he ſuffered him to treade vpon him, and to ſet his fete in his necke, and while he so did his Quier sang this verse of the Psalter. Super Aspidem & Basiliscum ambulabis, & conculcabis Leonem & Draconem, that is: Thou shalt walke vpon the Adder and the Basiliske: and shalt treade downe the Lion and the Dragon. But Frederick seeyng the Pope so to vse him, sayd vnto him, I do not this obedience to thee but to Peter: and the Pope aunswered both to me and to Peter. Of this outragious pride, let the Reader iudge. But this is to be noted as a truth, that the sayde Bishop of Rome, stirred and procured mortall and cruell warres, as before is sayde, without any iust cause, but onely for his priuate election, and would neyther obey to counsaile nor authoritie, nor yet condiscend to any atonement.

In the .xxiiij. yere also of this king, there chaunced great tempestes of thunder and lightnyng in the middle of Winter: And in the next Sommer folowyng there fell hayle of such bignesse that it slue both man and beast. And in this tyme there arose great discorde and variance among the Nobilitie in Englande. 1177 / 24

In the .xxv. yere of his reigne king Henrie gaue vnto his base sonne Geoffrey the Bishoprike of Lincolne in a Sinode holden at Northampton, after it had bene vacant a long tyme, who wastfully consuming the reuenues thereof, not mindyng to enter into the ministerie, within short space after resigned it. But the same Geoffrey was afterwards preferred vnto the Archbishoprike of Yorke. 1178 / 25

About this time, the king restored Robert Erle of Leycester (who as is beforesayd was taken prisoner in the battaile of Saint Edmondes bury) to his Erledome in a Parliament holden at Oxford, and made his yongest sonne John, Lorde of all Irelande. Margaret also the wife of king Henry his sonne was brought a bed of a daughter called Margaret, which liued not aboue three dayes after her birth.

About this tyme also there were a great multitude of Iewes in euery quarter of the realme, and had but one place assigned them to bury in, which was London, whether all the Corses and dead bodyes of their Nation were brought to be buryed, where so euer their chaunce was to die in the Realme. Therefore fynding it to be a great anoyance and discommoditie vnto them, they became suters vnto the king that they might haue a place assigned them to bury in wheresoeuer they dwelt, the which was graunted vnto them.

In the .xxvj. yere of his reigne Lewes the French king came into England to visite the Church and Tombe of Thomas Becket, as he had vowed to do, whome assone as he was landed, kyng Henry with his Nobles met and receyued very honourably. The which done, they went both together to Cauntorbury, and there offered at the Tombe of the sayd Becket, (such was the blindnesse of that time.) And when he had performed his vowe, and had adorned the said Tombe with many riche Iewels, he returned into Fraunce and died as it was sayd very shortly after, leauyng behinde him one onelye sonne named Philip, who succeded him, and as Polidore sayth was crowned king by his fathers life time. 1179 / 26

In the .xxviij. yere of his reigne, as sayth Fabian, Henry his eldest son, who in the life of his father as afore said, was crowned king, died very penitently. 1181 / 28

In the .xxx. yere of his reigne: Heraclius the Patriarke of Ierusalem came into England to haue ayde agaynst the Sarasens, who had wonne a great 1183 / 30 great part of Christendome which they possessed in the holy lande, and also prayed ayde for the defence of the City of Jerusalem, which shortly after was wonne by Saladyne the Prince of Surrey. But by the report of Peter Bisroy a Frenchman, the sayde Citie was wonne by Godfrey du Bulyon, in the yere of our Sauiour Christ. M.xcix. and so continued vnder the rule of iij. Christian kinges, vntill the last king named Guy of Lesyngham, who lost it, in the yere of our Lord. M.C.lxxxix. and the.xxvj. yere of his reigne.

Then it foloweth in the story: This Heraclius made earnest request vnto the king for aide as is aforesayde, and profered him the kingdome thereof, and the keyes both of the Citie and of the Sepulchre of Christ, and deliuered him letters from Lucius the thirde of that name then Bishop of Rome, chargyng him that he should take vpon him that iourney, and to haue minde of the othe that he before tyme had made. The king deferred his aunswere: And Baldwyn then Archbishop preached, and exhorted men to take the Crosse, by whose meanes, many there were that aduowed that iourney. In the ende, the king gaue aunswere and sayd, that he might not leaue his land without keepyng, nor yet leaue it to the pray and robbery of the French men: But he would geue largely of his awne to such as would take vpon him that voiage. With this aunswere the Patriarch was discontent and sayd: We seke a man and not money, well nere euery Christian Region sendeth vnto vs money, but no land sendeth to vs a Prince. Therefore we aske a Prince that nedeth money, and not money that needeth a Prince. But the king layd for himselfe such excuses, that the Patriarch departed from him discontented and comfortlesse. Whereof the king beyng aduertised, entendyng to recomfort him with some pleasant wordes, folowed him to the sea syde: But the more the king thought to satisfie him with his fayre speeche, the more the Patriarche was out of quiet: insomuch that at the last the sayd Patriarch sayd vnto him: Thou hast hetherto reigned gloriously, but hereafter thou shalt be forsaken of him that thou at this tyme forsakest. Thinke on him what he hath geuen to thee, and what thou hast yelden to him againe: howe first thou wast false to the king of Fraunce, and after slue Thomas Becket, and lastly thou forsakest the protection of Christes fayth. The king was amoued with these wordes, and sayde vnto the Patriarch: Though all the men in the land were one body, and spake with one mouth, they durst not speake to me such words. No wonder sayde the Patriarche, for they loue thine and not thee: that is to say, they loue thy goodes temporall, and feare thee for losse of promotion, but they loue not thy soule. And when he had so sayde, he offered his heade to the king saiyng, do by me euen as thou diddest by Thomas Becket, for I had leuer to be slaine of thee, then of the Sarasyns, for thou art worsse than any Sarasyn, and thy people foloweth pray and not a man. But the king kept his pacience and sayde: I may not wende out of my lande, for mine awne sonnes will rise against me, when I were absent. No wonder sayd the Patriarche, for of the deuill they came, and to the deuill they shall, and so departed from the king in great yre. Fabian.

And here the olde Historiographers finde a great fault with the king for his refusall of the office made by the Patriarch, declaring that to be the greatest cause of Gods plagues which after ensued vpon hym by his children, as the Patriarche prophesied vnto hym, which story is a good lesson to good

The wisedome, discretion, manhoode and ryches of thys Pzynce was so spreade and renowmed thozough all quarters that messages came to hym from Emanuell Emperour of Constantinople, Frederyck Emperour of Rome, and Wylliam Archebishop of Treuer in Almayn, and Duke of Saxon, and from the Erle of Flaundyzs, and from the french king, vpon determination of great questions and strifes, to aske counsell and dertermination thereof of this king Henry, as of one most wise, and schoolemaister of all wisedome and iustice, to haue solution of their questions and doubtes. Moreouer Alphonsus king of Castile, and Sauncius king of Nauerne, beyng in strife foz certeine Castelles, and other possessions, submitted them of their free accozde, and by their othe to abyde the awarde of this king Henry, who made a warde and pleased both. Whereby it is not to be pzesupposed that this king, to whome other Pzinces did so resoze, as to their Arbitrer and decisoz, did attend to any slouth oz vicious liuyng. Wherefoze this Pzinces actes may be a myzrour vnto all Pzinces.

Among many other things in this king memozable, this is one to be noted (folow it who can) that he reignyng, xxxb. yeres, & hauyng so many warres with his enemies, yet he neuer put any tribute, impost, oz tare vpon his subiectes, noz yet vpon the spiritualty, first fruites, oz appzopziation of benefices, belyke they were not then knowen, but sure it is, they were not vsed. And yet his treasure after his death, being weyed by king Richard his sonne, amounted aboue nine hundzeth thousand pound, besyde Jewelles, pzecious stones, plate, and housholde stuffe. Of the which substance, xl. thousand pound came to him by the death of Roger Archbishop of Yozke, who had pzocured a Bull of the Pope, that if any pziest dyed in his pzouynce without testament, then he should haue all his goodes.

A note worthy to be written in letters of golde.

A Pzince of great riches.

Bulles are perillous beastes.

But as there is no felicitie oz wealth in this moztall wozlde so perfite, which is not darkened with some clowde of combzance and aduersitie: So it happened to this king, that among his other pzincely successes, this incommoditie followed him withall that his sonnes rebelled and stoode in armour against him, taking the parte of the French king against their naturall father. First Henry his sonne whome the father ioyned with him as king, at the cozonation of which king, Henry his father tooke vppon him as Stewarde, oz Sewer and set downe the first dishe of Sewer, renowncing the name of a king foz that daye. At which tyme the afozesayde Archebishop of Yozke, sitting on the right hande of the yong king, sayd: Sir ye haue good cause this daye to ioye: Foz there is no Pzince in the wozlde that hath suche an officer this day. &c. And the yong king disdayning his wozdes, sayde: my father is not dishonoured in this doing, foz I am a king and a Queenes sonne, and so is not he. And not onely this, but also afterwarde he persecuted his father, as ye befoze haue heard. Wherefoze he escaped not Gods plague from his youth, after he had reigned a fewe yeres, he dyed as afozesayde, teaching vs what is the pzice and rewarde foz the breaking of the iust commaunde-

After him likewiſe, Richard his ſonne (who for his courage was called Cuer de lyon) rebelled againſt his father in the .xxxiij. yere of his reigne. And alſo John his yongeſt ſonne did not much degenerate from his Brethrens ſteppes. In ſo much that the aforeſayde Richarde, lyke an vnkinde childe, perſecuting and taking part with the French king againſt his father, brought him to ſuch diſtreſſe of body and minde, that for thought of heart he fell into an Ague, and within foure dayes dyed in Normandy when he had reigned. xxxiiij. yeares. ix. Monethes and odde dayes, whoſe Corps, as it was caryed to be buried, at Founteuerard in Fraunce, Richarde his ſonne comming by the way and meeting it, & beginning for compaſſion to weepe, the blood burſt incontinent out of the noſe of the dead king at the comming of his ſonne, geuing thereby as a certaine monſtracion, howe he was the Author of his death.

Kinges it ſhould ſeeme were not cered and cloſed in leade at thoſe dayes.

It is written of this king that he firſt ordeyned that Lyons ſhoulde be kept in the Tower of London.

Richarde the firſt.

Richard the firſt of that name, and eldeſt ſonne lyuing of king Henry the ſecond, for his valiaunt and luſtie courage, ſurnamed Cuer de lyon, that is the heart of a Lyon, began his reigne ouer thys realme of England the firſt day of July in the yere of our Lorde. 1189. and reigned. ix. yeres and. ix. monethes and odde dayes.

This king Richard prouyded diligently after the death of his father to ſet good rule in Normandy. For firſt of all he ſommoned a Parliament in Normandy, and cauſed all the Nobles of that Countrie to ſweare fealtie vnto him. After that beyng deſyrous to know what treaſure his father had left behynde him, and where it was, he commytted to warde Stephen Lieutenant of Anion, and by that meanes compelled him to bring out all the treaſure which he had long before layde vp in dyuerſe Caſtels by the commaundement of king Henry his father.

And whiles he was thus occupied (ſayth Polydore) his brother John came vnto him, whom he receyued very curteouſly, and aduaunced him to many high dignities and preferments, as afterwardes ſhall be declared.

Then calling to remembraunce the captiuitie of Alianor his mother, which as yet was in durance in Englande, he ſtreight wayes ſent ouer hys letters and commaunded that ſhe ſhould be forthwith ſet at libertie, committyng the whole order and gouernement of the realme vnto her, who beyng ſet at libertie, roade throughout the Realme, and ſhewed great curteſy vnto

the people in all places: and as one that in her ſelfe had felt the grieuous miſeries of captiuitie, pitying the caſe of all ſuch as were preſſed therewith, loſed all captiues and priſoners whereſoeuer ſhe came.

Then entering into league with Philip the French king, he receyued againe all the holdes and peeces which his father had loſt a little before, at what tyme, alſo he tooke vnto him Adela ſiſter vnto the French king, which was promiſed vnto him in his fathers life tyme: But ſhortly after hauyng a vehement preſumption that ſhe had bene carnally knowne of his ſayd father, he ſent her home againe vnto her brother, but not without an honourable dowrye, and manye riche and large giftes. And after this he ſped him into England, and firſt of all went vnto Wincheſter, & then to Sareſbury, where he founde no ſmall treaſure: For as the fame went, there was found beſides apparell, Jewelles, and plate, nine hundreth thouſande poundes in coyne. From thence returned he to London, and was the thirde day of the moneth of September folowyng crowned at Weſtminſter of Baldwyn Archbiſhop of Cauntorbury. Upon the which day the Jewes that then dwelt in England, and namely in the Citie of London and ſuburbes of the ſame, beyng aſſembled together, a great number of them preſumed farther then was lawfull for them to do. For which preſumption, they were firſt rebuked, and after one of them was ſtriken by one of the kinges chiefe officers, which thing beyng ſeene of the common people, who ſuppoſed the ſame to be done by the kinges commaundement, did therefore in a fury (as perſons aſmuch hated of the people as the deuill himſelfe, for their vſury and other their vnhappie condicions) fall vpon them, and chaſed them to their houſes, and robbed and ſpoyled them without all pitie, and brent ſome of their houſes, whereof the rumor ranne to Weſtminſter to the kinges heeryng. Wherefore in all haſte he ſent downe, geuyng ſtreyte commaundement that they ſhoulde ceaſſe off that ryot: But the people were in ſuch yre and madneſſe, that they refrayned not for all the kinges commaundement, vntill they had executed the full of their malice. And albeit, that this ryot was afterwarde grieuouſly declared againſt the Commons of the Citie, yet it paſſed vnpuniſhed, for the great number of the tranſgreſſors. And the ſayd day of Coronation, all priſoners that lay in any priſon about London at the kinges ſute, or for other ſmall and trifling actions, were freely diſcharged and deliuered.

A riot made vpon Jewes

A charitable deede which is not of late vſed.

Sone after the king gaue many dignities, namely to his brother John he gaue the Prouynces of Notingham, Deuonſhire, and Cornewall, and created him Erle of Lancaſter. And then the king ordeyned the Citie of London to be ruled by two Bailifes, whoſe names and ſurnames, together with the names of all the Mayors and Shrifes of the Citie of London are regeſtred in a Table in the ende of this booke, with the ſeuerall yeres that euery of them was in, aſwell of the reignes of euery king, as alſo the yeres of our Lorde.

The names & ſurnames of Baylifes, Mayors, and Shirifes of London, are in a Table in the ende of this booke.

And here is a meete place to ſay ſomewhat of the gouernement of this noble Citie of London, for that in this firſt yere of the reigne of this famous Prince, the ſame was gouerned by two Baylifes, as may appere by Fabian. The which Fabian alſo ſayth, that the ſame before tyme was gouerned by perſones graue and wyſe, and were named Portgreues, or rather Portgraues, the which is deriued of two Saxon wordes (as he ſayth) that is to ſay,

Port, and Greue, or rather Graue, for ſo are the rulers of the townes in Duchelande called at this day, that is to ſay, all ſuch Rulers of townes or Countries as are nere the ſea, are called Wergraue, as at this day in Andwarpe, the chiefe ruler is called Wergraue, that is to ſay, the Erle or Lorde of a towne or Countrie ioyning to the ſea, and ſuch rulers as are higher into the lande, and farther from the ſea, are called Lantgraue, that is, the ruler or Erle of a Citie or Countrie within the lande ſo that theſe wordes Portgraue, which Fabian interpreteth, the ruler of a towne, I do accompt it not ſo nere the truth, as to enterpret it as it is at this day in London, we call the ruler thereof not onely Maior, becauſe he is the chiefe ruler of the Citie, but we adde for a more dignitie vnto that ſtate, and call him Lorde Maior: So thinke I of Portgraues, for Port is a towne, and Graue is an Erle, and that they were then accompted as chiefe Lordes or Erles of the Citie, and were of no leſſe eſtimation then the ruler is nowe, although peraduenture not ſo glorious. And the name of the Shirifes of London at this day, which are vnder officers vnto the Maior, are in all the Queenes writtes named Vice commiti, that is vnder Erles, or vnder Lordes, or vnder rulers.

It was not long after that the king had thus exalted his brother John (as aboue is ſhewed) but that he alſo preferred him to the maryage of the Erle of Glouceſters daughter, by reaſon whereof he was Lord of that Erledome. Theſe great aduauncementes made him after vnkinde to his brother and by pryde thereof to couet after the whole kingdome.

Abſolucion. This yere alſo king Richard was abſoyled, of the rebellion that he vſed againſt his father. In recompence whereof (ſayth Guydo) he voluntarily tooke vpon him and promiſed to warre vpon Chriſtes enemies, but to ſpeake truly, it was at the requeſt of the Pope.

And this yere, as ſayth Fabian, king Richard gaue ouer the Caſtelles of Barwike, and Rokeſborough to the Scottiſhe king, for the ſumme of ten thouſand pound, for the erployte of his voyage to Jeruſalem.

Robert Hood otherwiſe called Robin Hoode. And about this tyme as ſayth John Maior, in his Chronicle of Scotland, there were many robbers and outlawes in England, among the which number, he ſpecially noteth Robert Hood, whom we now call Robyn Hood, and little John, who were famous theues, they continued in woodes, mountaynes, and foreſtes, ſpoilyng and robbing, namely ſuch as were riche. Murders commonly they did none, except it were by the prouocation of ſuch as reſiſted them in their rifelynges and ſpoyles. And the ſayde Maior ſayth, that the aforeſaid Robyn Hood had at his rule and commaundement an hundreth tall yomen, which were mightie men and exceedyng good archers, and they were mainteyned by ſuche ſpoyles as came to their handes: And he ſayth moreouer, that thoſe hundreth were ſuch picked men, and of ſuch force, that foure hundreth men who ſoeuer they were, durſt neuer ſet vpon them. And one thing was much commended in him, that he would ſuffer no woman to be oppreſſed, violated or otherwiſe abuſed. The poorer ſort of people he fauoured, and would in no wiſe ſuffer their goodes to be touched or ſpoyled, but relieued and ayded them with ſuche goodes as hee gate from the riche, which he ſpared not, namely the riche prieſtes, fat Abbottes, and the houſes of riche Carles. And although his theft and rapyne was to be contemned, yet the aforeſayd Auctheur prayſeth him and ſayth, that among the number of theeues, Robin Hood had an hundreth tall yomen weityng vpon him.

A worthie vertue in a theefe.

theeues, he was worthie the name of the moſt gentle theefe.

But in an olde and auncient Pamphlet I finde this written of the ſayd Robert Hood. This man (ſayth he) diſcended of a noble parentage: or rather beyng of a baſe ſtocke and linage, was for his manhoode and chiualry aduaunced to the noble dignitie of an Erle, excellyng principally in Archery, or ſhootyng, his manly courage agreeyng therevnto: But afterwardes he ſo prodigally exceeded in charges and expences, that he fell into great debt, by reaſon whereof, ſo many actions and ſutes were commenced againſt him, whereunto he aunſwered not, that by order of lawe he was outlawed, and then for a lewde ſhift, as his laſt refuge, gathered together a companye of Royſters and Cutters, and practiſed robberyes and ſpoylyng of the kinges ſubiects, and occupied and frequented the Foreſtes or wilde Countries. The which beyng certefyed to the King, and he beyng greatly offended therewith, cauſed his proclamation to be made that whoſoeuer would bryng him quicke or dead, the king would geue him a great ſumme of money, as by the recordes in the Exchequer is to be ſeene: But of this promiſe, no man enioyed any benefite. For the ſayd Robert Hood, beyng afterwardes troubled with ſickneſſe, came to a certein Nonry in Yorkſhire called Birckleys, where deſiryng to be let blood, he was betrayed & bled to death. After whoſe death the Priorelle of the ſame place cauſed him to be buried by the high way ſide, where he had vſed to rob and ſpoyle thoſe that paſſed that way. And vpon his graue the ſayde Priorelle did lay a very fayre ſtone, wherein the names of Robert Hood, William of Goldeſborough, and others were grauen. And the cauſe why ſhe buryed him there, was, for that the common paſſengers and trauailers knowyng and ſeeyng him there buryed, might more ſafely and without feare take their iorneys that way, which they durſt not do in the life of the ſayd outlawes. And at eyther ende of the ſayde Tombe was erected a croſſe of ſtone, which is to be ſeene there at this preſent.

Gerardus Marcator in his Coſmographie and diſcription of England, ſayth that in a towne or village called little Moraine in Scotland, there are kept the bones of a great and mightie man, which was called little John, among the which bones, the huckle bone or hip bone was of ſuch largeneſſe, as witneſſeth Boethus, that he thruſt his arme through the whole thereof, and the ſame bone being conferred to the other partes of his body, did declare the man to be. xliij. foote long. Little Iohn.

But before the king tooke his iourney, great preparation was made for money. At that time it appereth that taxes, tolles, exactions, and ſubſidies, eyther were not knowen, or not ſo much then had in vſe as of late tymes they haue bene: By reaſon whereof, this king was driuen to make other ſhift, by ſelling Lordſhips, Caſtels, Offices, Liberties, Priuileges, Biſhoprikes. &c. And as he ſayd himſelfe, he woulde haue ſolde London alſo, if he coulde haue found any able to buy it. Vpon this occaſion it came that diuerſe Biſhoppes, namely ſuch as were beſt monyed, purchaced to their Biſhoprikes dyuerſe Lordſhippes, as Godfrey Biſhop of Wincheſter, purchaſed Wargraue, and Meues. And Hugh Biſhop of Durham purchaſed the Lordſhip called Hadberge with all the appurtenances, for fiue hundreth Markes. &c. And alſo he purchaſed the whole Prouince of Durham of the king to be his awne, and himſelfe to be made Erle of the ſame, wherupon the old writers as Houeden

Taxes, tolles Subſidies.

Biſhops became great purchaſers.

The Biſhop of Durham was made Erle of Durham.

Ceſtrenſis, and other, rebuke the ſayde Biſhop in their Chronicles, the king alſo teſtyng at the ſame, ſaiyng, that of an olde Biſhoppe, he had made a yong Erle.

1191 3 Contention for ſuperiorite.

Now when king Richard had appoynted all things for his iourney, and the ſame beyng in a redineſſe, he then commytted the cuſtodie of his realme of England into the handes of foure men, that is to ſay, two Prelates, and two lay men, of whom the two Prelates, which were Hugh Biſhop of Duriſme, and William Biſhop of Ely, were the chiefe and principall. Theſe two fallyng at varyance amongeſt themſelues for ſuperiorite, at length this order was taken by the king: That the Biſhop of Duriſme (who a little before had purchaſed of the king certeine free Lordſhippes, and alſo to remaine as Juſtice without controlment or checke as aforeſayd) ſhould haue vnder hys cuſtodie, from Humber to the Scottiſhe ſea: The other Biſhop, which was the Biſhop of Ely, ſhould haue all the South partes beſides: But the ſayde Ely beyng more ambicious, ſo practiſed with the king, and by the kings Imbaſſadors ſent his letters to the Pope, that at the laſt he obteyned the authoritie Legantine ouer the whole realme of England.

And as ſoone as the king had thus ſet the realme of England in an order, he then ſayled into Normandy, where he ſettyng that country alſo vnder ſafe keping, did ſhortly after mete with the French king called Philip the ſecond, and after with Frederick the Emperor, & they together ſet forward on their iourney vntil they came to Turon, and there they paſſed away the winter. In the which time eyther of them with other made aſſurance for the continuance of that great iourney. And at the ſpring time of the yere, theſe three great Princes ſet forwarde on their voyage toward the holy lande. That is to ſay, king Richard by the ſea, and the Emperour and king Philip by land, and appoynted to meete together in the land of Scicill. But king Richard, as ſayth an olde written Chronicle, before his departure called all his Lordes and knightes vnto him, and did ſweare them for euermore to be true vnto him, and to take his part. And in token thereof he gaue to euery of them a blewe Lace or Ribband to be knowen by, and hereof (ſayth that olde Chronicle) began the firſt occaſion of the order of the Garter.

In this meane time in England, the Jewes in dyuerſe places of this realme, as Lincolne, Staunford, and Linne were robbed and ſpoyled: And at Yorke to the number of foure hundreth of them and mo, did cut their maſter vaynes, and ſo bled to death, as ſayth Fabian.

Theſe two kings according to their appoyntment met in Scicill, where grudge began to kindle betweene them. And the cauſe thereof as Reynulph ſayth, firſt began for that king Richard denyed vnto king Philip the halfe of his winninges in Cypres according to the couenant aſſured betweene them at Turon. But king Richard ſayde that the conuention ſtretched no farther then to ſuch goodes as ſhould be wonne within the limmites and boundes of the holy lande. Another cauſe of grudge was, by reaſon that the French king ayded not the Erle of Campayne beyng in diſtreſſe and neede. Wherefore the ſayd Erle beyng therewith diſcontent, ſayd to the Frenche king: Sir hetherto I haue done according to my duetie: But hereafter I will doe as neede compelleth me. For your grace hath hetherto cheriſhed mee but for mine, but now I will go to him that is more redier to geue then to take, and ſo departed vnto king Richarde where he was right well enterteyned. And the third cauſe was, as ſaith Reynulph, that king Richard at his firſt entring into Sycill maryed the ſiſter of the king of Nauerne, where before he had promiſed the ſayde French king to haue maryed his ſiſter Adela. But the French Chronicle chargeth king Richard to be in great fault, namely that he was a breaker of promiſe in all that he couenaunted with king Philip, and alſo that he ſolde the Ile of Cipres which he wan before he came vnto Syria vnto the Templers, for thirtie thouſande Marke, and after tooke it from them againe by ſtrength, and exchaunged it with Guy of Leſyngham that was the laſt chriſtened king of Jeruſalem, for the ſame kingdome, and therefore the kings of England were long time after called kings of Jeruſalem. Alſo that he ſhould take from a knight of the Duke of Oſtrich ꝑ ſaid Dukes Baner, beyng firſt ſet vpon the walles of Acon at the ſkalyng thereof, and in diſpite of the ſayde Duke, did treade it vnder his feete, and did vnto it all the diſpite that he might, and ſet his awne Banner in the ſame place. And alſo that where Conradus Marques of Tyre was trayterouſly ſlaine by two of his awne ſeruauntes, king Richard ſhould lay the charge of the fault therof vnto the French king. And for theſe grudges and ſickneſſe, with alſo feare of treaſon (as ſayth the French Chronicle) to be wrought betwene Saladine the Soudane and king Richard: king Philip returned firſt into Appulia, and then to Rome, whether he had vowed a pilgrimage, and from thence into Fraunce.

King Richarde charged by the French man with many great offences.

But howſoeuer the breach was betwene the foreſayd two kinges, great pitie it was, for as long as they continued in amitie together, ſo long they did many valiaunt and famous actes, as in winnyng of Acon, and diuerſe other Cities, and many mo had like to haue bene done, if they had not diſſeuered themſelues. And not long after the departure of the Frenche king, king Richarde at the next ſpring folowing returned alſo. Who in his returne, driuen by diſtreſſe of weather about the partes of Auſtria, in a towne called Sinaca, was there taken by Leopold Duke of the ſame countrie, who ſolde him to the Emperour for three ſcore thouſand Markes (though all writers do not agree vpon the ſomme) and for no ſmall ioy thereof, the ſayd Emperor writeth to the French king theſe Letters folowyng.

King Richard taken priſoner in Auſtriche.

Henry by the grace of God Emperour of the Romaynes euer moſt noble, to his welbeloued and eſpeciall friend Philip the famous king of France ſendeth gretyng, with further declaration of his ſyncere loue: Foraſmuch as the Empyre doubteth not but that your kingly magnificence, is alwayes right ioyous to heere of any ſuch thing with the which the Almightie power of our creator hath adorned and aduaunced vs and our Romaine Empyre, we thought good by the tenor of theſe preſentes to declare vnto your nobleneſſe that the enemye of our Empire, and perturber of your kingdome the king of Englande, as he was paſſyng the ſea in his returne homewardes from the lande of promes, it chaunced (the ſhip in which he was, beyng wrecked) that he was driuen by the winde into the coaſt of Hiſtria, vnto a place which is betwene Aquileia and Uenice, whether the ſayde king by the ſufferance of God after his Shipwreck with a fewe other eſcaped. And afterwardes the ſayde king went forwarde to a Bozough in the Archebiſhoppike of Salſburge named Friſoze, where Fredericke of Betſow, as the king was poſtyng toward Auſtria in the night ſeaſon, tooke fiue of his knightes pziſoners. And our welbeloued coſyn Leopold Duke of Auſtria laiyng wayte by euery way did take the king captiue at Dena in a village nere therevnto, in a ſimple houſe. Now therefoze ſeeyng he is in our poſſeſſion, and hath bene alwayes the cauſe of moleſtyng and troubling of you, we conſideryng the pzemiſſes, thought good to ſignifie thus much vnto your nobleneſſe, aſſuryng our ſelues that the ſame will be right pleaſant and acceptable newes vnto you, and an occaſion of ioy and gladnes. Geuen at Rithout, the fift kalendas of January.

Richard Ceur de lion, why he was ſo called.

It is read of this Richarde that duryng the tyme of his impziſonment, he ſhould ſlay a Lion, and teare the heart out of his body, and therefof it came that he was called Richard Ceur de Lyon, that is, the heart of a Lion. But of the learned it is thought that this is but a fable, but rather that he was ſo called foz his inuincible courage and ſtrength. The time alſo of his impziſonment, his brother John by the ſetting on of the French king, made great warr within the land, and tooke by ſtrength the Caſtell of Windſoze, of Notyngham and others, and the French king made ſtrong warre in Normandy.

Howbeit, as touching the returne of king Richard out of Syzia, and his taking by Leopald Archeduke of Auſtrich, the matter is farre otherwiſe repozted by Polidoze after this maner: When he had comfozted the chziſtian men in Syzia, with ſuch wozds as are befoze rehearſed, he then hauing pzepared his Naue foz that purpoſe, ſent away befoze him his wyfe Berengaria with her ſiſter Jone and a great part of his army into Sicill, which from thence ſayled into Englande: And then he himſelfe followed with the reſt, which were but a fewe in number, minding to ſayle into Thzacia: But by tempeſt his chaunce was to be dziuen into Dalmatia, where he arryued and chaunged his apparell, becauſe he would not be acknowne, and determined with him ſelfe to go home into England thzough high Almayne, trauayling at his eaſe, ſometime on hozſeback, and ſometime on foote. And when he was come to the Countrie of Auſtriche, he remembzing the bzeche that was betweene him and the Duke of the ſame countrie foz caſting downe his banner from the walles of Acon at the wynning therof: And therefoze miſtruſting that the ſaide Duke would be reuenged on him foz the ſayde diſhonour, and being alſo aduertiſed by his eſpialles, that the fame of his comming was now bzuted abzoade thzoughout all the Countrie, he beganne to feare himſelfe, and therefoze trauayled very circumſpectly, ſending euer hys ſpialles befoze to ſearch the wayes that he ſhould paſſe by. But yet coulde he by no meanes eſcape that which was by deſteny appointed to happen vnto him. Foz aſ ſone as he was entered into the Citie of Vienna, which is the chiefe Citie of that Countrie, he was by his tongue knowne to be an Engliſhman. And becauſe he was moze delicate and deyntie then became a perſon being ſo homely appareled, he was thereby ſuſpected of manye to be the king himſelfe, & the rather becauſe it was a conſtant rumoz, that he was come into the Countrie. The Duke heeryng of this, beſet the houſe by and by wherein he was lodged with men of armes, that none ſhould eſcape out, and then ſent he other into the houſe to viewe and ſee what maner of gueſtes were within. When king Richard perceyued that the houſe was thus beſet rounde about with harneſſed men, in ſuch wiſe that it was not poſſible for hym to flie, he cauſed himſelfe to be apparelled lyke a king, and hauing the ſame conſtancie of minde which he euer vſed in all his martiall affaires, he ſhewed himſelfe vnto the ſouldiours, now being entred the houſe, demaunding of them what the matter was, that they in ſuch forcible wiſe came vnto him, who anſwered that they came to take him. To whome he anſwered againe, how it was not ſeemely for a king to yeelde himſelfe priſoner vnto any but to the Duke himſelfe, and therefore if the Duke himſelfe would come, he would be content to yeelde himſelfe vnto him. Then came the Duke, whome the king met and deliuered him his ſworde, and ſo yeelded himſelfe vnto him, who being glad that he had gotten ſuch a praye vnlooked for, had him home with hym to hys houſe, geuing him verie fayre wordes all the waye as he paſſed, and then deliuered him vnto certeyne noble men of his Countrie to be ſafely kept. &c.

In this meane time that the king was ſo occupied in the warres with the Saraſens as is aforeſayde, the Biſhop of Elye of whome mencion is made before, being firſt authoriſed by the king as gouernor of this realme, & after made the Popes Legate, tooke then not a little ſtate vpon him in the abſence of the king, in ſuch ambicious and prowde ſort that he made all the realme cry out vpon him. This Biſhop whoſe name was William Longchampe a Norman borne, and commyng of a baſe ſtocke, after he had aſpired to the Biſhoprike of Ely, and then to be Chauncelor of England, and after the Popes Legate, hauyng now in the abſence of the king the whole rule and gouernement of the Realme in his awne hande, grewe out of meaſure in ſuche pompe and pride, that he became intollerable both to the Clergie, and to the Laiety. Firſt he beginneth to aſſemble a generall counſaile together at London. The colour and pretence was for Religion, but in verye deede, as ſayth the olde ſtories, the cauſe was his awne pompe and ambicion, with importunate oppreſſion of the Clergie. And no leſſe troubleſome was he alſo vnto the Layty, wonderfully oppreſſyng the Commons, abuſyng the kinges auctoritie, and aduaunſyng vaine glory. His vſe was to ride with a thouſande horſes continually, ſo that the noble mennes ſonnes were glad to become his ſlaues. And with the beſt Barons, Erles, and Peeres of this realme, maryed he his Coſyns, Neces and kinſwomen (I will not ſay his daughters) and for all that, his Grandfather was but a poore Ploughman, and his father a Cowheard. And hauyng ſo tirannouſly abuſed his office, fearyng leaſt he ſhoulde haue bene called to his examination, he fled with a fewe of his truſty ſeruauntes to Doner Caſtell, mindyng to haue ſtolen ouer the ſea: And commyng in the night in a womans apparell, with a peece of cloth vnder his Arme, and a met yard in his hande, vpon ſuſpicion (as God would haue it) beyng knowen what he was, his kercheſe was pulled off his head, & his ſhauen crowne appered on his head. And then was he drawen along the ſea vpon the ſandes, with a great wondering of the people: Some rated him, ſome reuiled him, ſome beſpatteled him, ſome drawyng him by the armes, ſome by the legges from place to place, his awne ſeruauntes not beyng able to helpe him. And at

at the last they brought him into a seller, where they shut him fast in, and so couered him from the people with shame ynough, vntill the counsaile of the realme sent for him, and after was brought to the Tower of London, and there imprisoned, examined, depriued, and banished the realme: And at the length restored againe by king Richard, and after beyng sent to Rome by the way there dyed. 1197.

But Polidore sayth, that king Richarde beyng moued therevnto by the dayly complaintes of his nobles, deprined him of the Gouernorship by hys letters, and placed in his steede William Archebishop of Roan, which was the cause that he would haue fled the realme, neither maketh he any mention that he was restored by the sayd king.

And after this, king Richard beyng prisoner, sent Hubert bishop of Sarisbury into England to haue the guydyng therof, and also to treate with the Lordes and Commons for the kinges deliuery, and for his raunsome: But for the payment of the sayd raunsome all the Welles of the white Monkes and Chanons in England were solde, and Ringes and Crolles of Prelates, with vesselles and Chalices of all Churches throughout the realme, and .xviij Shrines were scraped and spoyled of the golde and siluer, and rich and poore payed dyuerse summes of money to their great losse.

Now to returne to king Richarde, at the length he was raunsomed for an hundreth thousande pounde, as Polichronicon, Fabian, and Cooper say, from the couetous captiuitie of the Emperour, and beyng deliuered, he returned againe into England, and landed at Sandwiche, and so came to London, where when he had arested him a little while, he then roade with a certeine number of knightes to Notingham, and wanne the Castell by force, and after that the Castell of Tykhill. And shortly after called a counsaile of his Lordes at Winchester, where by aucthoritie of the sayd counsayle he deprined John his brother (then beyng in Fraunce) of all honour, and tooke from him all such landes as he before had geuen vnto him, for that in his absence he ioyned with the Frenche king agaynst him, and also sought to haue possessed the Crowne and realme of England into his owne possession.

John ♀ brother of king Richard deprined of all honour for rebellion.

And shortly after, that is to say, in the .viij. yere of his reigne, he caused himselfe to be crowned againe at Winchester. After which corronation he called a Parliament, by aucthoritie whereof, he resumed againe all patentes, and annuities, fees, and other graunte before his voyage by him solde and graunted, and caused the parties to be contented with such reuenues and profites as they had receyued of the sayde offices or landes, in the tyme of his absence: And spared not for any sufficiencie of wrytyng, that by him before was made.

A Parliamẽt wherein patentes & fees were reuoked, which the king had made & granted before his goyng to Jerusalem.

When the king by these aforesayd meanes had gathered some money, he then in the moneth of July sayled into Fraunce, and besieged a Castell called Arques, and sped there, as sayth Polichronica, dyuerslye, which worde diuerslye may well here be spoken. For who so readeth the Frenche Chronicle, shall finde that the French king was victor, although the Englishe booke sayth otherwise, but who had the victory in dede is vncerteine. But the French Chronicle sayth, that king Richard so scarred the French kinges host, that he tooke the kinges Sumpter horse and parte of his treasure. And shortly after a peace was concluded.

Arques Castell.

Then

Then John which had turned to the French king against his naturall brother, seeyng the fame and honour of his brother, and weakenesse and feblenesse of himselfe, made meanes vnto Alianor his mother, by whose mediation he was reconciled againe vnto his brother the king, and after became his true knight.

John was againe reconciled to king Richard his brother.

When the king and his brother John were thus agreed, they road ouer the land to visite the countries, and to see how they were guyded by the kings officers. Among other, two there were, which shewed that they would do many things to the kinges profite, the one was Abbot of Cadonence in Normandye, and the other was named William with the long beard, as sayth Reynulphe.

Two Parliaments.

The Abbot warned the king of the fraude of his officers, whereby he thought by the punishment of his officers, he should winne great fauour of the people. Then this Abbot gate a warrant of the king, and went to London, and there called before him diuerse officers, and caused them to make there accomptes before him. But he dyed shortly, so that his purpose tooke small effect.

And William with the long beard shewed vnto the king the outrage of the riche men, which (as he sayde) spared their awne, and pilled the poore people. It is sayde that this William was borne in London, and purchased that name by the vse of his beard. He was quicke of witte, and somethyng learned, bolde of speche, and graue of countenance, & toke vpon him greater matters then he could compasse, and some cruelnesse he vsed, as apered in the accusyng of his awne brother of treason, the which was a Citizen of London, and had shewed to him great loue and friendship, euen bringyng him vp in his youth.

William with the long beard.

This William stirred and excited the common people to desyre and loue fredome and libertie, and blamed the excesse and outrage of riche men. By such meanes he drue to him many great companies, and with all his power defended the poore mennes causes against the riche, and accused diuerse to the king, shewyng that by their meanes the king lost many forfeytes and escheates. For this cause, gentlemen and men of honour hated him, but he had such comfort of the king, as he kept on his purpose. But afterward, the king heeryng of the congregations that this William made, commaunded him to ceasse off such doynges, that the people might exercise their artes and occupations: By reason whereof, it was left for a while, but it did not clearely ceasse. For within a while after, they folowed him more then they did before. And then he preached vnto them, the which Sermon is at length set out in Reynulph, the. vij. booke, and. xxx. Chapter, and likewise in Fabian. But after his Sermon, he was sent for to the Archebishop of Caumtorbury, but he came with such a multitude folowyng him, that the Lordes were contented to remit him at that tyme with faire and pleasant wordes, and secretly commaunded certeyne personnes to espie when he was voyde of company, and then to take him and put him in sure keepyng. The which accordyng to the commaundement at tyme conuenient (as they thought) set vpon him to haue taken him: But he with an Axe resisted them, and slue one of them, and after fled into Saint Mary Bow Church in Cheape, and tooke that for his sauegard, defending himselfe by strength.

But

But within a little while after, by meanes of the heades and rulers of the Citie, the people miniſhed, ſo that ere it were long he was left with a few perſonnes, and ſo was taken, but not without ſhedding of blood. After which taking, he was arreigned before the Iudges, and there he and. ix. of his adherentes had iudgement to die, and were hanged the day folowyng. But yet the rumor ceaſſed not, for the common people rayſed a great cryme vpon the Archbiſhop of Cauntorbury and other, and ſayd, that by their meanes, William that was an innocent of ſuch crymes, as were obiected and put againſt him, was a defender of the poore people againſt extorcioners and wrong doers, and that hee was by them put wrongfullye to death, affirmyng him an holy man, and a martyr, in ſuch wiſe as folowеth. They ſayde that a man beyng ſicke of a feuer, was cured by vertue of a cheyne which this William was bound withall duryng the tyme of his impriſonment, which by a Prieſt of the kindred of the ſayd William was openly declared and preached. Whereby he brought the people into ſuch an errour that they gaue credence to his wordes, and ſecretly in the night conueyed away the Iebet that he was hanged vpon, and ſcraped away the blood of him where he was headed and quartered, ſo that they made there a hollow place, by fetchyng away of that earth, and ſayd that ſicke men and ſicke women were cured of diuerſe ſickneſſes by vertue of that blood and earth. By theſe meanes, and ſpreadyng abroade the fame therof, that place was the more viſited by women and vndiſcrete perſonnes, of the which ſome watched there all night in prayer: ſo that the lenger this continued, the more outcry and ſlaunder ranne vpon the Iudges and Iuſtices that put him to death.

Howbeit, at the laſt, when his dedes were declared, as the ſleayng of a man with his awne hand, and vſyng of his Concubine within Saint Mary Church of Bow, in the time of his there beyng, as he openly confeſſed at the houre of his death, with other deteſtable crymes, ſomewhat cooled the haſtie flame of the hoate Pilgrimage: But not clearely vntill the Archbiſhop accurſed the Prieſt that brought vp the firſt tale, and alſo cauſed that place to be watched, that ſuch Idolatrie ſhould there no more be vſed.

Reynulph in his. vij. booke and. xxxj. Chapter maketh mencion that about this tyme a Prince of Wales, whome he called Rees or Rice dyed, in whoſe prayſe this that followeth is written, by the ſayde Author.

Rees or Rice a Prince of Wales.

O bleſſe of battalie, chylde of chiualrie, defence of Countrie, worſhip of armes, Arme of ſtrength, hand of largeneſſe, eye of reaſon, brightneſſe of honeſtie, bearing in breſt, Hectors prowеſſe, Achilles ſharpneſſe, Neſtors ſoberneſſe, Tydeus hardineſſe, Sampſons ſtrength, Hectors worthyneſſe, Eurialus ſwiftneſſe, Ulixes fayre ſpeech, Salomons wiſedome, Aiax hardineſſe. O clothing of naked, the hungries meate, fulfilling the requeſt of all that deſyred. O Eloquence, felow in ſeruice, honeſt of deede, and ſober in worde. Glad of ſemblaunt and loue in face, goodly to euerye man, and rightfull to all, the noble Diademe and bewtie of Wales is now falen, that is, Ryce is dead. All Wales groneth, Ryce is dead, the name is not loſt, but deferred. The bliſſe of Wales paſſeth, Ryce is dead. The enimie is here, for Ryce is not here. Now Wales helpeth not it ſelfe, Ryce is deade and taken away. But his noble fame is not deade, for it is alway newe in the worlde wyde. If a man aſke what is the ende? In the Month of Aprill and in the .ix. yere of his reigne, when the king had prouyded to sende fourth twentie thousande pounde to the Emperour, for full payment of hys raunsome, the pledges which had lyen for the same came sodainely into England, and shewed vnto the king, that after hys departing the Emperor sent them vnto the Duke of Ostrich, to remayne with him vntill the money were payde. And they sayde also that the Duke was accursed of Innocent the thirde, then Bishop of Rome, by reason of hys wrong done to king Richard, and that his Prouince was vexed with manye mischiefes. And as the Duke roade fourth on a day in his disport, being saint Stephens daye, he hurt his foote in such wise with a thorne, or other venym which rankled and grewe so sore, that lastly he must die or cut it of. But in hope of recouery, he continued vntill in the ende there was none other way but death. Then he sent for his Bishops, and desyred to be assoyled of the sentence of the Churche which he stood in. The which was denyed him, except he would sweare to stande and abyde the ordinance and iudgement of holy Church, touching the wrong that he had done to king Richard. The Duke sware and was assoyled: and shortly after, the two Bishops, pledges for the money, were set at their libertie. 1197 9

Now king Richard calling to mind that his vttermost day of the truce taken betweene the Frenche king and him drewe nere at hande, he therefore made him readie and sayled into Normandy: where before his comming, the Frenche king, by occasion of the Normans (as sayeth the Frenche booke) was entered the Countrie of Burges, towarde whome king Richarde sped him with all possible speede, so that both hostes laye parted wyth the ryuer of Olson or Ollyne. Then to follow the Frenche booke, for so much as the Englishe Chronicle speaketh little or nothing of this act, let wise men that reade thys Chronicle conster it after their discretions: For although the Frenchman wrote it to the honour of his countrie men, it will the rather redound to their dishonor. For thus sayth the sayd Chronicle, these two hostes thus as is abouesayde lying together without skirmishe or assault, king Richard contrary to the minde and opinion of his Lordes, with a few accompanyed and vnharnessed, came to the French kinges tent, and there in presence of his Lordes did homage to the French king for the Duchie of Normandie, and Countries of Ingeow and of Poyters, and there sware to the king to kepe peace duryng his lyfe: And after. viij. dayes met againe and finished the sayde peace with an assured othe on either partie, and after departed as friendes, eyther resorting into their awne country: but it semed a fayne peace, for within foure monethes next folowyng, king Richard with his hoste entered into the Prouynce of Berry, and layde siege to the Castell of Wyersone, and gate it by strength. And after went to the Castell of Noryncourt, which was deliuered to him by appoyntment.

A tale told by a French Chronicler of king Richard

When the French king heard of the wynnyng and ouerthrow of the Castell of Wyersone, he in dammagyng of king Richard, layde siege to the Castell of Aubeuyle, and assayled it egerly: But it was so strong and so well defended fended by the Normans, that the French king was holden off. When king Richard had garniſhed & fortefied the Caſtell of Nozincourt with all thinges neceſſary to the warre, he drue him toward Aubeuyle to remoue king Philip from that ſiege, and fell vpon the Frenchmen vnwarily. But the Frenchmen quit themſelues ſo knightly, that they chaſed king Richarde and his people, and tooke a Norman knight priſoner, named Guy de Thonars, a man of great hardineſſe. And then king Philip returned to the towne and Caſtell of Aubeuile, and aſſaulted it more ſharpely, ſo that in the ende the Souldiours of the towne yelded it with the Caſtell for a ſumme of money. And when he had poſſeſſion of the towne, he threwe downe the Caſtell plaine with the ground, and after ſtrengthened the towne with Frenchmen, & then went to the Caſtell of Gyſors, and from thence to the Caſtell of Nozincourt: And aſſayled it in ſo cruell maner, that ſhortly he wan it, & toke therein. xb. knights, and. xxiiij. women with plentie of victuall and Armour.

Gyſors Caſtell.

In this time and ſeaſon, king Richard gathered againe a new ſtrength, and allyed himſelfe with Baldwyn Erle of Flaunders, and Reignold Erle of Dampmartyn and of Boleyn. By whoſe meanes (as ſayth the Frenche booke) king Richard waſted ſore the Countrie of Fraunce, and brent therein ſome Townes and villages, and tooke therein many riche prayes. Fabian.

In the. x. yere of his reigne, and about the begynnyng of the moneth of October, king Richard entred into the country of Unequecyne with a ſtrong hoſt, and made there cruell warre in deſtroiyng of the country, & aſſaulted the Caſtel of Gyſors, & threw to the ground a ſtrong hold called Courcellys, and brent thereabout many villages. Wherewith king Philip was ſo ſore amoued, that with a ſmall number of knightes he pierſed the hoſte of Engliſhemen, and entred the Caſtell or towne of Gyſors. But of his men were taken a great number, chiefely ſuch as were men of name, with the which priſoners and manye riche prayes the king departed, leauyng the Frenche king within Gyſors.

Caſtell of Gyſors aſſaulted.

It was not long after that king Richard was thus departed, but king Philip callyng to mynde the loſſe and diſhonour that he had receyued by that warre, aſſembled a great army, and entred the Duchie of Normandye, and waſted the country from Newefoorough to Beawmont le Rogier. And that done, he returned into Fraunce, and lycenced his knightes eche man to go into his awne countrie.

When the Frenche king had thus taken his pleaſure in the ſpoyle of a great peece of Normandy, then king Richard with his army entered the former countrey of Unequecyn, and Bewuoeyne, and there tooke as he before had done many rich prayes, and ſo came away, whome the Biſhop of Bewuays beyng a good knight and hardie of his handes, with a companye of knightes and other, folowed to haue reſkewed the priſoners that king Richard had taken. But they themſelues were diſcomfited, and a great many of them taken and ſlaine. At the ſame tyme the Erle of Flaunders wyth the helpe of the Engliſhmen, toke the towne of S. Omer from the French king.

Sone after Chriſtmaſſe next folowyng, king Richard beſieged a Caſtell nere vnto Lymogis. This Caſtell in the French tongue is called Chalons, & in the Engliſh boke it is named Gayllard. But Reynulph calleth it Caulr.

Caſtell of Chalons otherwiſe called Gaillard, or Caulr.

The cauſe of this ſiege (as ſayth moſt writers) was for certayne riche treaſure treasure that was founde within the Seigniory of king Richard, the which one Aydomer vicount of Lemonke had founden, and withheld the same from king Richard, and for his sauegarde fled into the aforenamed Castell, and defended it manfully from the first weeke of Lent, vntill the sixt day of Aprill. Upon the which day, king Richarde walking vnwisely aboute the Castell, to espie the feblenesse thereof, one named Bertrand Guedon marked the king, and wounded him in the heade (or as some wryte) in the arme, with a venemous quarrell. After which wounde receyued by the king, he commaunded sharpe assault to be made to the Castell, in the which assault the Castell was wonne.

King Richard wounded to death.

Then the king caused inquirie to be made who it was that did hurt him, the which being founde, was brought vnto the kinges presence, and named himselfe as afore sayde, but after some wryters, he was called Peter Basile. Then the king demaunded of him, why he did so lye in waite rather to hurte him, then any other of the company? And he aunswered, because thou sleweste my father and my brethren (sayd he) and I entended to aduenge their death what soeuer became of me. Then the king forgaue him his offence, and suffered him to go at libertie. And all the other of the Souldiours that were taken in that Castell were forthwith hanged. But Reynulph sayth, that after king Richard was dead, the Duke of Flaundirs which then was present, caused the sayd Bertrand to be slaine quicke, and after hanged.

The king forgaue his death but other reuenged it.

Bertrand slue king Richard is put to death.

And within three dayes after the king was hurt, he dyed that is to say, the ix day of Aprill, and was buryed as he himselfe willed at Fount Ebzard or Euerard at the Feete of his father. Howbeit his hart was buryed at Roan, and his bowelles in Poyters, when he had reigned ix. yeres, ix. monethes and odde dayes, leauing after him none issue.

King Iohn.

After the death of king Richarde, reigned his brother John Erle of Morton, yongest sonne of Henry the seconde, called John without lande, who at the tyme of hys brothers death was in Normandy, where immediatly after the death of hys sayde brother he possessed his treasure, and was proclaymed king of England the .vj. day of Aprill 1199. & then sent Hubert Archbishop of Cantorbury into England to make prouision for his coronation. And vpon Easter day next following, he was gyrde with the sworde of the Duke of Britayn, and sone after came into Englande, where he was crowned king at Westmynster, vpon holye Thursdaye then next following of the aforenamed Hubert.

But in this meane time the French king helde a counsayle at Cenamanna in Turon, where (to the derogacon of king Iohn) Arthur the sonne of Geaffrey Plantagenet, and Nephew to the sayde Iohn, was made Duke of Bziteyn: who incontinently after, with a great armie entered the Countrie of Angeou and tooke possession thereof. And king Philip with his people entred the Duchy of Normandy, and layed siege vnto the Citie of Eureux, and wanne it with all the strong holdes there aboutes, and stuffed them with victuall, and strengthned them with his owne knights, and that done wasted and spoyled the Countrie, vntill he came to the Citie of Meux, where met with him the aforenamed Arthur, and did to him homage for the Countrie of Angiers. On the other side, the Britones which fauoured Arthur tooke and kept for his behoofe (as sayth Polidore) these townes, Gorneium, Butauentu and Gensolium: and following also the good successe of victorie, recouered againe the Citie of Angiers, the which king Iohn had taken from Arthur the yere before.

Arthur the son of Geoffrey Plantagenet.

In the Moneth of May following, Alianour sometime wyfe to king Henry the second, and mother to king Richard the first came into Fraunce, to the French king to Meux aforesaid, & made him homage for the Countrie of Poyters as her inheritaunce. And sone after the French king returned into Fraunce, & the Duke of Bziteyn with hym, which as yet was within age.

Alianor the mother to king Richard the first did homage to ỹ French king for the county of Poyters.

A subsidy of thre shillings of euery plough land.

King Iohn beyng of thys warre in Normandy, and losse of the Countries aboue named, was greatly moued, charging ỹ French king with breche of truce, wherupõ he assembled a counsaile and asked ayde of his Lordes and commons, to wynne agayne theaforesayde landes, and there was graunted vnto him as some write three shillings of euery Plough land thorough England beside the subsidie of the spirituall lands. And when all things were in readinesse that was meete for that voyage he then on Saint Iohn Baptistes daye following sayled into Normandy, and came to Roan, where as he was royally receyued, & shortly after a truce was concluded betweene the French king and him for one yere following. And then there came vnto hym the Erle of Flaundyrs, and all other the Lordes of Fraunce that were of king Richards bond and friendship, and were sworne vnto him.

King Iohn sayleth into Normandy with a great power.

Not long after, king Philip taking homage of Arthur for the Duchye of Normandie and all other the possessions of king Iohn beyond the sea, promised him helpe against king Iohn. After this king Iohn and the Frenche king spake together about an houres space. And the Frenche king asked so muche lande for himselfe, and Duke Arthur, that king Iohn would none graunt, and so departed in wrath.

Philip the French king aydeth Arthur against king Iohn.

The same yere a Legate came vnto king Iohn into England and commaunded him vnder paine of interdiction of his land, that he should deliuer the Archebishop which he kept in Prison. And the king denyed so to do, vntill he had payed him fyre thousand Markes for his raunsome, because he was taken in harnesse in the fielde, and had before sworne that he would neuer weare harnesse agaynst any Christian man.

(This was ỹ Archbishop of Bewnays that was taken by king Richard the first in the last yere of his reigne.

At this time a deuorcement was made, betwene king Iohn and Auis his wife, daughter to the Erle of Glouceſter, because they were in the thirde degre of kindred. And after by the Counsaile of the Frenche king: King Iohn maried Isabell daughter of the Erle of Angolisme, fianced before vnto Hugh Variance betwene king John and Geoffrey Archbiſhop of yorke.

At this tyme fell ſtrife betwene king John, and Geoffrey Archbiſhop of yorke for diuerſe cauſes. Firſt becauſe he woulde not ſuffer and permit the Shirife of Yorke in ſuch affayres as he had to do for the king, within his dioceſſe. Secondly, becauſe he did alſo excommunicate the ſayd Shirife. Thirdly becauſe he would not ſaile with him into Normandy, to make the mariage betwene Lewes the French kinges ſonne, and his neece. &c.

Polidore ſayth, that the cauſe of this fallyng out of king John with his baſe brother Geoffrey Archebiſhop of Yorke, was for that he had reproued him for his great exactions and payments which he layde vpon his people without all meaſure, by reaſon whereof he was ſo much offended with him, that he ſpoyled him of all that he had, and then baniſhed him out of the court: And ſuch (ſayth the aforſayd Author) was the kinges diſpleaſure conceyued againſt him, that he could not by any meanes be pacified, neyther entreated to receyue him to grace againe, vntill it was a yere after: But here Polidores ſaiyng is not to be haſtily credited of the reader, for truly ſuch was the blindneſſe of the tyme, that Polidore had no good opinion of king John, and therfore wryteth very vehemently againſt him in his Hiſtory, which vehemency or fonde malice I thought meete rather to ſuppreſſe, then to make any mention thereof.

Homage of William king of Scottes.

Alſo in this yere as ſayth Reyuulph, William king of Scottes did homage to king John at Lincolne, or as ſome write at London, and ſware in the preſence of a Legate of Rome, and.xiij. Biſhops, to be true liege man to him, and to his heyres kinges. But Hector Boethus ſayth, that this homage was done for the landes of Northumberland, Comberland, and Huntingdon, which the Scottiſhe king helde of the king of England, and not for the realme of Scotland, the which is not true.

At the ſame time king John, earneſtly requeſted the ſayd Scottiſh king to ayde him againſt Philip of Fraunce, but he made many excuſes that he could not ſo do, ſpecially without the conſent of his Peeres and Commons, that done he haſtened himſelfe home againe into Scotland.

A ſtraunge ſight.

This yere in the moneth of December were ſeene in the Element about ten of the Clocke in the night time, in the Prouince of Yorke fiue Moones, one in the Weſt, another in the Eaſt, the thirde in the South, the fourth in the North, and the fift in the middeſt of the Element. The ſame tyme alſo in the ſpring ſeaſon king John ſayled into Normandy, and ſhortly after went vnto Paris, where he was very honourably receyued of the Frenche king, from whence after he had made a new league with him, he went vnto Chinon, but the ſayde league continued but a while. For it was not long after, but that the French king required of king John that he ſhoulde depart with all his landes in Normandy, and Pictauia, and elſe where within the dominion of Fraunce, vnto Arthure his nephew, and that incontinent, or elſe he woulde warre againſt him, and foorthwith made great prouiſion for warre, and ioynyng with him the ſayd Arthur, with a great army and puyſſance, ſet vpon certeyne of his townes and Caſtels in Normandy, and put him to much vnquietneſſe. When king John heard of this, he forthwith aſſembled a counſail, and prayed an ayde againſt the French king, which was graunted vnto him.

King John sayleth again into Fraunce with a power against the French king and Arthur duke of Bzitayne, and had a great victozy.

And with all spede possible prepared an army & sailed ouer, and gaue an onset on his enemies with such foꝛce (as by the pꝛouision of almightie God the geuer of all victozy) the French king and his complices had such a repulse at the English mennes handes, that they pursuyng the French men, in their flight did so nerely folow them into their holde, and so enfoꝛced vpon them, that they not onely tooke the sayde Arthur pꝛisoner, with manye other of the Frenche men, but also gaue such an ouerthꝛow to the rest, that none was there left to to beare tydynges home.

The pedegre of Arthur Duke of Bzitayn.

This Arthur was sonne to Geoffrey Duke of Bzitayn, which was the elder bꝛother of king John, and so thys Arthur was king Johns Nephew. And to make the matter moꝛe euident, king Henry the second had eyght childꝛen, one Wyliam, which dyed in his childhood, the second Henry, which also dyed in his youth, after he was crowned king, hys father being alyue, the third Geoffrey Duke of Bzitayn, which also dyed in hys fathers life time, leauing behinde him two childꝛen, Arthur and Bzecca, the fourth Richarde the firſt, surnamed Cuer de lyon, the fift John who succeeded Richard hys bꝛother, with thꝛee other daughters named, Elianoꝛ married to the king of Spaine, Ione Countesse of Tholouse, and Mawde Duches of Saxon, that afterwards was Empꝛesse.

Arthures moſt ſtowte answere.

The sayde Arthur being thus taken in warre, was bꝛought befoꝛe the king at the Castle of Falese in Noꝛmandy, who being exhoꝛted with manye gentle woꝛdes to leaue the French king, and to enclyne to his Uncle, answerring agayne stoutly and with great indignation, required the kingdome of Englande with all there to belonging to be restoꝛed to him, as to the lawfull heyꝛe of the Crowne: by reason whereof, pꝛouoking the kinges displeasure against him, he was sent to the Tower of Roane, where at the length, whether by leaping into the diche, thinking to make his escape, oꝛ whether by some other pꝛiuie hande, oꝛ by what chaunce else it appereth not certaine by stoꝛies, he finished his life, by the occasion whereof, the sayd John was had after in great suspicion, whether iustly oꝛ vniustly God knoweth.

Arthures death.

Thys yere as sayeth Fabian there were chosen in London. xxxb. of the moſt substanciall and wiſeſt Citizens, which were called the counsaile of the Citie, out of the which number yerelye the Baylifes, and afterwarde the Maioꝛs and Shiriffes were chosen.

Counsaile of the Citie.

This yere as Hiſtoꝛiographers wꝛite, king John foꝛ lacke of good pꝛouision to be made in tyme, lost all his holdes and possessions in Noꝛmandie, thꝛough the foꝛce and power of the French king.

King John lost al that he had in Noꝛmandy.

And after these losses came other troubles vpon him as great oꝛ greater enemies, that was the Pope and his Cardinalles, by occasion of choosyng the Archbishop of Cauntoꝛbury which afterwarde shall be at large declared.

Troubles & vexations encreace vpon king John.

And this yere also (as sayth Reynulph) happened many great and wonderfull tempestes, with lightninges and thunder, and the same also was of long continuaunce, and in that tempest there fell hayle of the greatnesse of Hennes egges, the which destroyed fruite, coꝛne and cattell, besyde manye other hurtes that the same did. And the same time also there were seene spiꝛites in the ayꝛe (as the aforesayd auctheur sayth) fleyng lyke fowles bearing fyꝛe in their billes, and did set diuerse houses on fyꝛe.

And in the sayde yere in the moneth of July dyed Queene Elianoꝛ the kinges kinges mother, and shortly after dyed also Hubert Archebishop of Cauntorbury: whose decease after it was knowen to the Monkes of Cauntorbury, before his body was yet cõmitted to the earth, the ponger sort of ỳ Monkes there gathered themselues together at midnight, and elected their Subprior Reignold: without the kinges licence or yet his knowledge, and they prevelye placed him in the Metropoliticall seate, singyng Te deum at midnight. And because the king shoulde not make their election voyde, they charged him forthwith to go to Rome to the Pope for his confirmation, and made him to sweare that he should kepe all thinges secrete by the way as he went, & not to make their doyngs knowen to any man before he came to the Pope. But he contrarye to his othe, assoone as he came into Flaunders, opened abroade all the matter and vttered their counsaile. Wherevpon the Monkes beyng not a little agreeued with him, sent to him previly that without delay he should go forwarde of his iourney. And so soone as he was departed, the next day folowyng they sent to the king, desiryng of him his gracious licence Canonically to choose their Archbishop. The king most gently and fauourably graunted their peticion, requiring them instantly, and desiryng that for his sake they would shewe fauour to John Gray then Bishop of Norwiche, and president of his counsaile as they did in deede, erecting him into that seate of high Primacie.

Hubert Archbishop of Cãtorbury deceassed.

Arrogant and craftie Monkes.

Nowe when this their election was presented vnto the king, the king gaue vnto them his great and heartie thankes, and of his awne costes and charges he sent his messengers vnto Rome to the Pope to haue the same election ratefied. 1203

After the former elections made as aforesayde, the suffraganes of Cantorburye beyng not a little offended at the sayde elections, sent spedilye to Rome, to haue them both stated, for that they were not called to neither of the elections: By reason whereof there grewe a great tumult.

This yere sayth Fabian by reason of fowle weatheryng, wheate was solde for. xv. shillinges the quarter, which was then thought a great price, and euen so it was if ye consider the value of their money, which was then valued at. xx. pence the ounce of siluer, and now it is currant with vs at fiue shillings the ounce, and so after that rate, when they payed. xv. shillinges for a quarter, the same was of our money. xlv. shillings a quarter.

And in the Sommer next folowyng, king John maryed his bastarde daughter vnto Lewlyn Prince of Wales, and gaue with her the Castell and Lordship of Elyngsmer, beyng in the Marches of Southwales.

This yere the Suffraganes of the Prouynce of Cauntorbury of the one side, and the Monkes of Cauntorbury on the other syde, came before the Pope with their lewde elections. First the Monkes presentyng Reignold their Subprior, desired that their election might be confirmed. The Suffraganes likewise complayned that the Monkes woulde presume to choose the Archebishop without their consent, and therefore desired by diuers reasons the first election to be of none effect. The Pope decisyng the matter betwene them both, pronounced with the Monkes, chargyng the Suffraganes and Bishops to meddle no more with that election, but to let the Monkes alone. 1206

The Suffraganes discharged by the Pope, from the election of the Archbishop.

The Monkes of Cauntorbury now hauyng the whole election in their awne handes, fell also at a square among themselues, the ponger sort with the elder. The ponger ſort which had choſen Reignold their Subpꝛior, would haue that election to ſtande. The olde ſort of Monkes replied againe, ſaiyng: that the firſt election was by ſtealth and by night, and by the ponger part alſo without the conſent of the elder Monkes, and alſo done without the kinges licence or appoyntment, and without the due ſolemnitie therevnto belongyng. And as concernyng our election, ſay they, it was done in the cleare day light, by the which it had aucthoꝛitie, and in the pꝛeſence of oure liege Loꝛde the king, and his conſent and counſaile, bey ng to the ſame.

This Allegation thus pꝛoponed, the Subpꝛiors pꝛoctor, oꝛ man of law, ſtood fooꝛth and pꝛoued the foꝛmer election to be good, and this latter to be voyde and of no value, after this ſoꝛt. Whether the firſt election (ſayth he) were iuſt oꝛ vniuſt, ye ought firſt by the lawe to haue condemned it, befoꝛe ye ſhould haue pꝛeſumed to the ſeconde: But this ye did not, therefoꝛe is this your latter doyng no election at all, the firſt therefoꝛe is rather to be ratefied than yours.

When they had thus multiplied talke vpon both ſydes, with many friuolous allegations a long time, and could not agree vpon one perſon. Pope Innocent condemned both theſe elections, commaũding them to chooſe Stephen Langton, then Cardinall of Saint Chꝛiſogone foꝛ the Archebiſhop of Cauntoꝛbury. The Monkes then aunſwered, that they durſt not ſo do, without the conſent of their king, and alſo foꝛ that it was pꝛeiudiciall to their auncient liberties. The Pope by and by (ſayth the ſtoꝛy) as one in a fury, takyng their woꝛdes out of their mouthes, ſayd thus vnto them, we will you to knowe it, that we haue full power and aucthoꝛitie ouer the Church of Cantoꝛbury: neither are we wont to tary the conſent of Pꝛinces, therefoꝛe we commaund you vpon paine of our great curſſe that ye chooſe him onely whom we haue appoynted you.

Stephen Langton named Archbiſhop by the Pope.

The Popes great curſe is of great force forſooth.

The Monkes at theſe woꝛdes were abaſhed and terrefied (although they much murmured in their hearts) yet conſented all in one, & therevpon ſang, Te Deum: only did Doctoꝛ Helias Bꝛantfield withdꝛaw himſelfe from that election, whom the king had ſent foꝛ the admiſſion of the Biſhop of Noꝛwiche.

Thus was Stephen Langton in the high Church of Uiterby by Innocent the Popes awne mouth made Archbiſhop of Cantoꝛbury. From thence fooꝛth therefoꝛe (ſayth Mathew of Paris) the Pope could do no leſſe, but mightely defend him from all veration and daunger, conſidering that he was of his awne pꝛeferment.

Matthæus Pariẽſis.

Vpon this occaſion king Iohn conceyued an exceedyng diſpleaſur againſt the Monkes of Cantoꝛbury (as he had good cauſe) they doyng ſo many euils againſt his Pꝛincely pꝛerogatiue: Without his licence they elected their Archbiſhop, and put by the Biſhop of Noꝛwiche whom he had appoynted: They waſted a great part of his treaſure foꝛ the warres, and vtterly againſt the kings minde they made Stephen Langton their Metropolitane, whom he toke foꝛ a grieuous enimy vnto the whole realme, chiefly foꝛ that he was alwayes ſo familiar with the French king. Wherefoꝛe in his anger he baniſhed them out of his land to the number of .lxiiij. foꝛ their contumacy and contempt of his regall power.

and expreſly quarell with the Pope: Firſt, for that he ſo vncurteouſly did adnihilat the election of the Biſhop of Norwich, & ſet vp one Stephen Langton, a man vnknowne to him, and brought vp amongſt his enimies along tyme in the kingdome of Fraunce, conſecrating him Archebiſhop of Cauntorbury, and letting the other go. Alſo, which is more, it redowneth, ſayth he, to the ſubuerſion and derogation of the liberties apperteining to his crowne, that his conſent being not aſked before of the Monkes, which ſhould haue bene done, they notwithſtanding raſhly preſumed to promote and preferre the ſame election. Wherefore he cannot marualle he ſayth, ynough, that neither the ſayde Pope, nor the court of Rome doth conſider, and reuolue with themſelues, how neceſſary his loue and fauour hath bene alwayes hetherto vnto the See of Rome: and that they fixe not the eye of reaſon vpon thys, what great fruite and reuenues hath proceeded hetherto to them oute of the realme of Englande, the lyke whereof hath not bene receyued out of any other Country beſides, on this ſide the Alpes. He addeth moreouer & ſayth, that for his liberties, he will ſtand, if neede be, vnto death, neyther can he be ſo remoued and ſhaken off from the election of the biſhop of Norwich, which he ſeeth to be to him ſo commodious and profitable. Finally thus he concludeth, ſaying: that in caſe in this his requeſt he be not heard, he will ſo prouide by the ſeas, that there ſhall bee no ſuch gadding nor courſing ouer any more to Rome, ſuffering the ryches of the lande anye more to be exported ouer, whereby he ſhould himſelfe be the leſſe able to withſtand his enimies. And ſeing he hath of his awne at home both Archebiſhops, Biſhops, and other Prelates of the Church, both of Engliſhmen and of other, ſufficiently prouided and inſtructed in all kinde of knowledge, therefore he ſhall not neede to ſeeke for iuſtice and iudgement any farther abroad. Now when theſe letters came to the Popes intelligence, he directeth letters to the king agayne in this forme.

The Popes letters written to king John.

Innocent Pope, ſeruaunt of the ſeruants of God, to oure welbeloued ſonne in Chriſt, the king of England, health & Apoſtolicall bleſſing: where as we haue written to you heretofore exhorting and entreating you after an humble, gentle, and diligent ſorte, concerning the matter of the Church of Cauntorbury, you haue written to vs againe after a threatning ſort, and vpbrayding manner, both ſpitefully, and alſo frowardly. And where as wee more and aboue that our right and duetie required, haue borne and geuen to you: you againe for your parte haue geuen to vs not ſo much as by right and duetie ye are bound to doe. And though your deuocion (as ye ſay) hath bene to vs very neceſſary, yet conſider againe, that oures alſo is not a little opportune and expedient for you. And where as we in ſuche lyke caſes haue not ſhewed at any time the lyke honor to any Prince, as vnto you, you agayne haue ſo much derogated to our honour, as no Prince elſe hath preſumed to doe, but you alone, pretending certaine friuolous cauſes and occaſions I cannot tell what, why you would not condiſcend to the election of Stephen Langton Cardinall of Saint Chriſogono choſen by the Monkes of Cauntorbury, for that the ſayde Stephen, as you ſay, hath bene conuerſaunt and brought vp among your enimies, and his perſon to you vnknowne. But you know what is the Prouerbe of Salomon: The net is caſt: but in vayne in the eyes and ſight of the fliyng birdes, with much other matter more in the ſame ſame epiſtle, wherin he falleth into commendation of Stephen Langton his Cardinall, declaryng howe learned he was in the liberall artes, and in diuinitie, inſomuch as he was prebentated at Paris, alſo come of an honeſt ſtock, and an Engliſh man borne, and not vnknowen to the king, ſeeyng the king had written thriſe to him before. &c. Moreouer, declaryng in the ſayde letter, howe the meſſengers of the king had ſpecefied to him another cauſe, which was, for that the Monkes of Cauntorbury which had to do in the election, came not to him before for his conſent, declaryng moreouer in the ſayd letter, how the ſayde Meſſengers of the king intreated in the kinges behalfe, that forſomuch as the Popes letters wherein the king was commaunded to ſend his Proctours to Rome for the ſame matter, came not to the kinges hande, neither did ỹ Monkes direct any ſuch letters or meſſage to the king to haue his conſent, therefore, that the Pope conſideryng the ſame, would graunt ſo much for the regard of the kinges honour, that the Monkes of Cauntorbury ſhould proceede, not without the kinges aſſent therein: And foraſmuch as that hath not bene done as yet, therefore they deſyred ſome delay therein to be geuen ſufficient for the doyng thereof. Wherevnto he ſayde, that he had graunted and fulfilled his requeſt, in ſendyng his meſſengers and letters once or twiſe for the ſame purpoſe, although he ſayd it was not the maner of the See Apoſtolike, who hath the fulneſſe of power ouer the church of Cantorbury, to wayte for Princes conſentes in ſuch elections, who then coulde not be ſuffered to do that which they came for. &c. Wherefore in the knittyng vp of his letter, he concludeth in theſe wordes.

And therefore, ſeeyng the matter ſo ſtandeth, we ſee no cauſe why we ſhould require or tary for the kinges fauour or conſent any more therein, but intend ſo to proceede in this matter, neither enclynyng on the right hande, neyther yet on the left, accordyng as the canonicall ordinances of the holy fathers ſhall direct vs: that is, that all impediments and delayes ſet aſyde, ſo to prouide that the Church of Cauntorbury be no lenger deſtitute of her Paſtour. Wherefore, be it knowen to your diſcretion or kingly prudence, that forſomuch as this election of Stephen Langton, hath orderly and concordly thus proceded without fraude or deceite vpon a perſon meete for the ſame: therefore we will not for no mannes pleaſure, neyther may we without daũger, of fame and of conſcience, differre or protract any lenger the conſummation of the ſayde election. Wherefore my welbeloued ſonne, ſeeyng we haue had reſpect to your honour aboue that our right and duetie requireth, ſtudye to honour vs ſo muche as your dutie requireth againe, ſo that you may the more plentifully deſerue fauour both at Goddes handes and oures, leaſt that by the doyng the contrary, you bring your ſelfe into ſuch a pecke of troubles, as afterward ye ſhall ſcarce rid your ſelfe of againe. For this know for a certeine, in the ende it muſt needes fall out, that he ſhall haue the better, vnto whom euery knee heauenly, earthly, and infernall creatures do bowe, whoſe turne I ſerue in earth, though I be vnworthie. Therefore ſettle not your ſelfe to obey their perſwaſions whiche alwayes deſyre your vnquietneſſe, whereby they may the better fiſhe in the water when it is troubled, but commit your ſelfe to our pleaſure, which vndoubtedly ſhall turne to your prayſe, glory, and honour, for it ſhould not be much for your ſafety in this cauſe to reſiſt God and the Church, in whoſe quarrell that bleſſed Martyr and glorious

Thomas hath of late shed his blood, especially seeyng your father and your brother of famous memory then kings of England did geue ouer those three wicked customes into the handes of the Legates of the See Apostolique. But if you will yelde your selfe humbly into our handes, we will looke that you and yours shall be sufficiently prouided for, that no preiudice may arise hereupon to you ward.

Geuen at Laterane the tenth yere of our popedome.

¶ Not long after this letter was sent out, there folowed especiall charge and commaundement sent into England vnto certeine Bishops there, requyryng them by authoritie Apostolicall, that if the sayd king would not receiue the aforenamed Prior of Cãtorbury and his Monkes, that then they should enterdict the king throughout all his realme. For the executing whereof, foure Bishops were appoynted by the authoritie of the popes Bulles, that is to say, William Bishop of London, Eustace Bishop of Ely, Walter bishop of Winchester, and Gyles Bishop of Herford. Which sayd foure Bishoppes went vnto the king, and shewed them their commission from the Pope (as is aboue sayde) willyng him to consent therevnto. &c. 1209 11

William bishop of London, Eustace Bishop of Ely, Walter bishop of Winchester Giles bishop of Herford.

But the king refused the same, and would by no meanes graunt their request: Wherevpon, they departyng from his grace, went the morow after the Annunciation of our Lady, and pronounced the sayde generall interdiction throughout the realme of England: so that the Church dores were shut vp with keyes and other fastenynges, and with walles. &c.

The bishops enterdicted ye king and all the realme.

Nowe when the king heard of this, he began to be moued against them, and tooke all the possessions of the foure bishops into his handes, appoynting certeine men to kepe the liuyngs of the Clergie throughout the realme, that they should enioy no part thereof. Which thing when the Bishops vnderstoode, they cursed all them that kept or should meddle with Church goodes, against the will of them that ought them: and vnderstanding for all that, that the king nothing regarded their doyngs, they went ouer the sea to the Archbishop of Cauntorbury and informed him what had happened. Who heeryng the same, willed them againe to returne to Cauntorbury, and he would come thether to them, or else sende certeine personnes thether in his steede, that should do asmuch as if he were there himselfe. Then when the Bishoppes heard this, they returned againe into Englande to Cauntorbury, which tydynges came shortly to the king, that they were come againe thether, and because he might not himselfe trauaile to them, he sent thether Bishops, Erles, and Abbottes, to entreate them that the king might receyue the Archebishop Stephen, and the Prior and all the Monkes of Cauntorbury, promisyng in his behalfe, that he should neuer take any thing of the church goodes against the will of them that owe them, but would make amendes to them of whome he had taken any goodes, and the Church should haue all her fraunchesse in as ample maner as in Saint Edwardes time the Confessor.

This king was in a great perplexitie.

When the forme of agrement was thus concluded, it was ingrossed in a payre of indentures, which the foresayde foure Bishops to the one part therof set to their seales, and the other part the sayd Erles, Bishops, and Abbots, caryed to the king. When the king saw the order therof, he lyked it well, saiyng he would not agree to make restitution of the Church goodes. So he sent to the foure Bishops againe, that they should put out that poynt of restitution:

tution: But they aunſwered ſtoutly that they would not put out one worde. Then the king ſent to the Archbiſhop, by the foure Biſhoppes, that he ſhould come to Cauntorbury to ſpeake with him, and for his ſafe conduit to come and go againe at his will, he ſent his Iuſtices as pledges, that is to ſay, Gilbert Peltwyn, William de la Bereuer, & John Lefitz: which thing this done, the Archbiſhop Stephen came to Cauntorbury & the king heeryng therof came to Chilham, from whence he ſent his Treaſurer biſhop of Wincheſter to him, to haue him put out of the Indentures the clauſe of reſtitution aforeſayde, who denyyng to alter any worde of the ſame, moued the king in ſuch ſort, that immediately was proclaymed throughout England at the kings commaunment, that all thoſe that had any Church liuing, & went ouer the ſea, that they ſhould come again into England at a certein day, or elſe loſe their liuyngs for euermore. And further in that Proclaymation, he charged all Shirifes within the realme to enquire if any Biſhoppes, Abbottes, Priors, or any other Church men, from that day forwarde, receyued any commaundement that came from the Pope, that they ſhoulde take his or theyr body, and bryng it before him. And alſo that they ſhould take into their handes for the kinges vſe all the Church landes that were geuen to any man through the Biſhop Stephen or by the Prior of Cauntorbury from the time of the election of the Archebiſhop. And further charged that all the woods that were the Archbiſhops, ſhould be cut downe, and all ſolde.

A proclamatiõ publiſhed by the king againſt the mind of Stephen Langtõ

When tidynges came to the Pope that the king had thus done, being moued thereby with fiery wrath, he ſent to the king two Legates, the one called Pandulph, and the other Durant, to warne him in the Popes name, that he ſhould ceaſſe off his doynges to holy Church, and amend the wrong that hee had done to the Archebiſhop of Cauntorbury, and to the Priors & Monkes of Cantorbury, and to all the Clergie of England. And further that he ſhould reſtore againe the goodes that he had taken of them againſt their will: or elſe they ſhould curſſe the king by name: and to do this, the Pope tooke them his letters in Bulles patent.

Pandulph & Durant the Popes Legates.

Theſe two Legates commyng into England, reſorted to the the king to Northampton, where he helde his Parliament, and ſaluting him ſayde: they came from the Pope of Rome, to reforme the peace of holy Church. And firſt they ſayd, we admoniſhe you on the Popes behalfe that ye make full reſtitution of the goodes that ye haue raviſhed of holy Church and of the land. And that ye receyue Stephen the Archbiſhop of Cauntorbury into his dignitie, and the Prior of Cauntorbury, and his Monkes. And that ye yelde againe vnto the Archebiſhop all his landes and rentes without any withholdyng. And ſir yet moreouer, that ye ſhall make ſuche reſtitution to them as the Church ſhall thinke ſufficient.

Then aunſwered the king, as touching the Prior and hys Monkes of Cauntorbury: all that ye haue ſayde I will gladly doe, and all thing elſe that ye would ordeyne: But as touching the Archebiſhop, I ſhall tell you as it lyeth in my hart. Let the Archebiſhop leaue hys Biſhoprike, and if the Pope then ſhall intreate for him, peraduenture I may like to geue him ſome other Biſhoprick in England: And vpon this condition I will receyue and admyt him.

Then ſayde Pandolph vnto the king: holy Church was wont neuer to diſgrade disgrade an Archbishop without cause reasonable, but euer she was wont to correct Princes that were disobedient vnto her.

What, how now, quoth the king? threaten ye me? Nay sayd Pandolph, but ye haue openly tolde as it standeth in your hart: and nowe we will tell you what is the Popes will, and thus it standeth: that he hath wholy interdicted and accursed you, for the wrongs ye haue done to holy Church, and to the Clergy: and for as much as ye dwell in your awne malice and will come to none amendment: ye shall vnderstand that from this tyme forwarde, the sentences vpon you giuen haue force & strength. And all those that you haue commoned withall before this time, whether that they be Erles, Barons or knights, or any other whatsoeuer they be, we assoyle them safely vnto thys day. And from this time forward, of what condition soeuer they be, we accurse them openly and specially by this our sentence, that doe with you common. And we assoyle moreouer Earles, Barons, knightes, and all other maner of men of their homages, seruice and fealties that they should doe vnto you. And thys thing to confirme, we geue playne powre to the Bishop of Winchester, & to the Bishop of Norwich. And the same powre against Scotland to the Bishop of Rochester and of Sarisburie. And in Wales, we geue the same power to the Bishop of Saint Dauid and Landaff and of S. Asse.

A stout speech of a straunger to a king in his awne realme.

The Legats curse the king.

And moreouer we send throughout all christendome, that all the Bishops beyonde the sea, shall accurse all those that helpe or counsell you in any maner of neede, that ye haue to doe in any parte of the worlde. And that they also assoyle them against you, how many soeuer they be. And further we assoyle them by the authoritie of the Pope, and also commaund them to warre with you, as with him that is enimie to the Church.

Then the king heeryng thys, aunswered, what may ye doe to me more? If I had knowne this to be the cause of your comming, I would haue kept you back for one yere. Pandolphe the Cardinall aunswered: full well we thought at our first comming, that ye would haue bene obedient to God and to holy Church, and to haue fulfilled the Popes commaundement, which we haue shewed and pronounced to you as we were charged therewith: But now if ye had wist the cause of our comming, ye woulde haue made vs tarie one whole yere, which ye might as well haue sayde, that ye woulde haue a whole yeres respite by the Popes lycence. But for to suffer what death that you can ordeyne, we wyll not spare to tell you all the Popes message.

Upon this occasion Pope Innocent yet once agayne commaunded vpon paine of his great curse, that no man should obey king John, neyther yet keepe company with him, to common or counsayle with him, yea, his awne familier houshold to doe him anye kinde of seruice, eyther at bed or at boord, in Church, Hall or stable: But what followed thereof? the greater parte of them which after such sort fled from him, by the ordinance of God, of dyuerse and sundrie diseases the same yere dyed. And betwene both nations English and French, fell that yere great amitie, but secret, subtile and false, to the bitter betrayng of England. Neither was the Pope content onely with this, but moreouer the sayd Pope Innocent gaue sentence definitiue, by counsaile of his Cardinalles, that king John should be deposed and put from his seate Regall, and another put in his rowme. And to the spedy execution thereof, he apointed king Philip the French king, promising to geue him full remission of all his sinnes, and the cleare possession of all the realme of England to him and his heyres for euer, if he did either kill him or expell him.

Christ tooke the crosse, to saue all mens life and not to slay any man.

Moreouer, he wrote vnto other Nations that they should take on them the liuery or badge of the crosse, and be reuenged on him for the manifolde iniuries done to the Church vniuersall, by that Turke and Pagan king Iohn, as he called him.

But for all that the Pope could do vnto him, he ceased not to be auenged on such Bishoppes and Priestes as trayterously had conspired against him, partly by puttyng them to exile, and partly by seasyng vpon their goodes and liuynges. And mistrustyng that his people would not now continue true vnto him, by reason he stood accursed, and also the land was interdicted for his sake, he caused the whole realme to be sworne vnto him againe. And then assembled he an armie intending to warre vpon Alexander the second king of Scottes, for that he receyued many of the Nobles of the Realme that dayly fled vnto him for succour, and by that meanes to be auenged vpon him, for breaking the league that was betwixt them.

And when he had thus prepared for warre, he hastened him shortly after to Northumberland, and marchyng forward from thence toward Scotland, he inuaded the Frontiers of his enemyes, and offered them battaile. But the Scottish king perceiuyng himselfe to weake to resist the power of England, and therfore thinking that it would be little for his profite, if he had then ioyned battaile with him, did by the aduice of his counsayle refuse to fight, and so dismissyng his army, he sent vnto king Iohn, and made great suite to bee at peace with him, the which at the length he bought, though with much a do, and for a great summe of money: But to returne from whence we haue digressed.

Philip the French king began to attempt to obteyne the crowne of England.

The next yere after the aforesayde interdiction, the French king began his attempt in hope of the crowne of England, beyng well manned with the Bishoppes, Monkes, Prelates and Priestes, and their seruauntes to mainteyne the same, braggyng of the letters which they had receyued of the great men there. But beholde the worke of God: The Englishe nauie tooke three hundreth of the Frenche kinges Shippes, well loaden with wheate, wyne, meale, flesh, armor, and such other like, meete for the warre, and an hundreth they brent within the hauen of Damme, not farre off Bruges, takyng the spoyle with them.

Peter wakefield a false Prophet.

In the meane while the Priestes within England had prouided them a false and counterfeated prophet, called Peter Wakefielde, a Yorkeshire man, who was an Hermite, an idle gadder about, and a prattlyng marchant. Now, to bring this Peter in credite, and the king out of all credite with his people, diuerse vaine persons bruted dayly among the Commons of the realme, that Christ had twise apered vnto him in the shape of a childe betwene the priests handes, once at Yorke, another tyme at Pomfret, and that he had breathed vpon him thrise saiyng, peace, peace, peace, and teachyng many things, which he anon after declared to the bishops, and bid the people amend their naughtie liuyng: Beyng rapt also in spirite, they sayde he beheld the ioyes of heauen, and sorowes of hell, for scant were there three in the Realme, sayde he, that liued christianly.

This counterfeated soothsayer prophecied of king Iohn that he should

reigne no lenger then the Aſcentiõ day next folowyng, which was in the yere of our Lord. 1211. and was the .xiij. yere from his coronation, & this he ſayd he had by reuelation. Then it was of him demaunded, whether he ſhould be ſlaine, or be depoſed, or ſhould voluntarily geue ouer the crowne? He aunſwered that he could not tell: But of this he was ſure (he ſayd) that neither he nor any of his ſtocke or linage ſhould reigne after that day. 1211 13

The king heeryng of this, laughed much at it, and made but a ſcoffe therat: Tuſh ſayth he, it is but an ideot knaue, and ſuch a one as lacketh his right wittes. But when this fooliſhe prophet had ſo eſcaped the daunger of the kinges diſpleaſure, and that he made no more of it, he gate him abroade and prated thereof at large, as he was a very idle vagabond, and vſed to prattle and talke more than ynough, ſo that they which loued the king cauſed him anone after to be apprehended as a malefactor, and to be throwen in priſon, the king not yet knowyng thereof. King Iohn ſhould appere to be wiſe and learned.

Anone after, the fame of this phantaſticall prophet went all the realme ouer, and his name was knowen euery where, as fooliſhneſſe is muche regarded of the people, where wiſedome is not in place: ſpecially, becauſe then he was empriſoned for the matter, the rumor was the larger, their wonderinges were the wantoner, their practiſes the fooliſher, their buſye talkes and other idle doynges, the greater. Continually from thence, as the rude maner of people is, olde Goſſyps tales went abroade, newe tales were inuented, fables were added to fables, and lyes grewe vpon lyes. So that euery day newe ſlaunders were layde on the king, and not one of them true, rumors aroſe, blaſphemyes were ſpred, the enemyes reioyſed, and treaſons by the prieſtes were mainteyned, and what lykewyſe was ſurmyſed, or other ſubtiltye practiſed, all was then fathered vpon this fooliſhe prophet, as thus ſayth Peter Wakefielde, thus hath he prophecied, and thus it ſhall come to paſſe, yea, many times when he thought nothing leſſe. When the Aſcention day was come, which was prophecied of before, king Iohn commaunded his regall tent to be ſpred in the open fielde, paſſing that day with his noble counſayle and men of honour, in the greateſt ſolemnitie that euer he did before, ſclacyng himſelfe with Muſicall inſtrumentes & ſonges, moſt in ſight amongſt his truſtie friendes. When that day was paſt in all proſperitie and myrth, his enemies beyng confuſed, turned all vnto an allegoricall vnderſtandyng to make the prophet good, and ſayde, he is no longer kyng, for the Pope reigneth and not he: yet reigned he ſtyll, and his ſonne after him to proue that prophet a lyer. Aſcentiõ day which ſhould be the laſt day of kinge Iohns reign as Peter wakefields ſayde.

Then was the king by his counſaile perſwaded, that this falſe prophet had troubled the realme, peruerted the heartes of the people, and rayſed the commons againſt hym, for his woordes went ouer the ſea, by the helpe of his prelates, and came to the Frenche kinges eare, and gaue to him a great encouragement to inuade the lande: he had not elſe done it ſo ſodeinly. But he was moſt fowly decepued, as all they are and ſhall be that put their truſt in ſuch darke drowſye dreames of hippocrites. The king therefore commaunded that he ſhould be hanged vp, and his ſonne alſo with him, leaſt any more falſe prophetes ſhould aryſe of that race. Peter the prophet was hanged with his ſonne.

The king thus compaſſed about on euery ſide with enemies, and ſeeyng the great daunger that was like to folowe, and himſelfe to be brought to ſuch a streyght, that none other way could be found to auoyde the present destruction both of his person and the realme also, but vtterly to be subuerted, and specially fearyng the French king, was enforced to submit himselfe vnto the Pope, conuertyng his lande into the patrimony of S. Peter, as many other had done before him, and so became a subiect to the See of Rome, thinkyng thereby to auoyde all daungers imminent: for of this he was sure (though not without shame) that beyng vnder his protection, no foreyne potentate throughout the whole Empire was able to subdue him. Wherefore he thus submittyng himselfe did enter into bonde to the Pope, the Copye of which bonde foloweth.

The copie of the bonde which king Iohn entred into vnto the Pope.

To all Christen people throughout the worlde dwellyng. Iohn by the grace of God king of England, greting to your vniuersity, and knowledging that forasmuch as we haue grieued and offended God, and our mother the Church of Rome, and forasmuch as we haue nede of the mercie of our Lord Iesu Christ, and we may offer none so worthie satisfaction to God and to holy Church, but if it were our awne bodye, as with our realmes of Englande and Irelande, than by the grace of the holy ghost, we desyre to meeke vs for loue of him, that meked himselfe to the death of the crosse, through counsaile of the noble Erles and Barons, we offer and freely graunt to God, and to the Apostles S. Peter and Paule, and to our mother the Church of Rome, and to our holy father Pope Innocent the thirde, and to all the Popes that come after him, all the realmes, patronages of Churches of England and of Ireland, with all the appurtenances for the remission of our sinnes, and helpe and health of our kinnes soules, and all christen soules, so that from this time afterward, we will receyue and holde of our mother Church of Rome, as for ferme doyng fealtie to our holy father the Pope, Innocent the thirde, and to Innocent the thirde bishop of Rome.

all the Popes that come after him in the maner abouesayde, and in presence of the wise man Pandulph the Popes Subdeacon, we make liege homage, as it were in the Popes presence, and before him were, and should haue done all maner of thinges abouesayd, and thereto we bynde vs and all that come after vs, and our heyres for euermore, without any gainsaiyng to the Pope and eke the warde of the Church vacant, and in token of this thing euer for to last, we will, confirme, and ordeyne, that our speciall renter of our foresaid after hym, and the realmes of England and of Ireland we should mainteyne truely in all maner of poyntes against all maner of men by our power, throw Goddes helpe.

But Sir Thomas Moore knight wrytyng in a booke of his entituled, the supplication of soules, against the supplication of beggers, certeinly affirmeth that there was neuer any such tribute graunted, eyther for England or Ireland. And he sayth further, that neither Rome can shew any such graunt, nor neuer could, & if they could it were right nought worth: for neuer could any king of England geue away the realme to the Pope, or make the lande tributary, though he would, and that no such money (sayth he) is there payd, nor neuer was. This saiyng I leaue to your iudgemēt. But I maruail much that maister Moore beyng a great learned man, would not for the auouchment of his credite, and the truth of so great a matter, in reprouing a thing so manifestly written by a great number of Authours, as namely Reynulph of Chester, Polydore, and a great number of other, which affirme the afore sayd History to be true, that he doth not allege so much as the testimonie and authoritie of some one author, for the prouyng of his assertion: But as afore said I leaue this to the iudgement of the reader.

But before the releasement of the interdiction, the king was miserably compelled kneelyng on his knees to geue ouer both his crowne and scepter to the Pope of Rome, for the space of fiue dayes, and as his client, vassall, feodary, and tenant, to receyue it of him againe at the handes of another Cardinall. And to this was he bound obligatory, both for himselfe, and for them which should succede him, paiyng yerely for a knowledge thereof, a thousand Markes for England and Ireland as afore sayde. So was the interdiction discharged the second day of July after fiue yeres three monethes and. xvj. dayes from the first proclaymyng thereof.

The miserable estate of king John.

The interdiction of this realme released.

In this new rufflyng, the king easily graunted that Abbots, Deanes, & Curates should be elected frely euery where, so that the lawes of the realme were truely obserued. But against that were the Bishops, alleagyng their Canonical decrees, & rules synodall, determinyng the king therin to haue nothing a do, but onely to geue his consent after they had once elected. But among that company, there were some that consented not to that error: A sort also there were of prelates that time which were not pleased that the landes interdiction should ceasse, till the king had payde all which their Clergie in all quarters of the realme had demaunded without reason: yea euery sawey Sir John for his part, euen to the very breakyng of their hedges, the stealyng of their Apples, and their other occasionall dammages, demaunded allowance which grew to an incredible summe and impossible to be answered.

Notwithstanding that which is vttered before, concerning the bitter malice of the clergie against the king, yet did the Popes Legate and Cardinall Nicholaus Tusculanus muche fauour the king hys doinges and allowe his proceedings, wherefore certaine of the Clergie reported of hym that he was exceeding partiall, and regarded not their matters ecclesiasticall as he should haue done, for leauing the accompt of their restitutions, he went with the kings officers as the kings pleasure was to the Cathedrall Ministers, Abbeyes, Priories, Deanries and great Churches vacant. And there for the next incumbent alwayes he appoynted two, one for the king, another for the parties. But vpon him onely whome the king nominated, he compelled moſt commonly the election to paſſe, which vexed them wonderfully: Vpon this therefore they rayſed a new conſpiracie againſt the kings perſon, and we behelde (ſayth Houeden) about the ſame time manye noble houſes and aſſemblyes deuyded in many places: the fathers and the aged men ſtode vpon the kinges parte, but the yonger ſort contrarye. And ſome there were that for loue of their kindred, and in other ſundrie reſpects, forſoke the king againe: yea, and the fame went that time (ſayth he) that they were confederated with Alexander the Scottiſh king and Leoline Prince of Wales to worke him an vtter miſchiefe. A counſell at Oxford the Archbiſhop called, where as ſome would not tarry, conſidering the confuſion thereof: the other ſorte hauing verie obſtinate hearts, reuyled the king moſt ſpitefully behinde hys back, and ſayde, that from thencefoorth, he ought to be taken for no Gouernour of theirs. Their outragious and frantick clamours ſo much preuayled in thoſe dayes, that it grewe to a greeuous tumult and a moſt perillous commotion.

In the yere of our Lord 1212 as witneſſeth Paulus Emilius and other Hiſtories, Pope Innocent the third held a generall counſaile at Rome called the counſell of Laterane. The chiefe cauſes of that counſel were theſe. In the dayes of this Innocent, hereſie (as he calleth it) beganne to riſe vp very high, and to ſpreade forth his braunches abroade. By reaſon whereof many Princes were excommunicate: as Otho the Emperour, John the king of Englande, Peter king of Aragon, Raymond the Erle of Tholouſe and a great ſort more. And many landes were interdicted, as England, Irelande, Pruuance, Tolouſe, Aquitane, Sataloni, and ſuch other lyke as is aforeſayde. So that it could be none otherwiſe (ſayth Houeden) but with the ſharpe Axe of the Goſpell (for ſo the Pope called excommunications) they ought of neceſſity to haue bene cut of from the church. Therefore was thys counſell prouyded and proclaymed, and Prelates from all Nations therevnto called. And to colour thoſe miſchiefes which he then went about, he cauſed it by his Legates and Cardinalles to be noyſed abroade that hys intent was therein onely to haue the Church vniuerſally reformed, and the holy lande from the Turkes handes recouered. But all this was but craft and falſhoode as the ſequele thereof hath manifeſtly declared. For hys purpoſe thereby was to ſubdue all Princes, and to make himſelfe riche and wealthy. For there he made this Act, and eſtabliſhed it by publique decree, that the Pope ſhoulde haue from thence foorth the correction of all Chriſtian Princes, and that no Emperour ſhould be admitted, except he were ſworne before, and were alſo crowned of him. He ordeyned moreouer that whatſoeuer he were the which ſhould ſpeake euill of the Pope, he ſhould be puniſhed in hell with eternall damnation, Conradus Vſpergenſis, Hieronimus Marius. He alſo ordeyned auricular confeſſion. Alſo in this counſaile was firſt inuented and brought in tranſubſtanciation.

Counſaile of Laterane.

The Pope to haue the correction of all Chriſtian Princes.

But nowe let vs returne to king John againe, and marke howe the prieſtes and their adherentes were plagued for their homely handlyng of his Maieſtie. In the aforeſayd counſayle of Laterane, and the ſame yere, was Stephen Langton the Archebiſhop of Caunterburye excommunicated of Pope Innocent, with all thoſe Biſhops, prelates, prieſtes, Barons and Commons which had bene of counſaile with him in the former rebellion. And when the sayd Archbishop had made instant sute to the Pope to be assoyled, anone he made him this aunswere with great indignation: Brother mine, I swere by Saint Peter, thou shalt not so soone at my hande obteyne the benefite of absolution, for why, thou hast not onely done harme to the king of England, but also thou hast in a great many of thinges iniured the Church of Roine here: and therefore thou shalt tary my leysure. The Archbishop was also at that tyme suspended out of the Churche, and commaunded to say no Masse at all, neither yet to exercise any other ecclesiasticall office, because he would not at tyme conuenient execute the Popes curse vpon the rebellious Barons: With them the sayd Pope had bene so depely offended and angred a little before, that the great Charter of the liberties of England, with great indignation and countenance most terrible, he rent and destroyed by sentence diffinitiue condemnyng it for euer. And by and by, therevpon curssed all the other rebelles with Bell and Candell. The greater Capteines of them which were the Citizens of London for that assay, were pronounced excommunicate by name, and remayned still in that state: wherefore they appealed to the generall counsayle.

Also in the sayde yere, those great men were likewise sommoned to appere at Rome in the generall Sinode, which neuer consented to the kinges deposyng: though they were called (they sayd) therevnto by the Archebishop of Cauntorbury and others, and required by other to subscribe to the same, yet could they not of conscience do it, because he had humbled himselfe, and also graunted to kepe peace with all men. Thus was the whole realme miserably then deuided into two factions, through the malice of the Clergie, & so strifes increased in the land euery where. Yet were there of the Lordes and Gentelmen a great number at that tyme that folowed the king, and allowed his doyngs. But they which were on the other syde, not a little suspectyng the state that they were in, fled spedely to the Frenche king Philip, desiryng him that he would graunt vnto them his eldest sonne Ludouicke, and they would elect him to be their king, and that without much tariance. They besought him moreouer, that he would sende with him a strong and mightye power, as were able to subdue him vtterly, that they might (they sayd) be deliuered of such a wicked Tyraunt. Such was the report that those wicked men gaue of their Christian gouernor appoynted to them of God, whom they ought to haue obeyed though he had bene euill, euen for very conscience sake. And as certeyne of the Lordes and Barons, were in doyng to chose the sayde Ludouick for their king, the Pope sent thether one Gualo, the Cardinall of S. Martyn, to stop those rashe and cruell attemptes, chargyng the French king vpon his allegeance, that he with all power possible, should fauor, maintaine, and defende king John of England, feodarie and tenant to the sea of Rome. The French king thereto made aunswere, as one not contented with that arrogant precept. The realme of England, sayd he, was neuer yet any part of Saint Peters patrimonie, neither is it nowe, nor yet at any time shall be hereafter. This spake he, for that he was in hope to obteyne it for hys sonne, by treason of the Barons.

The Barons of England sought to haue Lewes the Frenche kinges sonne to be king of England.

No prince or Potentate (sayde Philip the Frenche king) may pledge or geue away the kingdome (which is besydes the landes) the gouernement of his realmes and whole common wealth, without the lawfull consent of hys

The French king and his sonne, reasoning about England.

Barons, which are bound to defende the same. If the Pope shall introduce or set vp such a president in the Christiantie, he shall at his pleasure bring all Christen kinges and their kingdomes to naught. I like not this example in these dayes begonne. I cannot therefore allowe this fact of king Iohn of England, though he be mine vtter aduersary, but I much lament that he hath so endammaged his realme, and hath brought the noble ground & Queene of Prouynces vnder miserable tribute. The chiefe Lordes and men of his nobilitie standyng by when he vttered these wordes, beyng as it were in a fury cryed with one voyce. By the blood of God, in whome we trust to besaued, we will stick in this article to the losyng of our heades (let the king of England do therin what him liketh) that no king may put his land vnder tribute, and so make his nobilitie captiue seruauntes. With that came in Ludouicke the kinges eldest sonne, and sayd vnto them all there present, I beseche you let not my purposed iourney: the Barons of England haue elected me for their Lorde and king, and I will not surely lose my right: But I will fight for it euen to the death, yea so long as heart shall styrre within my breast, and I doubt not but that I shall well obteyne it, for I haue friends among them. His father the king stood still as he had bene in a doompe, and answered neuer a worde, but fared as though he had dissembled the matter.

Ludouicke or Lewes the kinges eldest sonne.

About the same tyme, were such treasons and conspiracies wrought by the Bishops, Priestes, and Monkes throughout all the realme, that the king wist not where to become to finde trusty friendes. He was then compelled by the vncertenty of his subiectes to trauaile from place to place, but not without a great army of men, loking euery day when his Barons and their confederates would cruelly set vpon him. At the last he came to Douer, and there loked for aide from other quarters, which loued him better then did his owne people. And thether to him resorted from Flaunders, Brabant and Holland, on the one syde, and from Guyan, Gascoyn, and Poyters on the other syde, and from other countries more, a wonderfull number of men. The report went then that the Pope had written to those countries, mightily to assist him for dyuerse considerations. One was, for that he had both submitted himselfe and his dominion to his protection. Another was, because he had taken on him a little before, the iuuery of the crosse to winne againe Ierusalem. The thirde was, for that he had gotten by him the dominion of England and Ireland, and feared to lose both, if he should chaunce to decay. Also in this tyme king Iohn sailyng to the Isle of Wight abode there the space of three Monethes, and remained of purpose for the quieting of him selfe from tumultes, and led there a solitary life, among ryuers and watermen: where as he accompted rather to die then to liue, beyng so trayterously handeled of his Bishops and Barons, and not knowyng iustly howe to be auenged on them. Vpon the Purification of our Lady therefore, he tooke vpon him the crosse or voyage against the Turkes for the recouery of Ierusalem, moued thereunto rather for the doubtes he had in his people, then for any other deuotion else. And thus he sayde to his familier seruauntes: since I submitted my selfe and my landes, England and Ireland to the Church of Rome (forowe come to it) neuer thing prospered with me, but it hath gone against me.

15 In the next yere after, Symon Langton was chosen Archebishop of Yorke, but that election was anon after dissolued, for information was geuen

to

to the Pope, that the sayde Simon was brother to Stephen the Archebishop of Cauntorbury, which had bene the occasion geuer of all the tumults which were at that tyme in England. And the Pope had the more hate vnto him, for that he had brought him vp of naught, and did finde him at that tyme so stubborne: wherfore he placed in his roome Walter Gray bishop of Wincheſter.

In the same yere, Gualo the Popes Legate renued his great curſſe vpon Lewes the french kings sonne, for vsurping vpon king John. Likewise vpon Symon Langton and Gerurs Hobruge, for prouoking him to the same, and that with a wonderfull solempnitie. For in that doing, he made all the Belles to be rong, the Candels to be light, the dores to be opened and the booke of excommunications and interdictions publiquely to be reade, committing them wholy to the Deuill for their contumacie and contempt. He also commaunded the Bishops and Curates to publiſhe it abroade ouer all the whole realme, to the terror of all subiects. The sayde Symon and Gerurs laughed him to scorne, and derided much his doings in that behalfe, saying: that for the iuſt title of Ludowike or Lewes, they had appealed to the generall counsell at Rome.

Gualo the Popes Legate, curſſeth Lewes the Frenche kinges sonne.

The solemnitie of curſſyng.

The Magiſtrates of London and Citizens of the same did likewise vilipend and disdeynously mocke all that the Pope had there commaunded and done: And in spite both of him and his Legate, they kept company with them that were excommunicate, both at Table and at church, shewing themselues thereby as open contemners both of him and his lawes. Lewes being at London, and taking himselfe for king, constituted Symon Langton for hys high Chauncelor, and Gerurs Hobruge for his chiefe preacher. By whose daylie preachings, as well the Barons as the Citizens themselues, being both excommunicate, caused all the Church dores to be opened, and the ſeruice to be song, and the sayde Lewes was in all pointes fit for their hands.

Lewes the Frenche kinges sonne came to London and was receyued as king.

About thys tyme was Pandulph the Cardinall collecting the Peter pence, taking great paines therein. And for his great labours in those affayres for holy Church, and for other good matters, he was made Bishop of Norwiche to the augmenting of his dignitie and expences, Pandulph the Popes Legate made Biſhop of Norwich.

It chaunced about this time, that the Vicount of Melun, a verye noble man of the realme of Fraunce, which came hether with Ludowike to fall deadly sicke at London, and also mooued in conſcience to call certayne of the Engliſhe Barons vnto him, ſuche as were there appointed to the cuſtody of that Citie, and thus he sayde vnto them. I lament your sorowfull caſe, and pittie with my hart the deſtruction that is comming towards you and your Countrie. The daungerous snares which are prepared for your vtter confuſion, are hidden from you, you doe not beholde them, but take you heede of them in tyme. Prince Ludowike hath sworne a great othe, and. xvj. of his Erles and noble men are of counsell with hym, that if he obteyne the Crowne of England, he will baniſhe all them then of ſeruice and depriue them of lands & goodes, as many as he findeth now to go againſt their liege king, and are traytours to his noble perſon: And because you ſhall not take this tale for a fable, I aſſure you on my fayth lying now at the mercy of God on my death bed, that I was one of them, which was sworne to the same. I haue great conſcience thereof, and therefore I geue you thys warning, I pittie poore Englande, which hath beene so noble a Region, that nowe it is come come to extreme miſerie. And when he with teares had lamented it a ſpace, he turned againe vnto them and ſayde: my friends, I counſayle you earneſtlye to looke to your ſelues, and to prouide remedie in tyme, leaſt it come vpon you vnwares. Your king for a ſeaſon hath kept you vnder: But if Lewes preuayle, he will put you from all. Of two extreme euilles, chooſe the more eaſie, and kepe that ſecrete which I haue tolde you of good will. With that he gaue ouer and departed this lyfe.

A greate plague came vpon the Barons of this realme.

When this was once noyſed among the Barons, they were in great heauineſſe, for they ſawe themſelues betrapped euery way, and to be in exceding great daunger. And this dayly augmented that feare which then came vpon the Barons: They were extremely hated of the Pope and his Legates, euery weeke came vpon them newe excommunications. Dayly detriments they had beſydes in theyr poſſeſſions and goodes, in their landes and houſes, corne and cattell, wiues and children, ſo that ſome of them were driuen to ſuch nede that they were enforſed to ſeeke prayes and bootyes for ſuſteynyng their miſerable lyues. For looke what Prince Ludouicke obteyned by his warres, either territories or Caſtelles, he gaue them all to the French men in ſpight of their heades, and ſayd, that they were but Traytours, lyke as they had warnyng before, which grieued them worſt of all. At the laſt they perceyuyng that in ſeekyng to aduoyde one miſchiefe, they were ready to fall into another much worſſe: They began to caſt their wittes together, conſentyng to ſubmit themſelues wholy and humbly to their late ſouereigne Lorde king Iohn. And for that they were ſomewhat in doubt of their lyues, for the treaſon before committed, many of the friendes of them, which were of moſt credite with him, made ſute for them. So were a great number of them pardoned, after inſtant and great ſute made for them.

And here I thinke mete to put in remembraunce ſuch certeine ſeuerall matters as happened to be done in this Realme, in all the tyme and proceſſe of the former hiſtory, which of purpoſe I deferred, becauſe I thought beſt and moſt cõmodious for the reader to haue the whole ſtory of this king Iohn or rather his tragedy together and in one place, then in ſeueral yeres to haue ſet out the ſame in ſundry partes as they chaunced. And therefore nowe I will returne to the order that I kept from the firſt yere of this king vnto the fift yere of his reigne, where I began with the ſtory aforeſayde, in the yere of our Lorde a thouſand two hundreth and three.

1204 / 6 In the. vj. yere of his reigne (as ſayth Fabian) at Orenford in Suffolke was taken in the ſea a monſtruous fiſhe, which was in the forme and ſhape of a man, and was kept fiue monethes aliue vpon the land, and fed with rawe fleſhe and fiſhe. And becauſe they could haue no ſpeach of it, they caſt it into the ſea againe.

1205 / 7 And in this yere both the Welſh men, and Iriſhe men rebelled, for that as ſome write that the king would haue ſet taſkes vpon them to haue ayded him againſt the French king. And after he had pacified the Welſhe men, he was compelled to demaund an ayde and taſke of all England for the quieting of Irelande. And beſyde that taſke he demaunded of the white Monkes of England fiue thouſande Markes, the which they denyed, makyng their excuſe by their generall head, wherewith the king was ſore diſpleaſed, and at his returne out of Irelande, he ſore troubled and vexed them, and tooke of them them much more then he required first, and caused many of the Monkes to forsake both their houses and the realme. And after that he had prepared his armie and all thinges that belonged to the same, he with a great number of shippes sayled into Ireland and shortly subdued them, and settyng all things in good order, he returned againe into England.

In the.viij. yere of his reigne, and the first day of the moneth of October his first sonne Henry by name was borne by Isabell his seconde wife at Wincheſter. 1207/8

In the.ix.yere of his reigne, he graunted to the city of London, that where before tyme the same Citie was ruled by two Baylifes, that now they should elect among themselues a Maior and two Shirifes, which should haue the rule and gouernaunce of the sayd Citie, and from thence forth the name of Baylifes should ceasse. 1208/9

Some write that the cause of this alteration of Officers was, because the purueyers for the kinges houshold, beyng then a great dearth of corne, would haue taken vp of the prouision of the Citie to serue the king withall: The which thing Roger Winchester and Edmond Hardell then Baylifes, would in no wise suffer them to do: Wherevpon the king taking great displeasure with them, deprined them of their offices, and afterwardes committed them to warde: But yet beyng at the length pacified againe, in the steede of two Baylifes, he gaue the Citizens auctority yerely to choose amongest themselues a Maior and two Shirifes, which should haue the gouernment of the Citie: The first Maior was Henry Fitz aleyn, and the first Shirifes, Peter Duke, and Thomas Neele.

And in the.x. yere, London bridge which before was made of Timber and repayred by a Colledge of Prieſtes, was nowe begonne to be builded of stone. 1209/10

Nowe to conclude, in the.xvij. and last yere of his reigne, the Barons submitted themselues vnto him as is abouesayde in the ende of the story, and then kinge John with a great armye went into Suffolke and Norfolke, and there hee afflicted suche as had sworne to his enemies, with great and grieuous mischiefe. After that, he destroyed the two Abbeyes of Peterborough, and Crowland, for the great treasons which they also had wrought against him, and so he departed from thence to Lincolneshire. And in this yere the.xvij day of July dyed Pope Innocent the thirde, and was buryed in a Citie called Perusum, in Italy, where as he had trauayled to make a peace betwene the Genouayes, and the Pyses, for his awne commoditie and aduauntage. After him succeded one Cintius, otherwise called Honorius the thirde, a man of very great age, yet liued he in the Papacie ten yeres and a halfe and more. When this was once knowen in Englande, a great reioyce had all they which were king Johns enemyes, speciallye the prieſtes: yet had they small cause as will appere hereafter. They noysed it all the realme ouer, that this new Pope would set a new order, and not rule thinges as the other Pope did: thinking thereby, that he would haue done all thinges to their commoditie, but they founde it otherwise, for he made all them which were excommunicate to pay double and treble, before they could be restored againe to their former lyuinges. Innocent the thirde dyed.

And in the same selfe yere, king John came to Swineſtedes Abbey, not not farre from Lyncolne, he rested there two dayes, where as certeyne wryters repoꝛt that he was moſt trayterouſly poyſoned, by a Monke of the ſame Abbey, beyng of the oꝛder of Saint Barnard, called Simon Swynested, and as Carton ſayth in his booke called fructus temporum, and Polichronicon alſo ſayth the ſame, the afoꝛeſayde Monke named Simon, hearyng the king vpon an occaſion to talke of bꝛeade, ſhould ſay that if he liued a yere lenger, he would make that loſe of bꝛeade beyng then of the value of one halfepeny, woꝛth twelue pence, meanyng that he woulde ſo perſecute his rebellious people, that he would not leaue one of them to be the owner of a plough. The Monke heeryng the king thus ſpeake, conceyued of the king a very euill opinion, inſomuch that foꝛthwith the Monke went to his Abbot ſhewyng him the whole matter, and what he was mynded to do. He alleged foꝛ himſelfe the pꝛophecie of Cayphas, ſaiyng: it is better that one man dye, then all the people ſhould periſhe. I am well content, ſayth he, to die & to become a mar-tyꝛ, ſo that I may vtterly deſtroy this Tyꝛaunt. With that the Abbot wept foꝛ gladneſſe, and much commended his feruent zeale as he toke it. The Monke then beyng abſolued of his Abbot foꝛ doyng of this act afoꝛehande, went ſecretly into a Gardeyne vpon the backeſyde, and findyng there a moſt vene-mous toade, he ſo pꝛicked him, and pꝛeſſed him with his penne knife, that he made him vomit all the poyſon that was within him. This done, he conueyed it into a cup of Wine, and with a ſmilyng and flatteryng countenance he ſayd thus to the king, if it ſhall lyke your Pꝛincely Maieſtie, here is ſuch a Cup of Wine as ye neuer dꝛanke befoꝛe in all your life tyme, I truſt this waſſall ſhall make all England glad. And with that he dꝛanke a great dꝛaught, the king pledging him. The Monke anone after went to the Farmoꝛy, and there dyed, his guttes guſhing out of his belly, and had continually from thence foꝛth thꝛee Monkes to ſing Maſſes foꝛ his ſoule, confirmed by their general Chapter. The king within ſhoꝛte ſpace after, feelyng great griefe in hys body, aſked foꝛ Simon the Monke, and aunſwere was made that he was departed this lyfe: Then God haue mercy vpon me (ſayde the king) I ſuſpected as muche. With that he commaunded his Chariot to be bꝛought, foꝛ he was not able to ryde. So went he from thence to Slafoꝛd Caſtell, and from thence to Newarke vpon Trent, and there within leſſe then thꝛee dayes he dyed, when he had reigned. xviij. yeres. vj. monethes and odde dayes, and was honourably buryed at Woꝛceſter, with all his armed men attendyng vpon the buryall.

SOone as king John was dead and buryed, as is sayde before, the Princes, Lordes and Barons, so many as were of his part, aswell of Straungers as of them that were borne here, by counsaile of the Legate Gualo, gathered themselues together, and all with one consent proclaymed Henry his sonne beyng then of the age of .ix. yeres, for king of this realme of England. And for that onely cause was king John buryed at Worcester, and not by testament, for that onely place of the realme in those dayes appered most sure and safe, where they which were friendes to the Crowne, might best deliberate with them selues in that matter, what was best to be done. So went they from thence to the towne of Gloucester, with William Marshall Erle of the same, and there was this yong king annoynted and crowned king by the Legate Gualo, assisted by Peter Bishop of Winchester, and Joseline the Bishop of Bathe, with other which then were in the realme, and called Henry the thirde, and this was done in the feastfull day of the Apostles Simon and Jude. 1216. After the which coronation he was committed to the tuicion of Henry Bishop of Winchester aforsayd, or as Polidore writeth, to William Erle of Gloucester. 1216 1

The Court of Rome at that tyme, not beyng slacke in their affayres, sent heether with all spede, and commaunded that they should manfully stande by the yong king, and to defende England with armour and his excommunications against Lewes the French kinges sonne, and his complices. And then Honorius the Pope not onely confirmed his Legate Gualo, or Swalo, but also committed to his discretion, all that apperteyned to that office of his, no appellations to the contrary admitted. Upon this authoritie, the Legate beyng bolde, compelled the Prelates of Englande to be sworne true to the yong king: and those that refused to take that othe, he punished very sore. And Henry or after some writers Peter, Bishop of Winchester, was not all behinde in that commission for his parte, who put a grieuous tare vpon the beneficed men and Priestes of his diocesse, to helpe the king in his warres against Lewes, which was not all amisse. Such as were great beneficed men, and might well pay, those Gualo reserued to his awne authoritie, and in the ende for great summes of money dispensed with them. Some that were obstinate and frowarde, he disgraded: some he excommunicated, and sent to Rome for their absolutions, not leauing one Priest vnpunished that had taken part with Lewes, hauing euery where his searchers and spyes to finde them out.

And in this time, diuers of the chiefe of the Barons forsooke Lewes the French kinges sonne, namely the Erles of Penbrooke, and of Chester, with all their retinue, and submitted themselues to the yong king.

Sone

Sone after the coronation of the king, certaine commissions were sent out into all places of England to gather strength of men to withstand the aforesayde Lewes, and to put him and his Frenchmen with other Alyaunts out of the land, which then had vnder their rule and custody, the Castelles of Berkhamsted, of Hartford and dyuers other. And for that Lewes would not cease of his warre and returne into Fraunce, therefore theaforesayde Legate Gualo, accursed him first by name, and after al such as him maintained or fauoured in this warre against king Henry. Then theaforenamed Erles accompanied with Wylliam Erle Marshall of Englande, Wylliam le Bruize Erle of Ferreys with many other went to Lyncoln, and wanne the Towne vpon the straungers, where was slaine a Frenchman called Erle of Perches with many other Souldiours. And there was taken of Englishmen, Serle Erle of Winchester, and Homfrey de Bohan Erle of Hartforde with dyuers other men of name.

Gualo or Swalo as some called him, ℔ Popes Legate curseth Lewes the French kinges sonne.

And in this while Lewlyn or Lluellen Prince of Wales, for that he ayded the parte of Lewes was accursed and his lande enterdicted.

Lewlyn prince of Wales.

After the Towne of Lyncolne was thus wonne from the Frenchmen, Lewes with the other parte of his Souldiours, drewe towarde London: for so much as worde was brought to him that his father had sent him a new company of Souldiours the which should land in England shortly. Truth it was that such an ayde of Souldiours was made by the French king, and committed to a Capitain called Eustace the Monke, the which was encountered vpon the Sea, with a captaine or Master of the fiue Portes called Hubert at Burgh, and gaue to him battayle, and discomfited hym at length, and sent the head of the sayde Eustace vnto the king.

Eustace a Monk made capitaine of an army.

When Lewes heard of these tydings, and considered howe daylie hys strength minished, he was more inclinable vnto peace: so that in conclusion, he toke money sayth Reynulph and yeelded vp hys Castelles and strengthes which he helde, and after was alloyled, and so returned into Fraunce: But of this money that Lewes receyued there are dyuers opinions. The Englishe booke named it a thousand Marke, and the Frenche booke sayth. xv. thousand Marke.

Now, after that the straungers were auoided, then inquisition was made to knowe what persons had fauoured the partie of Lewes against the king, and there was founde a great multitude, of the which the king pardoned a great number of the laye Fee: But the spirituall were put to such fines, that they were compelled to lay that they had to pledge to please the king, and besides that, to sue to Rome to be alloyled.

Reynulph Erle of Chester tooke his iorney to Jerusalem.

And this yere Reynulph Erle of Chester, for considerations him moouing, toke his iourney into the holy land. But one writer sayth, that he tooke that iourney vpon him, because he had contrary to his allegeance made homage vnto Lewes aboue named, and for malice which he bare vnto king John, entended at the time of that homage doyng, to haue made the sayde Lewes king of Englande.

And at this time was a Parliament holden at London, wherein was graunted two shillyngs of euerye Plough lande, through Englande, which was for the charge that he before had with Lewes at warre. And this Parliament king Edwards lawes were again restored, & Magna carta confirmed.

This

This yere also king Henry began to build the new worke of the Church of Westminster, which was that part where now all the kings are buried in. 1219 4

This yere Alexander king of Scottes maryed dame Jane the sister of king Henry. And this yere was great harme done in England by violence of a whirle winde, and fiery dragons were seene flying in the ayre.

Shortly after Proclamations were made in London, and throughout all England, that all straungers should auoyde by Michaelmasse next folowyng, except such as came with Marchandise, and to make sale of their wares vnder the kinges safeconduyt. Which Proclamation was chiefly made to auoyde Foulkes de Brent and his complices, which kept the Castell of Bedford against the kinges will and pleasure.

Of this Foulkes it is written by Polidore and others, howe that about this season, he assemblyng together a great rowte of Ruffians and Robbers issued out of the Castell of Bedford which he then helde, and wasted and destroyed all the Countrie, with the townes and villages thereabout, but specially the towne and Abbey of Saint Albon.

This yere also king Henry was the seconde tyme crowned at Westminster the .xvij. day of May. And the sayd yere Reynulph Erle of Chester returned out of the holy lande, and began to buylde the Castelles of Chartley and Beston. King Henry crowned agaune the second time

At this tyme also was holden a generall counsaile of the Bishops, and Clergie of the Realme at Oxford. In the tyme of which counsayle, a man was taken, which shewed himselfe to be Christ, and hee reproued manye abuses, which the Clerkes at those dayes vsed, as sayth Fabian. And to approue that he was Jesus the sonne of God, and that he was come to reforme those abuses, he shewed the Carectes and woundes in his bodye, handes and feete, lyke vnto Jesus that was nayled on the Crosse. Then was he examined, and found a false dissembler: Wherefore by the iudgement and auctoritie of that counsaile, he was iudged to be nayled vnto the Crosse, and so deliuered to the executioners, the which at a place called Adurbury, or Alburbury, nayled him vnto a Crosse vntill he was dead. 1220 5 A counterfeter of Jesu Christ.

This yere the men of Caithnes in Scotland burned their bishop, because he cursled them for not paying of their Tithes. For which cause the king of Scottes did hang foure hundreth of the cheefe doers, gelded their children, and disherited the Erle of that Countrie. Cooper. 1221 6

And in this tyme there was a great conspiracie in London against king Henry, made by one Constantyne the sonne of Arnulph, with the which conspiracie ꝑ king was so offended that he had thought to haue ouerthrowne the walles of the Citie of London: But shortly after, the sayde Constantine was taken and condemned, and was hanged drawen and quartered: This Constantine was borne in the Citie of London, & taken by Hubert Brough, who offered the same Brough, at the tyme of his taking, to haue let him scape .v. thousand markes: But Brough refused it.

This yere John king of Jerusalem came into Englande, and required an ayde of king Henry to recouer againe Jerusalem, which the Turkes had wonne from him: But shortly he returned without any great comfort. 1222 7

This yere the king began the foundation of Sarisbury Minster, and laide the first stone of the Church.

And this yere the king layd ſiege vnto the Caſtell of Bedford that Foulkes de Brent had ſo long holden by ſtrength: This ſiege began vpon the Euen of the Aſſention of our Lorde, and ſo continued vntill the day of the Aſſumption of our Lady next folowyng. In the which tyme many ſtrong aſſaultes were made, and great loſſe of men on both parties. But finally, about the aforeſayde day of Aſſumption, it was taken by fierce aſſault: Where in was taken Foulkes de Brent, and about the number of. lxxx. Souldiours, whereof the more part were put to death, and the ſayde Foulkes after he had lyen a certaine of tyme in priſon, was for his finance deliuered, and baniſhed the land. And in this time came the Gray Friers firſt into England.

1223 / 8 About this time a Parliament was holden, in the which was graunted to the king and his heyres kinges of this realme by the Barony of England, the warde and mariage of their heyres.

This law for wardes was firſt made by king Edgar, in the yere of our Lorde. 962. But the mariages of them was added by king Edwarde the Confeſſor in the yere of our Lorde. 1056. And here is to be much lamented that Wardes are bought and ſolde as commonlye as are Beaſtes, and mariages are made with them that are many tymes very vngodly, for dyuerſe of them beyng of yong and tender yeres, are forced to iudge by another mannes affection, to ſee with another mannes eye, and ſay yea with another mannes tongue, and finally conſent with another mannes hart. For none of theſe ſences be perfited to the parties in that minoritie, and ſo the election beyng vnfree, and the yeres vnripe, eche of them almoſt of neceſſitie muſt hate the other, whome yet they haue had no iudgement to loue. And certeinely the common bergaynyng and ſelling of them is to be abhorred, beſide the ſhamefull polling that many vſe, which if they conſent not to ſuche as are their ſellers, they ſhall be handeled as the common ſaiyng is, lyke Wardes, and ſtriped almoſt out of al they haue, when the ſame ſhould do them moſt good. God graunt the Maieſtrates maye take ſome good order therein, for ſurely it is nedefull, for many do ſo vſe them, as the ſame is not ſufferable in a Chriſtian realme. For who ſeeth not daylye, what innumerable inconueniences, deuorces, yea and ſome murders haue of ſuche mariages (or rather no mariages at all) proceded, the preſent time ſheweth to many examples, which miniſter ſufficient cauſe for vs to bewayle the ſame: But the greateſt iniury is to God who hath made that free, namely matrimony, which the lawe of the realme maketh bonde, the redreſſe whereof belongeth onely to the Prince, in whome like as the ſame God hath cauſed mo vertues to meete than in any other creature of her callyng, ſo we doubt not, but that his Godhead will when his good pleaſure ſhall be, vouchſafe not onely to preſerue her highnes with the encreaſe of vertue and wiſedome, but alſo to moue her heart to the Godly redreſſe of theſe and many other enormities and abuſes, to the great comfort of all her graces louyng and obedient ſubiectes.

1224 / 9 This yere Richarde the brother of king Henrie, did very valiauntly in Fraunce, and ouerthrewe great numbers of Frenche men, and recouered Poyters, and kept the Gaſcoynes in due obedience.

1225 / 10 In the. x. yere of the reigne of this king, the Plees of the Crowne were pleded in the Tower of London. And at this tyme the ſouldyours that kept dyuerſe Caſtelles and holdes in Poyters in Fraunce, were compelled to

The king at this time bearing great fauour to the Citie and Citizens of London, graunted vnto them the Shyriualtie of London and Middleſex in Fee farme for three hundred pounde by the yere. And he graunted alſo that all the weares in the Thames ſhould be plucked vp and deſtroyed for euer. And alſo by his Charter enſealed, he graunted that the Citizens of London ſholude paſſe tolle free throughout Englande. And that if any Citizen were conſtreyned in any Citie, Borough or Towne in Englande to pay any tolle, that then the Shrifes of London to attache any man comming to London of the ſayde Citie Borough or Towne where ſuch tolle was payde, and hym and his goodes to with holde and keepe vntill the Citizens of London were reſtored of all ſuche money as they payde for the ſayde tolle, with all coſtes and dammages ſuſteyned for the ſame. And the ſame yere alſo he graunted to the ſayde Citizens of London free wareyn, that is to ſay, that the Citizens haue free libertie of hunting a certeyne circuite aboute London.

The Shiritualtie of London & Middleſex graunted to the Citie in fee farme.

Citizens of London are toll free throughout England.

Free wareyn graunted to the Citie of London.

This yere the king confirmed the Charter and liberties of the Citie of London, & alſo certain liberties and priuileges he graunted to the Shrieſes of London, as hauing of Clercks and other.

Alſo about this time a Parliament was holden at London, in the which it was ordered that the Engliſh Grote ſhould be coyned of a certaine weight and of the one ſide the kings picture, and one the other ſide a croſſe as large fully as the Grote, to auoyd clippyng. And at thys tyme was vſed to be coyned that ſtandard and fineneſſe that was called ſterling money, which before as ye maye reade was firſt coyned in the Towne of Sterlyng in Scotland, and therefore it taketh the name of Sterlyng.

This yere the Towne of Lymoſyn with diuers holdes in Pierregot and Aluerne in the Countrie of Guyan, were geuen vp to the aforenamed Lewes the french king. Wherefore the king ſent ouer his brother Richarde Erle of Cornewal ſhortly after, and landed at Burdeaux with foure hundred Shippes. But ſome other writers ſaye, that the king himſelfe ſayled with an armie into Britteyne againſt Lewes the french king, where after ſpoyling the Countrie, a peace was concluded betweene the ſayde two kinges.

Stephen Langtō died.

At this time there was an order taken in the Citie of London that no Shriefe ſhould continue in the Shyriualtie lenger then one yere, the cauſe was, that they were had in ſuſpicion to be great Bybers and takers of rewardes.

This yere was graunted to the king a fiftene of the temporaltie, and a diſme and a halfe of the ſpiritualtie to recouer his landes loſt in Normandie, Guyan and Poyteau. And about this time alſo Hubert of Burgh being then chiefe Juſtice of England had diſpleaſed the king in ſuch wiſe, that he was compelled to flee the kings ſight. And after by the labour of Biſhop Edmond of Pountney he was againe reſtored to the kings fauour. And at this time in London, was great hurt done by fyre.

Upon complaint brought before the king by the friendes of Lewlyn or Luellen Prince of Wales, that Wylliam le Bruce should conspire against the king, or as some say, for that he kept vnlawfully the wyfe of the aforenamed Lewlyn, or Luellen: he was after long imprisonment hanged. Also at this tyme dyed Reynulph Erle of Chester, Lyncolne and Huntyngdon. And his sisters sonne named John, sonne vnto the Erle of Anguish who was his heyre, and helde that Lordeship after him. This John of most writers is called John Scot, for so much as his father was a Scot. This foresayde Reynulph had no childe, albeit he had foure sisters. The eldest was named Mawde, and was maried to Dauid Erle of Anguishe, and was mother to the aforesayde John Scot. The seconde was named Hawes, and was maried vnto the Erle of Arundell, the thirde Agnes, which was maryed to the Erle of Darby. And the fourth named Mabely, which was maryed vnto the Erle of Winchester called Quinacie. This Reynulph dyed at Wallingforde, and was buryed in the Chapter house of the Monkes of Chester, and ordeyned the aforenamed Scot to be his heyre, for that he would not haue so noble a Lordeship run, or be deuided among so many distaues. And this yere dyed Maister Wethershed Archebishop of Cauntorbury, whose successour was Edmond of Pountney.

William de Wruze hanged

And at this time beganne great variaunce betweene the king and his Lordes, because he put out of his seruice certeyne Englishe men and trusted straungers aswell in his counsaile, as in other offices.

1232 / 17

About this time the king began the foundation of the Hospitall of Saint John without the East gate of Oxforde.

This yere the king put from him the straungers, and restored the Englishmen to their offices: and the same yere also the Iewes dwellyng in Norwich were accused for steling of a child whom they purposed to haue crucified

This yere also Queene Elianor founded the hospitall of Saint Katheryns besydes the tower, for the relieue both of men and women.

Shortly after a Legate named Octobone came into England to reforme the Clergie, but the youth of the Clergie lyked him not, and it chaunced him that that as he passed through Oxforde, the scholliers picked a quarrell vnto his seruauntes, and fought with them, and slue one of them, and put the Legate in such feare, that for his sauegard he tooke the Belfrey of Osney, and there held him vntill the kings ministers came from Abingdon, who with strength mixed with fayre wordes deliuered him, and conueyed him after with a conuenient companie to Wallyngforde, where he accursed the misdoers, and punished them in such wise, that the Regentes and maisters of that Vniuersity, were compelled in the ende, to go barefooted, through Chepe to Paules at London, and there to aske of him forgeuenesse, and had that trespasse wyth great difficultie so forgeuen.

The yere folowyng a Clercke of Oxford that feyned himselfe mad, and before tyme had espyed certeyne secret places of the kinges Court, came by a windowe toward the kinges Chamber, at his manor of Woodstocke, entendyng to haue slaine the king in his bed. But he was espied by a woman and taken and conueyed to Couentry, and there atreyned of that dede: Where after lawfull proues of his malicious entent made, he for the same, was there hanged, and drawen. Polidore wryteth that the king as hap was had chaunged his bed that night, and so escaped the daunger of the treason.

This yere on Candlemasse day the king created Sir Simond Mountford Erle of Leycester.

Edward called Longshanks named Edward the first borne at Westminster.

In the.xxv. yere of the reigne of this king, a Citizen of London whose name was Gerard Bat, which had bene chosen Maior of London, was chosen againe. And after his election, was presented vnto the king: But the king hauyng some information of his euyll dealyng the yere before, sayde that he would not admitte him to that office, vntill suche tyme as he came to Westminster, with which answere the sayde Gerard and his companye returned to London. It was not long after or the king came to Westminster, where accordyng to their duetie, they wayted to knowe his pleasure. Then the king called vnto him the sayd Maior, and after certeine questions to him ministred, he caused him to be sworne in his presence. After which othe, the king charged him by the vertue of the same, that he should not take of the bakers, Brewers, and other victuallers of the City fortie pound, which other of his predecessors, and he himselfe the last yere had done. And also that he incontinently after his comming to London should restore vnto the sayd victuallers and other Citizens, al such money as he had with wrong in the former yere taken of the Commonaltie of the Citie. But because the sayde Gerard alleged for him certeine considerations, besechyng the king to pardon him of that restitution: The king in displeasure swore a great othe that he should not that yere be Maior, nor at any tyme after. And so the Commons certefied of the kinges pleasure, chose in his place or steede Reyner de Bungay.

Dauid prince of wales submitted himselfe to the king.

And afterward the king went into Wales, whereof Dauid Prince of Wales heryng, met him at Ruthland, and submitted himselfe vnto the kinges grace. After this he sayled into Normandy with a goodly army to recouer Guyan, and other Countries, but returned without any good ſucceſſe. And the ſame yere were firſt choſen within the Citie of London Aldermen, which then had the rule of the ſame, and of the ſeuerall wardes thereof, and were then yerely chaunged, as nowe the Shiriffes of London are chaunged.

Aldermen firſt appointed in London.

The king this yere prepared a goodly armye, and ſayled into Fraunce, and warred vpon the Frenche king. The cauſe of this warre (as ſayth the French Chronicle) was made by the ſtyrryng of a Frenche man, named the Erle of Marche, becauſe he refuſed to doe homage to Alphons, brother of Lewes the tenth of that name, and ſurnamed, S. Lewes, then king of Fraunce.

This Lewes the yere before had maried his brother Alphons vnto the daughter of the Erle of Tolouſe, and had geuen to his ſayd brother the Erledome of Poyters, with all the landes of Aluerne. By reaſon whereof, he would haue cauſed the ſayde Erle of March to haue done homage vnto the ſaid Alphons for ſuch landes as the ſayd Erle helde of the Erledome of Poyters. But for that the ſayd Erle knew well that the right of Guyan belonged to the king of England, he therefore, and for other aliaunces made betweene king Henry and him, refuſed the doyng of that homage, and after came to king Henry, and moued him to make warre vpon the French king. By reaſon whereof the king ſayled ouer as aforeſayde, and landed with a ſtrong power at Burdeaux. And as the French Chronicle affirmeth, this Erle of Marche maryed the mother of this king Henry.

In this time the French king warred vpon the landes of the Erle of March, and had wonne two Caſtelles of his, named Founteynes, and Villiers, with diuerſe other which I here omit. And when he had beaten downe ſome of them, and had manned ſome with newe Souldiours: he then went vnto a Caſtell named Mawcome, or Mawcoune, and brake a Bridge after him, becauſe he was enformed that the king of England was nere vnto him. At the ſayd bridge was a ſmall ſkirmiſhe, and little harme done. Then the French king tooke the way ouer the riuer of Charent, toward Tailbozough, waſting and deſtroiyng the Countrie as he went, and ſo foorth towarde the towne called Sainces. Nowe king Henry with his power made towarde him in all that he might. In keeping this courſe the vauntgarde encountered with the Erle of Boleyn, which was vpon the Frenche kinges partie, and that time the Erle of Sainces, bare the banner of the Erle of Marches, beyng the vauntgard of the king. But betweene theſe two Erles was a ſore fight, ſo that many vpon both parties were ſlaine, among the which the ſayd Erle of Sainces was ſlaine. Then came on both ſtrengthes on eyther ſyde, ſo that both the kinges fought in that battaile, and a great ſlaughter of men vpon both ſydes: But in the ende the Frenche men were victors, and tooke priſoners.xx. men of name, as knightes and men of higher degree, and three Clerckes of great fame and riches, beſyde other to the number of fiue hundreth meane people (as ſayth the French booke.) But of theſe men of name, nor yet of the three Clerckes, no mention is made what they payed for their raunſomes.

Then the Erle of March, by meane of his ſonne, was reconciled to the French king, and reſtored to his landes, except three Caſtelles, which were named Meſpyn, Cretaine, and Eaſterday, the which the French king reteyned ned in his possession. And sone after came vnto the French king the Lordes of the Castelles of Mirable, and of Mortaygne, submittyng themselues also vnto the kinges grace, beseechyng him of pardon, that they had so to his high displeasure fauoured his enemie the king of Englande. And after came in dyuerse other Lordes and Capitaines, that he was in possession of all the Countrie of Guyan and Poyters, vnto the riuer of Gerond.

I haue rehearsed the more of this Chronicle of Fraunce, to the entent that the readers may the better perceiue the pride and boldnes of the French men, for in all their writyng, when they come to any matter that soundeth any thing to their honour, it is written at the length, and in most shewyng maner, to their honour and worship: But if it sound any thing to their dishonour, then shall it be abreuiated and hid, that the truth shall not be knowen, for they euer delight to tell of winnyng, but neuer of losyng. Now after this euill fortune, king Henry returned againe into England.

Griffith the sonne of Lewlyn Prince of Wales being prisoner in the Tower of London, purposyng to breake prison and so to escape, fell ouer the wall of the inner ward, and there brake his neck. And this yere the Plees of the Crowne were pleaded in the Tower of London. Thys yere a Maior of London and a Shriefe were both deposed from their romes, bicause they were both proued periured, and other were chosen in their places. 1244 29

And this yere also Robert Grosthed Bishop of Lyncoln complayned to the king of the waste of the goodes and patrimony of the Church within this Realme of Englande, which daylie were consumed by alyen Bishops and Clerkes of thys lande, which shortly after were auoyded.

Thys yere a Jewe digging in the grounde to enlarge his Vineyarde founde vnder a stone a Booke, wherein was written in three languages, Greeke, Hebrewe and Latyne of three worldes that should be, of the which he appointed Christ to be the beginning of the thirde worlde, which was expressed in this maner. In the beginning of the thirde worlde, Gods sonne shall be borne of a mayde. &c. by the occasion whereof, the sayde Jewe was conuerted to the fayth of Christ.

At thys tyme dyed Frederyck the second of that name Emperour, who afore as ye haue heard marryed Isabell sister vnto the king. Of the which Frederyck mencion is made before in the. xxiij. yere of king Henry the second. After whose death much strife ensued about the election of the Emperour, some chose the Duke of Thoryngе, some the Erle of Holland, and some chose the kinges brother Richard Erle of Cornewall: which caused strife that endured long after, so that the onely Emperour of Almayn was not of all men allowed, vntyll Radulphus Duke or Erle of Habspurge in Almayn, was chosen by one assent vnto that dignitie, and there vnto admytted by Gregorie the.ix. of that name in the yere of our Lorde. 1273. And so that variance continued.xxvij. yeres, to the great empouerishing of Italy, and the landes of the Empire. 1246 31

In Englande thys yere happened so mightie an earthquake, that the lyke hath not beene heard of. And thys yere the king seased the Fraunchise and liberties of the Citie of London vpon the Euen of S. At thys tyme dyed Robart Groſthed Biſhop of Lyncoln who was a wiſe and a learned man. Innocent the Pope at that tyme grieued greatly the Church of England with ſoze and weighty taſkes and payments, whome this Groſthed did charply rebuke by an Epiſtle foz hys doings. And amongſt many other his abuſes this was one, he gaue vnto a childe a nephew of his, a Pzebend which fell in the Church of Lincoln, & ſent the child vnto the biſhop, charging him to admit the ſame childe, and to ſee him eſtalled. But this Biſhop boldely denyed his admiſſion, and wzote vnto Innocent the Pope againe, that he could not, noz woulde receyue any ſuche vnto cure of ſoule, that could not rule himſelfe. Therefoze this Robert was ſummoned to apere befoze the Pope, and therupon accurſſed. Then he appealed from Innocents Court, to Chziſtes awne throne.

Shoztly after the king gaue in mariage his daughter Mary, but ſome called her Margaret, vnto Alexander the king of Scottes, at the Citie of Yozke, and there did receyue of him homage foz the kingdome of Scotland, in like maner as many of his pzogenitozs had done dyuerſe and many tymes befoze, as in this wozke hath and ſhall appere.

King Henry maryed his daughter Mary to the king of Scots, who did homage vnto him foz all Scotland.

And nowe ſayth Fabian, by the procurement of Sir Richarde Erle of Cornewall, for diſpleaſure which he bare towarde the Citie, for exchaunge of certeine ground to the ſame belongyng. The king vnder colour that the Maior had not done due execution vpon the Bakers for lackyng of theyr aſſyzes, ſeazed the liberties of the Citie. That is to ſay, that where the Maior and Communaltie of the Citie had by the kinges graunt the Citie to ferme, with dyuerſe cuſtomes and offices for a ſtynted and an aſſerteyned ſumme of money: nowe the king placed officers in them at his will and pleaſure, the which were accomptable vnto him for all reuenues and profites that grewe within the ſayd Citie. But within foure dayes folowyng, the Citizens agreed with the ſayd Erle, for ſixe hundreth marke. After which agreement with him concluded, they were againe reſtored to their liberties.

The liberties of London ſeazed.

Money ſaueth many ſores.

In this tyme and yere was Sir Edwarde the kinges ſonne and heyre maryed vnto Alianor the kinges ſiſter of Spaine, or as ſome other write, to the daughter of Alphons king of Caſtile. To whom the king his father gaue the Principalitie of Wales, with the gouernance of Guyan and Irelande, whereof beganne that the kinges of Englande ordeyned their eldeſt ſonnes Princes of Wales. And in the ſame yere the king and Queene landed at Douer, and ſo came to London, and were lodged at the Tower, where he ſent for the Maior and Shirifes of London, with whome he reaſoned greuouſly for the eſcape of one called John Gate: This John had murdered a Prior allyed to the king. The Maior excuſed himſelfe, and burdened the Shirifes therewith, ſaiyng that vnto them belonged the keeping of all the Priſonnes and priſoners that were within the Citie of London. And ſo the Maior returned home: But the Shirifes remayned there as priſoners by the ſpace of a moneth after or more. And in their places, and for them were choſen Stephen Oyſtergate, and Henry Walmode. But howe the olde Shirifes paſſed out of the kinges daunger, I know not.

Edward the kinges eldeſt ſonne maryed to Alianor ỹ kinges ſiſter of Spaine.

This yere the Ladie Alianor wife vnto Prince Edward came through London, where ſhe was honourably receyued of the Citizens, and the Citie hanged with riche clothes of Silke and Golde. And there was preſent the Prince her huſband, who conueyed her through London vnto Saint Johns without Smithfielde, and there was lodged for a whyle, and after remoued to the Sauoye.

And not long after, the king ſeazed the liberties of London for certeyne money which the Queene claymed for her right of the Citizens, ſo that in the ende they payed vnto her foure hundreth Marke and had theyr libertyes againe reſtored.

Liberties of London againe ſeazed.

And about this time were brought vnto Weſtminſter an hundreth and two Iewes from Lincolne, the which were alſo accuſed of the crucifyng of a childe at Lincolne in deſpite of Chriſtes religion, which Iewes were after ſent vnto the Tower of London. Of the which afterward. xviij. were conuict and hanged, and the other remayned long in priſon.

Iewes condemned for crucifyng of a childe.

And

And this yere the king of Scottes and the Queene his wife came into England to the king to his Manor of Woodstocke, where he disported hym for a season, and then returned againe home, leauyng his wife with her mother vntill she were brought a bed and lighted of her childe. And shortly after the king and the Queene, and the Queene of Scottes, came to London, where they were honourably receyued, and so conueyed to Westminster.

This yere certeyne Lordes that came out of Germany made their homage vnto Sir Richarde Erle of Cornewall and brother vnto the king, the which as then stoode king of Almaine, and of Romaines. And shortly after he departed from the kinges Court, and sped him with his wife, and Sir Henry his sonne vnto the sea syde, and after tooke shippyng in Jarnesey, and landed at Dordrite in Holland. And soone after, he was crowned king of the Romaynes in the Citie of Aquis Granum.

Richard erle of Cornewall made king of ỹ Romaines.

And now the kyng of England set forward toward Wales for to subdue Lewlyn or Luellen the sonne of Griffyth the which with his Welsh men rebelled against the king, because Sir Edwarde his sonne, to whome he had a little before geuen the Erledome of Chester, would haue chaunged some of their skittishe condicions. And for to bring his purpose the better about, he sent for an army of Souldiours into Ireland, and taryed for their comming at his Castell of Brecknocke. But the yere passed so farre on, that he could do no good that yere, and therefore returned to London.

Lewlin the son of Griffith Prince of wales rebelled.

And this present yere, where there had beene a great and long sute betwene the Abbot of Waltham, and the Citizens of London, about certein toll to be payde at the fayre there holden: It was agreed that from thence forth the Citizens of London should come and go toll free, and that the distreses taken for the same should be restored, and if any were perished by keping, then the Abbot to make them good,

Nowe approched great veration and trouble to the Citie and Citizens of London, as after shall appere. It so chaunced by the meanes of some euil member, that bare no good will to the Citizens of London, that a certeine grieuous Bill of complaint was made and written in a great roll of Perchment, and the same Perchement was enclosed in greene ware, and was cast or left in the kings Wardrobe at ỹ Castell of Windsore, into the which Wardrobe, the kinges grace did often vse to come, & in this roll was written certeine most heynous articles and complaints against the Maior and rulers of the Citie, for the misgouernement of the same. And this Bill the king found, and after he had read and perused the contentes thereof he grewe into great displeasure therewith. And therevpon he sent Mancell one of his Justices to London, and there commaunded him the next holyday folowyng, that by the kings auctoritie he should call a folcksmote at Paules crosse, where then was present Sir Richard de Clare Erle of Gloucester, and diuerse other of the kinges counsaile. In which place the sayde John Mancell caused the sayde roll to be read to the people that were there assembled, and after the readyng thereof, he stoode vp and shewed the people the kinges pleasure and minde was that they should be ruled with iustice, and that the liberties of the Citie should be mainteyned in euery poynt. And if the king might know those personnes that had wronged the Communaltie of the Citie, they should bee grieuously punished to the example of other. And then the sayd John Mancell tell charged openly the Maioꝛ, to commaund that euery Alderman in hys warde ſhould the moꝛrow following, aſſemble his Wardmote. And that all thoſe Wardmotes ſhould aſſemble in one place, and choſe of themſelues without any counſell oꝛ aduiſe of any of their Aldermen. xxxvj. perſons, and them to preſent befoꝛe the Loꝛdes and him, at the ſame houre the next day in the Biſhops Pallace at Paules. Then vpon the moꝛrow all thing was done accoꝛding to his commaundment. And when the ſayde. xxxvj. perſons were preſented befoꝛe the ſaide John Mancell, Henry Baa and other Juſtices: the ſayde Mancell ſayde vnto them that they vpon their othe ſhould certefie all ſuch perſons as they knewe guiltie in the Articles befoꝛe ſhewed vnto the commonaltie, wherevnto the ſayde. xxxvj. Citizens aunſwered, that it was contrarie to their liberties to be ſwoꝛne ſo many foꝛ any matter of treſpaſſe betweene the king and any of the Citizens, wherefoꝛe they required a ſparyng. With which aunſwere the ſayde John Mancell being diſcontented, warned them to appere befoꝛe the kings Counſayle at the Guildhall vpon the moꝛrow following, where they kept their day, and thether came the ſayde Juſtices, John Mancell and Henry Baa, Sir Henrye Wengham Chauncelour of England, Philip Louell vnder treaſoꝛer, and dyuers other of the kings counſayle.

A folkemot was an assemly of people to say yea or nay to that which should be declared vnto them.

A wardmote is ꝓ aſſembly of the people of the warde foꝛ like purpoſe as is ſaid befoꝛe of a folkemote.

Then the ſayde John Mancell, exhoꝛted the ſayde perſons to be ſwoꝛne, and vſed vnto them many perſwaſions, but all was in vayne, foꝛ they excuſed themſelues ſtill, that it was contrarie to their othe, and againſt the libertie of the Citie. Wherefoꝛe the kings counſell departed from the hall ſomewhat diſcontẽted, & ſhewed vnto the king the demeanoꝛ of the ſaid Citizens.

The king cõmaunded the Maioꝛ out of his ſight.

Upon Candelmas euen, the Maioꝛ being warned that the king ſhould come to Weſtminſter, he with the moꝛe parte of the Aldermen came vnto knights Bꝛidge, and houed there to ſalute the king, and to know his further pleaſure. But when the king came neere that place, and heard of their being there, he ſent vnto them a Squire of houſhold, and charged them that they ſhoulde not pꝛeſume to come in his ſight: wyth which meſſage, they beyng greatly diſcomfited, returned home to the Citie.

Shoꝛtly after, Wighell Tony and Adam Baſyng returned from the Courte, whome the Maioꝛ befoꝛe had ſent thether, that by ſuch friendes as they could make to vnderſtande the cauſe of the kings wꝛath and diſpleaſure, They bꝛought woꝛde, that the king was well minded vnto the Citie, but he was in full purpoſe to haue ſuch perſons chaſtiſed, that had oppꝛeſſed the commonaltie of the ſame.

The nexte day following came vnto the Guyldhall, John Mancell with other of the kings counſell, the which to the people there aſſembled, vttered manye fayꝛe and pleaſaunt woꝛdes: among the which he declared that the kings minde and will was, to coꝛrect all ſuche perſons as had oppꝛeſſed the commonaltie of this his deereſt beloued Citie: and aſked of the commons whether they woulde be agreeable to the ſame: who incontinently beyng a multitude whereof many were without diſcretion, and knew full little what that queſtion meant, cryed, yee, yee, yee. And after that graunt thus had of the Commons, the ſayde John Mancell diſcharged the Maioꝛ, Shirifes, and Chamberleyn of their offices and delyuered the cuſtody thereof, vnto the Conſtable of the Towꝛe, & put in the rome of the Shirifes, Michaell Tony and and John Adrian. And moreouer all rolles and tolles and tallages before made, were deliuered vnto the sayde John Mancell, the which he there sealed and deliuered them vnto the Chamberleyne. Now when the Commons had well marked and considered whereaboutes he went, they returned home to their houses altogether confounded and amazed.

Then the sayd John Mancell with diuerse of the kinges counsaile, kept their daply courtes, and called before them.xij.wardes of the Citie. Of euery of the which. xij. wardes was taken three men, so that of those. xij. wards there were.xxxvj. men empaneled and sworne for to enquire of the aforesayd articles, and what persones in the Citie had offended them. This Court thus kept and holden at the Guyldhall, no man was called to aunswere, nor no question put vnto any person by the sayd enquest, or by any other. And soone after, that is to say vpon the first Sonday in Lent, the Maior, Aldermen and Shirifes, with the sayd enquest, and foure men of euery ward were charged to appere at Westminster, before the king: at which apperance they were countermaunded vntill the next day folowyng. At which season they cõmyng into the kings Exchequer found sittyng there, the Erles of Glouceſter and of Warwick, John Mancell, Henry Baa Justices, the Constable of the tower, then Custos of the Citie, & diuerse other of the kings counsaile. Then was called Raufe Hardell that yere Maior, Nicholas Bat, Nicholas Fitz Josue, Mathewe Bokerell, John Tolesham and John le Minour, Aldermen. Then sayd John Mancell, that the king by his lawes and inquisition of the Citizens of the Citie, had found them culpable, that they had wronged and hurt the communaltie of his Citie by diuerse meanes, as by the sayde inquisition apered, and forthwith caused it to be read before them. And when the more part thereof was read, he sayd vnto them, thus may you see that the cõmunaltie of the Citie hath bene by you most grieuously oppressed, and by your meanes and counsaile the common weale of the same destroyed as by alteryng of the tolles and other good auncient customes, turnyng them to your singuler aduauntage and lucre. All which matters the sayde Raufe and his company denyed, and that the commons was not by any such meanes by them nor none of them grieued or hurt, and that they offered to be iustified and iudged by the law and customes of the Citie.

How the Maior and Citizens appered in the Exchequer.

Then Henry Baa Justice asked them whether they would holde the aduenture of the enquirie that they had heard read before, or else stande vpon the saiyng of the other wardes, that had not yet bene sworne, but they kept them to their first aunswere. Then John Mancel demaunded of the Maior what was their law and custome. The Maior aunswered and sayd, that for tresspalle of a Citizen done against the king, he should defende him by.xij. of the sayd Citizens, and for murder and sleayng of a man by. xxx. Citizens, and for tresspalle against a straunger by the othe of fire and himselfe. Then after many reasons made by the sayde John Mancell, and also by the Maior and Aldermen, day was geuen them againe to appere the next day folowyng before the king and his counsaile.

Upon the day folowing, the king with many of his Lordes sittyng in the said Exchequer, the aforesaid inquisition was read. And that done the Maior and Aldermen were called by name, and two Aldermen more, which the day before were not called, that is to say, Arnold Thedmare, & Henry Walmode.

When

when Rauſe Hardell had heard the king ſpeake in the matter, he tooke ſuch feare, that he and Nicholas Bat without any farther anſwere, put them in the kinges grace, ſauyng to them their liberties and Fraunchiſes of the Citie. But the other fire beſought the king of his rightwiſeneſſe, that they might then be demed after the lawes and cuſtomes of the Citie. Then was layde to their charge, that beſyde many wronges by them done to the king, and to the communaltie of the Citie: they had altered the kinges Beame, and ordered it to the aduauntage of themſelues, and of the riche men of the Citie. Whereunto the parties aunſwered and ſaid, that the alteration of the Beame was not done by them onely, but by the aduice and conſent of fiue hundreth of the beſt of the Citie. For where before the Weyer vſed to leane his draught toward the Marchandice, ſo that the buyer had by that meane .x. or .xij. pound in a draught to his aduauntage, and the ſeller ſo much diſaduauntage, nowe for indifferencye and equalitie of both perſons or Marchauntes, was ordeyned that the Beame ſhould ſtande vpright in the cleft thereof, enclinyng to neyther partie, as it doth in weiyng of Golde and Siluer, and the buyer to haue of the ſeller allowed vnto him for all thinges * foure pounde of the hundreth.

* This is that allowance Grocers call Cloffe.

After theſe reaſons and ſundrie other by them made, the king commaunded that in the morning next folowyng, a folkemote ſhould be called at Paules Croſſe, and ſo that court was diſſolued, and the Maior and the other returned to London.

The next day the folkemote beyng aſſembled at Paules croſſe, theſe fire Aldermen heeryng the murmuration of the common people, and knowyng that neither the Aldermen, nor the worſhipfull of the Citie, ſhould haue any ſaiyng in the matter, fearing their cauſe, wēt into a Canons houſe of Paules, where at that time the ſayd John Mancell and other ſent from the king taryed the aſſembling of the people, and ſhewed vnto them that they entended not to pleade any lenger with the king, but were contented to put themſelues fully in the kinges grace and mercye, ſauyng alway to them and all other Citizens their liberties and Fraunchiſe of the Citie.

A folkemote againe called.

After the which agreement the ſayd John Mancell with other came vnto the Court of Folkemote, where was rehearſed vnto the People a faire and pleaſant tale, promiſyng to them their liberties ſhould be wholy & inuiolately preſerued by the king, with many other thinges to the great comfort of them. And laſtly it was demaunded of them, whether the law and cuſtome was ſuch as was the day before rehearſed or no? Whereunto like vndiſcrete and vnlearned men, they cryed and aunſwered rudely, nay, nay, nay, notwithſtandyng the ſayde lawe and cuſtome had before this time beene vſed tyme out of mynde. But to this, neither Maior, nor Alderman, nor other of the chiefe of the Citie that might replie nor impugne or make any reaſon for the defence of their auncient lawes and cuſtomes.

Rude and raſhe people.

It was not much to be marueyled that the king was thus offended againſt the Citie, for by ſuch euill diſpoſed people as he had about him, the land was euill ruled, and much miſchiefe was vſed: Wherof enſued much ſorow after, as appereth in the ſequele of this hiſtorie, as ſayth Fabian.

Then John Mancell called the Maior and Aldermen before him and charged them to be at Weſtminſter the next day folowing to geue attendance vpon the kinges grace. The next day the Maioz and Aldermen tarying the kinges comming in the great Hall at Weſtminſter, laſtly the king came into Saint Stephens Chappell, where a while he had communication with his Lozdes, and after went into the Chequer Chamber, and there ſate him downe and his Lozdes about him. Anon after the Maioz and Aldermen were called into the ſayde Chamber, and ſhoztly after called by name, and commaunded to ſtande nere to the barre. Then Henry Baa Juſtice ſayde vnto the Maioz and the ſeuen Aldermen, that foꝛſomuche as by foꝛme of the kings lawes they were found culpable in diuerſe articles touching tranſgreſſion agaynſt the king, therefoꝛe the Court awarded that they ſhould make fine and raunſome, after the diſcretion of the ſayde Court: But foꝛ that they had put them in the kinges grace and mercy, the king hath commaunded the fine to be put in reſpyte, ꝑ ye be not pained ſo grieuouſly as ye haue deſerued.

A iudgement geuen againſt the Maioz & Citizens in the Chequer Chamber in the preſence of the king.

After which iudgement geuen, they kneled downe, and then the Maioz with weping teares, thanked the king of his bountie and goodneſſe, and beſought him to be good and gracious Lozde vnto the Citie and to them as his faythfull ſubiectes. Wherevnto the king made no aunſwere, but roſe ſtreight vp, and went his way, leauyng them there. And aſſoone as the king was departed, they were all areſted and kept there till they had found ſurety, and euery Alderman of them diſcharged of his ward and office that they had within the Citie, but ſhoztly after they put in ſureties, and ſo returned heauilye to London.

Anon after that, was William Fitz Richard by the kinges commaundement made Maioz, and Thomas Fitz Thomas, and William Grappiſgate Shiriffes.

After this, day by day, the Chamberleyn was called to an accompt before the ſayde John Mancell of all ſuch tolles as was gathered in the tyme of the Mayzaltie of John Tolyſham, and of Rauſe Hardel, and there were preſent to here the ſayd accompt diuerſe of the Communalty of the Citie, but none of the heades: By the which accompt no fault could be found againſt any of the Perſonnes that were conuict before the king. By reaſon whereof, diuerſe of them were ſhoztly after admitted againe to the kinges fauour, and reſtoꝛed to their offices, but not without payment of money, whereof the certeintie is not knowen.

England in the time of ſcarſitie is beholdyng to ſtraungers.

And in this yere wheate was ſo ſcant, that it was ſolde at London foꝛ xviij. ſhillinges a quarter, and ſcanter ſhoulde haue beene, if plentie had not come out of Almaine: Foꝛ in Fraunce and Noꝛmandie it fayled likewiſe. By meane of this dearth and ſcarſitie, much pooze people dyed foꝛ hunger, and many of diuerſe countries of England, came vnto the Citie, and nere thereabout foꝛ comfoꝛt of victuall: Foꝛ it was then better chepe in London then in many ſhires of England there aboutes. And ſhoztly after was the ſayde John Mancell made knight and chiefe Juſtice of England.

Inſanũ Parliamentum, oꝛ mad Parliament.

Alſo this yere the king helde a Parliament at Oꝛenfoꝛd, which was called inſanum Parliamentum, that is to ſay, the mad Parliament. Foꝛ in this Parliament were made many actes againſt the kings pꝛerogatiue and pleaſure, foꝛ the reformation of the ſtate of the lande, which after turned to the confuſion and hurt of the land, and the death and deſtruction of many noble men, ſo that by occaſion thereof began that hatefull ſtrife, called at this day the Barons warre, whereof enſued much trouble and miſchiefe, as after ſhall appere. Barons warre.

Then as is afoꝛeſayde, to aduoyde the enoꝛmities, and to reforme the euill rule that was then vſed in the lande, by ſuch euill perſons as daylie were about the king, manye and diuers oꝛdinances were made: wherevnto the king (ſomewhat againſt hys woyll) and Sir Edward his ſonnes and others agreed. And foꝛ that theſe actes ſhould be holden firme and ſtable, there were at this Parliament choſen. xij. Peeres, which were named Douze perys, to whome authoꝛitie was giuen by vertue of this Parliament to coꝛrect all ſuch as offended in bꝛeaking of theſe oꝛdinances, and ſuch other, as by the ſayde xij. peres, ſhoulde afterward be deuyſed and oꝛdered touching and concerning the ſame matter and purpoſe. Of which. xij. Peeres the names enſue. The twelue Peeres commonly called le Douze Peres.

The Archebiſhop of Cauntoꝛbury, the Biſhop of woꝛceſter, Sir Roger Bygot then Erle of Noꝛffolk and Marſhall of Englande, Sir Symon de Mountfoꝛde Erle of Leyceter, Sir Richard Clare Erle of Glouceſtre, Sir Humffrey Bothum Erle of Herfford of Warwike and of Arondell, Sir John Mancell chiefe Juſtice of Englande, Sir Roger Moꝛtymer, Sir Hugh Bygraue, Sir Peter de Sauoy, Sir James Audely, and Sir Peter de Mountfoꝛd. And foꝛ that the kings bꝛother on the mothers ſyde, that is to ſaye Sir Eym Erle of Wyncheſter, Sir William de valaunce, Sir Godfrey de Lyndſey and Sir Guy de Lyndſey, woulde not aſſent to the afoꝛeſayde oꝛdinances, they withdꝛew them towarde the Sea ſide with ſuch ſtuffe as they had, and would haue departed the land, if they might then haue had ſhipping: foꝛ lack whereof they were fayne to returne, and ſo went to Wyncheſter. But it was not long after, that they were lycenced to depart the lande, with a certaine companie, and a certaine ſumme of money to paye foꝛ their coſtes, and their day ſet by Bartholomewtyde to aduoyde vpon payne of impꝛiſonement, which day by them was kept.

It was not long after the finiſhing of thys Parliament but that ſtrife and variaunce begamne to kindle betweene the king and the Erles of Leyceſter and Glouceſtre, by meane of ſuch officers as the ſayde Erles had remoued, and put other in their romes. Among the which John Mancell was diſcharged of hys office, and Sir Hugh Bygot then admitted foꝛ him. And bicauſe the afoꝛeſayde peres heard of the murmure of the Courte, fearing that the king ſhould be aduertiſed ſhoꝛtly to alter from his pꝛomiſe, therfoꝛe they entending to make their partie the ſtronger, the nexꝛt day following, the king being at Weſtmynſter, the Erle Marſhall, the Erle of Leyceſter, with dyuers other came vnto the Guildhall at London, where the Maioꝛ, Aldermen and commonaltie of the Citie were aſſembled, where the ſayde Loꝛdes ſhewed an inſtrument, oꝛ wꝛyting, at the which hanged many labelles with Seales, as the kings ſeale, Sir Edward his ſonnes, with manye other of the nobles of the lande, the which was the content of the Articles which were made and oꝛdeyned at Oꝛenfoꝛde, wylling the Maioꝛ and Aldermen (conſidering the ſaide actes were made vnto the honour of God, fidelitie vnto the king, and pꝛofite of the realme, that they would alſo in vpholding of the ſame, ſet to alſo their common Seale of the Citie. After which requeſt thus to the Citizens made, and after aduiſe and counſell among themſelues taken, they deſyꝛed a ſparing of the Loꝛdes, till they might ſpeake with the king, and know his pleasure in that behalfe. But finally no spatyng at that tyme might be graunted, so that in the ende, by the labour that the Lordes made, with helpe of such solicitors as they had within the Citie, the common Seale was put to, and the Maior and diuerse of the Citie swore to maintayne the same, their allegeance saued to the king, with preseruation of the liberties and fraunchises of the Citie and so departed.

Then day by day, the sayd Douze Peeres assembled at the newe Temple, where they kept their counsailes and Courtes for the reformation of the olde griefes, and remoued from the king diuers of his Menyall seruauntes, and set in their places and office such as pleased them.

This is called the Buttelerage.

And vpon the. ix. day of August, proclamation was made in diuerse accustomed places of the sayd Citie, that none of the kinges takers should take any thing within the liberties of London, without the will of the owner, except two Tonne of Wine, which the king accustomably had of euery ship cõmyng from Burdeaux, paiyng but fortie shillynges for a Tonne. By meane of which Proclamation, nothing was taken by the kinges officers, but it were streight payed for within the Citie & libertie of the same, which vsance continued but a while.

In the. xlij. yere, the king helde a Parliament at Westminster, and another (or else proroged the same) to Winchester. And in this yere, Sir Hugh Bygot Justice, with Roger Tuckley, and other, kept his Court at Saint Sauiours, and there held their Plees called Itinerarii. The which is to meane the traueylyng or the way Plees. For ye shall vnderstand, that at those daies they were kept in diuerse places in Englande, which nowe beene holden at Westminster, and Judges ordeyned to kepe a circuite, as nowe they kepe the Sizes in time of vacation. At this sayd Court, these Judges punished sore Baylifes and other officers, that before them were conuict for diuerse trespasses, & specially for takyng of amerciamentes otherwise then the law permitted them to do. For the which the sayde chiefe Justice empriſoned them, and after sealled them at grieuous fines. Also he sommoned the Citezens of London to come to the same Court, for Tolles that they had taken vpon the further syde of the water. But it was answered that the tolles that they there toke, were taken lawfully as they were redy to proue in places & Court conuenient to the same, which was within the precinct of their libertie. But notwithstanding that aunswere, the saide Sir Hugh charged them vpon a quest of. xij. knightes of Surrey to enquire of that matter and other, the which acquited the sayde Citizens, and shewed that the sayd Toll belonged to them of right.

A Tomberell was a kinde of Pillory made foure square that turned round about.

After this, the sayde Sir Hugh with other, came vnto the Guyldehall, and kept his Court and Plees there, without all order of lawe, and contrary to the libertyes of the Citie, and there punished the Bakers for lack of Size, by the Tomberell, where beforetymes, they were punished by the Pillorye, and ordered many other thinges at his will, more then by anye good order of lawe.

This yere came vnto London from beyonde the Sea Richard king of Almaine, and Erle of Cornewall, with his wife and children, which had bene there and taken possession of that kingdome, as before is shewed. Against whose commyng the Citie of London was richely hanged, with clothes of Silke and Arras, and ioyously he was receyued of the Citizens.

Silke

And in the.xliij. yere of his reigne in the Parliament holden at Westminster was reade in the presence of all the Lordes and commonalty at sundrie times, all the actes and ordinaunces before made in the Parliament holden at Orenford, with certeyne other articles by the aforesayde. xij. Peres therevnto added. After the readyng of which articles, there beyng remeued the Archbishop of Cauntorbury with other, to the number of.ix. Bishops besyde Abbots and other, denounced all them accursed that attempted in worde or deed to breake the sayde Statutes or any of them. 1258 43

In this Parliament also was graunted a taske called the Scutage, that is to say. xl. shillinges of euery knightes fee throughout the realme of England, the which extended to a great summe of money. For after dyuerse writers, there be (saith Fabian) in England in the possession of the Spiritualty and of the Temporaltie, or at those dayes were, ouer & aboue. xl. thousand knightes fees, which after that rate should extende to fourescore thousand pound. A taske called Scutage.

The first day of November folowyng, the king came to Paules, where by his cõmaundement was assembled the Court of folkmote, where the king fearing rebellion of his nobles, did according to the former ordinances made, aske licence of the Commonaltie of the Citie, for to passe the sea, and promised there in the presence of a great multitude of people, that he would be good and gracious Lorde vnto the Citie by the mouth of Sir Hugh Bigot his chiefe Justice, and to mainteine their liberties vnhurt: For the which the people for ioy made an exceedyng shoute. A folkemote.

Upon the. viij. day of November the king roade throughout the Citie towarde the sea syde. And vpon the day of Saint Brice, or the. xiij. day of November, he tooke his ship, and so sayled vnto Burdeaux, where when he had tarryed a season, he road vnto the French king, then beyng king Lewes vnto Paris. Of whom he was honourably receyued, and was lodged in his awne Pallace, by the space of a whole weke, makyng to him great feastes, and geuing to him and his, many costly and riche giftes. And from thence king Henry roade vnto Saint Denice, where of the Abbot and Couent he was receiued with procession, & tarryed there by the space of a moneth. In which season a mariage was concluded, betwene John Duke of Briteyne, and one of the kinges daughters. And at his departing, he gaue to the Abbot a Cuppe of Golde, and a Bason with an Ewer of Siluer. And for his more consolation certeine Lordes and other Noble men of Fraunce gaue attendaunce vpon him, to conuey him, and shewe him a part of Fraunce, with all disport of huntyng and hawkyng, and other many pleasures of the Countrie.

And in this time, the French king assembled his Parliament at Paris, where he shewed vnto his Lordes, that his conscience grudged with the withholdyng of all such landes as Philip the second wanne from king John in Normandy, vpon the which he desyred their faythfull and fruitefull counsaile, where after many reasons and argumentes made, it was concluded for a finall concorde to be had betwene king Henry and him, that if king Henrie with the agreement of his Lordes would resigne into the Frenche kinges handes, all such title and right as he had in the whole Duchie of Normandy, Angeow, Poyteau, and Mayne, for him and for his heyres for euer, that then the French king of his great bountie and grace, should geue vnto the king of England, and to his heyres kinges, the Lordship of Guian, Angeou, and Mayne, and by rightfull title, euer after to be called the Duke of Guian, and besydes that, he shoulde bee admitted for a Peere of Fraunce: To all which conditions, as appereth by the French Chronicle, king Henrie at his returne from his disport was agreable, and with consent of his Baronnye, and in their presence, with also the Barony of France, did his homage vnto the sayde Lewes for the Duchie of Guyan, and after made his othe according to the same. And after great giftes receyued on eyther syde, king Henry returned vnto Burdeaux.

Of this peace speaketh Guido, and sayth, that king Henry sayled into Fraunce, and asked restitution of the French king, of such landes as Philip the second his ayle had with extort power taken from king John his father. But because he found the French king straunge in his answere, and also had little trust in his Lordes to haue their ayde, he fell to agreement with the French king, and solde him his title that he had in Normandy, Gascoyne and Guyan, the which extended vnto the yerely value of twentie thousand pound, taking for the same title three hundreth thousande of small Turon money, whereof a pound is in value after sterlyng money but two shillings and three pence, or there about, so that he should after that rate haue for his sayde title, after the value of sterlyng money. xxxiiij. thousand. vij. C. fiftie pound.

A variaunce betweene Sir Edward the Prince and the Erle of Glouceſter.

While king Henry was thus occupyed in Fraunce, dissention fell in England, betweene Sir Edward the kinges sonne, and Sir Richarde Erle of Glouceſter. For the appeasing whereof, a Parliament, that is to saye, a counsaile of his Lordes was called at Westminster, which continued by the space of three weekes and more. To the which counsaile the Lordes came with great companies, and specially the sayde Sir Edwarde, and the Erle of Glouceſter, the which entended to haue lodged within the Citie. Wherefore the Maior went vnto the Bishop of Worceſter, and Sir Hugh Bigot, and Sir Philip Basset, to whome the king with the Archbishop of Cauntorbury had taken the rule of the lande in his absence, the which went vnto the king of Almaine to haue his aduise in that matter: Where it was concluded, that neyther the sayd sir Edward, nor the Erle, should come within the Citie there to be lodged, nor none that helde vpon eyther of the parties. And further it was prouided, that all such as were within the Citie, and was of the age of. xv. yeres and aboue, should be in harneſse to watch and kepe the City both day and night and that the gates should be shut vpon the day, & certaine men in harneſse to kepe euery gate of the City. And sone after, for ꝑ safegard of the Citie, and sure keepyng of the peace within the same, the king of Romaines, with the sayd Sir Hugh came into the Citie, and there were lodged with their companies, and suche other as they would assigne to strength the Citie if neede required.

Shortly after the king came to London from beyond the sea, and was lodged at the Bishop of Londons Palace. After whose commyng, by his assignement, the Erle of Glouceſter was lodged within the Citie, and Sir Edward his sonne was lodged in his owne Palace at Westminster. And soone after the king commaunded him to be lodged at S. Johns without Smithfield Barres in the Suburbes of London, and al the other Lordes were lodged in other places without the Citie. And the king of Romaynes remoued

againe to Weſtminſter.

In the which tyme an order was taken betweene the ſayde partyes, and a new aſſembly or Parliament was appoynted in the Quindena of Saint Johñ Baptiſt. And from that tyme to the entent that all thinges might be ſet in an order, it was proroged vnto the feaſt of Saint Edward, at which tyme all thinges were in quiet, and ſo continued a tyme.

And here Fabian telleth a tale of a Jewe, ſaying that at Tewkeſbury there fell a Jewe into a Jakes or Gonge vpon a Saterday, which was his Sabboth day, and would not for reuerence of his Sabboth day be plucked out, whereof heeryng the Erle of Glouceſter that the Jewe did ſo great reuerence to his Sabboth day, thought he would do aſmuch to his holy day, which was Sunday, and ſo commaunded him to be kept there vntill Monday at which tyme he was found dead. A Jewe drowned in a Pzeuy.

This yere the king kept a great feaſt at Weſtmynſter and there made diuers knights. Among the which Johñ Duke of Bzitayn which had maried one of the kings daughters was there made knight. And ſoone after was Sir Hugh Spencer made chiefe Juſtice. 1259 44

And ſone after this he commaunded a Folkemote to be called at Paules Croſſe, where he in proper perſon with the king of Almayne, the Archebiſhop of Cauntorby, and many other nobles came: where the king commaunded the Maior that euery ſtriplyng of the age of. xij. yeres and aboue ſhoulde the nert day be ſworne before hys Alderman, to be true to the king and to his heyres kings of England, and that the gates of the Citie ſhould be kept with harnelledmen, as before by the king of Romanes was deuyſed. A folkemote.

Abont this time alſo, at a Fayre kept at Northhampton variaunce fell betweene the Londoners and the men of the Towne, ſo that betweene the Citizens of London and them continued long ſute and plee, and it was for a man of Northhampton that then was ſlaine, to the great veration and trouble of both partes: But in the ende the Citie of London had the better.

The Barons alſo at this tyme with the conſent of the peres diſcharged Sir Hugh Spencer, and admitted for hym Sir Philip Baſſet to be chiefe Juſtice, vnwitting to the king. By reaſon whereof, another grudge and diſpleaſure began to kindle betweene the king and his Lordes, and encreaſed more and more. But by the polleete of the king of Almayn, and ſome prelates of the lande, it was ſet in quiet for a while, but it continued ſcantly to the ende of the yere.

And this yere the Barons admitted and made the Shirifes of diuers ſhires of England, and diſcharged ſuch as before the king had admytted, and named them Gardians and keepers of the Counties and Shires. And beſydes that, the ſayde Barons would not ſuffer the Juſtice, that the king had admitted to keepe the Plees and lawes called Itinerarij, but ſuch as were of their admyſſion. wherewith the king was greeuouſly diſcontented, in ſo much that after that time, he labored that he might make fruſtrate and vtterly voyde the aforeſayde ſtatutes and ordynances: In ſo much, that vpon the ſecond Sunday in Lent next following, the king commaunded to be read at Paules croſſe a Bull of the graunt of Vrban, Biſhop of Rome and the third of that name, as a confirmation of another Bull before purchaſed of hys predeceſſour Alexander the thirde, for to aſſoyle the king and all other that before 1260 45 Gardians and keepers of Counties and Shires.

fore had swoorne to the maintenance of the afore sayde Articles made at Orenfoorde. And after caused the absolution to be shewed throughout the realme of Englande, Wales and Ireland, geuing strayte charge to all his subiects, that none to be so hardie to disobey the sayde absolution. And if anye person were founden disobedient to his commaundement that he were streight way committed to prison, and not to be raunsomed nor delyuered vntill the kinges pleasure were further knowne.

A folkemote. In the Month of June next following, the king of Almain tooke shipping and sayled into Almayn. And king Henry at a Folkemote holden on S. Peters daye in the Month of July following had lycence to sayle into Fraunce. And the next day he departed from London towarde the sea syde, with the Queene and other Lordes, his two sonnes Sir Edward and Sir Edmond being then in Guyan. When the king had bene a while in Fraunce, he returned vnto Burdeaux, where he fell sicke, by occasion whereof, he taried in those parties vntill December next folowyng. And in this meane time dyed Richard Clare Duke of Gloucester, and Sir Gilbert de Clare his son was Erle after him. To whom the father gaue great charge that he should vpholde the former ordinaunces.

And it happened soone after, that a Iew fell at variance with a Christian man at Cole Church in London beside the great Conduit in Cheape, and woounded the Christian man within the same Church. Murder vpon murder. Wherefore the people of the Citie in a fury, pursued the sayd Iewe to his house, and there slue him, and after fell vpon the other Iewes, and slue and robbed many of them.

And shortly after the king landed at Douer, and came to London in the beginnyng of January folowyng. And this yere about the .vj. of December began a great frost, and continued the space of one moneth and more, in such wise that the Thames was so frosen that men passed ouer on horseback. And in the same Winter the kings Palace at Westminster perished by fyre, namely a great part thereof, which happened by negligence.

Variance betwene the Constable of the Tower and the Citizens of London. About this time also a displeasure and variance began to growe betwene the Constable of the Tower, and the Citizens of London, for that the Constable contrary to the liberties of the Citie, tooke certeine shippes passyng by the tower with wheat and other victuall, and caryed the same into the tower, makyng the price thereof at his awne will and pleasure. Wherevpon great harme had ensued, had not bene the policie of wyse men: Which thing was shewed vnto the kinges counsaile, by whose direction, the matter was committed vnto Sir Philip Basset then chiefe Iustice, and other, to set an order and rule betwene the sayd parties. Then before them were brought all euidences and priuileges for the aduauntage of both parties: Where finally after long plee and argument, it was firmely demed and iudged, that if the Constable or any other officer of the Tower, would at any tyme take wheate or other victuall to the vse of the king, or of the Tower, that he should come vnto the market holden within the Citie, and there to haue it two pence in a quarter within the Maiors price, and other victualles after the same rate: And if he, or any of his officers would do contrary to that ordinaunce, that then the shiriffes should make report vnto the kinges counsaile, and to withstande him in all that they might, so that the kinges peace were kept.

An order made betwene the Constable of the Tower and the Citizens of London.

At this tyme was spread many tales, and there arose among the people

a

a mutteryng and murmuryng, that shortly there would be warres betwene the Lordes and the king, for the Bull of dispensation before mencioned. But by the helpe and mediation of good wise men, these murmours and grudges were so appeased, that the king agreed againe to the maintenance of those statutes, and sent his writtes wherein the sayd articles were comprysed, into all the Shires of England, geuing straight commaundement to all men to obserue and kepe the same, and such other as were to them adioyned by the discretion of the Erle Marshall, the Erle of Leycester, Sir Philip Basset, Sir Hugh Bigot and others, the which shortly after was reuoked and denied. Wherevpon the Archebishop of Cauntorbury, fearyng what after might ensue, made him an errand to Rome, and so by licence of the king and of the Lordes he departed the land, and by that meanes kept him out of the realme vntill the trouble was appeased and ceassed.

A folkemote.

Then vpon a midlent Sunday the Maior and the commons beyng present at a folkemote holden at Paules Crosse before Sir Philip Basset, and other of the kinges Counsaile, the Maior was sworne to be true vnto the king, and to his heyres kinges. And the next day after at the Guyldhall, euery Alderman in the presence of the Mayor tooke the same othe. And vpon the Sonday folowyng, euery stripplyng of the age of.xij. yeres and aboue, before his Alderman in his warde was newly charged with the same othe.

Then the displeasure betwene the king and the Barons began to breake forth, which by a long time had bene couered and hidden, insomuch as diuerse of the Barons assembled themselues in the marches of Wales, and gathered vnto them strong power, and sent a letter vnto the king, vnder the Seale of Sir Roger Clifforde, beseechyng him to haue in remembraunce, the othe and manifolde promises that he had made for the obseruing of the statutes made at his towne of Orenforde, with other ordinaunces made to the honour of God, for fayth and allegeance to his person, and for the weale and profite of his realme: Willyng him further, to withstand and defye all such persons, as will be against the sayd actes, sauyng the Queene and her children.

Barons begin to sturre.

After the which letter thus sent, and receauyng of it no answere, the said Barons, with Baner displayed went agaynst suche as they knewe that helde against the sayde actes. And first at Hertford they tooke the Bishop of that see, and as many of his Chanons as were aliauntes borne, and tooke suche treasure and Cattaile as they there found, and bare it with them. And after went and sent vnto such manours as the sayd Bishop and Chanons had, and robbed and spoyled them, and some of them, they threwe to the grounde and consumed with fire, and put the sayd Bishop and Chanons in safe and sure keping, and set others in their places: and after went into other partes of the realme, where they supposed to finde any of their enimies, keping still their course towarde London, bearing before them a Banner of the kings armes, and goyng on their iourney, much people drewe vnto them. And in their passage, euer as they found any that they knewe to be against the maintenance of the sayde actes, those thy imprisoned and spoyled their places and houses, were they spirituall or temporall men, and in diuerse of the kinges Castels they set in such men as they lyked, and put out such as the king had placed there before, and gaue vnto them an othe, that they should be true and faythfull to the king, & kepe those Castels to his vse & to the weale of the realme.

About

About Midſommer folowing, they drewe nere to London, and ſent a letter to the Maior and Aldermen vnder the ſeale of Sir Simon Mountford, requiring to knowe of them, whether they would obſerue and mainteine the actes and ſtatutes made at Oxenford or not, or elſe they would aide and aſſiſt ſuch perſonnes as entended the breche of the ſame, and ſent vnto them a copie of the ſame actes with a prouiſo, that if there were any of them that ſhould ſeeme to be hurtfull to the realme or common weale of the ſame, that they then by diſcrete perſons of the land ſhould be altered and amended. The which Copie the Maior bare vnto the king beyng then at the Tower, accompanied with the Queene and the king of Almaine, which lately was returned from beyond the ſea, and Sir Edward his ſonne and other of hys Counſaile.

Then the king entendyng to knowe the minde of the Citie aſked the Maior what he thought of thoſe ordinaunces and actes, knowyng well that before his commyng thether, he had counſayled with the Aldermen, and ſome of the Commons of the Citie.

The Maior then abaſhed with that queſtion, beſought the king that he might common with his brethren the Aldermen, and then he would declare vnto him both his and their opinions. But the king ſayd, he would here his aduice without more councell. Then the Maior boldely ſayde, that before tymes, he with his brethren and commonaltie of the Citie, by his commaundement were ſworne to maintayne all actes made to the honour of God, to the fayth of the king, and profite of the realme, which othe by his lycence and moſt gracious fauour they entended to obſerue and kepe. And moreouer to auoyde all occaſion that might growe of grudge or varyance betweene hys grace and his Barons within the Citie, they would auoyde all aliauntes and ſtraungers out thereof, if his grace were ſo contented. With the which aunſwere, the king ſeemed to be pleaſed, ſo that the Maior with his fauour departed, and ſent aunſwere to the Barons, accordyng to the ſayd communication, their liberties alwayes vpholden and ſaued.

Then ſhortly after, forſomuch as diuerſe noble men of the land, which helde againſt thoſe ſtatutes, were ridden toward Douer, and there entended to haue taken ſhipping for feare of the Barons, the king ſent after them diuerſe perſons of his houſhold, and of the Citizens of London to reforme and enduce them to retorne and tary with the king.

And in this tyme all aliauntes and ſtraungers, the which were taken ſuſpect of any fauour borne to the one part or to the other, were auoyded the Citie. But it was not long after that Sir Edwarde the kinges ſonne, ſet them or many of them in offices within the Caſtell of Windſore. Then watch was kept dayly within the Citie, and in the nightes a certeine were appointed to ryde about the Citie, with a certeyne number of footemen to attend vpon them to ſearche all the Citie ouer, but of that enſued harme: For while the ridyng watch was in one part of the Citie, ſome euill diſpoſed perſonnes vnder the colour of watchmen, and to ſearch for ſtraungers, robbed and ſpoiled many houſes within the Citie. For remedie whereof, a ſtandyng watche was appointed in euery warde: But now the king hearing that the Barons approched nere the Citie, he ſhortly after departed thence.

Then the Barons entered the Citie in the moneth of July. And ſhortly after after, the king returned to Westmynster, with the Queene and other of hys counsayle. And sone after by the consent of the king and the Barons, Sir Hugh le Spencer was made chiefe Justice and keeper of the Tower.

The next day after Mary Magdaleyn daye, a writ was directed vnto the Maior and Aldermen, charging them that the kings peace were firmely kept within the Citie. And in the same writ it was also expressed, that the king and his Barons were louingly agreed. Furthermore it was by the same writ commaunded that if within the precinct of their Fraunches, were any person or persons knowne, that would withstande the aforesayde ordynances and statutes, that all such should be attached and put in prison, & their goodes attached for the king, vntill they knewe his further pleasure.

Ye shall vnderstande, that while the Lordes laye thus in the Citie, dyuers cõuenticles and gatherings were made of the Citizens and other, that robbed in the Citie and did much harme. The which was smally corrected, they were so borne out and mainteyned by their maysters. And lykewise the Commons of the Citie were farre out of rule by the insensyng of ryotous persons, that in assemblies and courts, that then were kept at the Guyldhall or other places, simple and vndiscreete persons should haue the voyce, and the worshipfull men little or nothing regarded, whereof ensued daylie much vnhappinesse and sorrow, as after shall appere.

The Barons then, to obteyne the more fauour of the Citie willed them to shewe if they had any parte of their liberties withdrawne that they might againe to them be restored, and also to deuyse some newe to their weale and profite, and they would labour to the king that they might haue them graunted. For the which comforte of the Lordes, the Maior called the commons vnto the Guyldehall, and shewed to them the beneuolence of the sayd Lords, and willed them that euerie officer for hys office, to deuyse such things as might be beneficiall for the Citie.

Wherevpon they counsayled together and made a note in a paper, of dyuers statutes, prouisions and ordynaunces to be graunted, which might (sayth Fabian) more properly be named abhominations, for they were deuised to their singuler profite, and to the great hurte of all other Marchauntes comming to the Citie, and to all other Fayres and Markettes of England, and also preiudiciall to the vniuersall weale of the Realme.

The which when they were perused and ouersene by the heades of the Citie, it was shewed vnto the sayde Commons, that their ordinaunces were not lawfull nor charitablie considered, and therefore they knewe well they should not be admytted, willing them to deuise other, but all was in vayne. By meane whereof, both those and other that were right necessarie for the common weale of the Citie were reiected and put of.

The Barons departed from London the morowe after Saint James day, and went toward Wyndsore, to see the guyding of the Castell: where at their comming they put out the sayde alyantes before set in, by Sir Edward the kings sonne, who being accompanied with other went to Fulham to the king and shewed him that the Barons had spoyled them of such goods as they had, and that without cause. But the king put them of for that season and warned them to sue to him about Mighelmas, when more of hys counsayle was with him, and then they shoulde haue iustice.

The

The. xviij. day of September, the king, the Queene with his ſonnes and other nobles of this land tooke ſhipping and ſayled into Fraunce, to be preſent at the French kinges Parliament then holden at Bonony, and ſhortly after he returned againe and the. viij. day of October next folowyng, landed at Douer, and the Friday folowyng came to London.

The. xb. day of October there were a Jury of. xij. knightes of Middleſex, ſworne betweene the Abbot of Weſtminſter and the Citie of London, for certaine priueleges that the Citie clayned within Weſtminſter. Where, by the ſaid Jury it was founden before Gilbert of Preſton then chiefe Baron of the kinges Exchequer, that the Shiriffes of London at thoſe dayes might lawfully enter into the towne of Weſtminſter, and all other Tenementes, that the Abbot had within Middleſex, and vnto the gate of the ſayde Abbey, and there to make ſommons and diſtreyne for lacke of appearaunce, all and euery Tenant of the ſayd Abbot.

And ſoone after Michelmaſſe, the former complaint of the alyens or ſtraungers, was ſhewed before the king and the Lordes in the Parliament, or rather counſaile holden at Weſtminſter, where at the laſt, ſentence was geuen, that the Barons ſhould reſtore all ſuch goodes as they and their company had taken from ſuch perſons before that day, as well to aliauntes as other, ſpirituall or temporall perſons: And alſo that ſuch meniall ſeruauntes as ſhould be dayly in the kinges houſe, and about his perſon, ſhould be ſuch as the king would chooſe and admit himſelfe, the which two articles, the Barons vtterly denyed. Wherefore olde rancoure tooke place, and diſſention kindled his fyre of malice againe betweene the king and his Lords feruently.

And in the yere folowyng, the Commons of the Citie of London chooſe vnto their Maior for that yere Thomas fitz Thomas, and without counſell of the Aldermen ſwore him at the Guildhal vpon the day of Simon & Jude, and made no preſentment of him vpon the next day folowyng, neyther to the king, nor yet to the Barons of the Exchequer, as they of right ought to haue done: For the which preſumption the king was grieuouſly diſcontented againſt the Citie. And ſone after he being aduertiſed that the Citizens would take part with the Barons, cauſed Sir Edward his ſonne to take the Caſtel of Windſore by a traine. Whereof, when he knewe that he was in poſſeſſion, the king early in a morning a little before Chriſtmaſſe, departed from Weſtminſter, and rode to the ſayd Caſtell, whether ſhortly after came many of the Lordes vpon the kinges partie. And as faſt the Lordes and knightes which helde with the Erle of Leyceſter, drewe them toward London, ſo that on eyther partie great numbers of people were aſſembled. And in this tyme ſome well diſpoſed perſons laboured to haue peace and concorde betweene the kyng and his Lordes: By whoſe meanes at the laſt, it was agreed, that all matters concernyng the aforeſayde articles or ſtatutes made at Orenford, and after by the. xij. Piers, ſhould be demed and iudged by the French king, ſo that he ſhould alow or diſalow thoſe that ſhould be kept or broken, and as he iudged, ſo both parties to be contented to ſtand vnto & abide firmely & ſurely. Vpon which agreement, copies were made of the ſayde ſtatutes, and with letters (ſhewyng the effect of the former agreement) ſent vnto Lewes the Frenche king as aforeſayde. And at Chriſtmaſſe next after, the king tooke ſhippyng, with Sir Edward his ſonne, and other of the Counſayle, and

The king rideth for feare of the Barõs to the Caſtell of Windſore.

The controuerſie betweene ỹ king & his Lordes was committed to the iudgement and order of the French king.

and ſayled into Fraunce for the aforeſayde cauſe. And for the partie of the ſayde Barons, was ſent ouer Sir Peter de Mountforde and other. Then before Lewes king of Fraunce thoſe ſtatutes were ſore argued.

In the ende, the French king hauyng before him both the parties, the xviij. day of January, ſyttyng in iudgement gaue expreſſe ſentence, that all and euery of thoſe ſtatutes and ordinaunces ſhould be from that day forward vtterly fordone and ſet at naught, and all ſuch bandes and promiſes that the king or any other had made for the maintenance of the ſame, ſhould be annulled and canceled, and the king and all other, for any matter concernyng thoſe ſtatutes ſet at libertie.

The French king iudged agaynſt the Barons of England.

After which ſentence thus geuen, the king returned into Englande, ſo that he came vnto London the.xv. day of February. But the Barons beyng ſore amoued with this ſentence, and notyng great partialitie in the Frenche king, departed from London Weſtward, and ſo into the marches of Wales, where they drewe to them great power, and warred vpon the landes and Caſtelles of Sir Roger Mortimer, & threw ſome of them vnto the ground, and ſpoyled of his what they might finde, and ouer that, brent of his manours and houſes. In whoſe ayde, Sir Edward the kinges ſonne commyng, hys people were diſtreſſed, and he almoſt taken.

For reformation of which matter a newe Parliament or counſayle was called and appointed to beholden & kept.xv. dayes after Eaſter at Oxenford, but it neuer toke effect. Howbeit another Chronicle ſayth, ỹ from this Parliament then holden at Oxford, the king and his Lordes parted in diſpleaſure.

A new Parliament holden at Oxford, but it tooke none effect.

Then the Barons drewe towarde London, and the king remayned at Woodſtocke. And then newe aſſurance by wrytyng indented was made betwene the commonaltie of the Citie, and the Barons, without conſent of many of the rulers of the ſayde Citie. Wherefore the Commons, as men in a rage and furye, made of them ſelues two Capitaines, whiche they named Conſtables of the Citie, that is to ſay, Thomas Piwelſdon, and Stephen Bukerel. At whoſe commaundement, by tollyng of the great Bell of Paules all the Citie ſhould be readye ſhortly in harneſſe, to geue attendaunce vpon their ſaid Capitaynes,

The Citizens of London choſe two newe Capitaines.

About the beginnyng of Lent, the Conſtable of the Tower, Sir Hugh le Spencer, came with a fayre company of men of armes before him into the Citie, and deſyred aſſiſtance of the aforenamed Conſtables. The which commaunded the ſayde Bell to be tolled: By meane whereof, the people ſhut in their ſhops, and came out in harneſſe in great multitudes. The which after proclamation made, that they ſhould follow their Capitaines, without knowledge what to do, or whether to go, folowed their ſayde Capitaynes, and ſo went to Thiſtlewoorth.viij. miles beyond Weſtminſter, and there ſpoyled the Manor of the king of Romaynes, and ſet it after vpon a fyre. And that done, his water Milles and other commodities that he there had, put them vnto vtter ruyne, and after with great noyſe and cry returned to London.

The Citizens of London brent at Thiſtlewoorth the Manor of Richard the king of Romayneſ.

This dede as ſaith Fabian, was the cauſe of the mortall warre folowing. For where before time the ſaid king of Romaines had gone about for the aliaunce that was betwene him and the Erle of Glouceſter, a treatie of peace, to be had betwene the king and his Barons: after that deede done, he was enemie vnto them to the vttermoſt of his power.

The king heryng of this ryot, gathered vnto him a great power. And for that he heard that Sir Peter de Mountfort was at Northhampton gathering of people to strength the Barons partie, he sped him thether, and wan the towne vpon him by force, and slue many of his men, and in the ende tooke him and Sir Simond the sonne of the Erle of Leycester, with diuerse other on liue, the which, with many Burgesses of that towne, that had taken their partes, the king sent vnto diuerse prisonnes, and some he closed within the Castell of the same towne.

A ryot made vpon the Iewes.

And aboute this tyme, that is to saye, the weeke before Easter, all the Iewes in London were spoyled and robbed, and the number of fiue hundreth of them were slaine, and diuerse of their houses brent and destroyed, and such of them as were saued, were conueyed for great neede vnto the Tower, and there kept from the fury of the Commons. And the occasion of this riot was, for that one Iewe woulde haue forced a Christian man to haue geuen vnto him more then two pence for the vsury of twenty shillynges for a weeke lendyng. For ye shall vnderstande that in those dayes by licence graunted vnto the Iewes of the king, they might take by vsury of euery man that of them would borow money, two pence of a pound for a weekes lendyng, and so of greater and of smaller summes after the rate.

Vsury allowed among the Iewes & suffered in England.

And soone after the Iewes were thus punished, many houses of religion within the Citie, and nere there about, were searched for goodes of aliauntes, and muche founde. Whereof a part was brought vnto the Barons, but the more part was stolne and bribed.

In this season the king passed by dyuerse Countries, and lastly came into Sussex, with a strong power. Whereof hering the Lordes, they made preparation to go against him. In all which tyme the Wardens of the fiue Portes kept the sea with shippes that no straungers should enter the land to ayde the king against the Barons.

In the ende of Aprill, the Barons with a multitude of the Citie, which they put in the vawarde, departed from London, taking their iourney towarde the king. And when they were well onwarde vpon their way, worde was brought vnto them, that the king with an howge power was at Lewes. Wherfore they by an whole assent, deuysed a letter, and sent it in the name of all the Barons vnto the king, whose names herevnder folow, but not all.

The names of the Barõs of England.

Which letter sealed with the seales of the sayde Erle of Leycester, and of Gloucester, conteyned as foloweth.

A letter writ ten by the Barons vnto the king.

TO the most excellent Lord, king Henry, by the grace of God king of Englande, Lorde of Irelande, and Duke of Guyan, the Barons and other faythfull your seruauntes, their fidelitie and othe to God and to you coueting to kepe, send to you due salutyng with all reuerence and honoure, vnder due obeysaunce.

obeyſaunce. Lyketh it your highneſſe to vnderſtand, that many beyng aboute you, haue before tymes ſhewed vnto your Lordſhip of vs many euill and vntrue reportes, and haue found ſuggeſtions, not al onely of vs, but alſo of your ſelfe, to bring this your realme vnto ſubuerſion. Know your excellency, that we entend nothing but health and ſurety to your perſon, to the vttermoſt of our powers: and not alonely to our enemies, but alſo yours, and of all thys your realme, we entend vtter greuaunce and correction. Beſechyng your grace, hereafter to geue to them little credence, for ye ſhall finde vs your true and faythfull ſubiectes to the vttermoſt of our powers. And we Erle of Leyceſter, and Erle of Glouceſter, at the requeſt of other, & for our ſelues, haue put to our ſeales, the .x. day of the moneth of May.

The aunſvvere vnto the aforeſayde letter.

The kinges aunſwere to the Barons letter.

HEnry by the grace of God, king of England, Lord of Ireland, & Duke of Guyan: To Simond de Mountfort, and Gilbert de Clare, and their complices. Whereas by warre and generall perturbaunce in this our realme, by you begon and continued, with alſo brennynges and other hurtes, and enormities, that euidently it appereth that your fidelitie to vs due, ye haue not kept, nor the ſuretie of our perſon ye haue little regarded, for ſo much as our Lordes and other truſtie friendes which dayly abyde with vs, ye vexe and greeue, and them purſue to the vttermoſt of your powers, and yet dayly entend as ye by report of your letters haue vs aſſerteyned: We the griefe of them admit and take to be our awne, ſpecially when they for their fidelitie, which they to vs dayly impend, ſtand & abyde by vs, to oppreſſe your infidelitie and vntruth. Wherefore of your fauour and aſſurance we ſet little ſtore, but you as our enemies we vtterly defye. Witneſſe our ſelfe at our towne of Lewes, the .xij. day of this moneth of May.

And beſydes this, the king of Romaynes, Sir Edvvard the kinges ſonne, and other Lordes beyng then vvith the king, ſent vnto them another letter vvhereof the tenor enſueth.

Another letter ſent to the Barons.

RIchard by the grace of God king of Romaynes, alwayes Auguſtus and Edwarde the Noble firſt begotten ſonne of the king of Englande, all other Barons firmely ſtanding and abyding with our ſouereigne Lorde the king, to Symond de Mountfort, Gilbert de Clare, and all other their falſe fellowes: By the Letters which ye ſent vnto the king our moſt ſouereigne Lorde, we vnderſtanding that we are defyed of you. Neuertheleſſe, thys worde of defiance appered vnto vs ſufficiently before, by the depriuation and brenning of our manors, and carying awaye of oure goodes. Wherefore we wyll that ye vnderſtande, that we defye you as our mortall and publique enemies. And whenſoeuer we maye come to the reuengement of the iniuries that ye to vs haue done, we ſhall acquite it to the vttermoſt of oure powers. And where ye put vpon vs that we are neyther true nor good to oure Souereigne Lorde the king. We geue you to vnderſtand that ye therin ſay, falſely and vntruely of vs. And if that ſaiyng ye Sir Symond de Mountfort and Sir Gilbert de Clare wyll teſtifie in the Court of our ſouereigne Lord the king: we are readie to purchace to you ſurette and ſafe comming, that there we maye proue our true and faythfull innocencie, and your falſe and trayterous liyng. Witneſſed with the Seales of Richarde king of the Romaynes and ſir Edward aforenamed. Geuen at Lewes the xij. day of May.

When the Barons had receyued these Letters from the king and hys Lordes, they perceyued well that there was none other meane, but to defend their cause by dent of sworde, wherfore, they putting their trust in God, sped them forth toward the king. And vpon Wednesday being the.xxiij. day of May, earely in the morning bothe the hostes met: where after the Londoners had geuen the first assault, they were beaten back, so that they began to drawe from the sharp shot and strokes, to the discomfort of the Barons hoste. But the Barons encouraged and comforted there men in suche wise, that not all onely the freshe and lustie knightes fought egerly, but also suche as before were discomfited, gathered a newe courage vnto them, and fought without feare, insomuch that the kings Vaward lost their places. Then was the fielde couered with dead bodyes, and gasping and groning was heard on euery side, for eyther of them was desyrous to bring others out of lyfe. And the father spared not the sonne, neyther yet the sonne spared the father. Alliance at that time was turned to defiaunce, & christian bloud that day was shed without pittie. Thus duryng the fyght by the more parte of the daye, lastly the victorie fell to the Barons, so that there were taken the king, and the king of Romaynes, Sir Edward the kings sonne, with many other noble men, to the the number of.xxv. Barons and Banarets, and of the common people there were slaine aboue twentie thousand as saith Fabian & Cowper.

A terrible battail called the battaile of Lewes in Sussex betweene the king and his Barons.

The king & his brother & sonne taken.

When the Barons had thus obtayned the victorye, prouision was made for the safe keepyng of the prisoners, so that all were sente vnto dyuerse Castelles and Prysons, except the king and hys brother the king of Almayne, and Sir Edwarde his Sonne, the which the Barons helde with them vntill they came to London. Then a newe graunt was made by the king, that the aforesayde statutes should stand in strength. And if anye were thought vnreasonable, they to be corrected and amended by foure noble men of the realme, that is to saye, two of the spiritualtie, and two of the temporaltie. And if those foure could not agree, then the Erle of Angeou and Duke of Burgoyn to be iudges of the matter. And this to be firmelye holden and obeyed by the king and his brother: The kinges graunted that their sonnes and heyres should remaine with the Barons as prisoners vntill all thinges were finished, according to the former agreement. And vpon this was a Parliament appoynted to be holden at London the Whitsontyde folowing, but that came neuer to passe. Then the Tewesday before the Ascention day, a peace was proclaymed in London betwene the king and the Barons.

The king graunteth to the Barons, all their requestes.

The next day the king and the Barons came to London with the king of Romaynes, and Sir Edward the kinges sonne. Then Sir Edwarde as pledge for the king, and Sir Henry sonne to the king of Almaine, were sent vnto the Tower, and there lodged, and from thence to Douer Castell. And the king was lodged in the Bishops Palace beside Paules, and the king of Almaine and diuerse other within the tower. Then it was agreed by the king, that for his more suretie, and for the weale of the lande that the Erle of Leycester should be resiaunt in the kinges Court. Vpon which agreement and other, many of the Prisoners were set at large.

In this meane while, before the Battaile of Lewes, the Queene and the king of Romaynes had sent ouer the sea for Souldiours, to ayde the king agaynst the Barons, which nowe were come in great number vnto Douer, and there houed on the Sea to haue landed. Whereof heeryng the Barons, they ſent the king of Romaynes as priſoner to Barkhamſtede, vntill the ſayd Aliauntes were returned: and cauſed king Henry with a great power to ryde thether, and to force the ſayde hoſte of ſtraungers to returne vnto their Countreys from whence they came.

and

Kynges by power are forced to do an other will, and not as they luſt.

And when the king had returned the ſayde ſtraungers, he ſhortly after with the agreement of the Barons, ſayled ouer into Fraunce, and returned againe within ſhort tyme.

And ſhortly after the Lordes of the Marches of Wales aſſembled themſelues together, and did much harme vpon the Lordeſhippes and Manors of the Erles of Leyceſter and Glouceſter. Wherefore the king ſo ſoone as he returned out of Fraunce, forthwith roade to Glouceſter, and called there a Counſaile of his Lordes, by the auctoritie of which counſaile, it was enacted that as many of the ſayd Lordes as came not in by the Octaues of Saint Hillary next folowyng, & yelded them vnto the kinigs grace, ſhould be exiled. And in the ſayd Counſayle it was alſo agreed, that in the ſayd Octaues there ſhould be a Parliament holden at Weſtminſter. At the which tyme the king with his Lordes ſpirituall and temporall, and commons of his lande, began his foreſayd Parliament. And in the ſame it was there moued (the king himſelfe beyng preſent) that neither he the king, nor yet Sir Edward his ſonne, nor none of them ſhould after that day greue or cauſe to be greued the Erles of Leyceſter and of Glouceſter, the Baronnes, Banerettes, or knightes, the Citizens of London, and Barons of the fiue Portes, nor none other perſon or perſons of high or low degree, that was vpon the partie of the ſayd Erles, for any matter of diſpleaſure done againſt the king, and the ſayde Sir Edward his ſonne, at any tyme before that day. And that to do and vpholde, the king before his Lordes was ſworne.

Here is the firſt mention made of a Parliament holden by the three eſtates.

The king ſworne but ſhortly brake his othe.

After this there was read a Charter or Pardon, concernyng the cauſe and matter of offence aforeſayde. And afterwarde alſo was concluded a confirmation of the ſtatutes of the Foreſt, with many other actes and ſtatutes before graunted of the king, as Magna Carta, and other.

The.xij. day of March next folowyng Sir Edwarde the kinges ſonne that before was alſo ſworne to perfourme ſuche promiſes as the king had made before in the Parliament, was deliuered and ſet at libertie, and lykewiſe was Sir Henry the kinges ſonne of Almaine, the which had bene kept as pledges (as before you haue heard) about the ſpace of.xv. monethes & odde dayes vpon aſſurance made, that the ſayd Sir Edward ſhould dwell and abyde in the kinges Court, and not to depart from thence without licence of the king, and of a certeine of the Barons.

Then were many Inſtrumentes and Bondes made by the king and Sir Edward his ſonne for the performance of diuerſe and ſundry couenants made betwene the king & his Barons, which ſhortly after tooke ſmall effect.

Now ſhortly after, that is to ſay, betweene Eaſter and Whitſontide, for the ordering and maner of executyng of the aforeſayde ſtatutes made at Oxenforde, fell great diſſention betwene the Erles of Leyceſter and Glouceſter, ſo that wordes of diſpleaſure were vttered betwene them, the king and they alſo beyng then at Glouceſter. Then the king and his Barons had much to do to ſet them at quiet and reſt. And the ſame ſeaſon, the Barons of the fiue Diſſention among the Lordes.

Portes with their ships were vpon the sea, and robbed and spoyled all that they might take, for all was fish that came to the net, sparing neither English Merchauntes nor other. And the Bootie that they gate was no small thing. Of whiche as the common fame went, some of the Barons had no small share.

The Whitsontide folowyng, the king with the Erle of Leycester, and Sir Edward his sonne, with many other his Lordes beyng at Hereford in the Edge of Wales: the sayd Sir Edward secretly and without licence, departed from the Court, and went vnto Chester, where he called vnto him the Erle of Glouceſter, and the Lordes of the marches, the Erle of Wareyn, Sir Roger Mortimer, and other, and they fallyng into felowship, and ioynyng in a confederacie, went from thence vnto Glouceſter breaking the bridges as they went, to the entent that he were not folowed vntill he had assembled his power.

When knowledge of this came to the Erle of Leycester, he in all haste sent vnto Sir Simond his sonne that he should gather his knightes vnto him. The which according to that commaundement, assembled vnto him with much people, and with them drew toward Winchester, so that he came before the Citie the. xiiij. day of the Moneth of July, where he was shut out, for so much as the Citizens knewe not whether he came as the kinges friend or not. And also a little before, they had receyued a letter from Sir Edward, willyng them to kepe them out of the Citie, and to suffer them by no meanes to enter. For these causes the Citizens closed their Gates against the sayde Sir Symond and his company. But it was not long before the Citie yelded and gaue vp. Then they spoyled the towne, and slue the greatest part of the Iewes that were therein. And that done, they layde siege vnto the Castell, and assaulted it: But sodeynly a feyned newes was brought vnto them, saiyng that Sir Edward and his power was commyng euen at hande, wherefore they departed shortly thence, and went to Kenelworth.

And the last day of July Sir Edward and his hoste came vnto Kenelworth aforesayde, and fell sodeinly vpon the hoste of the aforenamed Sir Simond, and with sheddyng of little blood tooke there prisoners, the Erle of Orenford, William de Mount Canise, Adam de Newmarket, Sir Baldwyn Wake, and Hugh Neuile, with dyuerse other, and Sir Simond fled into the Castell and so escaped. Then the aforenamed Prisoners were sent to Glouceſter, and there put in safe kepyng.

In this meane tyme Sir Simond Erle of Leycester tooke his leaue of the king, which then from Herefordе passed the Ryuer of Seuerne, and so went vnto Worcester, and the Erle with great paine passed the Bridges before broken by Sir Edward, and so coasted the countries in gathering of the people as he went: so that at the length he had with him a strong power. And When Sir Edward heard therof, he made towards him so fast as he might. And the first day of August they met at Euisham in Worcestershire, where betwene them was foughten a cruell and bloody battayle, in the which was slaine the sayd Sir Simond the Erle, and Sir Henry his sonne and heyre, Sir Hugh le Spencer, Sir Peter de Mountford, and many other noble men that helde vpon the Barons partie. After which discomfiture, some malicious persons in despite of the Erle cut off his head and his preuy members, and and fastened them vpon either syde of his nose, and after made a present ther-of vnto the wyfe of Sir Roger Mortimer: his feete also and his handes were cut of from the body and sent to sundrie places, and the truncke of hys bodie buryed within the Church of Guilham.

Some after this victorie thus obtayned by Sir Edward, the king and he met with no small ioy and comforte to them both. And then by the authoritie of the king all the prisoners that before had bene taken, and imprisoned were delyuered and set at libertie, and manye other daylie accused and set in for them. And about the.viij. daye of September next following a Parliament or counsell was holden at Winchester, where by the authoritie of the same, all statutes and ordynaunces before made, by the Barons at Orenford in the.xlj. yere of the king, were vtterly fordone and set at naught. And all bondes and writings made by the king, or any other for the obseruing of the same, were cancelled and broken. Also at thys counsell was ordeyned, that all suche as had fauoured the Barons, being then in prison, or at large, should be disherited and then the king resumed into his handes all graunts before made and geuen to any person. And for Sir Symond Mountfort the sonne of the Erle that was slaine could not agree with the king at the Parliament, he was restored againe to the Castell of Kenelworth as he before was assured, the which he with Sir Henry de Hastyngs and other, kept and defended against the kings power, a long time after.

A Parliament at Winchester.

The statutes of Orenford againe condemned.

A straunge alteration.

After the Parliament ended the king came to Windsore wyth a great power, entending, as the fame went, to destroye the Citie of London, for the great wrath and displeasure that he had conceyued for the ayding of the Barons against hym. Of the which when the Maior and Aldermen were enformed, they were striken into a wonderfull feare: Although manye of the rude and rashe commoners were in full purpose to haue defended the Citie against the king: and thus among them were dyuerse and sundrie opinions, and no great maruaile, for at those dayes the Citie was inhabited with sundrie nations and people.

The king was greatly displeased with the citie of London.

At the last the sad and graue Citezens being called together by the Maior and his brethren to the Guyldhall, it was among them agreed & thought meete, to make a most humble supplication vnto the king, and to sende it by some religious person. Of the which they made diuers, and sent them by sundrie persons, but all auayled nothing. For the king was most greeuously incensed against the Citizens by some of hys Counsayle, so that he would not looke vpon, nor hearken vnto any of their suppplications. And if it fortuned any to moue the kings fauour towards the Citizens, he would so storme and geue vnto them such vnpleasant and wrathfull lookes, that no man durst once open his mouth vnto him for them.

Then the Citizens were counsayled by their Friends that they shoulde make a writing, and seale it with the common seale, and in the same they should offer themselues, and put them wholy in the kings grace and mercy, touching their liues and goodes. And at the last according to this counsayle, they deuised a writing, and sealed it with their common seale, and that done chose.viij. persons of the Citie, suche as had friendes in the Courte, and the vj. day of October sent them toward Windsore, and as they passed thorough Colbrook they met a knight of the kings, called Sir Roger Leyborne, the which which caused the sayde. viij. persons to turne againe vnto the Citie, and he accompanied them vntill he came almost at the Citie, and there departed from them, and roade vpon the backesyde of the towne vnto the tower. But at his departing he willed them to warne the Maior with certeine of the Citie to meete with him vpon the morow at Barkyng Church. And on the morow, when the Maior and the sayd Sir Roger met, the same Sir Roger after a long processe made, shewed and declared the kinges most grieuous displeasure agaynst the Citie, and also tolde them what meanes their friendes and louers had made to obteyne the kinges graces fauour for the Citie: But in the ende he concluded that there was no grace to be obteyned for them, except they would by their common seale, bynde themselues fully and wholy to stande at the kinges grace, and to put into his mercy their lyues and goodes: The which when the Maior and his brethren conferryng with sundrye other of the Citizens had well weyed and considered, and also beyng greatly afearde of the kinges wrath agaynst the Citie, for it was bruted that he woulde vtterlye destroy the same by fyre: Wherefore in the ende they graunted to all that Sir Roger had moued, and delyuered the aforesayde writyng vnto the aforesayde Roger, praiyng him to be a good meane and intercessor for them vnto the king. And the next day the sayd Sir Roger went vnto the Court, and returned againe the first day after, and willed the Maior and Aldermen to mete with him again at the foresaid Church. Where he shewed to them, that the king by great instance of their friendes, had receyued their writyng, and woulde first for the beginnyng and contentation of his mynde, that all the Chaynes that was in euery streete, and stoode at euerye Lanes ende, shoulde be losed from their Postes, and the Post also drawen out of the earth, and all they to be brought vnto the Tower of London: And that done, that the Maior with a certeine of Citizens, to the number of. xl. persons should the day folowyng be at Windsore to confirme the graunt of their writyng. And that they should go and come in safe and sure wise, he deliuered vnto them the kinges letter and seale, for the terme of foure dayes, which all was done accordyng to the former deuise, and the Maior with the aforesayde persons were ready on the morow which was Sunday, at Windsore by one of the clocke, and there tarryed vntill foure of the same day: At which tyme the king comming from his disport, entered the Castell without countenance or castyng of his eyen vpon the Londoners. And when the king and his people were entered the Castell, the Londoners woulde haue followed, but they were warned to abide without.

And immediately the king caused a Proclamation to be made, that no man of high or lowe degree, should by worde or deede shewe any displeasure vnto the Londoners. And in the euenyng came vnto them, the aforesayde sir Roger and sir Robert Waleys knightes, and brought them into the Castell, and said that the kings pleasure was not to speake with them that night. And afterwardes the sayde knightes deliuered them vnto the Constable of the Castell, which closed them all in a large Tower, where that night they had small cheere and worsse lodgyng.

The Maior and Aldermen locked vp in a tower in the Castell of Windsore.

The nexte day beyng Monday, towardes night they were taken out of that tower, and deliuered to the Bayly of the sayde Castell, and lodged by his assignement, except .v. persons, that is to say, Thomas fitz Thomas Maior, Wighell Highell Tony, Stephen Bukerell, Thomas Ptwellisdon, and John de Fleete. The which fiue persons the king had geuen to Sir Edwarde his sonne, at whose commaundement they remayned still in the sayde Tower long after, notwithstandyng the kinges safe conduite to them made as before is sayde. When tidinges hereof came to the Citie of London, albeit, that for feare many were before aduoyded, yet then a great manye mo gate them thence with spede into diuerse countries of England, and very many of them neuer returned.

The Maior of London & foure Aldermen geuen by the king to Prince Edwarde his sonne.

The first day of Nouember folowyng, the king came to Westminster. And shortly after he gaue vnto diuerse of his houshold seruauntes, more than lx. housholdes and houses within the Citie of London, so that the owners were compelled to agree and redeme their houses and housholde, with all goodes that in them were, or else to aduoyde and suffer such persons to enter as the sayde houses were geuen vnto, and not alonely that, but also such lands and Tenements, goodes and Cattelles, as the sayd Citizens had in any other places of England. And at that tyme the king made Custos and Gardian of the Citie, Sir Othon Constable of the Tower of London, which sir Othon chose to be Baylifes vnder him, and to be to him accomptable to the vse of the king, John Adrian, and Walter Henry Citizens of the same Citie.

Housholdes and houses geuen away in the Citie of London by the king to his seruants.

Sir Othon Constable of the Tower was made Custos of the City of London.

And after this, the king tooke pledges of the best mennes sonnes of the Citie, that his peace should be surely kept within the same. The which pledges were kept in the Tower of London, and there found at the cost of theyr parentes. And shortly after by great labour and sute made, all the aforesayde persones which were in the keepyng of the Baylife of Windsore Castell, foure onely except, that is to say, Richard Bonauenture, Simon de Hardistocke, William de Kent, & William de Gloucester, all the other Londoners. xxiiij. in number were deliuered and came to London the .xxj. of Nouember folowyng, and the other .ix. were kept still in the Tower of Windsore.

Nowe was dayly sute and labour made vnto the king to haue his gracious fauour, and to know his pleasure what fine he would haue of the Citye for their transgressions. For the which the king demaunded .xl. thousande pounde, and firmely helde him at fiftie thousand markes. But the Citizens alledged for them, that the poore Commoners (wherof many were aduoided) were the trespassours, and besydes that, the best men of the Citie were spoyled by those riotous persons, and by the Rouers also of the sea, as the Wardeynes of the fiue Portes, and other, so that in this troublesome tyme they lost the greatest part of their substaunce. For the which considerations, and many other, that were here to tedious to wryte, the Citizens besought the king of his most gracious clemency and fauour, and to take of them that they might beare.

This matter thus hangyng, the king vpon the first day of December departed from Westminster towarde Northhampton. And a little before hys departure, he ordeyned Sir John Linde knight, and maister John Waldren Clerke, to be Gardians of the Citie and Tower of London, the which were named in the kinges writyng Seneschalles, or stewardes of the City.

Stewardes or Seneschalles appointed to haue the rule of the Citye.

The next day after that the king was ridden as aforesayde, the aforenamed two Stewardes, sent for .xxiiij. of the most notable men of the Citie, and warned them to apere the next day folowyng before the Counsayle at Westminster:

minſter: Where at the tyme of their appearance was ſhewed vnto them by Sir Roger Leybozne, that the kinges minde was, that they ſhould haue the rule of the Citie in his abſence, vnder the afozeſayde Stewardes: and foz to ſee good rule to be kept within the Citie they ſhould be ſwozne there, befoze his counſayle. And there they were ſwozne, and ſo commaunded to returne againe into the Citie. But yet ceaſſed not meanes to be made, and continuall labour to the king foz his gracious fauour in the leuying of a mercifull fine, ſuch as the pooze Citizens might be able to beare. And in Chriſtmaſſe weeke at the laſt, the king at the prayer of ſuche friendes as the Citie made vnto him, graunted the Citie to be releaſed foz all maner of tranſgreſſions, and to haue their whole liberties reſtozed vnto them againe foz. xx. thouſand marke, thoſe perſons only except which the king had geuen to Sir Edward his ſonne, beyng, as is afozeſayde, at Wyndſoze. Foz the payment of which ſomme at the dayes agreed vpon, Sir Roger Leybozne, and mayſter Robert Warien Clerke, were aſſigned to take ſureties foz the ſame. After which aſſuraunce by them receyued, and ſent vnto the king at Nozthhampton, the king ſent immediately after vnto the Citizens a Charter vnder his bzoade ſeale, the tenoz whereof enſueth.

The liberties of the Citie againe reſtozed foz the ſumme of. xx. thouſande marke.

A Pardon graunted to the Citizens of London by the kyng.

HEnry by the grace of God, king of England, Lozde of Ireland, and Duke of Guyan: To all men health. Knowe ye that foz the fine of. xx. thouſande marke, the which our Citizens of London to vs made, foz the redemption of the tranſgreſſions and treſpaſſes to vs, to our Queene, to our noble bzother Richard king of Almaine, and to Edward our firſt begotten ſonne done, we remit and pardon foz vs and our heires, to the ſaid Citizens and their heires, aſmuch as in vs is, ſo that they haue and enioy all theyz fozmer grauntes and liberties, rentes and pzofites from the feaſt of Chriſtmaſſe laſt paſt: And alſo that the ſayde Citizens haue to them, all fozfeites of all malefactozs of the Citie, which in the perturbance befoze made, were endited, oz foz the ſame be yet to be endited: Except the goodes and Cattalles of them, of the which we haue geuen the bodies vnto our fozeſayd ſonne Edward, and except the rents and tenementes of all thoſe Citizens, which now be and ſhall be our eſchete, by reaſon of the afozeſaide tranſgreſſions. And that all pziſoners, which now remaine in pziſon, be frely delyuered, except thoſe perſonnes, whoſe bodyes we haue geuen to Edward our ſonne. And that the ſayd Citizens be as free, as they were befoze the ſayde tranſgreſſions in all partes and coaſtes of this our landes. In witneſſe whereof, we haue made theſe letters patentes. Witneſſe my ſelfe at Nozthhampton the tenth day of January, the. xlix. yere of our reigne.

¶ After the Citizens had receyued this pardon, then were all the pledges foz them, which were in the tower of London deliuered, and alſo foure of them that were in the Caſtell of Windſoze. Then alſo were diſcharged the afozenamed Stewardes, and the Citizens of themſelues choſe foz Maioz, William fitz Richard, and foz Shirifies, Thomas Delafozde, and Gregozy de Rokeſley. Then foz the leuying of this fine, were tared, aſwell couenant ſeruaunts as alſo houſholders, and many refuſed the liberties of the Citie, to be acquited of this charge.

While the king lay thus at Nozthhampton, Sir Simond de Mountfozte referred the iudgement of his cauſe vnto Octobonus the Legate, that befoze before was come into thys lande to reforme things in the Church of Englande, and also to set vnitie and rest betweene the king and his Lordes. To whose order and iudgement and to the king of Romaines the sayde Sir Symond did bynde himselfe to stande. Upon which promise and band, he was set at libertie, and was at large in the kings court, and did there awhile contynue, but at the last, when the king was come to London, he departed sodainely out of the courte, and roade to Winchelsey where he accompanied with the Rouers of the Sea, and (after some prises taken) departed from them and so sayled into Fraunce, and put himselfe in seruice with Lewes the French king.

And shortly after, the king besieged the Castell of Kenelworth with a great power. But Sir Henry Hastings with such as were within it, defended it so strongly, that the king and all his power might not winne it, of a long time, as after shall appere. Kenelworth Castell.

It was before declared that the Queene to helpe her Lorde the king against the Barons, before the battaile at Lewes, had caused an host of straūgers to be prepared to come into Englande. And the same time also she purchased a curse of the Pope, to accurse the Barons, and all their ayders and helpers, and had commissions directed to certaine Bishops of England to execute the same, as London, Winchester, and Chichester, the which for feare of the Barons denyed the doing thereof. Wherefore the Queene made new labour to the Pope, then Urban the thirde, and had it graunted, that the sayde Bishoppes for their disobedience shoulde be corrected. And for thys the aforesayde Legate Octobone, this yere at a counsell holden by him at Paules Church in London, suspended the sayde Bishops, and sent them to Rome to be assoyled of Clement the third.

And nowe was the Castell of Kenelworth yelded by appoyntment, which had bene besieged from the.xxiij. day of June, vnto the.xx. day of December folowyng, vpon condicion that Sir Henry Hastinges and all other that were with him in the sayde Castelle, should haue life and limme, and horse and harnesse, with all thinges within the Castell to them belongyng, and a certeine of leysure to cary away the same. 1265 50 Kenelworth Castel yelded

About this time also, the Wardeynes of the fiue portes were reconciled to the king, by fauour and helpe of Sir Edward the kinges sonne. And notwithstandyng the great harme that they had done by roauyng vpon the sea, as well to Englishe merchauntes, as to other, they had to them confirmed all their former priuileges. And moreouer there was graūted to them, that if any man English or other, would sue for restitutiō of goodes, by them before taken, or for the death of any of their friendes before slaine: that all such complayntes should be sued and shewed in their Courtes, and there to haue theyr matters determined, and not else where. But what the cause was of this end thus made betweene the king and them, it is not shewed: But the common fame at that day ranne, that the sayde Wardeynes of the fiue Portes, had at this day the dominion of the Sea: wherefore the king was faine to folowe their pleasures. The wardēs of the .v. portes are reconciled to the kyng.

In the former yere also, in the begynnyng of the moneth of May, the king helde his Parliament at Northhampton: In the which Parliament was confirmed vnto the Citie of London the olde fraunchises and liberties Parliament at Northhampton.

by the kinges progenitors graunted to the sayde Citie, with a newe graunt also for the shire of Middlesex. And in this Parliament were manye noble men disenherited, that before tooke part with the Barons. For the which cause they assembled together and robbed in dyuerse coastes of the land, and tooke the towne of Lincolne and spoyled it, and after raunsomed many of the riche Burgesses of the towne, and tooke the Isle of Ely, and strengthned it in such wyse, as they helde it a great while after.

A newe rebellion.

This yere fell a great controuersie betweene the rulers of the Citie of London, and the commons of the same, about the chosyng of the Maior. The Rulers named Alyn Souch: But the Commons (specially such as were of the meaner sort) cryed vpon Thomas fitz Thomas, who was then prisoner in the Castell of Windsore. Wherefore the Aldermen were compelled to call for the helpe of sir Roger Leyborne and other, who came to the Guyld hall, beyng harnessed vnder their gownes, and at the last were enforced to carye certeyne of the rascalles to the Counters and other Prisons, and then quietly they went to the election of the sayd Aleyn Souche.

Trouble about the election of the Maior of London.

The Gentlemen of whom ye heard before, that kept the Isle of Ely, did now breake out sundry tymes, and did much hurt in Norffolke and Suffolke and Cambridge shire, and toke the citie of Norwich, and after the spoylyng and sackyng thereof, caryed away with them many of the Citizens beyng riche, and raunsomed them at great summes of money, and lyued there in that Isle lyke vnto Outlawes. By these and other many hurtes in diuerse places of the land were done, and namely by Theues and persons of euill disposition: but what wickednesse so euer was done, the blame thereof was laid to the charge of these gentlemen. And at this time Octobone the Legate laboured vnto the king that the sayd disenherited gentlemen might purchase theyr landes againe of him by fine and raunsome. By whose labour, the king, at the last agreed that they should haue their landes againe by fynes of fyue yere value of their landes. As he that might dispende. xx. pound by the yere should pay an hundreth pound in fiue yeres, and of other after that rate, except sir Robert Ferrers Erle of Darby, Sir John de la Ware, and hym that stroke of the fist of the kinges pursuyuant, and some other persons that were of small countenaunce, should be fined by discretion of the kinges counsaile, but this tooke none effect.

The Citie of Norwiche spoyled.

Octobone the Popes Legate.

About this tyme was made the statute of weightes and measures, that is to say, that a sterlyng penny should waye. xxxij. graynes of wheate drie and round, and taken in the middes of the eare, and. xx. of those pence shoulde make an ounce, and. xij. ounces make a pound Troy: And. viij. pound Troy weight make a gallon of Wine, and. viij. wyne galons to make a London bushell, which is the. viij. part of a quarter. Also three barly Cornes dry and round should make an ynch, & xij. ynches a foote, & thre foote a yard, and fiue yards, halfe a perch, or poll, & xl. pol in length & thre in bredth an acre of land.

And these standardes of weight and measures were confirmed in the xv. yere of king Edward the thirde, and also in the tyme of Henry the first and of Edward the fourth, and lastly confirmed in the last yere of Henry the seuenth. But in the time of king Henry the first it was ordeyned that the same ounce should be deuided into. xxx. pence, and in the tyme of king Edward the fourth, into. xl. pence, and in the tyme of king Henry the eight into. xliij. pence:

pence: But the weight of the ounce Troy, and the measure of the foote continued alwayes one.

And about this tyme, of what occasion I knowe not, Sir Gilbert de Clare Erle of Glouceſter gathered out of the Marches of Wales a great and ſtrong power againſt the king, and with him alſo ioyned Sir John Eiuile, and other of the diſenherited company, and ſhortly after Chriſtmaſſe came with a great hoſt nere vnto London, Octobone the Popes Legate lying then in the Tower of London. 1267 52 A new rebellion made by Gilbert de Clare Erle of Glouceſter Aſſoone as the Maior and Aldermen of the Citie of London had knowledge of the Erles commyng, and that with a great power, and they themſelues not knowyng whether he came as the kinges friend or no: they ſhut the Gates againſt the forerynders: and at that tyme neyther was the king nor any of his counſaile in the Citie, nor nere thereunto. Wherefore the Maior and Aldermen went to the Legate, and required his counſaile whether they ſhould ſuffer the Erle to enter the Citie or not? And the Legate anſwered that he thought they might let him come in, for he knewe well that he was the kinges true ſubiect and friend. London againe vexed and in much trouble.

And immediately after this talke, a meſſenger came from the Erle to the Maior, willyng to haue licence to paſſe through the Citie into Southwarke, where he entended to lodge him and his people, which was graunted vnto him: and ſo the Erle paſſed through the Citie, and was lodged in Southwarke. To whome came ſhortly after by Southwarke ſyde ſir John Eiuile with a great companie.

The Maior at that tyme cauſed the Gate of the bridge to be ſhut, and cauſed a certein number of armed men to watch it, as wel by day as by night, and ſo did he all the Citie through. And ſodeinly the Legate and the Erle agreed ſo well together, that the Erle by his aduice was ſuffered, with a certeine of his people to be lodged within the Citie of Lõdon. By reaſon whereof he dayly drue more and more of his people into the Citie, ſo that at the laſt many thinges were ordered by him, and many of the Commons tooke hys part againſt the Maior and Aldermen.

And ſhortly after he gathered vnto him ſuch a courage and aucthoritie, that he tooke the keyes of the bridge, and of the Gates, from the officers of the Citie, and delyuered them to ſuch as pleaſed him, and receyued into the Citie many of the diſherited perſons, and gaue to them free libertie to paſſe the bridge by all houres of the day and night.

The Maior of this ſent worde to the king, who then was gatheryng of his power in Norffolke, and made haſtie ſpede towardes London. And in the meane while the Erle with his companie made Bulwarkes and Barbicanes betweene the Tower and the Citie, and caſt ditches and trenches in ſome places of the Citie, and fortefyed it wonderfully.

Then a great number of the ſober and graue Citizens feared a new Inſurrection, and therefore aduoyded the Citie as ſecretly as they might, whoſe goodes the Erle ſeaſed to his owne vſe, or ſuffered his men to ſpoyle them at their owne pleaſure. And now the rude Commons had quite forgotten theyr great and late affliction and puniſhment: and as men deſperate and without the feare of God, or obedience to their Prince, nor yet reſpectyng nor regardyng any thing at all their owne weales and ſtates, neyther the weales of their houſeholdes, as their wiues, children, or friendes, toke certeyne of the Aldermen and caſt them in priſon, and ſequeſtred their goodes, and ſpoyled a great part thereof. And in this their rage and fury, they ran to the Guild-hall, and there did choſe for their Maior or Cuſtos of the Citie, Sir Richard Culworth knight, and for Bailifes, Robert Lynton, and Roger Marſhall, and diſcharged the olde Maior and Shirifes. And after this, then went they vnto Newgate, Ludgate, and Creplegate, and all other priſons within the Citie, where they diſcharged and ſet at libertie all that were empriſoned for any matter touchyng the Barons warre before paſſed.

A ſhamefull ryot.

Nowe, the Legate beholdyng all this buſineſſe, and well conſideryng this rebellion and diſorde, repented him of his former counſaile geuen to the Maior: and for that he ſawe that he could not reforme the Erle of his error, he threatned him with the cenſures of the Church, and to accurſſe him as the diſenherited were. And forthwith he commaunded the deuine ſeruice, to be ſayde without note, and the Church dores to be ſhut in the tyme of the ſeruice doyng, and that no Bell were rong vnto the ſayde ſeruice: And all becauſe that the diſenherited which ſtood accurſed ſhoulde not enter into the Churches to here the deuine ſeruice.

And ſhortly after Eaſter the king came to him, three miles from London, and he himſelfe was lodged in the Abbey of White Monkes in Stratford: and ſone after the Legate came thether vnto him, and was lodged alſo in the ſame Abbey, where for ſtreightneſſe of lodging, his horſe & Mules were ſet in the Cloyſter of the ſame Abbey. Then the kinges hoſtes made dayly aſſaultes, and Gunnes and other ordinaunce were ſhot into the Citie, which did little or no hurte at all, the towne was ſo ſtrongly fortefyed.

I doe not thinke that theſe were ſuch Gunnes as we nowe vſe, but rather ſome pot Gunne, or ſome ſuch other inuention, for the Arte and making of Gunnes was not then inuented nor many yeres after.

And in this tyme the Legate on the one part, and the king of Romaynes on the other part, for alliaunce that was betweene him and the Erle of Glouceſter, and chiefely for the aduoyding of ſpillyng and ſheddyng of blood, laboured ſo to the king, that a reformation of peace was ſpoken of. And during the tyme of the entreatie, the Souldiours that lay in Southwarke, committed many robberyes in Southerey, and many other places, and roued ouer vnto Weſtminſter, and ſpoyled there the kinges Palace, and deuoured hys Wine, and brake the Glaſſe of the Windowes, and made a common ſpoyle of all that belonged to the ſayde Palayce, and they did the like alſo in ſundrie places of London. And of that company of Rouers there were foure taken that had the cogniſaunce of the Erle of Darby, whoſe handes the Erle cauſed to be cut off, and legges to be bound, and them to be put into a ſacke, and then to be caſt into the Thames and drowned. And about the .xj. day of June next folowyng, a peace betweene the king and the Erle of Glouceſter was concluded.

A iuſt puniſhment for Rebels.

And ſo ſoone as the former peace was concluded, the Erle remoued out the Citie, and was lodged againe in Southwarke: and the king entered the Citie the Sonday before Midſommer day. And forthwith the kinges Proclamation was made through the Citie of the peace betweene the king and the Erle. And afterwarde was graunted to the diſenherited perſons that they ſhould haue .xj. dayes after to ſhift for themſelues, that is to ſay, eyther to aduoyde vnto ſuch places, where they might be in ſome ſuretie, or elſe to agree to the former compoſition made by the Legate, and to pay the fift part of the stint of their landes, certeine persons excepted, as before is reherſed.

of

And as touchyng the Erle, and ſuch other as before were not diſchenhe-rited, and alſo the Citizens of London to be clerely pardoned and forgeuen.

And forthwith were reſtored to their offices Aleyn Sowche for Maior, and Thomas Baſyng, and Robert de Cornehill for Shrieſes, and the Al-dermen that before were deposed, were agayne reſtored to their wardes and offices.

And on the Wedneſday nexte followyng, the Legate enterdicted all the City of London: which endured from vj. of the clock in the morning vn-till thre of the clock the next day at after none, and then he diſcharged it, vpon the othe of two commoners which were ſworne in the name of all the Citie, that the Citie ſhoulde ſtande to the ordynance and iudgement of holy church. But another Chronycle ſayth, that this interdiction ſhould haue continued lenger, if the ſtoutneſſe of the Londoners had not beene, who helde the Le-gate ſo ſtreyte, that they inforced him to withdrawe that ſentence vpon the aforeſayde condition. London enterdicted.

Sone after, were all the Bullwarkes, Rampires and Barbicans that the Erle had made in and aboute the Citie pulled vp, and the diches filled, that no parte of them was ſene. Now were the Citizens enforced agayne to ſue for a newe pardon, and aunſwere was made vnto them, that as yet they had not recompenced the king of Romaines for the ſubuerſion of his manor of Thiſtlewoorth which they brent, and for the ſame he demaunded. vj. thou-ſand markes: So that at the laſt, with great labour and friendſhip, they a-greed to geue vnto hym for amendes a thouſande Markes to bee payde in two yeeres. A pardon a-gaine recone-red with more money.

And not long after the king receyued into his fauour Sir John Eliyle, Sir Nicholas de Segraue, Sir William Mermion, Sir Richarde Gray, Sir John Fitz John, and Sir Gilbert de Lucye with other. And agree-ment was alſo made betweene ſir Edwarde the kings ſonne and the afore-named Erle of Glouceſter. And then alſo were all the fortreſſes and other defences which were made in Southwarke during the time of the lying of the Erle of Glouceſters armie there, and all other places adioyning to the ſame, pulled downe & deſtroyed, and the Erle and al other ſouldiours cleane auoyded. And after all things were ſet in order and reſt, except ſuch as yet kept the Iſle of Ely: the king roade to Shrewesbury where he taried a ſea-ſon, for to common of matters betweene hym and Lewelyn or Lleuellen Prince of Wales.

The king thus being at Shrewesbury, a Writ was directed to Sir A-leyn Souche Maior of London, eyght dayes before Mighelmas from the king, charging him that the Citizens ſhoulde not proceede to the election of newe Shrieſes vntill his comming to London, but to ſuffer the olde to re-maine and ſtande ſtill in office.

This yere there happened a variance betwene the companies of Gold-ſmithes and Taylors of London, which grewe to making of partes. So that with the Goldſmithes the Felowſhip of tooke parte, and with the Taylers tooke parte the Steyners. And by this occaſion much people mightily gathered in the ſtreetes in harneſſe. And at length the ſayde parties met to the number of fyue hundreth, and they ranne together with ſuche vio-leuie, that diuers were slaine, and many wounded, whereupon an outcrie was made, so that the Shrieues with the helpe of other Citizens came vnto the ende of the fray, and tooke diuers of them, and sent them to sundrie prisons: and the morowe after such inquisition and searche was made, that the greatest part of the principalles and causers of this fray were taken, and put in ward. Then shortly after, Sessions were kept at Newgate by the Maior and Laurence de Broke Justice, and other, where at that tyme was arreigned of felony.xxx. of the sayde persons, whereof.xiij. were condemned and hanged. And for that one Godfray of Beuerley did helpe to arme one of the sayde persons, he was also cast among the other.

Execution.

The Lent next folowyng, the king beyng at Westminster, commaunded the Maior of London to present vnto him sixe persons, such as were able to be Shirifes. Of the which sixe so presented, the king chose two to be Shirifes, that is to say, William de Durham, and Walter Henry, and then caused them to be sworne, that they should gather the profites of the Citie, and to geue a true accompt for the same before the Barons of the Exchequer.

The king choseth the Shirifes of London.

And the.xxvj. day of July, the king discharged Sir Aleyn Sowche of the Mayraltie, and made Stephen Edworth Constable of the Tower, and Custos of the Citie of London. Of these rulers of the Citie, after the yere that Thomas fitz Thomas was Maior, are diuerse opinions. For after some writers, from that yere, which was the.xlviij. yere of the reigne of king Henry, vntill the.lviij. yere of his reigne, in the which yere John Adrian Draper was Maior, were all Custos and Gardians of the Citie of London.

And at this time, by the mediation of Sir Edward the kinges sonne all suche disenherited personnes as kept the Isle of Ely, were reconciled to the king, and all fortresses and defences by them there made, were plucked vp and destroyed.

And in the latter ende of this moneth of July, Octobone the Legate, after he had made many rules in the Church, not without great charge of dismes leuyed of the same, tooke his leaue of the king and roade towarde the sea syde, with great treasure, and so returned in processe of tyme to Rome. Where after Innocent the fift, in the yere of our Lorde a thousand two hundreth seuentie sixe, he was chosen and created Pope of Rome, and then named Adrian the fift, and dyed within fiftie dayes after his election.

At this tyme also, because many of the Citizens of London (for the great imposition and charge that they were set at, toward the fine of. xx. thousand marke aforenamed, with other charges) voyded the Citie, with their householdes and goodes, and inhabited themselues in diuerse places of the realme, thinkyng thereby to be acquited of the sayd rellyng or charge: The other of the sayde Citie which remayned, made instant sute and labour to the king, that all such as had for the sayd cause voyded their goodes out of the Citie, should be distreyned by the Shirife of that Shire where they then dwelled, and forced to paye all suche summes of money, as they before were selled at, which sute they obteyned of the king.

Citizens forced to flee the Citie.

And in the Moneth of September folowyng, the aforenamed fiue Citizens, which had remayned prisoners in the Tower of Windsore, as before is mencioned in the.xlviij. yere, made at this tyme their ende with Sir Edward the kinges sonne for great summes of money, and so were deliuered.

The fiue Citizens that before were imprisoned in Windsore, were now e againe deliuered.

In

In this season was a great and an extreme frost, and began at S. Andrewes day, and cõtinued vntill Candlemas following, & the Thames was so frosen, that men, horse, and cart went safely ouer betwene London and Westminster. But a little after the breaking vp of the sayd frost, there fell such an aboundance of raine, that the Thames rose so high, that the like thereof had not bene seene by any man then lyuyng. Whereof ensued much harme about London, for the Sellers by the Water syde were all drowned, and in them great plentie of Marchandise perished and was lost. 1269 54 A great frost.

And this yere the king gaue to Sir Edwarde his sonne the rule of the Citie of London, with all reuennes and profites to the same in any wise belongyng. After which gift, the sayd Sir Edward made Sir Hugh the sonne of Othon Constable of the Tower, and Custos of the Citie. The Citie of London geuẽ to prince Edward the kinges eldest sonne.

And the. ix. day of Aprill following, Sir Edmond the kinges other sonne (surnamed Crouchbacke) maryed at Westminster the daughter of the Erle of Aumarle: For solemnitie whereof, the king kept in the great Hall there an honourable feast the Sonday following. Edmonde Crouchbacke the kinges seconde sonne.

The last day of Aprill following, Sir Edwarde the kinges sonne, commaunded the Citizens of London to present vnto him fiue persons able to be Shirifes of London. Of the which he admitted to that office, William de Hadistoke, and Anketyll de Auerne, and sware them to be accomptantes as their predecessors were.

At these dayes a newe custome or toll was vsed to be payed by the Citizens of London vnto the king: Which toll Sir Edward had then letten to ferme to a Marchant straunger for. xx. marke a yere. Wherefore the Citizens not willyng to be vnder the rule of a straunger, made great sute vnto the sayd sir Edward, and lastly agreed with him to buy the same toll fee, for the summe of two hundreth marke. A newe toll tared vpon the Citizens.

And in the ende of this yere, the king had graunted vnto him towarde his voyage purposed into the holy land, the twentie penny of euery mannes substance moueable throughout his land of the lay fee: And of the spiritualty three disines to be leuied in three yeres. A great summ of money graunted to the king for his voyage toward Ierusalem.

And this yere the king of Romaines concluded a couenaunt with Sir Gilbert de Clare, Erle of Gloucester, for a voyage to be taken into the holye lande, by the sayde Erle for the king. For the which voyage, the sayde Erle should haue of the king towarde his charges, viij. thousand markes, and at the takyng of his shippyng other foure thousand markes, and to be ready by the first day of May next following: And if the Erle were not ready at the sea syde at that day with his company to take shippyng, he should then forfeite to the king two thousand markes. For suretie whereof, the sayde Erle should deliuer into the kinges possession his Castell of Henleger standyng vpon the Marches of Wales: But this came after to no purpose, but the cause why is not shewed. But that Journey was afterward performed by Sir Edward the kinges sonne, as after shall appere.

In this meane while, the Citizens of London so well pleased and contented Sir Edward the kinges sonnes minde, that he so laboured vnto the kinges grace for them, that he obteyned of the king their Charter in suche wise newely to be confirmed vnto them, that they should after their auncient liberties chose of themselues a Maior, and two Shirifes, and the sayde 1270 55 The charter and liberties of London againe newly graunted.

Shiriffes to haue the offices therevnto belongyng to farme. After which confirmation thus graunted and passed by the kinges broade seale: The Citizens vpon the.xiij. day of July next folowyng, assembled themselues at the Guildhall, and there did choose for their Maior John Adrian Draper, and for their Shiriffes, Walter Potter, and John Taylor. And within two daies next folowyng Sir Edward beyng present, they presented them to the king at Westminster, where they were admitted and sworne, and then was Sir Hugh of Othon discharged of the rule of the Citie.

Then the Citizens of their free will gaue vnto the king an hundreth marke, and to Sir Edward fiue hundreth marke, which gift the king well accepted. And sone after they receyued their Charter of confirmation bearyng date the.xxj. day of July and the.lv.yere of the reigne of the king.

Prince Edward taketh his voyage into the holy land for his father.

And by reason the former couenant and agreement that was made betweene the king and the Erle of Glouceſter tooke none effect, therefore Sir Edward tooke vpon him the kings Crosse: To whom the king gaue all the money that was graunted of the lay Fee, as before is shewed, and then he tooke shippyng at Douer the.xx. day of August, and so sayled to Burdeaux, with his wife accompanied with many noble personages.

And because Lewes king of Fraunce was gone before Sir Edwarde came, therefore he taried but a little while at Burdeaux, and after went with his foresayde companie toward the Citie of Thunys, where the French king was. But before he could come thether, the French king was deade, and a peace concluded betweene Philip his sonne, and the king of Thunys. Wherefore Sir Edward entendyng to greeue the enemyes of God, accompanyed with some knightes of Fraunce that entended the same, tooke their leaue of the French kyng, and of Sir Charles his vncle then kyng of Sicile, and sayled further into the holy land, and arryued at a Porte of Acris or Acon. For at that daye there was no mo Cities of the holy lande in the possession of the Christians but the cities of Acon and Tyre, with certeine Castels wherevnto the Christians fled often for succour against the Sarazens.

When Sir Edward was come to Acon, the Christian knyghtes receaued him with great honour and gladnesse, & lodged him in theyr best maner: where he taried by the space of a yere after, as saith the French Chronicle. And it was not long after that he came thether, but that the Souldane of Surrey came thether also (the which had wonne all the Countries there aboutes) with a great power of Sarazens, and assaulted the Citie strongly and fiercely: But Sir Edward with the ayde of Christen men, bare him so knightly and valyantly, that he defended both the Cities and the Castelles to the same belongyng, and the territories of the same, so that the Souldane for all his great multitude and power gate there little honour: Notwithstanding, he had in his host, as sayth the French Chronicle, aboue an hundreth thousand Sarazens. And the sayd Chronicle affirmeth moreouer, that Sir Edward in his pollicies, and manfull actes so honourably behaued himselfe, that he neuer did the like act all his lyfe folowyng, although he did afterward many honourable deedes, but yet none comparable to those that he did there: By reason whereof, his name among the Infidelles was had in memory many yeres after.

Of the honour of this martiall and valiaunt knight, I haue made the lenger lenger reherſall, bicauſe I finde the ſame wytneſſed of the Frenchmen, the which I knowe well, there muſt be ſome great and notable matter that moueth them when they wrote anye thing in the fauour and commendation of any Engliſh Prince, or of any thing done by the nation.

Then this noble Prince being thus in Acon, and daylie putting the Souldane and the Sarazens to ſhame and great dammages, they ſeyng that they might not preuayle againſt hym by ſtrength of battaile, caſt howe they might deſtroy him by treaſon, and ſent vnto him a Sarazen in the name of a Meſſenger, the which in tellyng of his feyned meſſage, wounded him with a knife enuenomed, of the which wound he laye long before he were thereof cured and healed. But after confeſſion made by the Sarazens of all hys compaſſed treaſon, he was put vnto moſt cruell death. Prince Edward wounded by a Sarazene.

About this time, the Steeple of S. Mary Bow Church in Cheape in London fell downe and ſlue both men, women, and childzen. Bow church ſteple fallen downe.

This yere the king helde his Parliament in Nouember at Weſtmynſter, in the which the Marchauntes of London and of other partes of the Realme, exhibited a Byll of complaint agaynſt the Counteſſe of Flaundyzs, for that ſhee had taken from them certayne goodes amountyng to a great ſumme. Upon which complaynt, the king ſent vnto her to make reſtitution: But becauſe ſhe made none, the king therefore commaunded, that all men which were borne in thoſe parts and now being reſiaunt in England, ſhould be arreſted, and they and their goodes to be put vnder ſure and ſafe keping. By occaſion whereof ſhe at the length ſent ouer Ambaſſadors, and beſought the king that his Merchaunts might vſe their entercourſe into Flaundyzs, as they before tyme had done, and all ſuche loſſes as before tyme they had ſuſteyned, ſhould be recompenſed. And ſhortly after an amitie and friendſhip betwene the king and hir was concluded. 1271 56 A parliament.

In the later ende of thys yere dyed Richard king of Almayne and Erle of Cornewall, brother to the king, and was buried at Hailes, an Abbey of white Monkes in Glocesterſhire, which before he had builded. Richard king of Almaine dyed.

And in thys yere the Monaſterie of the Trinitie in the City of Norwich, was conſumed with fyre, by reaſon of a fray made betweene the ſeruauntes of the Abbey, and certayne Citizens of the Cytie, which grewe to a great ſkirmiſh: For the Priour of the ſame, and others Monkes prouyded ſouldiours, and helde the Belfraye and the Church by force of armes, & threwe out ſtones and dartes, and ſhot many arrowes, by reaſon whereof, manye of the Towne were both wounded and ſlayne: which brought the commons and yong men into ſuch a furie and madneſſe, that they fyzed the Gates, and after forced the fyre with Reede and drie Wood, that the Church wyth the Bookes and all other ornaments of the ſame, and all houſes of office belonging to the ſame Abbey, were cleane brent and throwne downe, ſo that nothing was preſerued, except it were a little Chapell. Trinitie Abbay in Norwich brent.

When tydings of thys riot came to the kings knowledge, he was therewith greatly diſpleaſed and offended, ſo that he road thether in haſt, and there commaunded queſtes to be charged, both of knights and Squires that dwelled in the Countrie aboute, and to endite all ſuch perſons as were the occaſioners and doers of that deede. By reaſon of which enquirie, there were condemned and iudged, xxx. young men of the Towne, the which were after Execution.

drawne to the place of execution, and there hanged and brent, to the great discomfiture of the Citizens. For they thought that the Prior of the place was the occasioner of all that mischiefe, which was borne out and defended by the Bishop of Norwich, then named Roger.

Nowe approched the ende, that all flesshe is borne vnto, which is death, of the which nothing is more certeyne to all persons, though the day and houre is most vncerteine. At this tyme the king sickened, and forced to kepe his bed at Westminster, called before him Sir Gilbert Clare Erle of Gloucester: and caused him to be newely sworne to kepe the peace of the lande, to the behoofe of Edward his sonne, and then dyed the.xvj. day of Nouember, when he had reigned. lvj. yeres, and.xxvij. dayes, leauyng after him Sir Edward before named for his heyre, and Edmond Crouchbacke his sonnes, and is buryed at Westminster.

King Henry the third died

Edwarde the first.

King Edward the first.

EDward the first of that name, and sonne of king Henry the third, surnamed Longshanke, beyng of the age of. xxxb. yeres, began his reigne ouer Englande the. xvij. day of the moneth of Nouember, and in the yere of oure Lorde. M.CC. lxxij.

This Edward as before is shewed in the lb. yere of his fathers reigne, was in the holye land when his father dyed, and there did manye notable feates of warre as is aforesayd. And while he was so exercised, tidyngs was brought vnto him that his father was dead: wherefore in all hast, he sped him unto England, and came to London the seconde day of August, and was crowned at Westminster, with Alianor his wife sister vnto the king of Spaigne, the. xiiij. day of December folowyng of Robert Archebishop of Cauntorbury, which was in the beginnyng of the second yere of his reigne. At his Coronation were present the king of Scottes, and John Erle of Britein, with theyr wyues the kinges sisters which liued short while after. Mathew of Westminster.

The nexte day after his Coronation, the Scottishe king aforesayde dyd homage vnto him for the realme of Scotland.

In the beginnyng of the reigne of this king Edward the first, the busie Citizens of London attempted to haue made a Maior as they would, but they were by the discreter number preuented: Notwithstandyng in the yere folowyng their purpose tooke more effect.

As before is sayde in the moneth of August, the King came to London, where he was ioyfully receyued of the Citizens, and with all honour conueyed ueyed to Westminster, where he kept great obseruaunces for his father a certeyne of tyme after.

Nowe the lewde purpose which the yere passed was in the light Citizens, began to breake foorth: For where Philip le Taylor who before had beene chosen Maior of London, shoulde vpon the day of Simon and Jude haue bene placed in the Chayre of the Guyldhall as the maner is, dyuerse of the Citizens put him beside the Chayre, and put therein Walter Herup, that was Maior the yere before. By reason whereof, great rumor and grudge arose among the Citizens: the matter whereof was after brought before the king, who heeryng the reasons of both partes, forsomuche as he could not agree them, he put both the sayd Sir Walter, and the sayd Philip aside, and did choose Henry Frowike for Custos of the Citie, and so continued vntill Candelmasse next after. At which time by discrete & wise peaceable meanes, the aforenamed Sir Walter Haruie was set in auctoritie as Maior, and so continued the whole yere.

Vaine heades beget trouble

At this time Lewlyn, or Lluellen Prince of Wales rebelled, and king Edward after the solempnitie of his Coronation gathered a great power together, and went toward Wales, and subdued the sayd Lewlyn.

Lluellen Prince of Wales rebelled.

Lewlyn subdued.

The cause of this rebellion (saith Holinshed) was for that the same Lluellyn being desyrous to make a styre and businesse in England, and ioynyng in amitie with the French king, sent messengers to king Philip of Fraunce to desyre his good will that he might mary Ladie Alianor the daughter of Simon Mountfort Erle of Leycester, which then was a banished woman in Fraunce, as was her mother also, and Henry her brother. The which request of his the king graunted, and so sent the Damosell vnto him by her sayd brother Henry. The which Alianor with her brother were both taken by the English fleete, when they were approched nere vnto Wales about Bristow, and were brought vnto king Edward. Nowe when Prince Lluellen vnderstood this, he was so moued with the fact, that he streight wayes armed himselfe, and so makyng a roade into the marches of Englande, wasted and destroyed the Countrie as he went, and slue all that he met with. For repression of the which his outrage and fury, and to relieue his distressed subiects there, the king reysed a puyssaunt armie, and at the length, when the Prince sawe what daunger he was in, and how lyke he was to be discomfited, he submitted and yelded himselfe to his mercy, who vpon the sayd submission pardoned him, and with much ado deliuered him the sayd Ladie that was sent him (her virginitie remaynyng vnspotted) whome he shortly after maryed. But Mathew of Westminster sayth, that he gaue the king afore hand in the name of a fine for his transgression fiftie thousande markes, and bound himselfe to pay yerely in the kinges Exchequer, a thousand markes more. And sone after he returned and ordeyned certeine newe lawes for the wealth of the Realme, which are to long here to reherse. Among the which one was that Bakers makyng bread lacking the weight alligned, after the price of corne, should first be punished by losse of bread, and the second tyme by emprisonment, and lastly by the correction of the Pillory: And Mylners for stealyng of corne, to be punished by the Tomberell: And for the execution hereof, he gaue auctoritie, to all Maiors, Bailifes, and other officers through England, but specially to the Maior of London. He made a law also the same time against

1274 3

And this yere the king confirmed the liberties of the Citie of London, and graunted them some newe.

A parliament.

And at this time he helde his great Court of Parliament at Westminster, and summoned Lewlyn Prince of Wales to come to the same, the which presumptuously he denied. Wherefore then shortly after he entered againe into Wales, and so warred vpon the sayd Lewlyn, that he was constrayned to submit himselfe to the kinges graces mercie, and obteyned it with great difficultie, as is beforesayd.

Lewlyn Prince of Wales again reuolted and was subdued

After this king Edward builded the Castell of Flint, and strengthned the Castell of Rutland and other, with Englishe men, to kepe the Welshmen in due obedience, and so returned to London.

Walter Harup chosen Maior.

The aforenamed Walter Harup who after long controuersie and strife by him made and continued against the Aldermen of London, and in the first yere of the king was at a folkemote holden at Paules crosse chosen Maior of London, and continued out that whole yere to the great trouble and hurt of the Citie, and he was this yere accused of diuerse periuryes, and dedes done contrary to his othe. For the which, and for making of assemblyes of the Commons that fauoured him in his euill deedes, he was deprined of his Aldermanship and counsaile of the Citie for euer, and found suretie of xij. honest persons that he should be of good abearyng for kepyng of the kinges peace within the Citie, for terme of his life.

A folkemote.

Walter Harny deprined.

And this yere was the statute of Mortmayn first enacted, which is that no man should geue vnto the Church any landes or rentes, without a speciall lycence first obteyned of the king: which acte sithen that tyme is set out more largely, and diuers things added therevnto.

1276 5

In this tyme the king had in his court one Dauid brother vnto Lewlyn Prince of Wales, which Dauid did vnto the king suche pleasaunt seruice that the king bare him such loue and fauour that he gaue him the Lordship of Frodesham in Chesshire, but afterwarde, it did right well appere, that he was but a Trayterous spie to geue his brother Lewlin warning and knowledge, of all the kings will and minde.

1277 6

And thys yere Mighelmas Terme was kept at Shrowesburie, but at Hillarie Terme following, it was agayne remoued to Westmynster. In the which by reason of caryage and of great raynes that then did fall, the records were sore blemished and defaced.

1278 7

And in thys tyme a Parliament was holden at London, chiefely for the reformation of the kings coyne which then was sore clipped, by reason whereof, the same was much diminished and empayred.

The coyne sore clipped.

And in the time of thys Parliament, manye of the Iewes in London, and other places of the Realme were taken and put in prison for clypping of Money, and in December following, diuers enquestes were charged in London to enquire of the sayde Iewes and other that had so blemished the kings coyne. By the which enquestes the Iewes of the Citie, with diuers Goldsmithes that kept exchange of Siluer were endicted. And shortly after Candlemas, the Maior and Iustices of the lande, sat at London, where before fore them was cast CCIxxxviij. persons. Of the which were but three Englishemen, and all the reast were Jewes, and suche as came of Jewes borne in this Realme or elsewhere, who were all at sundrie places & tymes put to execution. A great execution of Jewes.

And this yere beganne the foundation of the black Fryers beside Ludgate and of Baynardes Castell. And the same yere also was the Towne of Boston in Lincolneshire, greatly blemished with fyre. Boston brent

And at thys tyme the king caused the halfpeny and farthing to be coyned of Siluer: where before, other coynes of mettall went among the people, to their great noyaunce. But the lack of theafforesayde coynes in these oure dayes are a great losse and hinderaunce to the pouertie of thys Realme. And in the winter of thys yere, there fell so great snow, that thereof ensued much harme. 1279 8 Halfe pence & farthings lack in Englande.

At thys tyme Dauid the brother of Lewlyn Prince of Wales (of whom before you haue heard) which dwelled in the kings court, to know the kings Counsayle, and thereof to informe hys brother: when he had that he wayted for, he secretly gate him into Wales to his brother, & prouoked him against the king in all that he might: and caused hym to victuall and man certaine Castelles within Wales, and specially the Castell of Swandon, wherein he much trusted, and gathered vnto him the Welshemen, by giftes and other meanes, so that he was verie strong. 1280 9 Dauid brother of Lewlyn fled into Wales.

Whereof, when the king was informed, he would therevnto geue no credite, vntill he had sent thether, and retreyued from thence the certaintie. But for so much as winter was then toward, he might not as then go thether with any power, and therefore he prouyded to sende men and victualles to strengthen the Castels of Flynt and Rutlande, and other holdes which he there had, and made prouision to warre vppon them in the beginning of the next spring.

But the king yet hearing more and more of the vnstedfastnesse of the welshemen, and to keepe them from the anoyeng of his holdes, sent thether the Erles of Northumberlande and Surrey with a lustie Crewe of souldiours, and with them went Sir Roger Cliffords, Sir Wylliam Lyndsey, Sir Richard Tanny, and many other knightes and Esquires. The which with great courage entered Wales, and made with the Welshmen manye skirmishes vntill at the last vpon Palme Sunday, Dauid with a great power of Welshmen, met with the sayde Lordes and knightes at a place neere to a Towne called Hauerden, where betwene them was a sore fight, but in the end the losse fell to the Englishmen, For there were slaine Sir Wylliam Lyndsey. Sir Richarde Tanny with manye other, and Sir Roger Clifford was taken. 1281 10 The king sendeth a power into Wales to tame the welshemen. The Englishmen ouerthrowe.

After the which ouerthrowe of the Englishe men, the sayd Dauid layde siege vnto the Castelles of Flint and Rutland. And his brother in that tyme warred and occupyed the landes of Sir Edmond Mortimer, and wan the towne called Llan matreuer, and threwe the walles thereof downe to the ground. This towne also is called Abriswith, or rather Oswistrey. It was not long after or the brute of the ouerthrowe of the Englishe men came vnto the towne, wherefore he sped him the faster thetherward.

Nowe, while king Edward was busyed in the rescuyng of his men that were 1282 11 were beſieged of Dauid, Sir Roger Cliffoꝛd with other, which entended to rayſe men to ſet vpon the Welſhemen, was dꝛowned by follie vpon a bꝛidge made of Barges & Plankes to haue paſſed a water betweene Snowdon and Ingleſey. And the thirde day of December next folowyng, was Lewlyn Pꝛince of Wales ſlaine by ſir Edmond Moꝛtimer and his compaine, and his head was ſent vnto the king then being at Rutland: The which he ſent vnto London, chargyng that it ſhould be ſet vpon the Tower of London.

About this tyme was Marton College in Oxfoꝛd founded by Maiſter Marton Biſhop of Rocheſter, and Loꝛd Chauncelloꝛ of England, who was dꝛowned paſſyng ouer the water of Rocheſter, hauing at that tyme no bꝛidge foꝛ people to paſſe ouer as it nowe hath.

The king continuyng ſtill in Wales, pꝛoſecuted Dauid the bꝛother of Lewlyn from towne to towne, ſo that at the laſt he was taken and bꝛought to the king, about Midſommer, and there kept in warde, vntill the king had ſped his buſineſſe. And then had the king the whole countrie at his will, and gaue vnto Engliſhe Loꝛdes, Townes in the middle of Wales, and deuyded the Countrie into ſhires, and oꝛdeined there Shiriffes & other officers in like maner as then was vſed in England, and as it is there nowe at this day. At Aberconowe he made a ſtrong Caſtell, where befoꝛe there was a houſe of white Monkes: The which he remoued from thence, & pꝛouided foꝛ them in another place called afterwardes Vale Royall. He alſo made then the Caſtel of Carnaruan, faſt by Snowdon hill, and repayꝛed againe the towne Llan Matreuer afoꝛeſayd, which Lewlyn had beaten downe. Alſo he garniſhed the Caſtelles and holdes ſtandyng vpon the ſea ſyde with Engliſhe men, and made the Engliſhemen Loꝛdes of the gꝛoundes belongyng to the ſame. And when the king had put the Countrie in good oꝛder, and all thinges were quieted, then about Michaelmaſſe he returned to Shꝛewesbury, where he helde a Parliament. In the tyme whereof the afoꝛeſayde Dauyd, as chiefe ſtyꝛer & beginner of all this warre, was there demed to be dꝛawen, hanged, and quartered, and ſo he was ſhoꝛtly after at the ſayde towne of Shꝛewesbury, and his head ſent to London, and ſet by the heade of his bꝛother Lewlyn, oꝛ Lluellen.

And this yere the king had his firſt ſonne boꝛne at the Caſtell of Carnaruan, while he was in Wales, and he was named Edward of Carnaruan, and was boꝛne vpon the .xxb. day of Apꝛill, and was king after him.

In this yere alſo, there was found one Lawrence Doket a Citizen of London, deade and hanged in Saint Mary Bow Church in Chepe. Foꝛ the which, enquiries were made, and in the ende foꝛ that dede were attainted theſe .vij. perſons folowyng, that is to ſay: Reignold of Lancaſter, Robert Pynnot, Paule of Stepinhithe, Thomas Coꝛdwayner, John Talanſon, Thomas Ruſſell, & Robert Scot, the which were all foꝛ that deede dꝛawne & hanged. And a woman alſo foꝛ the ſame deede was bꝛent. And Maiſe Crepyn, Jourdan Goodchepe, Gilbert Clerke, and Geoffrey Clerke, were alſo attainted foꝛ the ſame cauſe: But they were repꝛyued & ſent vnto the Tower of London, where they remayned long after, but at the laſt were deliuered.

Execution.

And in this yere the great Conduit in London, ſtanding againſt the church called Acres in Chepe was firſt begon to be made. And in this yere began a ſtrife oꝛ vnkindnes to kindle betweene the king, & the Erle of Leyceſter, oꝛ as ſome some write of Glouceſter, which after turned to the great trouble of manye townes in Englande, but ſpecially to the Citie of London, as after ſhall be ſhewed.

This yere the king ſeazed the liberties of the Citie, and diſcharged the Maior that then was, who was named Gregory Rokeſley, and appoynted Stephen Sandwich to be Cuſtos and Gardian of the Citie of London, and the ſame Sandwich continued in the office vntill Candlemas next folowing, and then was he diſcharged, and Sir John Breton knight charged for the reſt of the yere. 1284. 13. Liberties of London a-gaine ſeazed.

The cauſe of the diſpleaſure that the king had againſt the Citie, as appereth by John Raſtell, was that the ſayd Gregory Rokeſley tooke certaine bribes of the Bakers, and ſuffered them to ſell bread that lacked fire or ſeuen ounces in a penny loafe. But this appereth not to be a ſufficient cauſe, for the offence of the Maior beyng but one man, to take away the liberties of the whole Citie who offended not: Wherefore I thinke there was ſome greater cauſe.

And in this yere was full finiſhed and ended the newe worke of the Church of Weſtminſter, to the ende of the Quire, begon as before is ſhewed in the thirde yere of the thirde Henry: By which accompt, it ſhould appere that the ſayd Church was.lxvj.yeres in buildyng. But of the buildyng of this Church are ſundrie opinions, as ye may ſe more at large in Fabian.

This yere the king helde his Parliament at Weſtminſter, wherin were made the ſtatutes called Additamenta Gloceſtriæ, that is to ſay, additions of ſtatutes ioyned to them which before were made at Glouceſter. 1285. 14. Additamẽta Gloceſtriæ.

Alſo it happened aboute this tyme that a Citizen of London named Thomas Piwelſdon, which in the tyme of the Barons warre before mentioned, had bene a great ſtyrrer vp of the Commons of the Citie for to mainteine the Barons part againſt the king, was nowe newely accuſed, that he with other of euill diſpoſition ſhould make conuenticles and aſſemblies to the newe griefe and diſturbaunce of the Citie. Whereof report was made vnto the king, who remitted the inquirie thereof vnto Sir Raufe Sandwiche then Cuſtos of the Citie.

Then the ſayd Thomas with other were put in ſure and ſafe keping vntill the matter were duely enquired of. After whiche inquiſition made and found, report thereof was made vnto the king. Then the king ſent downe a writ, and commaunded it to be proclaymed ſhortly after within the boundes of the Citie, whereof the effect was thus: That the ſayde Thomas Piwelſdon, William de Heywood, Richard de Coundys, Richard le Cofferre, Robert de Darby, Albyn de Darby, William Mayo Mercer, and John Lyng Draper, with dyuerſe other to the number of fiftie perſons, ſhould be baniſhed out of the Citie for euer. And if any of the ſayde fiftie perſons were at that tyme of the Proclamation voyded the Citie for feare or otherwiſe, that they ſhould remain & not returne vnto the Citie vpon paine of loſyng his life. Citizens baniſhed for euer.

And in this tyme alſo, where of long tyme before the Marchant ſtraungers comming with their Marchaundiſe were lodged within Citizens of the Citie of London, and ſolde all their wares by the procurement of hys hoſte, for the which his ſayde hoſte had a certaine of euery pounde. But nowe the ſayde Marchauntes had ſo brought it to paſſe, that they might hier for themselues, houses to dwel in, and sellers for stowage of their wares, so that no Citizen had to doe with them: By meane wherof, they vsed many deceits, both in vtteraunce of false wares, and also in weightes which they vsed in their awne houses, to the great hurte of the whole Realme of Englande. Wherefore sodainely search was made, and their weightes founde and proued false. And besides that, all suche wares as they shoulde haue weyed at the kings Beame, they weighed much thereof at their awne houses, to the hinderaunce of the kinges Custome, for which offences against them proued, to the number of twentie of the sayde straungers were arrested, and sent to the Tower of London, and their weightes brent and consumed in West Cheape of London. But in the ende the sayde Marchauntes were deliuered by making of fine to the king of a thousande pounde, when of a long season they had suffred harde and vyle imprisonment.

Thys yere the commons of Englande offered vnto the king the fift part of their moueables to haue the Iewes clerely banished the realme of Englande: But the Iewes perceauing the intent of the commons, dyd preuent them, and gaue to the king great summes of money, but within fewe yeres after they were all exyled.

Great summes of money was offered to the king to banish all the Iewes out of England.

And in this yere about the beginning of May, the king sayled into France where he was most honorably receyued of Philip the French king, where king Edward did to him homage for the Duchye of Guyan. And after king Edwarde had remayned there a while, he returned vnto Burdeaux, whether came vnto him certaine Ambassadours from the king of Spaine, with the which he helde long dalyaunce. Wherefore, of the French king he was suspected that he shoulde alye himselfe with the king of Spayne agaynste the Frenche king.

King Edward did homage for the Duchie of Guyan.

And this yere (sayeth Fabian) the Sommer was so hote that men dyed with very heat. And yet Corne this yere was so plenteous that wheate was solde for three shyllings and foure pence a quarter. But sayeth Rastell in hys Chronicle, the next yere followyng, by reason of vnseasonable and intemperate weather, there was a maruellous great dearth of Corne, for (sayth he) wheate was then worth. xviij. pence the Bushell, and afterward yere by yere it encreased vntill it came to. xl. shyllings a quarter, which was a great price, because as he sayth, at that time. xx. pence of siluer weighed a full ounce, and it so continued vntill the reigne of king Henry the first, and then. xxx. pence made an ounce of Siluer. And in the tyme of king Edward the fourth. xl. pence made an ounce of siluer, and in the tyme of kyng Henry the. viij. three shillinges and eight pence made an ounce of siluer, and nowe at this tyme being in the tenth yere of the reigne of our souereigne Lady Quene Elizabeth, fyue shillinges maketh an ounce of siluer, but the standard of the ounce was euer at one stynt, although the valuation of coynes altered, as more plainely may appere in the statute made in the. ij. yere of king Henry the thirde.

This was a great dearth, if ye conferre the value of theyr money vnto our money that we now presently haue. The after the rate of. xl. s a quarter, they of our money payd. vj. pound that is, xv. s. for a bushell, & the no marueil though they poore cried out

Aboute this time fell a great variaunce betweene Sir Paine Tiptoft Wardein of certein Castelles in Wales, and a Welshe knight called sir Rice ap Mordack, or Meridock, so that sundrie skirmishes were foughten betwene them, and men slaine on both sydes, to the great disturbance of all the Countrie.

But in the yere folowing the sayde Rice to be reuenged of the aboue named med Tiptoft, reysed a great multitude of Welshemen, and brent and wasted diuerse townes in Wales, so that the king then beyng in Normandie sent vnto the Erle of Cornewall, then beyng the kings Lieutenant in England, that he should send thether an armie of knightes and good Souldiours to withstand the malice of the Welshe men. The which prepared shortly an armie, and went with them into the Borders of Northwales: where he with hys companie bare him so nobly and knightly, that in the ende the said Sir Rice was taken, and brought vnto Yorke, where he was after drawne, hanged, and quartered.

This yere and in the moneth of August, king Edward returned out of Fraunce, and came to the Citie of London, where he was honourably receyued by the Citizens, and conueyed to Westminster, where shortly after were brought vnto him many grieuous complaintes of diuerse of his Justices, as Sir Thomas Weyland, Adam Stretton, and other, whome the king caused to be streitly examined, and in the end they were found guiltie of such trespasses and causes as they were accused of. Wherefore some of them were outlawed, and lost such goodes as they had, and the other punished by long imprisonment, and at the last deliuered by paying of great fines.

And in the ende of this yere, Alexander king of Scottes, as he was running his horse, fell horse and man to the grounde and brake his necke, and died immediatly, by reason whereof there ensued great warre and trouble for the enheritance of that land. And at the last by the consent of king Edward, the crowne was geuen to John Bailioll, who afterward to gratifie the English nation, buylded a Colledge in Oxford nowe called Bailioll Colledge. But of this Bailioll, ye shall reade more in the. xxiiij. yere of thys kinges reigne.

And this yere also, all the Jewes were banished this land, for the which the Commons gaue to the king a fiftene.

Also at this time, Sir Gilbert de Clare Erle of Gloucester maried dame Johan daughter of king Edward. This was called Johan of Acres or Acon, for she was borne at Acres or Acon a Citie in Jewry when king Edwarde was there, vpon his great iourney. And shortly after, the Duke of Brabandes sonne, maryed Margaret the Sister of the sayde Johan.

This yere dyed Quene Alianor the kinges wife, & was buried at Westminster. This Gentelwoman as before is touched in the. xxviij. yere of king Henry ỳ third, was sister vnto the king of Spaine: by whom king Edward had foure sonnes, that is to say, John, Henry, Alphons, and Edward, which Edward succeded his father, for that the other three dyed before their father. Also he had by her fiue daughters. The first Alianor, who was maryed vnto William Barre. The seconde Johan of Acres, or of Acon, maryed vnto the Erle of Gloucester, the thirde Margaret, maryed to the Duke of Brabandes sonne, the fourth Mary, who was made a Nonne at Ambresbury, and the fift named Elizabeth, who was maryed vnto the Erle of Holland, and after his death she was maryed vnto Humfrey Bohetum Erle of Herfort. Polidore sayth that the king hauing continuall warres as well in France as also in Wales & Scotland had greatly consumed his treasure, & one Lord William Marchian, being then highe treasorer of Englande perceyuing the great ryches that then were in churches & religious houses, so put the same into the kings head, ỳ they were all brought into the kings treasury: but not without the great grudge and griefe of the people who thought much that the king would meddle with those holy things as they then called them. Howbeit the king being in neede, dissembled the matter, & yet not so content, did shortly after as shal appere obteyne of the spiritualtie the moytie of one yeres of their spirituall promocions and lyuings. Notwithstanding afterward the king considering their great burdens and entending somewhat to gratefie them againe, promised to graũt them something for to pleasure them if they would aske it at his hands. The bishops after consultation thereof had, did desyre to haue the law set at libertie, touching landes geuen in Mortmain to religious houses. But the king not minded that way, gaue them aunswere that it lay not in him to breake the lawes without the consent of the bodye of the realme by whome it was made, and so with fayre wordes put them off for that tyme.

1292 21 And nowe againe the king helde his high Court of Parliament at London, vnto the which came the king of Scottes and dyuers Lordes of that Prouynce. And after he had remayned there a certayne tyme, he was then conueyed by dyuers Lordes of thys Realme, a great way vpon his iourney toward his awne Countrie.

And here by the way for a note, it happened one called Richarde Bagle an officer of London to arest a man, and leadyng hys prisoner to the Compter, there came three men and rescued the sayde prisoner, and tooke him from the officer: The which were pursued and taken, and by iudgement & lawe then vsed, they were brought into west Cheape in London, and there had their right handes striken of by the wrestes.

1294 23 Now agayne the Welshemen beganne to sturre, by the prouocation of one Madock: wherof when the king was informed, he in all haste sped him vnto Westchester, and about the first day of December wanne from the sayde Madock the Isle called Anglesey, and buylded newe the Castle and Citie of Bew marise, and brought the vnstedfast welshmen to a better order and stay: and then he caused the woodes of the Countrie to be hewen downe, wherein before tyme they vsed to hyde them, as a Cony doth in his hole: and he so repayred the Castels and strong holdes, and buylded some newe, in such wise that he caused the welshmen to be quiet and to go about their awne thrift, against their willes, for by the strength of those Castelles, they were kept from their olde accustomed raynes and stealings, and put so to execution by the Capitaines of the saide Castels that they fell vnto occupation, and to byeng and sellyng, and gathered treasure together, and began to lyue after the manner of Englishmen, so that more and more that Countrey grewe vnto restfulnesse and peace.

The which Charles layde his ſiege vnto the Caſtell of Ryon, wherein were at that tyme, Sir John Seynt John, and John of Briteyn, the which manfully and valiauntly defended the aforeſayde Caſtell againſt the Frenchymen all that yere and more.

And beſides this he required alſo of the Clergie all the money which they had graunted towarde the defence of the holye lande, and the rather for that he hearde from the Court of Rome of the Popes maners, and therefore commaunded it to be brought into his treaſurie. And moreouer, by a conuocation of the ſayde Clergie, he had graunted vnto him towardes his warres, halfe of their ſpirituall and temporall lands, beginning at twentie Marke benefice, and ſo aſcending vpward, the which was not payde in one yere but by deuided porcions, it was payde in three yeres next enſuyng. Alſo about the time of Eaſter, when Charles de valoys as ye before haue heard, had lyen long at the Caſtell of Ryon, and had no hope to wynne anye thing vpon the Engliſhmen but that daylie he loſt the beſt of his knightes, he ſent then for more ayde and ſuccour. At which tyme came vnto hym Sir Raufe Nele Conſtable of Fraunce with a freſhe company, and then aſſaulted it a newe. But when they had lyen there a ſeaſon, and ſawe they preuayled nothing againſt their enemies, they went vnto a holde thereby named Boudeney, and aſſaulted it, becauſe the greateſt parte of the ſouldiours there were Normans: and after viij. dayes, by appointment or otherwiſe, they gate the ſayde holde, ſo that all the Engliſhmen had their libertie and goodes, and the Normanes were taken as priſoners, the which they brought after vnto the Caſtell of Ryon, and there in ſight of the Souldyours, hanged all or the more parte of the ſayde Normans. When the Gaſcoynes being within the Towne and Caſtell of Ryons, ſawe their coſyns and Countreymen hanged before their eyen, they caſt in their minde, that it was done by treaſon of Engliſhmen, and that they woulde at length deale with them in lyke maner. A briefe collection of the homages done by the Scottishe kinges vnto the kinges of England.

But here a little to returne back, ye haue before in the.xviij. yere of thys king heard, that after the death of Alexander king of Scottes, many questions fell among the same Scottes, who by right of inheritaunce shoulde be king of that lande, considering that the sayde Alexander, had left after hym three daughters the which in the lyfe of their father were maried. The first to Sir John Bayliol, the second to Robert le Bruze, and the thirde to one named Hastynges. Many of the Lordes of Scotland woulde haue crowned Sir John Bayliol, by reason that he maried the eldest daughter: But the friendes of Robert le Bruze withstoode it with all their power: And other there were, that helde with Hastings, so that after long strife and great variaunce the matter was brought before king Edwarde, as chiefe Lorde and Souereigne of that lande, and all those that made clayme to the Crowne of Scotlande promised to abyde and stande vnto suche determination & iudgement, as king Edward should set therein. Then king Edwarde, to the ende that the Scottes should knowe perfitely, that the king of Englande ought of right to be their chiefe head and souereigne, shewed vnto them suche olde writings, as he a little before had caused to be searched & founde out, in the which it was conteyned by the authoritie of olde Chronicles and writers, as Marianus the Scot, Wylliam of Malmesburie, Roger of Huntyngdon and other, that in the yere of our Lorde nine hundred and twentie, king Edward the elder made subiect vnto hym the kings of Combrys and of Scottes. And in the nine hundred xxj. yere the aforesayde Scottes and Combrys, chose the sayde Edwarde the elder to be their chiefe Lorde and patrone. And in the yere of our Lorde nine hundred. xxvj. Athelstane then king of England subdued Constantine then king of Scottes with the Northumbres, and receyued of them againe othe and homage. And it is further founde in the sayde Chronicles, that Edgar ouercame Alphunius the sonne of Kynadus king of Scottes, and receyued of hym fealtie and homage, and helde him vnder his obeysaunce, as he had done his father Kinadus before tyme. Moreouer it is there further witnessed, that Canutus in the. xvj. yere of his reigne subdued Malcolyn then king of Scottes, and receaued of him fealtie and homage. Furthermore, Wylliam Conquerour in the.vj. yere of his reigne subdued Malcolyne king of Scotlande, the which before tyme had receyued the sayde kingdome of the gift of Edward king and confessor. And Wylliam Rufus or Wylliam the Red, did in likewise to the sayde Malcolyn, and vnto his two sonnes that reigned in Scotlande the one after the other. And also Dauid king of Scottes did homage vnto Stephen then king of England. And Wylliam king of Scottes did homage vnto Henry the third at the time of his coronation, and after came vnto hys father Henry the seconde, when the aforenamed Henry was dead in Normandy and made his homage to him againe. This Henry that was sonne vnto Henry the second, is of many writers named Henry the thirde, bicause he was the thirde king that was crowned of that name: But because he dyed before his father, his deedes be little spoken of, so that of some writers he is nothing minded. And it followeth in the storie, how that Alexander king of Scots in the .xxxb. yere of Henry the thirde or sonne of king John, maryed at Yorke Margaret the daughter of the sayde Henry, and did vnto him homage for the Realme of Scotlande, and bounde him and hys heyres kings of Scotland by his letters patents to be true vnto the sayde Henry, and vnto his heyres kinges of Englande lyke as before William king of Scottes had bounde himselfe vnto the seconde Henry, as before in the.xxij. yere of his reigne is more manifestly shewed. And more, there was shewed vnto them the Popes Bulles, the which were sent before time into Scotlande, by authoritie whereof, the kinges of Scotlande were accursed because they woulde not be obedient to their Lordes kinges of Englande.

¶ When all these presidentes were seene by the Scottes, a day was assigned of meetyng at Norham in the marches betweene England and Scotland, whether vnto the king came, & al the nobles and chiefe rulers of Scotland. And there and then also the king helde his high Court of Parliament, where openly in the presence of all the nobilitie of Scotland who were called specially thether, the king himselfe in the Churche of Norham declared that the right of the Dominion and superiorite of the realme of Scotlande doth iustly apperteigne and belong vnto the Crowne of England, and therefore required of them to acknowledge and confesse the same, protestyng and makyng his vowe that he would defende the same his right with the aduenture of the losse of his life, and further he required of them that they would enter into bond, not onely to acknowledge him their chiefe and supreme Lorde, but also to abyde his sentence, order and iudgement, in appoyntyng and placyng such a person to reigne ouer them, as their king, as should by his iudgement be thought to haue most right therevnto: But the Scottes not willyng to be bound, vsed many excuses, but at the last they consented: Whereupon all the Nobilitie of Scotland, and namely all those that made claime to the crowne, entered into bond, the tenor whereof foloweth, beyng made letters patentes, wherevnto were fixed their seuerall seales.

TO all men that shall eyther see or heere these presentes, Florence Erle of Holland, Robert Bruse Lorde of Valley Androw, John Baylioll Lorde of Galloway, John Hastings Lorde of Aberganenny, John Comynes Lord of Badenagh, Patrike of Dunbarre Erle of March, John Uelly deputie for his father, Nicholas of Soules, William of Roos, sendeth gretyng in the Lord: Where as we beleue and thinke that we haue a right and title to the kingdome of Scotland, and our entent and meanyng is to declare, chalenge, and trie the same right and title before him which hath the superiour power, iurisdiction and authoritie to debate and examine the same: And the noble prince Lord Edward by the grace of God king of England hath informed vs by good and sufficient reasons, that the same belōgeth to him, & that he ought to haue the superiour dominion of the kingdome of Scotlande, and the authoritie to here, examine, and decyde our right and title. We of our awne proper accorde, not beyng compelled or enforced therevnto, will, and graunt to receyue our ryght and title before him as superior Lorde of the land. Moreouer we will and promise to obserue and holde his deede firme and stable: And that he shall haue and enioy the kingdome, to whome the better ryght and title shall before him be tryed and iudged. In witnesse whereof, we vnto these wrytynges haue put our Seales, dated at Norham the thirde day after the Ascention of our Lorde. 1291.

¶ Now after the Lordes of Scotland had acknowledged the superiority of Dominion of Scotland to apperteyne to the king of Englande, and had sub-

And fozthwith, they graunted vnto the kinges petition, and therevppon made their letters in French, and ſigned and ſealed the ſame in maner and fozme folowyng.

The letters of Seiſyn made by the Lozdes of Scotlande vnto king Edward.

TO all men that ſhall ſee oz heere theſe pzeſents, Flozence Erle of Holland, Robert Bzuce Lozde of Vally Andzow, John Bailioll Lozde of Galloway, John Haſtings Lozde of Aberganenny, John Compnes Lozde of Badenagh, Patrike of Dunbarre Erle of March, John Velly Deputie foz his father, Nicholas Sules, and William of Roos ſende gretyng in our Lozde: Fozaſmuch as we of our good will and common aſſent, without all compulſion haue yelded and graunted vnto the noble Pzince Lozde Edwarde, by the grace of God king of England, that he as the ſuperiour Lozde of the land of Scotlande hath power to heere, examine, and decyde our chalenges and ſutes which we entende to declare and pzoue foz the receyuyng of our ryght and title befoze him as the ſuperiour Lozd of the land: pzomiſyng mozeouer that we will obſerue firme and ſtable whatſoeuer he iudgeth oz determineth, and that he ſhall obteyne the kingdome of Scotland, whoſe title ſhall befoze him be pzoued and iudged to be moſt lawfull: But fozaſmuch as the ſaid king can neyther make noz accompliſhe his examination without iudgement, neyther ought iudgement to be without execution, noz can he duely make execution without the poſſeſſion and ſeiſyn of the ſayde lande and Caſtelles of the ſame: We therefoze will, permit, and graunt, that he as the ſuperioz Lozde ſhall haue foz the accompliſhyng and perfourmance of the pzemiſſes, the ſeiſyn of the whole land of Scotlande, and Caſtelles of the ſame, vntill ſuche tyme as the matter be determined betwene them, who make claime and chalenge the right to be king of Scotland: But yet vpon this condicion, that befoze the ſayde king Edward haue the ſeiſyn, he make good and ſufficient aſſuraunce vnto the ſutozs, wardeynes and communaltie of the kingdome of Scotland, foz the reſtitutiõ and redeliuerie to them of the kingdome, with all the royaltie, dignitie, and dominion, liberties, cuſtomes, rightes, lawes, vſes, poſſeſſions, and all what ſoeuer therevnto apperteine, in the ſame ſtate wherein they were at the time of ſeiſyn deliuered to hym: And he ſhall deliuer it vnto him to whome by right it ſhall be due, accozding to his royall iudgement: Sauyng vnto the king of England the homage of him that ſhal be king. And this reſtitution ſhall be made within two monethes after the tyme that this title ſhall be diſcuſſed, ratefied and eſtabliſhed: The reuenues of the afozeſayd land in the meane tyme ſhall be receyued and layd vp in ſafe cuſtodie, and ſhall be well kept by the handes of the treaſurer of Scotlande that nowe is, and his whom herevnto the king of England ſhal aſſigne, & this to be done vnder their ſeales, ſauyng a reaſonable ſuſtentation of the lande, Caſtelles, and miniſters of the kingdome. In witneſſe of all the pzemiſſes, we haue vnto theſe writynges put our ſeales, dated at Nozham the Wedneſday nert enſuyng the Aſcention of our Lozde. 1291.

And foorthwith, by the common assent of the nobilitie of Scotlande, the king had the season and possession of the whole realme of Scotland, and helde the same until suche time as he had determined who of right was the next heire to the sayde kingdome.

King Edward is seased of all Scotland.

The same yere the king of Englande, after the feast of the natiuitie of Saint Johu Baptist went into Scotland, and there receiued the allegations of those that made clayme to the kingdome of Scotlande, accordyng to the authority to him committed, and did cause to be elected and chosen. xl. persons that is to say, xx. of England, and. xx. of Scotland, which with good aduisement should consider vpon their allegations, and to make report vnto him of their sentence and iudgement, before the feast of Saint Mighell then next folowyng. And when the sayde feast came, after great and long debatyng, by the consent of them all, king Edward adiudged the kingdome of Scotland of right to apperteyne to John Baillioll, which came of the eldest daughter of Dauid king of Scottes. Robert de Bruce, betweene whome and the aforesayde John the strife did chiefely consist, although he had some colour of title, yet he discended of the second daughter of Dauid, and so his clayme tooke no place: Wherefore the aforesayd John Baillioll at the feast of Saint Andrew next folowyng, was with much honour brought vnto the Regall seate, and in the same was placed, and afterward crowned with great solempnitie in a Church of a house of Chanons in Scotland.

King Edward iudgeth ỹ kingdom of Scotland to John Baylioll.

After his coronation he came vnto the king of England, who then kept his feast of Christmasse at Newe Castell vpon Tyne, and there made his homage with these wordes.

John Baylioll doth homage to king Edward for the kingdom of Scotland.

I John Baillioll king of Scottes do knowledge me to be your liege man for all the kingdome of Scotland, and of all those thinges that in any wyse belong to the same, and that I holde the same kingdome, and of right I ought and clayme to holde the same of you, and of your heyres kinges of England with the aduenture of my lyfe and members, and of all earthly honour against all men that can liue and die.

And the kyng receyued his homage in forme aforesayde, addyng a sauyng for his awne and others rightes. And allone as the king had receyued this homage of John Baillioll aforesayd, he without any delay restored to the said John the whole kingdome of Scotland with all the appurtenances. &c.

Madock or Meridock taken and hanged.

And this yere was taken the aforenamed Madock or Meridock, which as ye heard before in the. xviij. yere of the reigne of this king caused ỹ welsh men to rebell, and he was drawen and hanged at London.

Edmond erle of Lancaster.

The king shortly after caused a great quantitie of wheate to be gathered and taken vp in England to the number (as some write) of an hundreth thousand quarters, and sent the same into Gascoyne and Guyan. And shortlye after he sent thether Sir Edmond hys brother Erle of Lancaster, Sir Henry Lacye Erle of Lyncoln and Sir Wyllyam Veyseye Baron, with diuers other Lordes and knightes, to strength such people as he there had readye while he prepared another armie against the Scottes.

Ye haue heard in the former yere howe Sir John Baylioll king of Scottes made othe and homage vnto king Edwarde for the kingdome of Scotlande.

Scotlande. Of the which he repented him shortly after by reason of the counsell of the Abbot of Menros, as sayeth Reynulph, although it shoulde seeme to be as well by the counsell of the French king, as maye appere by wordes that are written in the French Chronicle. But howsoeuer it was, full vntruely he forsooke his former othe and promise, and reysed warre against the king. Wherfore king Edward sped him thether with a great host, minding to haue made a generall spoyle and destruction of that nation, but that he was partly perswaded and steyed by some that made excuses for Baillioll, but chiefly for the people. Notwithstanding the king proceeding forth on his purposed iourney came to Newe Castle vppon Tyne, at the which place he caused John king of Scottes to be sommoned by a publique Edict that he should appeere and answere vnto such things as should be obiected against him at a daye and place prefixed: But Baillioll appered not nor none for him, and therefore the king determyned to proceede in his pretended purpose, and wyth good speede he passed to Berwick and layde siege vnto the Towne: But the Scottes defended it manfully, and bet the Englishmen backe, and brent some of the English Shippes. With the which victory, they were so inflamed with pride, that in derision of the king, they made certaine peeuishe and mocking rymes which I passe ouer.

The Scots rebell.

When king Edward heard of the pride of the Scottes and vnderstoode of their foolishe rymes, he was somewhat moued, and therfore so encouraged his knightes, that they gaue a newe onset on Barwicke, and wanne the Diche of the towne, and after in processe with great labor & daunger wanne the Bulwarkes, so that they came vnto the Gates and made there so strong an assault that in the ende they wanne the towne, and slue of the Scottes (as sayth dyuers writers) aboue the number of. xxv. thousande, and as Hector Boethus the Scot wryteth in his Chronicle in the. xiiij. Booke and seconde Chapiter, the slaughter of people was so great that a Mylle might haue bene well dryuen by the space of two dayes, with the streames of bloud that at that tyme ranne of the ground. If you thinke not this to be truth, I will not enforce you, but remember it is the tale of a Scot, who as he is to be suspected in this, so is the truth of his storie to be doubted of in a great number of places mo. And there were taken prisoners Sir Wylliam Douglas, Sir Symon de Frisell, the Erle Patrike and Sir Robert Bruze with diuers other. And in short time after, the wardeyn of the Castell of Berwike, perceyuing that to him was sent no succour, yeelded vp the sayde Castell by apointment. And when the king had possessiō of the Castell & Towne of Berwike he then strengthened them with Englishmen. And afterwarde wanne the holdes of Tyndall, of Erham, of Wyerbyrd and of Lamerstocke, with diuers other.

A great slaughter of Scottes.

Barwike wonne.

And while that king Edward was thus busied about the wynning of the afore sayde holdes, he sent Sir Hugh Spencer with Sir Hugh Percye and other noble men, with a parte of his hoste to laye siege vnto the Castell of Patrick of Dunbarre. Where when they had lyen a certaine tyme, an armie of the Scottes came thether to remoue the siege, with whome the Englishmen had a fierce and a cruell battayle, but in the ende, by the help of God, the Englishmen had the victorie, and slue of the Scottes aboue the number of twentie thousande, and lost of the English company a very small number, which as sayeth Caxton, Cowper and other, were but. xviij. persons.

Victory vpō the Scottes.

And

And after this victorie the towne and Castell of Dumbarre was wonne, in the which were taken prisoners three Erles, seauen Barons and.xxviij. knightes with diuers men of the clergie. Then the king went to Edenborough, and shortly after wanne the Towne and Castell: In which were founde the Regalyes of Scotland, that is to saye, the crowne with the scepter and the cloth of estate, the which after, were offered by king Edwarde at the Shrine of S. Edward in westmynster the xviij. day of June in the yere next following.

The Regalyes of Scotland taken.

And at this time the king being at Berwike and fortifying the same, the king of Scotlande writeth a letter vnto him and in the same resigneth hys homage and fealtie, the Copie of which letter followeth.

A letter sent from ỹ king of Scottes to the king of Englande, wherein the sayde king of Scottes resigneth his homage and fealtie.

TO the renowmed prince and Lorde, Edwarde by the grace of God king of England: John by the same grace king of Scotland sendeth greeting: where as you and they of your realme by violent power haue openly and very often inferred and done to vs and to the inhabitauntes of oure realme. greeuous, yea rather intollerable iniuries, contemptes, annoyaunces, and also innumerable losses and dammages, contrarie vnto the liberties of oure realme, and also against God and all iustice, whereof you are not, nor ought not to be ignorant by citying and sommonyng vs to appere out of our realme, and vnlawfully vexing vs, for euery small and light motion of your minde and pleasure, by entring vpon the Castelles, lands and possessions of vs and our subiects which are within our realme, without our demerites or desarts interceptyng our Marchaunts as well by Sea as by lande, by sleying and murthering other the inhabitaunts of our realme, by violent takyng and caryng our people out of our dominion, and there with you detenyng and imprisonyng of them. For reformation whereof, we haue often times sent our Imbassadors: But they as yet not onely remaine vnreformed, but also from daye to day more greeuous iniuries are by you and on your subiects behalfe exaggerated and heaped vp. For you now in cruell maner haue entered our marches with an innumerable multitude of armed men, hauyng gathered together a generall hoste to the entent to dishenerite vs and the inhabitantes of our realme, and thencefoorth proceeding into our kingdome, haue both by Sea and also by lande committed dyuers tymes murthers and brenned our Townes, and also haue made assaultes and violent inuasions: we not being hable any lenger to susteyne the sayde iniuries, contempts, griefes, dammages and fierce assaultes, (by reason of our Fealtie and homage to you done) to the doyng whereof we were enforced by violence and threatenings) we can neyther defende our selues nor oure kingdome, for the defence whereof we are bounde by othe: we therefore in our owne name, and in the names of all and singuler the inhabitaunts within our kingdome, doe by these presentes yeelde agayne vnto you and resygne all that our Fealtie and homage, as well of our selfe as of all other that inhabite within our kingdome, which are bounde to you eyther by force of their awne fealtie done for suche landes as they holde within our kingdome, or else generally for the homage which we haue done.

The resignatiō of homage and fealtie.

¶ The king when he had read hys letter did admit the resignation of the homage, and commaunded hys Chauncelour that the same should be enrolled and recorded for perpetuall memorie, and then passed on his iourney and

The Scottiſhe king prayeth for peace and mercie.

And while theſe things were in doyng, John Bailioll king of Scotlande ſawe that he was forſaken of all men, and that he had no power hable to reſiſt or withſtande the power of the king of Englande: wherefore he ſent his Imbaſſadors vnto him prayyng for peace and deſiryng mercy. To whom the king being mooued with pittie ſent a countermaund that the ſayde king John wyth his Nobles ſhould come with his meſſenger vnto hys Caſtell of Bruthyn within. xv. dayes next following, and there to treate. And the king of England ſent at that tyme as his Imbaſſador, Anthony Biſhop of Durelme with a full power & aucthoritie, vnto the which place the king of Scots with his Nobles came at the day prefixed, who after much controuerſie and debating of ſundrie caſes, did at the laſt ſimply and playnly ſubmit himſelfe vnto king Edward, and reſigned vnto hym the kingdome of Scotlande to be ordered and gouerned according to his will and pleaſure. And for the perfourmance of the ſayd ſubmiſſion, the king of Scottes delyuered his ſonne in hoſtage, and cauſed his letters of ſubmiſſion to be made in Frenche in forme following.

The ſubmiſſion of ỹ king of Scots to the king of England.

The king of Scottes reſigneth the crowne and kingdome of Scotland to King Edward.

IOhn by the grace of God king of Scotlande, to all whoſoeuer ſhall ſee or here theſe preſent letters: knowe ye that for as much as we by euill & falſe counſaile, and by our fooliſhe ſimplicitie haue moſt greeuouſly offended and prouoked our Lorde Edward by the grace of God king of Englande, Lorde of Irelande and Duke of Aquitayn in many things, that is to ſaye, that in the time that we remayned in his fealtie and homage, we ioyned our ſelues vnto the French king, who was then his enemy and yet is, onely for the concluſion of a mariage to haue bene procured betwene the daughter of the ſayde French king and our ſonne. And for the further griefe and offence made vnto our ſayde Lorde the king, we ioyned with the ſayde French king in armor againſt the ſayde king of Englande to the vttermoſt of oure power by order of warre and all other wayes of enemitie. And furthermore by our peruerſe counſail we defyed our ſayd Lord the king of England, and put our ſelfes out of his fealtie and homage, and ſent our men of warre into his lande of Englande burnyng and ſpoylyng the ſame, & caryeng from thence ſundrie prayes, and committed ſundrie murthers and other dammages. And the lande of Scotlande which is of his Fee, we mainteyned againſt him, plantyng and placyng men of warre in ſundrie Caſtels and Townes for the defence of the ſayde land againſt him, purpoſing to haue remoued him from his ſayde Fee, for the which treſpace our ſayd Lorde the king of England entred into Scotlande with his power, and the ſame conquered and poſſeſſed, notwithſtanding any thing that we were hable to doe againſt hym, as it was right lawfull for him to doe as the Lorde of the Fee, becauſe we did reſigne vnto hym our homage and rebelled againſt him: We therefore being againe reſtored to our full power, of our free wyll redelyuer vnto him the realme of Scotlande and all the people of the ſame with all the homages. And in wytneſſe hereof, theſe our letters we haue made patentes, dated at Bruthyn the. x. day of Julij in the fourth yere of our reigne.

¶ Shortly

¶ Shortly after this, king Edward called his Parliament at Berwick and thether came all the nobilitie of Scotlande, and there did vnto him fealtie and homage. And for a perpetuall remembrance thereof, they caused the same to be made by their letters patents sealed with their seuerall seales, the tenour whereof ensueth.

A parliament holden at Barwike.

TO all that shall here or see these letters, John Compnes Lorde of Bardenagh and so of euery one of the nobles and Lordes, greetyng: For as much as we are come to the fidelitie & pleasure of the most renoumed Prince and our dere Lorde Edwarde by the grace of God king of Englande, Lorde of Irelande and Duke of Aquyteyn, we doe promise for vs and our heyres, vnder paine of our bodies, Castels and all thyngs which we may haue, that we will serue him well and truely against all people which may lyue and dye, and at all tymes when we shall be required and forewarned by our aforesayd Lorde the king of Englande or his heyres: And that we shall not know anye dammage or harme vnto them, but that we shall withstande the same with our whole might and force, and geue knowledge therof vnto them: And for the performaunce hereof, we bynde vs and our heyres and all oure goodes. Furthermore, we haue both swome vpon the holy Euangelistes, and also afterwarde we all and euery of vs by hymselfe haue made homage vnto oure sayde Lorde the king of Englande in these wordes.

The king of England receyueth the homages of the Scottes.

I become your liege man of lyfe and members & earthly honor against all men that may lyue and dye. And the sayde Lorde our king receyued this homage in these wordes.

Homage.

We receyue the same for the landes of which you are now sealed, sauing our title or the title of other, and exceptyng the landes which John Baliioll in tymes past king of Scotland gaue vnto vs after that we had delyuered to him the kingdome of Scotlande, if paraduenture he hath geuen any.

Moreouer, we all and euerye of vs by himselfe hath made fealtie and loyaltie vnto our Lorde the king aforesayde in these wordes.

Fealtie.

I will be faithfull and loyall, and will obserue my fealtie and loyaltie to Edward king of Englande and his heyres, of lyfe and members and earthly honour against all men which may liue and die, and neuer for any will I beare armour nor be in counsaile or ayde agaynst hym or his heyres in anye thing that may happen, but will faythfully acknowledge and doe those seruices which doe apperteyne vnto the tenement that I clayme of hym, so God helpe me. &c. In witnesse of these things, the letters patents are made and sealed with our Seales, dated at Berwick the.xxiiij. yere of the reigne of of our Lorde king Edward of England. &c.

And at this time the king made John Warreyn Erle of Surrey and Sussex keeper of the Realme of Scotlande, and Sir Hugh Cressyngham high treasorer of the same Realme. And he made Mylliam Ermesby chiefe Justice of the same and commaunded him to call before him all such as helde landes of him, and to take of them homage and fealtie.

King Edward appointeth a keeper of the realme of Scotland.

And these things done, he sent John Baliioll king of Scotlande to the Tower of London, and assigned vnto him a conuenient family, and graunted him liberty to go. xx. Mile about in compasse. And shortly after he translated John Comines Erle of Bardenagh, & Alein of Lawghan out of Scotlande and sent them into England beyond Trent, commaundyng them vpon paine of their heds not to returne again into Scotland so long as he had warre with Fraunce. And soone after he returned into Englād with many prisoners.

But while these trauayles were taken in hande in Scotland, the Englishe men susteyned many harde and sharpe showers in Gascoygne and Guyan. Among the which, one is remembred in the French Chronicle, saiyng, that Edmond Duke of Lancaster dyed at Bayon, after whose death, while the towne and other strong holdes prepared them to withstand the French men, Robert Erle of Arthoys, which a little before had encountered with sir John Saint John, and had bene of him ouerset, reassembled his companie, and made him another skirmishe. In which he slue vpon an hundreth Englishe men and Gascoynes, and tooke prisoners the aforenamed Sir John Saint John, Sir William Mortimer, and other to the number of. lxx. the which were sent into Fraunce into diuerse prisons.

And soone after the king with a puissaunt army, sayled into Flaundyrs in the moneth of August, to ayde and helpe Guye then Erle of Flaundyrs against the French king, the which at that tyme was sore vexed by the French king, for he had wonne from him the towne of Marquet, and the Countrie thereabout. And for the more trouble and veration of the sayde Guye, the French king caused Robert Erle of Arthoys to inuade the Countrie of Flaūdyrs towarde Picardie, and encountered with the same Guye nere vnto a towne called Furnes. Where betwene the sayde two Erles was fought a sharpe battaile, so that many men were slaine vpon both partes. After which fight the Erle of Flaundyrs sped him toward Gaunt, where king Edward at that tyme was, and the Erle of Arthoys drewe him toward the French king, the whiche shortlye after was receyued into the towne of Bruges. In the which tyme and season, while the sayde two kinges lay thus at eyther towne, a meane of peace was treated of, and finally a peace was concluded betwene the two kinges, and betweene the French king and Guye Erle of Flaundyrs, vntill the feast of all Saintes then next ensuyng. And continued from that day vnto the feast of all Saintes then two yeres foloweyng. After which peace so stablished, king Edward departed from the towne of Gaunt and went vnto Burdeaux: And the French king returned into Fraunce, and prisoners were deliuered on both parties.

Now while king Edward was thus occupyed in Flaundyrs, the Scots by the enticement of the French king, to the entent to make king Edwarde to kepe home, and that he should not ayde the Erle of Flaundyrs, began to make warre vpon the kinges souldiours, which the king had left there in diuerse holdes. And also vpon the borders of Northumberlande, and made sharpe warre vpon the inhabiters of that Countrie. And for that Sir John Baylioll their king, was at that tyme prisoner in the Tower of London: Therefore the sayde Scottes made them a Capitaine, whome they named William Walys, a man of vnknowen or low birth, to whom they obeyed as vnto their king. Anon as the king heard of the rebellion of the Scots, which to him was no great wonder, considering their great vnstedfastnesse, he wrote his letters vnto sir Henry Percy Erle of Northumberland, to sir William Latimer, and to sir Hugh Cressyngham then treasurer of England, and to other, that they in all goodly haste should make prouision to withstand the Scottes. The which persons after the receipt of the kings letters, sped them all all in ſpedy maner, ſo that they entered Scotland ſhortly after, and compelled the Scottes to returne backe vnto a towne named Streuelyn, where in a ſkirmiſhe foughten betwene the Engliſhe men and the Scottes, ſir Hugh Creſſyngham aforenamed and dyuerſe other Engliſhe men were ſlaine. But yet the Scottes were holden ſo ſtreight of the Engliſhe hoſte, that after that ſkirmiſhe, they would not of a certeine tyme come in plaine fielde againe, but kept them within their Caſtelles and ſtrong holdes.

The Scots put the Engliſh men to the worſe.

And about this tyme certeine of London brake vp the Tonne in Cornehyll in London, and tooke out certeine priſoners from thence which ſir John Briteyn as cuſtos of the Citie had committed thether. By the which it maye appere, that there hath bene a priſon in the ſtreete of Cornehyll before tyme, which then was called the Tonne, as nowe we call them the Compters. For the which ryot, the ſayd perſons, that is to ſay Thomas Romaine, and viij. other, were afterwarde grieuouſly puniſhed, as firſt by impriſonment, and after by fynes.

This priſon was kept in the place that nowe the conduit in Cornehyll ſtandeth, for that was called the Tonne.

This yere king Edward in the moneth of October returned into England, and ſo to Wincheſter, where the Citizens of London made ſuch labour vnto his grace, that ſhortly after they obteined graunt of their liberties, which had bene kept from them by the ſpace of.xij. yeres and more, ſo that on ſaint Edwardes day next folowyng they choſe them a Maior, where by all the tyme aforeſayd their Cuſtos or Gardian was put in by the king, or by ſuch as the king would aſſigne: But it is to be thought that this was not redemed without ſummes of money, for as ſome write it coſt the Citie three thouſande markes.

The liberties of London again reſtored.

This yere alſo king Edward put out of his protection certeine Aliens that were richely beneficed in Englande: The cauſe was for that the ſayde Aliens would not ayde the king with their goodes, as the other of his lande did, but purchaſed an inhibition of Boniface the. viij. that they & their goodes ſhould be free from all the kinges diſmes and taſkes. Therefore the king ſeiſed the temporalties, and ſuffered them with their ſpiritualties, vntill they had agreed with the king.

And about this tyme there were a certeine number of perſons that fell to diggyng in London in the Church called ſaint Martynes le graund, for certeine treaſure that ſhould be there hidden. But they laboured in vaine, for there was nothing found.

And this yere the king prepared a ſtrong power againſt Scotland, and went himſelfe thether. And firſt appoynted his Lordes with three companies to mete with him at Yorke, whether came a great hoſte, the which he himſelfe led into Scotlande, and brent and ſpoyled the Countrie as he went, and tarried a while at Berwike. And from thence he ſped him in wynnyng of Caſtels and townes as he went, vntill he came to a towne called Faukirke, or Fankirke, where the. xxij. day of July met him the power of Scotland, and gaue vnto him a ſore battaile: But in the ende the victorie fell vnto the Engliſhe men, ſo that of the Scottes were ſlaine in the fielde as witneſſeth ſundrie Auctheurs. xxxij. thouſand, and of Engliſhe men but barely. xxvij. perſons. After which diſcomfiture, the Scottes yelded vnto the king the greateſt part of their ſtrong holdes and Caſtelles, that they before had holden againſt him, and made vnto him a newe othe and promiſe, and yelded themſelues vnto his Coynes of money condemned.

And when the king had set that Countrie in an order, he then returned into England, and so to London: Where by the aduice of certeine of his counsaile, he sodeinely condemned certein coynes of money called Pollards, Crocardes, and Rosaryes, and caused them to be brought to newe coynage, to his great aduauntage.

Ambassadors sent from the Pope to king Edward for the deliuery of John Baliol late king of Scottes.

The latter ende of this yere there were certeine Ambassadors sent from the Pope to the king of England, earnestly entreatyng the king for the deliuerie out of prison of John Baylioll late Scottishe king, which now was in the Tower of London, and they promised the king in the Popes name, that he should be safe from troublyng eyther of the king or of his realme, and that no perill should come by his deliueraunce. And after that the king had conferred with his counsayle, and considered of this the Popes request, he condiscended there vnto, and made deliuery of the sayd John Baylioll vnto the Popes messengers, and they conueyed him into Fraunce to his awne landes called Bayliolles landes, and there left him in safe keepyng, vnder the order and gouernement of certeine Prelates.

The Scots againe rebell and are subdued.

And yet againe the king heryng that the Scottes were not in quiet, but were as brag and as busie as before they had bene, therefore he made nowe his thirde voyage into Scotland, and did so Princely, and valiauntly, that within short time after his commyng thether, he subdued the greater part of the land. And forward he went to the Castell of Estriuelyn, wherein were many of the great Lordes of Scotland, and he compassed the Castell with a strong siege, but he lay there somewhat long without any great aduauntage or hurt done vnto the Scottes: Wherefore, of pollecie he caused to be made two payre of Gallowes in the sight of the Castell, and afterward commaunded proclamation to be made, that if the Scots by a certeine day would yelde that Castell vnto the king, they should haue lyfe and limme: and if not, but that he wanne it by strength, as many as were within the sayd Castell should be hanged vpon those Galowes, no estate nor person to be excepted.

Estriuelyn besieged.

Estriuelyn Castell is yelded to the king.

Nowe when the Scottes had aduised themselues well vpon this Proclamation, and considered the strength of their enemies & their awne weakenesse and feblenesse, and lack of succour, they assented to yelde them and their Castell vnto the king, which shortly they did: Whereof when king Edward was possessed, he stuffed the same with Englishe knightes, and after tooke a newe othe of the Lordes and Capitaynes, the which he found closed within that Castell, of true and faythfull allegeaunce, and then suffered them to go where they lyked.

William Walys flyeth from king Edward.

And when William Walys, which as before is sayde pretended the rule and gouernaunce of Scotland, heard tell that the strong Castell of Estriuelyn was yelded vnto king Edward, and that the Lordes and knightes therein founden (in whome he much trusted) were swoorne to the kinges allegeance, he feared sore least the sayde company would betray him, and bring him vnto the king: Wherefore he with his adherentes, withdrewe them into the Wastes, and other such places, where they thought them selues safe from pursuyng of the kinges host.

The Scots submit themselues vnto ỹ kings mercy.

Then the poore Commons of the lande presented them selues by great companies, and put them wholy in the kinges grace and mercye, so that the king king then thought that he was in peaceable poſſeſſion, or at the leaſt in a great ſuretie of the land. Wherefore, after he had cauſed to be ſworne vnto him the rulers of dyuers Boroughes, Cities and townes, with other officers of the lande, he returned vnto Barwike, and ſo vnto Englande, and laſtly to Weſtminſter.

And while the king was thus occupyed in Scotland, the Queene before mencioned, that is to ſay, the Lady Margaret ſiſter to the French king, was conueyed from Cauntorbury to London, and by the way there met her fyre hundreth Citizens in one Lyuery of red and white, with the cogniſaunce of dyuerſe miſteries brodered vpon their ſleues, and receyued hir foure miles without the Citie, and ſo conueyed her through the Citie, which then was richely hanged, vnto Weſtminſter, and there ſhe lodged.

A ſtraunge lawe.

When the king was returned out of Scotlande, he cauſed ſhortly after an inquiſition to be made through his lande, which afterwarde was called Troplebaſtone. This was made vpon all officers, as Maiors, Shirifes, Baylifes, Ercheters, and other officers that miſbehaued themſelues in their offices, or had vſed any extorcion or euill dealyng with the kinges people, otherwiſe then they might lawfully do by vertue of their offices. By reaſon of which inquiſition, many were accuſed, and redemed their offices by grieuous fynes to the kinges great profite and aduauntage. Other offences and forfeytures were ſought out alſo, as forfeytures agaynſt the Crowne, the which brought great ſummes of money into the kinges Coffers, toward the great charges of his warres that he ſuſteyned in Wales, Fraunce, and Scotland, as before is ſhewed.

Troplebaſtō.

And as ſayth Polydore, when king Edward returned out of Scotland into England, becauſe he would not leaue any monument or remembraunce of the former eſtate of their kinges, he cauſed therefore to be brought from thence a ſtone Chayre, in the which their kinges were wont to be crowned, and the ſame nowe remayneth in Weſtminſter Church.

And the ſayde tyme alſo the Lorde Chauncelor and Judges came from Yorke, where they had remayned and kept their termes by the ſpace of ſeuen yeres, and now came to London by the kinges commaundement.

It chaunced at this time that maiſter Langton then Biſhop of Cheſter, made a grieuous complaint to the king of Sir Edward his eldeſt ſonne, for that he with Piers of Gaueſtone and other wanton and wilde perſons, had broken the Parke of the ſayde biſhop, and riotouſly deſtroyed the game within it. With the which complaint the king was ſore agreued againſt his ſonne, and commaunded him to Priſon and the other his complices. And afterward when the king was fully and truely informed of the lewde and wanton diſpoſitions of the ſayd Piers Gaueſtone, he therefore baniſhed the ſayde Piers out of England for euer. But after the death of king Edward, this baniſhement continued not, for he was againe reſtored by his ſonne, whereof enſued much harme and trouble, aſwell to the king, as alſo to the Nobles and whole Realme.

The writer of the Scottishe Chronicle, namely Hector Boethus setteth foorth a great ouerthrowe that the Scottes gaue vnto the Englishmen in this yere, at Roslyng, where sayth he, there was not one Englishe man that escaped alyue, and he sayeth further, that the Englishmen came vpon them with the number of. xxx. thousand men deuyded into three seuerall battailes, and that the Scottes were in number but eyght thousand men, and yet they gaue the ouerthrow to all the three battailes, beginning with the first whom they vanquished, and then came the seconde and set freshe vpon them, whom also they ouerthrewe, and lastly came the thirde battayle lykewise freshe vpon them, and although the Scottes beyng so small a number, and were sore wearied with the fight and ouerthrow of the two former armies, yet espyeng the thirde to approche, they tooke their stomakes so couragiously vnto them and gaue them so fierce and sharpe an onset, that they ouerthrew them man and mothers sonne. But as sayeth the aforesayde Scot, this victorie lasted not long, for after king Edward heard of thys losse, he returned to Scotland and went thorough the land brennyng and spoylyng the same from the North to the South, and compelled all to sweare to him homage and fealtie and herein ye may beleue the Scot as ye thinke good. But this conquest seemeth to be the same that we spake of in the. xxvij. yere of thys kinges reigne. And thys yere the king helde his Parliament at Cauntorbury.

And within. xiiij. dayes after, a peace was taken betweene Scotlande and Englande vnto the conclusion whereof, at Myghelmas next followyng, the king then holdyng hys Parliament at Westmynster, thether came out of Scotlande, the Bishop of S. Andrewes Robert Bruze, Sir Symond de Frysell Erle of Dunbarre, Sir John of Cambrees Erle of Atleys, and Sir John Comyn with other, the which voluntarily were sworne, in the presence of the king and his Lordes, that they should be true vnto the king of Englande, and keepe the lande of Scotlande to hys vse, agaynst all other persons. And if any rebell or other malicious person disturbed the lande, or brake the kinges peace, they should cause him to be taken and sent vnto the king, with sundry other articles of their allegeaunce which they falsely brake and conspired to the contrarie and that foorthwith.

Robert le Bruze aboue mencioned returning into Scotlande, did contrary to his othe assemble the Lordes of that realme, and by the counsell of the Abbot of stone and other that fauored his vntruth, he sent vnto Clement the fift then Bishop of Rome for a dispensation of hys othe before made vnto king Edward, and surmised to him that king Edward vexed and greeued the Realme of Scotlande wrongfully: wherevpon the Pope wrote vnto king Edward his Letter, the summe and effect whereof ensueth.

The Scots againe rebell.

The Popes Letter written to king Edward.

THat Pope Boniface being informed and procured by the Scottes, sent his letters vnto the king of England, & therein did first alledge that the kingdome of Scotlande did belong vnto the right of the Church of Rome: And that that the king of Englande did chalenge the ſubiection thereof againſt God and right, and to the preiudice and harme of the Sea apoſtolike, & for proofe thereof, he allegeth theſe reaſons following.

1 Firſt, that whereas Henry the father of the king that nowe is, obteyned of Alexander king of Scots an ayde and aſſiſtence in his warre againſt Symon Mountfort. To the entent that the ſame ayde ſhould not be thought to be required or geuen by the right of any ſubiection or duetie: the ſame Henry by his letters patents did confeſſe and acknowledge that he receyued it not of duetie, but of ſpeciall fauour.

2 Alſo where as he being called vnto the coronation of the king that nowe is, by his letters that he as his friend might in ſo great ſolempnities exhibite and geue vnto him his friendly preſence. And ſo he came not of duetie, but of ſpeciall fauour.

3 Furthermore, where as the king of Scotlande came perſonally vnto the king of Englande to make fealtie vnto him for the landes of Tindale and Pembreth lyng within the realme of Englande, he made that fealtie onely for thoſe landes which lye in Englande, and not as king of Scottes, nor for the kingdome of Scotland: For he openly proteſted in the preſence of all the people that he ought not to make any fealtie vnto the king of England for the kingdome of Scotland.

4 Alſo that the aforeſaide king Alexander left behinde him a young mayde his heyre called Margaret nece vnto the king of England, the ſupreme dominion of which kingdome came not vnto her, but vnto certaine peeres of the kingdome of Scotlande elected therefore, and therefore ſhe ought not to doe homage vnto him.

5 Alſo the Pope reproued the king, for as much as he after the deceaſſe of the ſayde king Alexander ſubdued vnto him by force, the Scottes being then without a gouernour, and not hauing the helpe of any gyde to the preiudice and no ſmall greeuance of the Church of Rome.

6 Alſo he affirmed that when the ſea of Rome doth commit the office of a Legate to anye man to be executed within the Realme of Englande for the payment of Tithes or for any other lawfull cauſe, and this Legacy doth not by ſpeciall letters and priuileges of the ſea apoſtolike extend vnto the kingdome of Scotlande, that they ſhoulde reſiſt and withſtande the ſame, as it chaunced euidently in the time of Adrian: For the Legate was not by anye meanes admitted vnto the ſayde king of Scotlande, vntill the office of a Legate there was by ſpeciall letters apoſtolike committed vnto him.

7 Alſo that the ſame realme of Scotlande was conuerted vnto the vnitie of the Catholique fayth, by the reuerend reliques of Saint Peter the Apoſtle not without the giftes of heauenly grace.

8 Alſo that in auncient time the Archebiſhop of Yorke, when a queſtion was moued concerning the right of the Metropolitane againſt the prelates of Scotlande, coulde not obteyne ſentence with him.

¶ Theſe things thus alleged, the Pope admoniſhed the king by his letters to permit and ſuffer the Biſhops, Abbots, Clerkes and all other of the kingdome of Scotlande which he deteyned priſoners, freely to departe, and that he ſhould call home out of the ſayde kingdome of Scotlande his officers which he had appointed and ſet to the preiudice, iniurie and greeuous offence of the faythfull people and for the oppreſſion of the iuſt, whereby he ſhould be the more acceptable and beloued with God, and the better obteyne the fauour of the ſea apoſtolike. And if the king of Englande woulde allege that he had right or title to the kingdome of Scotland or to anye parte thereof, that then he ſhoulde ſende his procurators vnto the ſea apoſtolique and Ambaſſadors ſpecially appointed with the right lawes and miniments concerning that buſineſſe, and there he ſhould receyue a full performaunce of Iuſtice.

A parliament holden at Lyncoln.

When the king had read and well conſidered the aforeſayde letter, he then called together his parliament at Lyncolne, and ſhewed the ſame letter vnto his Lords, and after long conference had with them, it was agreed that the king ſhoulde write againe to the Pope in his awne name, concerning the right of his ſuperioritie of Scotlande: But for the latter parte of the ſame letter, that where the Pope would that the matter ſhould be brought in iudgment before him, that they deſyred that they might anſwere by their letter in their owne names: And ſoone after the king wrote his letter vnto the Pope as followeth.

The kinges Letter to the Pope.

THe moſt highe God knoweth it to be regeſtred in oure recordes, the ſtyle whereof may neuer be blotted out, that our predeceſſours and progenitors being kings of Englande haue reigned ouer the kingdome of Scotlande and all the kinges therof, and ouer their temporalties and other things thereunto annexed of long and auncient tyme heretofore, by the title of the ſuperiority and direct dominion, of the ſame: And haue receyued of the ſame kinges for the kingdome of Scotlande and of other the Nobles of whome them pleaſed loyall homage, and due othes of fidelitie. We continuyng the poſſeſſion of our ſayde title and dominion, haue likewiſe taken the ſame, as well of the king of Scotlande as of the Nobles of the ſame Realme. And oure progenitors haue had ſuche prerogatiue of right and dominion ouer the realme of Scotlande and the kinges of the ſame, that they beſtowed the ſame vpon their faythfull ſubiectes, remouing thence for iuſt cauſes ſuche as were their kinges. And ſo ordeyned and ſet in their place others to reigne: which things are without doubt to be well knowne and apparaunt to all. Although peraduenture it hath by falſe inſimuation otherwiſe beene certefied through the children of rebellion and enuiours of peace vnto your eares, from whoſe craftie and imagined faynings, that your holyneſſe would turne your eares we humbly doe beſeeche and craue with deuout affection your fatherly clemencie and excellencie. And for breuities ſake, paſſing ouer actes done in former tyme, that we may touche ſome for example. In the time of Hely the high Prieſt and of Samuell the prophet, there was a certaine noble man named Brute of the Troyan ſtocke, who poſſeſſed thys whole Realme, and named it after his awne name Briteyne, wherein were conteyned that parte which now is called Scotland and one other part that was called Camber, but now it is called Wales. &c. he proceedeth in his ſayde letter and proueth that England and Scotland is but one Monarchy, and ſo diſcendeth in hys proues from Prince to Prince vntill he come to king Edward named the elder, who was the ſonne of king Alured and ſo ſucceſſiuely vnto Edward the confeſſor and Wylliam the conquerour, and laſt vnto king Henry the thirde this kings father. And at the length hauing declared that the title of the ſuperiour dominion of Scotland was due vnto his father king

Henry

Henry the third & ſo conſequently to hym, he concludeth thus, ſayeng. Where therfore we doe know our ſelues in full poſſeſſion of the ſame Realme by the title of a full dominion, we neyther can nor ought but repreſſe the inſolencie of our ſubiectes and rebels, and if we finde any, and that in ſuch maner as it ſhall ſeeme good by our kingly preheminence. And becauſe by the premiſſes and other it doth euidently appere and is manifeſtly knowne, that the ſayde kingdome of Scotland, as well by reaſon of poſſeſſion as of propertie doth appertaine vnto vs by full right, nor that we haue done nor prouyded anye thing by worde or deede (as we could not) by which anye thing ought to be withdrawne of the ſame right and poſſeſſion aforeſayde: we humbly beſeech your holyneſſe, the premiſſes being with good meditation conſidered, that you wyll vouchſafe to withdrawe your motion of minde, and not to geue credite in thys behalfe vnto the euill wyllers of the contrarie ſide, but alſo that you would if it pleaſe you with meere affection commend and ſet foorth oure ſtate together with our kingly rightes aforeſayde, and thus. &c.

And immediately the Lordes alſo did vvrite theyr letter vnto the Pope, the tenor vvhereof enſueth.

The letters of the nobles of England written to the Pope.

OUr holy mother the Church of Rome, by whoſe miniſterie the Catholike fayth doth with ſuch perfection in her actes proceede (as we do firmely beleue and holde) that ſhe will be preiudiciall to none: But will mainteyne and preſerue the right and title of euery man inuiolate. In a generall Parliament ſommoned at Lincolne by our moſt excellent and ſouereigne Lorde Edward, by the grace of God king of England, he our ſayd ſouereigne Lord cauſed certeine letters Apoſtolike to be brought foorth, and ſeriouſly to be expounded to vs, which he had receyued from your fatherhood concernyng certein buſineſſe and affayres touchyng the ſtate & condicion of this our realme. The which letters beyng heard, and diligently conſidered, we perceiued therin to be conteyned thinges both merueylous and ſtraunge vnto vs, which before this time was neuer heard of. For we are certeine (moſt holy father) and in our parties it is well knowen, as alſo to many others it remayneth not obſcure, that euer ſithence the firſt inſtitution of the kingdome of England, the kinges thereof, aſwell in the tyme of Britons, as of the Engliſh men, haue had in their poſſeſſion the right, title, and dominion of Scotland, or elſe haue bene the chiefe Lordes in the ſuperioritie both of the right and direct dominion of the ſayde kingdome of Scotland at all tymes continually, and that the ſayd kingdome in temporal matters hath not at any time perteyned, or by any right now doth apperteyne vnto the Church aboueſayde. And moreouer the ſame kingdome of Scotland hath vnto the progenitors of our ſayde king beyng kynges of Englande, and vnto him alſo of auncient tyme remayned feodarie: Neither hath the king of Scottes and kingdome of Scotlande beene ſubiect to any other then to the kings of England. Neyther haue the kinges of England concernyng the right and title to the kingdome aforeſayd, or other the perceiles thereof, aunſwered, or were bound to aunſwere before any iudge ſpirituall or tempoall by reaſon of the preheminence of their eſtate or kingly dignitie at al times inuiolately ſerued and kept. Wherfore hauing treated and diligently deliberated vpon the contents of your letters, the vniuerſal aſſent and conſent of all and euery of vs, hath bene, is, and Godwillyng hereafter moſt firmely ſhall be, that our foreſaid ſouereigne Lorde the king ſhall

in no wise aunswere in iudgement before you, concernyng the right and title to the kingdome of Scotland or other the perceiles thereof, nor shall by any meanes submit himselfe to iudgement, nor shall bring his forsayde right and title in doubt, neither shal he send any procurators or Ambassadors vnto your presence in this behalfe, especially forasmuch as the premisses would manifestly tend vnto the dissherison of the title & right of the crowne of this realme of Englande, and kingly dignity, and to the notorious subuersion of the state therof, and also to the preiudice of the liberties, customes & lawes of our forefathers: vnto the obseruation and defence wherof, we are obliged and bound by our othe, the which also we will defende and maintayne with our whole might and power, God Willyng. Neither do we permit, or in any wise will permit (as neyther we may nor ought) our forsayde souereigne Lorde the king, yea, although he were willyng to do, or by any meanes to attempt the premisses, beyng thinges vnaccustomed, vnlawfull, preiudiciall and at no time before euer heard of. Wherefore we do reuerently and humbly beseech your holinesse, that you will more benignly suffer and permit our forsayde souereigne Lord the king (who among other princes of the worlde doth shewe himselfe most Catholyke and deuoute vnto the Church of Rome) quietly to enioy and possesse his aforesayde right, title, liberties, customes and lawes inuiolably without diminucion or disquiet. And vnto this letter, were fixed of the Nobles and Lordes of the Realme (as sayth my record) more than an hundreth of the seuerall seales of their armes.

King Edward againe entreth into Scotland with a great armie.

¶ And in the ende of this yere, the king keepyng his feast of Christmasse in the North partes, did so soone as the feast was ended prepare an armye against the Scottes: and his sonne Edward Prince of Wales likewise folowyng him with a great host of warlike men, and entered Scotland, and passed through a great part of the same, but found not one Scot that resisted.

At this time also the French king, whose sister beyng called the Ladie Margaret, which the king of England did shortly after marry as shal appere, sent the Abbot of Compeyn and certeine other Ambassadors vnto the king of England, desyryng him to haue peace with the Scottes callyng them hys friendes, which notwithstandyng receyued a short aunswere and so returned in vayne.

King Edward callyng to his remembraunce that the tyme of the truce lately taken betwene him and the French king was almost expired, called his priuy Counsaile vnto him at Westminster sone after the feast of Christmasse, and agreed and sent very noble and honorable Ambassadors vnto the French king, prayng him to declare and shewe his minde whether he had aduisedly determined to haue, truce, warre, or peace: To the which the French king aunswered, that without the presence of the. xij. peeres he could not deale in so weightie a matter, and also that the same Peeres were then occupyed in the prouision of newe warre: But he sayd that within. xv. dayes he loked for their commyng. Which tyme beyng come, and they meetyng together, sayde that they would not meddle in the matter without the aduice of the Scottes. And so soone as the Englishe Ambassadours heard this, they returned into England.

A parliament holden at Westminster.

And shortly after king Edward called his Parliament at Westminster, and there declared the delayes and craftie dealyngs of the French king: But in the meane time the French king sent his Ambassadors to the king of England. And after a litle conference, it was agreed that both the kinges should mete together in a place conuenient betweene Flaundyrs and Picardie, and that then they would intreat and conclude of a friendly and continuall peace: Which meetyng was done with speede, and the sayde peace concluded vpon sondrie conditions, and among other this was one, that king Edward should take vnto wife Margaret, the sister of Philip le Beawe the Frenche king, and with her was deliuered in peaceable maner the Countie of Gascoyne with all rightes and liberties, in as large maner as the king helde the same in the begynnyng of his warres: The which Margaret while the king was in Scotland was brought vnto Doner, and so vnto Cauntorbury, where the king maried her in the Month of September, & had by her in proces of tyme two sonnes, named Thomas and Edmond, and a daughter named Margaret. The first of the sonnes was named Thomas of Brotherton, and the second Edmond of Woodstocke.

in

A peace concluded with the French king.

And in the meane while that this matter was thus complayned vpō to the Pope, the sayd Robert le Bruze made all the labor he might vnto the Lordes of Scotland to be admitted for king of that Region, so ỹ vpon the. viij. day of December, a great assembly of the Lords was made at the Abbey of Stone. And the next day folowyng, by the meanes of the Abbot of that place, many of the sayde Lords assented vnto the will of the sayde Robert, except Sir John Comyn onely. The which in defence of his truth and othe before sworne vnto king Edwarde made many reasons and excuses, but finally sayde that he would not falsefie his othe for no man. And for this cause Robert le Bruce bare vnto Sir John Comyn a great stomacke, and so did many other of the Nobles. But he helde his opinion so firmely and stoutly, that other began to take his part, so that in the counsayle arose such varietie of opinions, that the sayd counsayle was dissolued, and anewe assembled at the Gray Friers of Dunfrise, at Candlemasse next folowyng. At which day of assembly, when the cause of their meetyng was by Robert Bruce published and declared, and many of the great Lordes had graunted vnto him their ayde and assistance: But the aforenamed Sir John Comyn and other sate still and sayd nothing. Which Robert le Bruze marked well, and to him sayde: And you Sir John I trust for the defence and weale of this realme, will not be behinde. Whereunto he answered: Sir I would that you and all my Lordes here present knewe well, that for the weale, defence, and in the right of this land, I will stand with it to the vttermost of my power: But for that I see, ye rather entend the subuersion then the weale thereof, I geue you therefore knowledge I will neyther ayde you with counsaile, nor yet with strength: And some other also were present which allowed very well the graue saiyng and answere of Sir John Comyn. But Robert le Bruze was so amoued therewithall, that when Sir John Comyn, and Sir Roger his brother was departed from the counsaile, and was come into the Church of the Friers, Robert le Bruze folowed him, and wounded him to death with his sworde, and when his brother would haue defended him, he slue him also. After which murder litle or no resistaunce was made against the vntrue meanyng and dedes of the sayde Robert le Bruze, so that he at Saint Johns towne was crowned king shortly after.

Robert le Bruze laboreth ỹ lordes to make him kinge of Scotland.

King Edwarde once agayne goeth with a great power to subdue ȳ Scots.

Assoone as king Edward was admonished of the murther of sir Iohn Comyn, and that he had also well considered the continuall vntrouth of the Scottes, he forthwith made prouision and gathered a great power together to enter into Scotland. And hauyng, and holdyng at that time beyng Whitsontide a great feast of his Baronnie at Westminster, and duryng the time of the same feast, he made aboue two hundreth knightes. And assoone as his feast was ended, he sent with a goodly company of knightes and furniture of warlike men, Sir Aymer de valaunce Erle of Pembrooke and Sir Henry Percy Erle of Northumberlande into Scotland, and shortly after the king himselfe folowed with his host.

Battayle of Methfen.

And it was not long after that the Erle of Pembrooke was arryued with his power in Scotlande, but that Robert le Bruse with a great power of the Scottes were gathered together in a place called Methfen, euery of them hauing vpon his harnesse a whyte shyrte, and there they bade the Erle battayle. And the Erle with his power set manfully and courageously vpon them, so that there perished with the swoorde that daye a great number of the Scottes that came with the false king. And the sayde false king was that day three times beaten downe, but was euer releued by Sir Symon Frisell that valyaunt warryour, and by the craft and help of his whyte shyrte, he fled and escaped out of the battayle. The names of the chiefe prisoners that were taken at this skirmish of the Scottes were these, Thomas the sonne of Rainulph, Dauid of Inkmartyn, John of Someruile knightes, Nicholas Huttynges Marshall, and Hugh the false kinges Chapleyn who that daye was standard bearer and many other whose names were here to long to reherse. And the aforesayd Hugh the priest with dyuers other were shortly after condemned, but the priest was first hanged because he had sayd, that I the priest will beare your banner and lead you this iourney.

Robert le Bruse flyeth.

King Edwarde entereth Scotlande with a great power.

Sone after the flyeng of Robert Bruse, the king of Englande with his sonne the prince of Wales, being then about the .x. daye of August entered Scotlande being accompanied wyth a great number of the Nobles of the realme and a puyssaunt armie. And of manye of the Scottes the king was honorably receyued, and many fled from him and hid themselues in woodes and marishes. The king going forth in Scotland with his armie, raunged ouer all the lande and tooke many of the fugitiue Scottes, and many he put to death, and also manye he pardoned. But among other that were taken, there were two Bishops and an Abbot which crowned Robert le Bruse the false king, the which were hardly and streightly kept in strong prison so long as the king lyued. There was also taken the aforenamed Symon Frisell in whome rested all the Scottes hope and trust. And there was taken Herebert of Morham, a man of excellent bewtie and stature, farre exceeding all the other Scottes. The aforesayde Symon was shortly after hanged: But Herebert with his Squyre Thomas de boys were beheaded. And the head of Symon Frisell for the manifold treasons by him committed was set vpon London bridge nexte vnto the head of Mylliam Walleys who was placed there before.

Symon Frisell taken.

King Edwarde causeth an inquisition to be

And shortlye after the king of Englande caused an inquirie to be made thorough the realme of Scotland by the othes of honest and good men, who and how many they were that murdered and consented to the murther of the noble noble man John Comyn before named, and also to the coronation of the aforsayde Robert Bruse. And in a maner he tooke them all and put them to death. And suche as submitted themselues vnto the kings will and pleasure, he kept in streight and hard prison. And John Seyton and Christoker hys brother which were the Esquiers of Robert Bruse, and consented vnto the shamefull murder of the sayde worthy and noble John Comyn were also taken. Of the which John Seyton at New Castell vpon Tyne, and Christopher at Womfrise were hanged, drawen, and quartered.

made in Scotlande for the murder of Sir John Comyn.

And during the time that this iustice was executed vpon the wicked and wretched Scottes, the lewde and vnworthye crowned king Robert Bruse fled into the Mountaynes, hyding hymselfe in suche places as he might best lurcke in. And lykewise Sir John of Cambzes Erle of Athles practised to flye and escape, but by the prouydence of God he was taken: which when the king heard, although he was then troubled with greeuous sickenesse, yet he bare the same the better, as one much comforted with these newes.

Robert le Bruze escaped by flyeng.

The aforenamed Sir John of Cambzes, Erle of Athes, as I finde in an auncient recorde, after he was apprehended, and among other prisoners committed to warde: There were certaine that resorted vnto the king, and shewed him that this Erle was of the bloud royall, and therfore they thought it vnseemely that he should be committed among the other cõmon offendors. To whome the king not respecting his bloud and progeny sayde: The higher that he is of degree, the more greeuous is his fall: if he among the other murderers did excel in bloud, then is it meete that he for his mischiefe should hang higher then any of the other: Take him, saith he, and carie him to London and there let him haue iustice. And shortly after, that is to say the. vij. day of November, next following he was arreigned in Westminster Hall and found giltie of treason, and of the murder of Sir John Comyn, and had iudgement of death. And because he came of the bloud royall as aforesayde, he was not drawne, but was set vpon an horse, and so brought to the place of execution, and there hanged vpon a payre of Galowes that were fiftie foote high, hauing before his eyes a great fyre burnyng, and before he was halfe dead, he was cut downe and behedded, and his bodye cast into the burnyng fyre, where it consumed vnto Ashes, & his head was set vpon London bridge among the other Traytours and murderers heads, but a great deale higher then the other.

About the ende of Februarie a certaine Scot of Galoway named Dongaldus came with three hundreth men and withstood a great Nauie of Pirates replenished with. vij. C. men of warre that woulde haue landed vpon his ground: But he set so fiercely vpon them, that what with the fight and by drowning in the Sea and hauen, and followyng such as had recouered land and fled, they in a maner all perished. And among the principall of these theeues that were slaine in thys skirmish, the sayde Dongallus brought vnto the king of England the head of Malcolyn the Lorde of Kentyr, and two heads of two rulers of Irelande. And he brought with him as prisoners Thomas Bruse knight, and Alexander his brother Dean of Glaskowe, both brethren Germaynes of Robert Bruse the false king of Scotland. And also they presented Reynold of Craunford knight which was sore wounded, and halfe dead. Of which number Thomas Bruse knight was drawen, hanged and hedded. And the reſt were onely hanged and headed at Carliſle.

And the aforeſayde yere there came from the Pope vnto the king of Englande a Cardinall and Mayſter Peter a Spanyard as Ambaſſadors, to conclude a mariage betweene Edward the king of Englands ſonne Prince of Wales, and the Lady Iſabell the daughter of the French king, the which in the yere followyng was fully fynished.

Robert le Bruze eſcaped by flyeng.

Robert le Bruze, after this diſcomfiture and loſſe of his chiefe friends, and fearing leaſt the Scottes with ſuche Engliſhmen as king Edward lefte there, would ariſe againſt hym: did therefore all comfortleſſe flie vnto the king of Norwaye, and there abode during the lyfe of king Edward.

When this noble and valiaunt Prince had thus ſubdued the Scottes, he yeelded thankes vnto almightie God for this victorie. And when he was truely aſſertayned of the flyeng and departing of Robert le Bruſe, and alſo that he had ſet the lande in a good and quiet order, he returned into England.

The Scottiſhe Lordes beheaded.

And in this meane while, the aforeſayde Lordes of Scotland were arreigned at London, and there condempned and put to death, and their heads ſet vpon London bridge. And ſhortlye after was John Waleys brother to Wylliam Waleys (which for lyke treaſon was put to death the yere nerte before) taken, hanged and quartered, and ſome of the Scottes that were taken as priſoners, remayned there a long time before they were hable to pay their fines.

And ſhortly after the king for diuers cauſes returned againe into Scotlande, but ſome ſay he remayned at Barwike and kept hys Chriſtmas and Eaſter there, and did not returne to London vntill the Sommer followyng.

King Edwarde taken with a greeuous diſeaſe.

And that then in the time of his returne, a ſickneſſe tooke hym ſo feruently, that he knewe well he ſhould die. Wherefore he being at Bourgh vpon the ſandes beyond Carlyle, called to him Sir Aymer de Valaunce Erle of Penbrooke, Sir Henry Percye Erle of Northumberlande, Sir Henry Lacye Erle of Lyncoln, and Sir Robert Clyfford Baron, and cauſed them to be ſworne before him, that they ſhould crowne Edward his ſonne in as conuenient time after his death as they might, and to keepe the lande to his vſe vntill he were crowned.

King Edward giueth a great charge to his ſonne.

And after his Barons had taken the ſayde othe, he then called vnto him his ſonne Edward, and charged him with dyuers pointes vpon his bleſſing: among the which one eſpeciall was, that he ſhould neuer after that daye ſuffer Piers of Gaueſton to returne into Englande, and ſo ſhortly after ended his lyfe vppon the. viij. daye of Julie, when he had reigned. xxxiiij. yeres. viij. Moneths and odde dayes. And after with great ſolempnity was conueyghed vnto Weſtmynſter, and there buried in the Chapell of S. Edward vpon the ſouth ſide, in a plaine Tombe of Marble at the head of his father. This noble prince had two wyues, and had iſſue by them as may appere before in the twentie yere, and in the. xxbij. yere of this kings reigne, where it is at large ſet out.

The iſſue of this King is ſet out in the xx. and. xxbij. yere of his reigne.

The deſcription of king Edward the firſt.

This king was of ſtature talle, ſomewhat ſwarte or black of colour, ſtrong of body, and nothing fat, for by much exerciſe he did eſchewe fatneſſe: he was amiable of countenaunce, hauing black eyes, which when he ware angry, would ſeeme to be fyrie: his beare was black and curled, he was very healthy and of a ſtoute courage, that neuer fayled in any daunger, or aduerſitie, he tie, he was verie pregnant and had an excellent wyt, and commonly atcheeued any enterpriſe he tooke in hande. He was a great louer and fauourer of religion, but yet a great enemie to the pride and inſolencie of Prieſtes which in his dayes exceeded, and he iudged the ſame onely to ſpring of their wealth and riches. And therfore to bridle their wantonneſſe he eſtabliſhed the lawe for graunting landes in Mortmayn. Of friendſhip he was conſtaunt, and not eaſie to be reconciled where he conceyued a diſpleaſure. And in vacant tunes he gaue himſelf much to huntyng. Thus much Polidore.

Edwarde the ſeconde.

King Edward the ſeconde.

EDwarde the ſeconde of that name, and ſonne of Edward the firſt, borne at Carnaruan beyng a towne of Wales, began his reigne ouer this realme of England the viij. day of July in the yere of our Lord. 1307. and was crowned king at weſtminſter the .xxiij. day of Februarie in the yere aforeſayd.

The deſcription of king Edward the ſecond.

This king was fayre of body, but vnſtedfaſt of maners and diſpoſed to lightneſſe. He refuſed the company of his Lordes and men of honor, and haunted among villeynes and vile perſonages. He gaue himſelfe alſo to ouermuche drinking, and lightly he would diſcloſe things of great counſaile: and beſides that, he was geuen to theſe vices by nature, he was made much worſſe by the counſaile and familiaritie of certein euill diſpoſed perſons, as Piers of Gaueſton, Hugh Spencer the father, and the ſonne, and other, whoſe wanton company and counſayle prouoked him to the appetyte and pleaſure of the bodie, nothyng ordering hys common weale by ſadneſſe, diſcretion and iuſtice, which thing cauſed great variance betwene him and his Lords, ſo that ſhortlye he became to them hatefull, and in the ende was depriued of his kingdom.

Piers of Gaueſtone.

But Polidore ſayth, that immediatly after the death of his father he being then in Scotland at Dunfrieze, callyng his counſayle together, did firſt of all cauſe the Lordes and rulers of Scotland to ſweare vnto him homage and fealtie, the which euery one, except certeine that leaned to the part of Robert le Bruze did willyngly offer. And then leauyng ſufficient furniture for defence in Scotland, he returned into England, and ſo to London.

So ſoone as his father was buryed, and the Exequies ſtantly finiſhed, he forgettyng the high and chargeable commaundement of his ſayde father, ſent in all haſt for his olde compire Piers Gaueſton, the which he receyued with all ioy and gladneſſe, and aduaunced him to much honour.

to Fraunce, and the. xv. day of January folowyng, he maryed at Bolein Isabell the daughter of Philip the French king, which, as saith Froisart was one of the goodlyest Ladyes in the worlde. And shortly after he returned wyth her vnto London, where they were honourably receyued of the Citizens, and so conueyed to Westmynster where as it is before rehersed they were both solempnly crowned the. xxiiij. day of February. At the which coronation was such preasse that a knight called Sir John Bakewell was thrested to death.

Piers of Gaueston aduaunced to the Eriedome of Cornewall.

And shortly after, the king gaue vnto Piers of Gauestone the Erledome of Cornewall, & the Lordship of Walyngford, and was ruled all by his wanton counsayle, and folowed the appetyte and pleasure of his body, to the great offence of the nobilitie, and no lesse perill of his awne destruction.

Langton Bishop of Chester commaunded to the tower.

Nowe shortlye after, the king callyng to hys remembraunce the great displeasure done vnto him and to his familier Piers of Gauestone by the Bishop of Chester, mencioned before in the. xxviij. yere of the reigne of king Edward the first, commaunded him vnto the Tower of London, where he was streightly kept many dayes after.

Piers Gauestone banished the land.

Then the Lordes of the land, and specially Sir Henry Lacy, Sir Guy and Sir Aymer de Ualance Erle of Lyncolne of Warwike & of Penbrook, to whom the noble Prince Edward the first, had geuen so great charge, that Piers Gauestone should no more come into Englande, sawe the rule of the lande, and howe that the kings treasorie by meane of the sayde Piers was wasted, assembled them in counsell & of one assent, with ayde of other Lords of the realme, so spake to the king, that contrarie to his pleasure, he was aduoyded the land, and banished into Ireland for that yere. But the king sent vnto him often tymes diuerse secrete messengers, and comforted him wyth many rich giftes, and made him his chiefe ruler of that countrie.

And afterward, diuerse and sondry grudges happened betwene the king and his Lordes for the banishment of the sayd Piers Gauestone: wherefore to continue amitie betwene him and them, the sayd Piers was fet home againe, and so continued to the more vnquietnes and mischiefe of the realme.

The Isle of the Rhodes first recouered by christian men.

About this tyme (as sayth the Author of Chronica chronicarum and other) the knightes of the order of saint John Baptist, called Saint Johns of Jerusalem, by knightly Manhoode, put out of the Isle of Rhodes the Turkes and infidels which to that day had kept and occupied the same Isle: and after that they wanne dayly and yerely vpon the sayd Turkes, so that they had in their possession much of the landes of the Turkes. This Religion of Saint Johns, was greatly preferred, by the fall and suppression of the Templers, whose possessions, landes and goodes were geuen to them.

A Table & tressilles of gold take out of the kings Jewell house by Piers of Gauestion.

Gauestion againe banished.

The aforesayde Piers of Gauestone, more and more encreasyng in the kinges fauour, had at the last the guydyng of all the kinges Jewelles and treasure. And at a certeyne tyme he went to Westmynster, and there out of the kinges Jewell house he tooke a Table and a payre of Tressilles of gold, and conueied them with other Jewelles out of the land, to the great empouerishyng of the same. And moreouer, he brought the king by meane of hys wanton condicions to manifold vices, as adulterie, and other. Wherefore the aforesayd Lordes, seyng the mischiefe that dayly encreased by occasion of this vnhappie man, tooke their counsayle together at Lincolne, and there concluded to aduoyde him againe out of England: so that shortly after he was exiled led in to Flaunders, to the kinges great displeasure.

This yere dyed Philip le Beaw French king, commonly called Philip the fayre.

In this yere was borne at Windsore the kinges eldest sonne named Edwarde, which after the death of his father was king of this realme, by the name of king Edward the third, & he was borne the.xiij. day of Nouember. 1311 5

And this yere also was the aforesayd Gauestone called home againe out of Flaundyrs, which after his returne, did worsse then euer he did before: In somuch that he disdeyned the Lordes of England, flouted, scorned, and rudely taunted them. Wherfore the Lordes assented and agreed to put him to death: And soone after assemblyng theyr powers, they besieged him in the Castell of Scarborough, and in short tyme wanne the Castell, and tooke him and brought him vnto Gauerseede beside Warwike, and there the.xix. daye of June smote off his heade. But when the king was informed thereof, he shewed himselfe to be most grieuously displeased with the sayd Lordes, and made a solemne vowe that his death should be reuenged, as afterwarde it was, as shall appere. The birth of Edward the kinges eldest sonne, who after was king Edwarde the thirde. Gauestion beheaded by the Lordes. The king greatly offended with the death of Gauestion.

Nowe by this occasion, the rancour and Malice that before was kindeled betwene the king and his Lordes, was againe so encreased and inflamed, that it burst out to the vnderstanding of the whole realme: For after this day the king neither studied nor endeuored himselfe to any thing so much, as to seeke some cause agaynst his Lordes, that by some one meane or other, hee might attaine to an occasion of reuengement, for the death of the aforenamed Gauestone. In this meane tyme dyed Sir Henry Lacy Erle of Lincolne, the which lyyng vpon his death bed charged Sir Thomas Erle of Lancaster that had maryed his daughter, that he should stand with the other Lordes in the defence for the weale of England, the which request the said Erle graunted, and so did firmely obserue and kepe it, which was the occasion of the losse both of his owne life, and of many others also, as after shall appere.

It this tyme the king helde his high Court of Parliament at London, where by the aduice of his Lordes, he made many good ordinaunces and statutes for the suppression of riots and other mischiefes that then reigned: And in the ende, the king was sworne to keepe them, and so were all his Lordes. 1312 6

And shortly after, worde was brought vnto the king that Robert le Bruze was returned into Scotlande, and had caused the Scottes to rebell of newe. Before in the.xxxiij. yeere of king Edwarde the first ye haue heard how the sayde Edward chased the aforenamed Robert le Bruze out of Scotland into Normandy. But as it may be well coniectured, nowe when he vnderstoode of the misgouernaunce of the realme of Englande, and specially of the deuision betwene the king and his Lordes, he was encouraged with a small ayde of the Normans to returne againe into Scotland, where he behaued himselfe in such wise to the Lordes of Scotland, that sone after they agayne made him king of the Realme, and then warred he sore vppon England, and wanne many Castels and strong holdes, and did to the Englishmen great harme and dammage, and (as sayth Sir John Frossart) the Scottes came brennyng and spoylyng this Realme, so farre, that they were foure or fiue dayes iourney within the Realme of Englande. The returne of Robert le Bruze.

Nowe when the king was truely certefyed of thys great rage of the 1313 7

Scottes, he with all conuenient ſpeede made prouiſion to reſiſt them, and gathering together a great power did paſſe by water and entred into Scotland and brent and deſtroyed ſuche Villages and Townes as lay in his way without all mercye. Whereof, when Robert le Bruze had knowledge, he with the whole power of Scotland coaſted toward the Engliſhmen, and vpon Mydſomer day, mette with king Edwarde and his hoaſt at a place called Eſtreuelyn, neere vnto a freſhe ryuer that then was called Bannokeſborne, where betweene the Engliſhmen and the Scottes was that daye foughten a moſt terrible and bloudie battayle: But the victorie fell to the Scottes, and the Engliſhmen flyeng, were chaſed of the Scottes ſo egerly, that many of them were drowned in the aforenamed ryuer, and many a noble man of Englande was that day ſlayne in that battayle, as Sir Gilbert de Clare Erle of Glouceſter, Sir Robert Clifford, Sir Edmond of Maule the kinges Steward, with other Lordes and Barons to the number (as ſayth Guydo de Columna) of.xliij. and of knightes and Baronets to the number of.lxvij. beſide.xxij. men of name, which that day of the Scottes were taken priſoners. And the king himſelfe ſcaped with great daunger from that battayle, and wyth a fewe horſe and ſmall company came to Berwike, where he reſted for a time. But Hector Boethus the Scot, whoſe nature is ſo ſhamefully and monſtruouſly to lye, (that all the worlde may perceiue it) wryteth that at this battayle were ſlaine fiftie thouſand Engliſhmen with the Duke of Glouceſter and two hundreth knights. But beleue him as it pleaſeth you. And after the Scottes had obteyned this victorie, they being enflamed with pride, publiſhed in the deriſion and mockage of Engliſhmen manye fond and fooliſhe rymes, the which I thinke meete to omit.

And after that king Edward had ſet the Towne of Barwike in as good order and ſuretie as he then might, he returned into England, and with ſmall honour and leſſe courage came to Weſtmynſter the.xix. day of Auguſt.

And not long after a Vileyne called John Poydras a tanners ſonne of Exceſter went about in diuers places of Englande and named himſelfe to be the ſonne of king Edward the firſt: & ſayde that by meane of a falſe Norice, he was ſtollen out of his Cradell, and Edwarde which was a Carters ſonne was layde in the ſame Cradell in his place, and he himſelfe was afterwarde hardely foſtered and brought vp in the North parte of Wales. But when this vileyn was layde for to be taken, for feare he fled to the Church of the whyte Fryers in Oxford: where he thinking to haue beene ſafe and ſure, becauſe king Edward the firſt was founder of that Church, and there he rehearſed agayne the former ſayeng, addyng more therevnto, that it appeered well that the king was a Carters ſonne, for hys conditions were according to the ſame, as hys maners daylie vſed did manifeſtly expreſſe and ſhew.

A Counterfeater that named himſelfe king Edward the ſeconde.

When thys vileyn had thus continued a whyle, not wythout ſome rumour in the lande, laſtly he was taken out of that place and caryed as a felon vnto Northampton, and there was arreigned and iudged for his falſeneſſe, and ſo drawen and hanged. The which at the houre of his death confeſſed that he had a Fende in his houſe in the ſimilitude of a Cat, the which among other promiſes to him made, he aſſured him that he ſhould be king of Englande. And Fabian ſayth that he confeſſed that he had ſerued the ſayde Fende three yeres before, to bring his purpoſe about.

Thus king Edward beſet with manye aduerſities kept a counſayle at yorke ſayth Polidore, for preparation of warre with Scotlande, and other things meete to be done for the weale of the realme of England. And ſhortly after Sir Peter Spaldyng knight was ſent to Barwike with a crewe of Souldiours to fortefie that Towne, becauſe the king had a certaine vnderſtanding, that Robert le Bruze entended haſtely to lay ſiege to that Towne.

Sir Peter Spalding knight.

And not long after the ſayde Caſtell and Towne of Barwike was yelden or loſt, by treaſon of the aforeſayde Sir Peter Spaldyng (as the common fame went) vnto Robert le Bruze king of Scottes. Alſo in this tyme was great miſery in England by dearth of Corne, ſcarcetie of victualles and Moreyn and death of Cattell. Moreouer, in this time was ſent into Englande two Cardinalles from Clement the fift Biſhop of Rome to ſet an vnity and peace betwene the kinges of England and Scotland, and as they were rydyng into Scotland they were met withall vpon the Moore of Wigilſdon in Yorkeſhire, and there robbed of ſuche ſtuffe and treaſure as they brought with them. After which robbery, great inquirie was made, and at the laſt two knightes named Sir Gilbert Myddleton and Sir Walter Selby with vi. hundred men were accuſed to be the doers of the ſame, and were committed to priſon for that felony, and after were at London condempned, drawen and hanged for the ſame, and their heades ſet vpon London Bridge: But the Cardynalles receyued of the king double the value of their harmes.

The Caſtell of Barwike was yelded to the king of Scottes.

Two Cardinalles were robbed.

Gilbert Myddleton and Walter Selby knightes condemned and hanged.

About this time alſo, Sir Goſlyn Deynuile and his brother (as ſayth John Hardyng) hauyng in his companye two hundreth perſons clothed in Fryers weedes, paſſed thorough the Countries as Outlawes and baniſhed men, and robbed and ſpoyled all that they coulde meete with, and namely, they robbed and ſpoyled the Byſhop of Durhams houſe and left nothing therin but bare walles, but at the laſt they were taken and hanged at Yorke.

And in the ende of this yere fell ſuche aboundaunce of rayne and vnſeaſonable weather, that they could not carie in that little corne that they had on the grounde, by reaſon whereof followed great ſcarcetie, dearth, peſtilence and death both of men and beaſtes.

Now againe the Scottes entred into Northumberland, and robbed and brent the Countrie moſt cruelly, and ſpared neither man, woman, nor childe, and did ſo great harme, that the Country was thereby greatly impouerished. To this miſchiefe alſo was ioyned another miſery: For as it is rehearſed before, victuall by reaſon of the Moreyn was wared ſo ſcant and dere, that people were forced to eate Dogges, and other vncleane and filthie beaſtes, as Fabian and other do recite. And the dearth of graine was ſo great this yere that wheat was ſolde for foure marke a quarter, which if you conferre with the value of an ounce of ſiluer then currant, as is before expreſſed in the. xv. yere of king Edward the firſt, which was. xx. pence, with ỹ time now which is the tenth yere of the reigne of our ſouereigne Ladye Queene Elizabeth in the which an ounce of ſiluer is currant for fiue ſhillinges, then after that rate, foure marke a quarter of that money, is of the money that is now currant with vs. viij. pound, and that is. xx. ſhillinges a buſhell, which may well be called both a great price, and a great dearth: and by reaſon of this dearth of grayne, and ſcarcitie of victuall, and of the warres with the Scottes, the people dyed and periſhed both by hunger and peſtilence, ſo that the land was greatly greatly waſted and almoſt deſolate of people, for the people liuing were ſcant ſo many in number as were able to bury the dead.

Yet the king aſſembled againe as great a power as he could get in thys realme of England, and went into Northumberland to reſiſt the malice of the Scottes, which dayly made aſſaultes vpon the Borders, and entered far within the realme of England, robbyng, brennyng and ſpoylyng the ſame. Wherefore, for great lacke and diſtreſſe of men, the king had manye people out of the South and Eaſt partes of England. And among other, the Citie of London, contrary to their liberties, were conſtreyned to find at their coſtes and charges two hundreth men, and ſo ſent them to Yorke.

When the king then beyng at Yorke had receyued his people from ſundry Countries and good townes of England, he with a conuenient number road toward Barwicke, and ſo ſped his iourney, that at the length he came nere vnto Barwike, and layde his ſiege about the ſame.

The Scots commeth into Yorkſhire, and cruelly burneth and ſpoyleth.

But while the king was buſyed in the aſſault of the towne, the Scottes brake ouer the water of Swale in great number, and leauing the coſt where the kinges people lay, in ſecret wiſe came downe into the marches of Yorkeſhire, and there ſlue the people and robbed them in moſt cruell wiſe. Wherefore the Archebiſhop of Yorke conſtreyned of pure neceſſitie to defende that Countrie, gathered vnto him an vnredy and diſpurueyed hoſt for the warre, as Priors, Clerkes, Chanons, and other miniſters of the Church, with huſband men and other vnmete people: and ſo with a great number of men, and fewe warlye or diſcrete Capitaines, he went againſt the Scottes, and encountered them at a place called Mitton vpon Swale, the .xij. day of the moneth of October: But for lacke of wiſe and warly prouiſion, the Engliſhe men were beſet of their enemies vpon euery ſyde, ſo that of them were ſlaine a great multitude, and the remnant put to ſhameful flight, by the which flight the ſayde Archebiſhop, with the Abbot of Selby and other were preſerued. And becauſe in this Battayle there were ſlaine ſo many ſpirituall men, therfore it was after called of many writers the white battaile.

The Engliſhmen were againe diſcomfited of the Scots.

When the king was informed of this ouerthrow of the Northren men, and alſo that it drewe ſo nere wynter, he therefore brake vp his ſiege and returned vnto Yorke, and ſhortly after went further into England.

The king againe returneth with great loſſe.

At this tyme there was nothing done that concerned the order and gouernement of the realme, without the aduice and counſayles of ſir Hugh the Spencers, the father and the ſonne, by whoſe procurement many thinges were done in England to the great grudge, as well of the noble men of the realme, as of the cõmons of the ſame, ſo that they were had in as great hatred and indignation, as before tymes was Piers Gaueſtone. And many euill reportes and great extorcions were tolde of them, as commonly it happeneth to all thoſe that are out of fauour with the common people.

Sir Hugh Spencer the father, and Sir Hugh Spencer the ſonne ruled all England.

12

This yere the king helde his counſayle or Parliament at Yorke, where contrary to the mynde of the Lordes Sir Hugh Spencer the ſonne was made high Chamberlaine of England: By reaſon whereof he waxed ſo hautie and prowde, that no Lorde of this land durſt diſpleaſe him at any tyme, whereof grewe the occaſion of the Barons warre, as after ſhall appere.

A parliamẽt at Yorke.

Before ye heard of two Cardinalles that came to trauaile to make a peace betweene the two kinges, but it would not be, wherefore the king purchaſed chaſed a curſſe of John the. xxij. Biſhop of Rome, to accurſſe the Scottiſhe king and all that helde with him, or mainteyned him. But it anayled nothing, but put the king to great coſtes and charges, for the Scottes ceaſſed not for all their curſſynges, and the poore commons were ſo vexed and that with ſo many troubles, as loſſe of their moueable goodes, of their poſſeſſions, and of all that euer they had, not onely by the foreyne enemie, but euen here among our awne people, by reaſon of the miſgouernance of the king, as alſo by the trouble and variaunce that was betwene him and his Lordes: ſo that many were vtterly vndone, & a fewe ſinguler diſordered perſons aduaunced.

Now when the greateſt part of the Baronny of England behelde this miſerie of the people, how they were puniſhed by the hand of God, and alſo by the ignorance of the king, they in ſecret maner aſſembled themſelues together at a towne called Sherborne, and there concluded a reformation for this miſchiefe, which was, to remoue from the king the ſayd Spencers, both the father and the ſonne. And that this might take effect, Sir Thomas Erle of Lancaſter, Sir Humfrey Bohum Erle of Herkford, Sir John Mowbray Baron, Sir Roger Cliffordе Baron, Sir Goſlyn Daniell Baron, Sir Roger Toket, Roger Benefield, Sir Roger Mortimer, ſir William Sulland, Sir William Elmenbridge, Sir John Gifford, and Sir John Tyers, Barons and knightes with diuers other, ſware eche of them to ſtand by other vntill they had amended the ſtate of the realme.

The Barõs aſſembled in a counſaile at Sherebourne.

And ſhortly after, by their aduice and agrement, Sir John Mowbray, Sir Roger Clyfford, and Sir Goſlyne Danyell, with a ſtrong company entred vpon the Manours, and Caſtelles of the ſayde Spencers, ſtandyng in the Marches of Wales, and ſpoyled and deſtroyed them. Of the which ryot the Spencers complayned to the king. And for an order of due puniſhment for theſe to be taken, ỳ king called vnto him dyuers of his counſell at Wyndſore, and there it was determined that the ſayde Sir John Mowbraye, Sir Roger Clifford and Sir Goſelyn Danyell ſhould appere before the kinges counſell ſhortly after, and there to make anſwere vpon that ryot. And if they refuſed that to doe, that then they ſhould aduoyde the lande ſhortly after as baniſhed men. But no day of apparaunce was kept by them. Wherefore proclamations was made in dyuers places of the realme and at London the .xvj. day of Marche, that the ſayde Sir John Mowbraye, Sir Roger Clifford and Sir Goſlyne Daniell, ſhould aduoyde the lande within .x. dayes following vpon paine of death. Whereof hering the Lords and Barons before named, reaſſembled them a more ſtrong power, and vpon that ſent a meſſenger vnto the king, beſeeching hym humbly, to exclude and remoue from him the counſell of the Spencers, which daylie did vnto him great diſhonour, and to the common weale of the realme great hinderaunce. The king heering this humble requeſt, was with it nothing content, but yet fearyng greatly the deſtruction of his awne perſon, aſſembled his counſaile for the reformation of thys matter: where it was concluded, that the king ſhoulde call a Parliament at London. And forthwith the king wrote his letters and ſent theſame vnto the ſayde Barons, commaundyng them at a daye prefixed to bee at the ſayde Parliament, who at the day appointed, made their apperaunce at London, bringing with them a great hoſte of men of armes in a ſute of Jacquets or Cotes parted, yelow and greene, with a band of white

At this tyme the Maiour of the Citie of London for the preſeruation of the ſayd Citie, & for the ſure keeping of the kings peace, cauſed daylie a thouſand men being well armed, to warde the Gates and water ſydes of the ſayd Citie, and the ſame warders or watchemen to begynne their watche at foure of the clock in the morning, and ſo continued vntill.vj. of the clock at night. At which tyme, as manye were ordeyned for to take the charge of the night watch, and ſo to continue vntill the houre of fiue of the clock in the morning. And becauſe the night watch ſhould be the more duely kept, therefore there was aſſigned nightly two Aldermen to ryde about the Citie with certaine officers of the Towne to ſee the watchmen well and diſcreetely ordred and guided. And the gates were ſhut at. ix. of the clock, and opened againe at.vj.in the morning, and euery Citizen was warned to haue his harnes by him, that he might be readie with ſhort warnyng whenſoeuer he were called.

The Citie of London was garded with a watch both day & night.

Thus duryng the tyme of the Parliament which was holden at Weſtmynſter, the watch, as aforeſayde, was holden and kept in London. And among other things it was ordeyned in that Parliament for the weale of the lande that Sir Hugh Spencer the father, and Sir Hugh the ſonne, ſhould be baniſhed out of the realme of Englande for terme of life. And ſhortly after that baniſhment was put in execution, ſo that they both were brought vnto Douer, there to take ſhypping. Where Hugh the father made great mone when he ſhould take his ſhip, and curſſed his ſonne in the hering of thoſe that had the guyding of them, ſayeng: that by his meanes he was baniſhed from the Flowre of all the landes chriſtened.

The Spencers both father and ſon baniſhed.

Then the king diſſolued the Parliament, and euerye man returned to his awne. But it was not long after but that worde was brought to the king, that Sir Hugh Spencer the ſonne houed vpon the coaſte of England, and tooke prayes of all Marchaunts that paſſed by his courſe: But the king made as though he vnderſtood no ſuche thing, and ſuffred that and many mo euill deedes to go vnpunniſhed, the which at length he repented full ſore, and toke therof great remorſe of conſcience as appereth in the ende of his reigne.

The king being bewitched with the loue of the aforeſayde Spencers did now agayne reuoke the actes and ordynaunces made in the laſt Parliament, and called againe into Englande the foreſayde Spencers to theirs and his caſtyng awaye, as after it ſhall appeere, and ſet them agayne in auctoritie as high as euer they were, mawgre the heart and minde of all his Barons, and to the great vnquietneſſe of all the realme. And ſhortly after beganne quarell piking, and the king beganne claymyng a title by the Queene of the Caſtell of Ledes in Kent, which belonged to ſir Barthen Bladeſmore knight then being on the Barons party, and the king beſieged the ſayde Caſtell, and by the helpe of the Citizens of London did at the laſt by ſtrength wynne the ſame, and ſpoyled the moueables thereof, which were of a great value.

The Spencers are called home againe by the king.

Nowe when the king had thus called home the Spencers, and things were ruled and gouerned after their ſenſuall appetites and pleaſures, without hauing any reſpect or regard to the common weale of the realme of England. The Barons alſo well pondering and conſidering among themſelues that this lewde kinde of gouernment vſed by the Spencers muſt of neceſſity

And in the meane time that Sir Thomas Erle of Lancaster was gathering of his people, the two Mortymers, that is to say, Sir Roger Mortymer of warke, and Sir Roger of Wygmore with other, went vnto the Marches of Wales, and tooke by strength certayne Cities and Townes belongyng to the Spencers, and pursued also some of the kinges seruauntes. Wherfore the king heryng of the rebellion of hys Lords, made hastie speede, and with a great hoste came about by Shrewesbury, and was neere vnto them before they were ware of hym, so that for feare, the sayde Mortymers yeelded themselues vnto the kings grace and mercy, the which forthwith were conueyed as prisoners vnto the Tower of London.

When the king had set all thinges in order about the marches of Wales, he then gathered more strength about him, and therefore about the begynnyng of March, he set forward and came to Glocester, where the Spencers with all their people met with him. And from thence they went to Lichefield, at which tyme the Erles of Lancaster and of Herford with their hoste were at Burton vpon Trent, and fortefied the bridge, that the king might not come ouer the sayde Riuer. Then the king was brought vnto a foorde, and began to set ouer his knightes, whereof heeryng the sayde Erles, they forsooke the towne and fled. But before they could passe farre vpon their iourney, they were encountered of Sir Aymer de Valaunce Erle of Pembrooke, with the Spencers and other of the kinges host vpon the .xij. of March, and them did ouerset, and caused them to flie, who at the last came to Pomfret. In this meane tyme, the Erle Thomas had sent a knight of his named Robert Holland, into Lancashire for to arrere his tenauntes. But when the sayde Sir Robert heard of the sayde skirmishe, and howe his maister was fled, he then drewe to the king, and presented him with such company as he then brought. And thus the kinges power daylye encreased, and the Barons discreased. Then the Barons heeryng of the goyng of Sir Robert Holland vnto the kinges partie, were therewithall astonied, and tooke their counsaile in the Friers of Pomfret, where after sondrie reasons and argumentes, they concluded that they would go vnto the Castell of Dumstanborough, and there to remaine vntill such tyme as they might purchase the kinges mercie. And as they set forward vpon their purposed iourney, takyng with them such people as they had, at the last they came to a towne called Burghbridge, where they were encountered of Sir Andrew of Harkeley knight, with other that were come out of the North with a strong company: Who gaue there an onset vpon the Barons, and in the ende discomfited them, and chased their people. In the which fight was slaine the Erle of Herford, sir Roger Benefielde, and sir William Suiland, and other: and there was taken the Erle of Lancaster, sir Roger Clifford, sir John Mowbray, sir Roger Turkettes, sir William Fitz William, with dyuerse other, and they were led to Yorke. And this fielde was faughten the .xv. day of March. 1320.

The Barõs flie and are taken.

Thomas erle of Lancaster and diuers other of the Barons taken, and cõmitted to dyuerse prisons after were behedded to the number of .xxij. Noble men.

It was not long after that Sir Hugh Daniell, and Sir Bartheu de Badlismere were taken. And sir Thomas Erle of Lancaster was brought againe to his awne towne of Pomfret, where he was brought in iudgement before sir Aymer de valaunce Erle of Pembrooke, sir John Britayn Erle of Richmond, Richmond, ſir Edmond of Woodſtock Erle of Kent, ſir Hugh Spencer the father, and ſir Robert of Malmeſtrope Juſtice with other, and finally he was by them condemned and iudged to haue his head ſtricken off, which was done the .xii. day of Aprill next following.

From this tyme forward for the ſpace of foure yeres, the Spencers encreaſed meruellouſly in fauour and authoritie with the king, and as faſt decayed the fauour of the king towardes the Queene, vntill ſuch tyme as ſhee was relieued by her brother the French king, as after ſhall be ſhewed.

But nowe to returne where we left. The ſame ſame day that the aforeſayde Erle of Lancaſter was put in execution, Sir Roger Tuckettes, Sir William Fitz William, ſir Waren of Iſelde or Iſell, ſir Henry of Braddorne, and ſir William Cheyny Barons and knightes, were alſo drawen and hanged, and their heades ſmitten off and ſent to London, which were all put to death at Pomfret aforeſayde, with an Eſquier called John Page. And at Yorke ſoone after was drawne and headed Sir Roger Clifford, Sir John Mowbray, and ſir Goſelyn Daniell, Barons. And at Briſtow, ſir Henry Womington, and ſir Henry Mountford Baneretes: And at Glouceſter ſir John Gifford, and ſir William Elmenbridge knightes: And at London ſir John Tyers Baron: And at Wynchelſey, ſir Thomas Culpeper knight, and at Windſore, ſir Fraunces Waldenham Baron, and at Taunton bury, ſir Mathew Gladyſmoore, and ſir Barthell de Aſborneham Barons, and at Cardiffe in Wales, ſir William Fleming knight.

A parliament at yorke.

After that the king had thus executed and ſubdued his Barons, he ſommoned a Parliament at Yorke about Whitſontide next following, in the which Parliament Edward the kinges ſonne was firſt made Prince of Wales and Duke of Aquitaine, Sir Hugh Spencer the father was made Erle of Winchester, and ſir Andrew of Harkelay, Erle of Carleyle, and in the ſame were diſherited all ſuche as before tooke partes, or had holden with the Erles of Lancaſter, and Herford, except ſir Hugh Daniell and fewe other, the which ſyr Hugh was receyued to grace, becauſe he had maryed a kinneſwoman of the kinges.

Sir Hugh Spencer the father made Erle of winchester.

Shortly after Maiſter Robert Baldock, a man of euill fame and name, was by the king made Chauncelour of England. And he helped forwarde that good ſtore of forfeites and fines were gathered into the kinges treaſury, without ſparyng of priuileged places or other: ſo that whatſoeuer could be found, the ſame was ſeaſed for the king: By reaſon whereof, much treaſure was brought into the kinges Coffers, beſides great thinges that were pylled and ſpoyled by the Officers of diuers ſhires.

This yere ſayth Fabian, the king gathered the firſt penny of all temporall mennes goodes within England, Ireland, & Wales, which was graunted vnto him in the aforeſayd Parliament for the defence of Scotland: which money was not payed without great murmure and grudge, conſidering the manifold miſeries that the common people at thoſe dayes were wrapped in. And this yere alſo (as Fabian ſayth) the Sunne appered to mannes ſight as red as blood, and ſo continued by the ſpace of fiue houres, and it was vpon the laſt day of October.

The ſonne appered as red as bloud.

About this tyme the Scottes entendyng to do a feate in Ireland, and to ſubdue that countrie to their obeyſaunce, entered it with a ſtrong hoſt vnder their their Capitaine, Edward le Bruze, brother to the Scottish king. But the Irishe men bare them so manfully, that they banquished the Scottes, and chased them out of that countrie. In which chase and fight the sayd Edward le Bruze and many other noble men of Scotland were slaine.

Nowe againe the king made great prouision for to haue entred vppon Scotland, so that he was entring the lande about the beginnyng of August. But the Scottes hauyng knowledge of the greatnesse and strength of hys armie, withdrewe themselues into Mountaynes, Marisses and other suche places, as the Englishe army could not come at them: And this was done by the Scottes of purpose to werye and tyer the Englishe army. And shortly after among the hoste entered sundrie diseases and sicknesses, so that many of them dyed, and were cast away in that iourney, aswell for lack of victuall, as by other infirmities, so that the king for these causes & other, was constreyned to returne againe into England without doyng any notable act: Wherof when the Scottes were informed, sir John Douglas, and other Capiteines folowed and costed the king in such wise, that they had almost taken the king at dinner, at an Abbey called Bellaunde. Then the king of pure constraint defended himselfe, and withstood the Scottes so well as he might. But after a small and weake fight, the king was compelled to flie, and by that meane to saue him selfe.

The king againe entreth Scotland but returneth home without any victory.

In the aforesayde skirmishe was taken Sir John Britayne Erle of Richemonde, and the kinges treasour was there spoyled and caried awaye, and the ordynaunce belongyng to the hoste, a great parte of it, was by the Scottes caryed into Scotlande.

Then the Scottes in their returne homeward, wanne the Castell of Norham, and robbed the Towne of Northallerton, and other. For this losse and harmes Sir Andrew of Harkeley Erle of Carleysle was much blamed and charged by misleadyng of the kinges hoste.

This yere it was ordeyned, that when anye theefe or other trespasser should be hanged, that from thencefoorth, the same should foorthwith be cut downe and buried, where before they were wont to hang still vntill they were consumed.

Theues being dead was appoynted to be buryed.

The king now being informed that the great dishonour and losse before mencioned by the Scottes, happened by the vntruth and treason of the aforesayde Sir Andrewe of Harkeley Erle of Carleisle, caused a knight named Sir Anthony Lucye to arest the sayde Sir Andrewe Erle of Carleyl, and to bring him safely vnto hys presence. And the sayde Sir Anthony made suche speede herein that the second day of Marche followyng the sayde Erle was taken, & so kept in prison vntill October next followyng, at which tyme the sayde Sir Andrewe was arreigned and condemned for that he had taken money of the Scottes to betray the king his naturall Lorde. For the which treason he was at Westchester or at Shrewesbury drawen and hanged, and his head sent after to London, and set vpon the Bridge.

Sir Andrew Erle of Carlisle, hanged drawen and quartered for treason.

At this time also, the warre began to quicken in Guyan betweene the Englishmen and Frenchemen, whereof the occasion was (sayth the French Chronicle) for a Bastile or Fortresse buylded by the Lorde Mount Pesart, a Lorde of Gascoyne, vpon the Frenche kinges ground, as the Frenchemen sayde: But the Gascoynes and Englishmen iustified it to be within the terri-toꝛy of Guyan. Foꝛ this, firſt began great woꝛds, and after many threates, but in the ende, moꝛtall warre. So that the Gaſcoynes, with the ayde of the kings Steward of Englande ſlue many of the Frenchemen that came to ouerthꝛowe the ſayde Baſtile.

When Charles the French king heard of the ouerthꝛow of the Frenchmen, and howe the Gaſcoynes foꝛtified the ſayde Baſtile within his ſayde Seignoꝛy as he was infoꝛmed, he ſent with all ſpeede his Uncle Charles de Ualoys with a great hoſte, who made ſharpe and cruell warre againſt the Gaſcoynes, and wanne from them the Towne of Angeow and Ampas with dyuers other, and at the laſt came vnto the Townes oꝛ Citie of Ryoll, and layed ſiege vnto the ſame: But the Engliſhmen with the Gaſcoynes iſſued out of the towne and gaue battaile vnto the Frenchemen, and put them to the woꝛſe, and ſlue. xiiij. C. of them. Among the which a Loꝛde, called the Lord of Saint Flozentine, with other noble men of Fraunce were ſlayne, and the other enfoꝛced to lye further from the Towne. Howbeit in the ende, the ſayd Towne by appoyntment was yelden to the Frenchmen vpon condition, that all ſuche Engliſhmen as were within the Towne ſhould go freely with their goodes to Burdeaux, oꝛ if they woulde remaine there ſtill, then to be ſwoꝛne vnto the French king, and to remayne there as Frenchmen.

After which Towne yeelded as afoꝛeſayde, Sir Edmond of Woodſtock the kinges bꝛother, then beyng at Burdeaux as the kinges Deputie, made ſuche reſiſtaunce againſt the ſayde Charles de Ualoys, that a truce was taken foꝛ that yeꝛe.

And about Mydlent next folowyng, the king hauing knowledge of this warre in Guyan, and howe the French king entended to ſeaſe all Gaſcoyne and Guyan, foꝛ bꝛeaking of couenauntes betweene them made, and not by king Edward perfoꝛmed, ſent ouer the Queene his wife the French kinges ſiſter to entreate an agreement and peace betweene them, as ſayth Fabian. But Sir John Froiſſart in his hiſtoꝛie, ſheweth the cauſe of her goyng to be otherwiſe, and wꝛyteth as followeth.

The cauſe of the Queenes goyng into Fraunce.

When the Queene (ſayth he) perceyued the pꝛide of the Spencers and howe they pꝛeuayled with the king, and had cauſed him to put to death the greateſt parte of the nobles of his realme of Englande, and alſo that they bare towarde hir a ſower countenaunce, and ſhe fearing leaſt they ſhould haue put ſomething into the kinges head, that might haue beene to the peꝛill of her lyfe, was therefoꝛe deſyꝛous to be out of this feare, and pitying alſo the miſerable gouernement daylie pꝛactiſed and vſed againſt the whole ſtate and communaltie of the Realme in all kinde of tyꝛannies and cruelties, by theafoꝛeſayde Spencers. The Queene therefoꝛe purpoſed nowe to flye the Realme and to go into Fraunce, and therefoꝛe did feyne her ſelfe that ſhee would go on pilgꝛimage to Saint Thomas of Cauntoꝛbury, from whence ſhe tooke hir way to Winchelſey, and in the night entred into a ſhip which befoꝛe was pꝛepared foꝛ her, and had with her, her eldeſt ſonne Edwarde, and the Erle of Cane. and Sir Roger Moꝛtymer, who a little befoꝛe bꝛake out of the Tower of London, as after ſhall be ſhewed. And in another Ship they had placed their neceſſarie pꝛouiſion and furnyture: then hauyng wind at will, they aꝛriued ſhoꝛtly at the hauen of Boleyn in Fraunce, where ſhee was moſt ioyfully receyued of the Capiteyne of the Towne, and alſo of the Abbot there, who conueyed her and all her company into the Abbey, where they were feasted and cheered. And after the Queene had remayned there two dayes, she then daylie iourneyed so farre, that at the last shee came to Paris. But the French king her brother, hauing before knowledge of her comming, had sent to meete her diuers of the greatest Lordes of his realme, as the Lorde, sir Robert de Artoys, the Lorde of Crucy, the Lord of Sully, the Lorde of Roy and diuers other, who honorably did receaue her and brought her into the Citie of Paris, vnto the king hir brother. And when the king sawe his sister, whome he had not sene long before: as she should haue entred into his Chamber he met her, and tooke her in his armes and kissed her and sayd: ye be welcome fayre sister, with my fayre Nephew your sonne and tooke them by the handes and led them foorth. The Queene who had no great ioye at her heart, but that she was so neere to the king her brother, she woulde haue kneeled downe two or three times at the feete of the king: But the king would not suffer her, but helde her still by the right hande, demaundyng right gently of her estate and businesse. And she aunswered him right sagely, and recounted to him all the vilanyes and iniuries done to her by Sir Hugh Spencer, and prayed of him his ayde and comfort.

The Queene was honorably receaued in Fraunce.

When the Noble king Charles of Fraunce had heard his sisters lamentation, who with teares had expressed her heauie case, he most comfortably spake vnto her and sayd: fayre sister quiet your selfe, for by the fayth I owe to God and Saint Denise, I shall right well prouyde for you some remedy. The Queene then kneeled downe whether the king would or not, and sayd: My right deere Lord and fayre brother, I pray God rewarde you. The king then tooke hir vp in his armes, and led hir into another chamber, the which was appaceled for hir, and for the yong Prince Edward her sonne, and so for that time departed from her, and caused all thinges that was behouefull and meete for her and her sonne to be delyuered vnto them at hys costes and charges.

And not long after, the sayde Charles, French king, for thys cause chiefly assembled together a great number of the greatest Lordes and Barons of his realme, to haue their counsayle and good aduise, howe he might best prouyde to remedy and help the distresse of his sister the Quene of Englande. And it was thought best to them, that the Frenche king should suffer hys sister to make the best friendes she could, in Fraunce or any other where and that the king shoulde not take anye knowledge thereof: For sayde they, the king to minister an occasion of warre with Englande, and so bring hys owne realme in trouble, is neyther honorable for hymselfe nor profitable for his realme. And they concluded, ꝑ the king might conueniently ayde her with Golde and Syluer, which is the Metall that purchaseth both the loue of the Gentleman and also of the souldyour. And to thys counsell and aduyce the king agreed: and caused thys determination to be shewed to the Queene priuely by Sir Robert de Artoys, who at that time was one of the greatest Lordes in all Fraunce.

Nowe the Barons of Englande that were lefte, considerynge that the Spencers had so drawne the king to doe and consent to whatsoeuer they required: and considering also how they had not onely made awaye the greatest parte of the Barony of Englande, but also kept those that remayned in such feare and awe that they could beare no rule, nor be heard with the king by reason of their authoritie. Therefore the sayde Barons which were left, assembled themselues together, and with one accord, wrote ouer into France to the Queene of England, certefying her that if she could finde the meanes to haue any company of men of armes (if it were but to ỹ number of a thousand) and to bring hir sonne and heyre with her into England: that then they would all drawe to her, and obey vnto her and her sonne Edward, and ayde them with all their power, as they were bounde to doe of duetie.

The French king geueth good wordes to the Queene his sister.

The aforesayde letters beyng secretly sent vnto her out of Englande, she shewed them vnto king Charles her brother: Who aunswered her and sayd, Good sister, if God be your ayde, your businesse shall preuail the better. Take of my men and subiectes, to the number of that your friendes haue written vnto you for, and I consent well to this voyage: I will cause to be deliuered vnto you, golde, and siluer so muche as shall suffice you. And herein the Queene had so traueyled, what with her prayer, giftes and promises, that many great Lordes and yong knightes agreed to bring her again into England. Then the Queene as secretly as she coulde, prepared for her voyage, and made her prouision: But she could not do it so secretly, but that sir Hugh Spencer had knowledge thereof. Wherefore he thought to get the good will of the French king her brother from her, by giftes: And secretly he sent messengers into Fraunce, with great plentie of golde, syluer and riche Jewels, and specially to the king, and to his priuy counsaile: The which giftes tooke such effect, that in a short space, the French king and all his priuie counsaile were as colde and as straunge to helpe the Queene forwarde in her voyage as though they had neuer talked of the matter. And the Frenche king brake that voyage, and made proclamation, commaundyng all his subiectes vpon paine of banishement, that none should be so hardie, as to go with the Quene to bring her againe into England. And besides this, the sayd sir Hugh Spencer practised more malice, and compassed and deuised with himselfe a further mischiefe, which was, howe he might bring to passe to get againe the Quene into England, to be vnder the kinges daunger and his. And to bring this about, the sayde sir Hugh caused the king to wryte vnto the Pope, effectually desyryng him that he would sende and wryte to the Frenche king, that he should send the Queene his wyfe againe into England. For he tooke God to record that it was not through his faulte or occasion that she departed from him, for he entended nothing towardes her, but loue and good fayth, as belongeth vnto matrimonye. And he caused also like letters to be made to diuerse of the Cardinalles, wherin were practised many subtile deuises, which were to long here to be rehersed. And to suche as were most nerest and about the Pope, he sent great plentie of golde and siluer: insomuch, that they so traueyled and preuayled with the Pope, that they caused him to write vnto the French king, that vpon payne of curssyng, he should send his sister Isabel into England to the king her husband. These letters were brought vnto the French king by the Bysshop of Xayntes, whome the Pope had sent in that legation. And when the king had red the letters, he caused them to be shewed to the Queene his sister, whome he had not seene of a long space before, and now he cõmaunded her forthwith to auoide his realme, or else he would cause her to auoide with shame.

The French king goeth frõ his word and is in displeasure with the Queene his sister.

When

When this tidinges was brought to the Queene, she was at her wittes ende, and knewe not what to do, or what aduise to take, for as then, all the Barons of Fraunce had forsaken her by the commaundement of the French king, and so she was left all comfortlesse, sauyng that her dere Cosyn the Erle of Arthoys did secretly counsaile and comfort her as muche as he might, for otherwise he durst not, because the king had forbidden him: But he was fully perswaded that the Queene was wrongfully vexed and troubled. Thus was sir Robert of Arthoys at the Queenes commaundement, but he durst not speake nor be acknowen thereof. For he heard the king say and sweare, that whosoeuer spake to him for the Queene his sister, should lose his landes and be banished the realme. And he knewe secretly howe the king was in minde and will, to cause his sister to be taken, and Edward her sonne, and the Erle of Cane, and sir Roger Mortimer, and to put them al in the handes of the king, and of sir Hugh Spencer. Wherefore he came on a night and declared all this to the Queene, and aduised her of the perill that she was in. Then the Queene was greatly abashed, and besought him with weepyng eyes to geue her his best counsaile. Then he sayd, Madame I counsayle you that you departe and go into the Empire, where as there bee mayne great Lordes, who may right well ayde you, and specially the Erle Guillam of Henault, and sir John of Henault his brother. These two are great Lordes and wise men, true, dread, and redoubted of their enemies. Then the Queene caused to be made redy all her prouision, and payde for euerything as secretly as she might, and so she and her sonne, and the Erle of Cane, and all her company departed from Paris and rode towarde Henault, and so long shee roade vntill at the last she came to Cambresey. And when she knewe that she was in the Empire, then she thought her selfe in some better assurance than she was in before: And so passed through Cambresey, & entered into Ostrenaunt in Henault, and lodged at Ambreticourt in a knightes house, who was called sir Dambricourt, who receyued her right ioyously in the best maner to his power. In so much that afterward the Quene of England and her sonne had the same knight and his wife and children with them into Englande and aduaunced them in diuerse maners.

A friend in neede, is a friend in deede

Sir Robert de Arthoys a true & sayth-full friend to the Queene.

The Queene flyeth out of Fraunce.

And in this meane tyme (sayth Polydore) Water Stapleton Bishop of Ereter, which hetherto had bene with the Queene and was of her counsaile in Fraunce, did priuely flie from her into England vnto the king, and reueled vnto him all Queene Isabels counsayles and ententes, the which his doings was the beginnyng of his mischiefe, as shall be shewed.

Sone after the comming of the Queene of England and her sonne into Henault, the same was well knowen in the house of the good Erle of Henault, who then was at Valenciens. And sir John of Henault was certified of the tyme when the Queene came to the house of sir Dambrecourt, the which sayde John was brother to the sayde Erle Guyllam. And the sayd sir John as one all yong and lustie and desyrous of honor, mounted on his horse backe and departed with a small companie from Valenciens, and came the same night to Ambreticourt, and did to the Queene all the honour and reuerence that he could deuise.

The comming of the Quene into Henault

The Queene, who was right sorowfull, declared (complaynyng most piteously) vnto him with weppyng eyes her miserable case, whereof the sayde

ſir John had great pitie, ſo that the water ran out of his eyen, and ſayd, fayre Lady, beholde me here your awne knight, who will not fayle to dye for you in the quarrell, I will do the beſt of my power to conduct you and my Lorde your ſonne, and helpe to bring you into your eſtates in England by the grace of God, and with the helpe of your friendes in thoſe parties. And I and ſuch other as I can deſyre, will put our lines and goodes in aduenture for your ſake, and we will get men of warre ſufficient (if God be pleaſed) without the daunger of the French king your brother.

Then the Queene would haue kneeled downe for great ioy that ſhee had, and to haue yelded thankes for the good will that he had offred vnto her: But this noble knight tooke her vp quickly in his armes, and ſayde: By the grace of God, the noble Queene of Englande ſhall not kneele to me. But Madame, recomfort your ſelfe and all your companie, for I will keepe you faythfull promiſe, and ye ſhall go ſee the Erle my brother, and the Counteſſe his wife, and all their fayre children, who will receyue you with great ioy, for ſo I hearde them ſay they would do.

The Queene is greatly comforted by Sir John Heynault.

Then the Queene ſayde, ſir I finde in you more loue and comfort then in all the worlde. And for this that you haue ſayde and affirmed vnto me, I thanke you a thouſand times: and if you will do this that you haue promiſed, in all curteſie and honour I and my ſonne ſhall be to you for euer bound, and the whole realme of Englande ſhall conſider your great curteſy and gentleneſſe, and it is right that it ſhould ſo be.

And after theſe wordes, when they were thus agreed, ſir John of Henault tooke his leaue of the Queene for that night, and went to Douaingne, and lay in the Abbey. And in the morning he tooke his horſe, and came againe vnto the Queene, who receiued him with great ioy: And before he came, the Queene had dyned, and was ready to mount on her horſe, and to go wyth him: And forthwith the Queene departed from the Caſtell of Dambrecourt, taking her leaue of the knight, and of the Lady, and thanked them for their gentle entertaynment, and ſayde, that ſhee truſted once that ſhe or her ſonne ſhould remember well their curteſie.

The Queene vſed no delayenge of her weyghtie affayres.

Thus departed the Queene in the company of Sir John Heynault, Lorde Beamont: who right ioyouſly did conduct her to Valenciens: and to ſalute and welcome her, there came many of the Burgeſſes of the Towne, and receaued hir right honorably. And ſo was ſhee brought before the Erle Guyllam of Henault, who receaued her with great ioye, and in like maner did the Counteſſe his wyfe, and feaſted her right nobly. And at the ſame time the ſayde Erle had foure fayre daughters, Margaret, Philip, Jane, and Iſabell. Among whome the young Prince Edward ſet moſt his loue, and had to his company Philip, and alſo that young Lady was in all honor more conuerſaunt with hym, then was any of hir ſiſters. Thus the Queene of England aboade at Valencians by the ſpace of. viij. dayes wyth the good Erle, and wyth the Counteſſe his wyfe, whoſe name was Jane de Valoys.

The Queene is right honorably receyued by the Erle of Henault.

In the meane ſeaſon, the Queene prepared and called on for the ſetting forward of her buſineſſe: and the aforeſayde Sir John wrote letters very effectuouſly vnto knightes, and ſuche companions as he truſted beſt in all Heynault, in Brabant, and in Behaigne, and prayed them of all loues and friendſhips that was betwene them, that they would go with him in this enterpryſe terprize into Englande, and there came great numbers, what of one Countrie and other, that were content to go with him for his loue. But this sayde Sir John Henault was greatly discouraged, and counsayled to the contrary both of the Erle hys brother, and of the chiefe of the counsell of the countrie, because it seemed to them that the enterprise was right highe and perilous, considering the great discorde and hatredes that then were in Englande amongst the Barons themselues. And also considering that the Englishmen most commonly haue enuye at straungers. Therefore they doubted that the sayde Sir John of Heynault, and his company shoulde not returne agayne with honour. But howsoeuer they blamed or counsayled him, the gentle knight would neuer chaunge his purpose, but sayd that he had but one death to dye, the which should be when and howe as God would, and sayde moreouer, that all knightes ought to ayde, to their powers, all Ladyes and damoselles, chased out of their awne Countries, being bothe without counsayle and comfort.

Sir John of Heynault is aduised not to take this enterprise in hand, but his voyage would forward, who euer said nay.

Now thys courageous and lusty knight assembled his people, and appointed at a daye, the Henaultes to be readie at Hale, the Brabanders at Bredas, and the Hollanders at Durdright. Then the Queene of Englande tooke her leaue of the Erle of Henault, and of the Countesse, and thanked them greatly for their honorable feastyng and great cheere that they had made her, and kissed them at her departure. Thus the Quene with her sonne and all the rest of her company came forward with Sir John of Heynault, who with muche adoe gate leaue to depart from his brother the Erle, sayeng vnto him: my Lorde and brother, I am young, and I thinke that God hath prouyded for me this enterprise for mine aduauncement. I beleue verily that wrongfully and synfully this Lady hath bene chased out of England, and also her sonne. It is almose and glorie to God, and to the worlde to comforte and helpe them that are comfortlesse, and specially so highe and noble a Lady as thys is, who is daughter to a king, and descended of a royall king: we be of her bloud, and she is of oures. I had rather renounce and forsake all that euer I haue, & go serue God ouer the sea, and neuer to returne into this coũtry, rather then thys good Lady should haue departed from vs without our comfort and helpe. Therefore deere brother, suffer me to go with your good will, wherein ye shall doe nobly, and I will geue you most humble thankes for the same, and my voyage shal be the more prosperous. And when the good Erle of Henault had well heard his brother, and perceaued the great desyre he had to this enterprice, and sawe well it might turne hym and hys heyres to great honour hereafter, sayde to him. My dere brother, God forbid that your good purpose should bee broken or let: therefore in the name of God I geue you leaue, and kyssed hym, streynyng hym by the hande, in token of great loue.

The Quene departeth frõ the Erle of Henault yeldyng great thankes for her honourable entertainment.

Howe Sir Iohn of Henault taketh his leaue of his brother the Erle

Thus he departed, and roade the same night to Mounce in Heynauld with the Quene of England. What should I make long processe, they made so speedie iourneys, that shortly they came to Durdright in Holland, where they made their speciall assembly. And there they prouyded for shippes great and small, such as they could get, and shipped their horses and harneys and other prouision, and committed themselues into the handes and defence of almightie God, and so tooke shypping, and set forward on their passage by Sea.

The names of the Lords and knightes that accompanied Sir Iohn of Heynault.

Sea. In thys company there were of knightes and Lordes: Firſt, Sir Iohn Heynault Lorde Beamond, Sir Henry Dautonig, Sir Wighell de Lyne, the Lorde of Gomegnes, Sir Perciuall de Semeries, Sir Robert de Bailleull, Sir Sampes de Bolloyt, the Lorde of Uertoigne, the Lorde of Pocelles, the Lorde Uillers, the Lord of Heyn, the Lorde of Sars, the Lorde of Boyſiers, the Lorde of Wambzeticourt, the Lorde of Sarmuell, and Sir Oulpharte of Guſtell, and dyuers other knightes and eſquyers, all in great deſyre to ſerue their mayſter. And when they were all departed from the hauen of Durdzight, they were foz their quantitie a very fayze fleete and well ozdered, and the weather was fayze, cleere and temperate, and at their departing with the firſt flood they came befoze the digneſſe of Holland.

Sir Iohn Heynault and the Quene with their company is embarked toward England.

And the next daye, they hoyſed vp their ſayles and tooke their waye in coaſtyng Zeland, & their entents were to haue taken land at Dongpozt, but they could not, foz a tempeſt toke them in the ſea, that put them ſo farre out of their courſe, ỹ they wiſt not of two dayes where they were, wherin God wzought mercifully foz them, foz if they had landed where they purpoſed to haue lãded, they had bene all loſt, foz they had fallen into the handes of their enimies, who knew wel of their comming, & abode them there to haue put them al to death.

Gods ſecret & moſt wonderfull wozke.

And it came ſo to paſſe that by the ende of two dayes, the tempeſt ceaſed, and the maryners diſcried lande in England, and therevnto dzewe right ioyfully, & there landed on the ſandes without any hauen oz pozt, nere vnto Harwich in Suffolk, as the Engliſh chzonicle ſayth, the .xxiiij. day of September 1325. and ſo taried on the ſands thzee daies with ſmal pzouiſion of victual, in ỹ which time they vnſhipped their hozſe & harneys, not knowing in what part of England they were, whether among their friends, oz in the daunger of their enimies. The fourth day they ſet fozward in ỹ aduenture, deſyzing God to be their guyde, and as people that had ſuffred cold and tempeſts, with hunger alſo and feare went weakely onward as well as they might. And thus they kept their courſe by hilles and dales on the one ſide & on the other, vntill at the laſt, they found Uillages, & a great Abbay of black Monkes, the which was called S. Hamon, where as they thzee dayes refreſhed themſelues wel. And then newes was ſpzead abzode thozough the realme, of the landyng of the Quene and of her ſonne, ſo that at the laſt it came to the knowledge of the Barons, by whom the Queene was called again into England, and they appareled themſelues in all haſte to come to Edwarde her ſonne, whome they would haue to their ſouereigne Lozd. And the firſt that came and gaue them moſt comfozt was Henry Erle of Lãcaſter with ỹ wzie neck, called Tozt toll, who was bzother to Thomas Erle of Lãcaſter ỹ was behedded, as ye haue heard befoze, who was a right vertuous & good knight as after ye ſhal here.

Quene Iſabell the wife of king Edward the ſecond and her ſonne Pzince Edward landed beſide Harwich.

How the Lordes came to the ayde of the Quene.

This Erle Henry came vnto the Quene with a great company of men of warre. And after him came from one part & other, Erles, Barons, knightes, and Eſquiers, with ſo many people that they thought themſelues out of all perilles, and their power ſtill encreaſed as they went.

So ſone as king Edward had knowledge of the landyng of the Quene his wife, and of his ſonne Pzince Edwarde, and heeryng alſo howe the Barons and Nobles of the realme reſozted vnto her with great powers from al partes: The king beyng then at London, left the ſayde Citie vnder the gouernment and ozder of Maiſter Walter Stapleton, Biſhop of Exeter, who was nowe high treasurer of England, and the king himselfe accompanyed with the Spencers, and a few other, taketh his way into Wales: But when he came to Bristowe, he caused that towne to be fortefyed, and committed the charge and custodie thereof vnto sir Hugh Spencer the elder, and the Erle of Arondell: and he himselfe with sir Hugh Spencer the yonger, entered into the Castell, and fortefied the same.

The Queene heerynge of the kinges departyng from London, did forthwith send her letter to the Maior and communaltie of the sayde Citie requyryng of them aide to subdue the oppressors of the cõmon wealth of the realme, and that they would see that the Citie of London & the Tower might be kept to the vse of the Prince her sonne: and sondrie other thinges were conteyned in the sayd letter, but for that the Copie that came to my hande seemed to conteyne diuerse repugnaunces, I haue therefore omitted the rehersall thereof. After the receipt of this letter, Fabian sayth, that Walter Stapleton, Bishop of Excester, to whome the custodie and gouernement of the Citie was committed, as aforesaide, sent to the Maior of London to haue the keyes of the Gates of the Citie by vertue of his commission, which the Maior, whose name was Hamond Chickwell, denyed. But the Bishop vsed suche stoute wordes in the kings name, to the Maior and Citizens, who had an euill opinion of him, for bearyng with the Spencers, whom the people hated as euill as the Deuill, and also for betrayng of the Queene and Prince as is aforesayde, that the sayde Citizens in a rage and fury tooke the sayde Bysshop the .xiij. day of October, and him with two of his housholde seruauntes beheaded at the Standard in Chepe in London, of the which two one was his brother, as appereth by a monument in the Cathedrall Church of Excester. And the same day, sayth Fabian, was taken for a spie a Citezen called John Marshal, which fauored the Spencers partie and was beheaded in the same place. And the dead corps of the said Bishop and his two seruants, & of Marshall were harped vnto the Thamys syde, where the sayd bishop had begon to buylde a tower, and there in the rubbishe or sand of the same, they buryed the foure bodyes aforesaide. And Polidore sayth that after the Citizens had thys done with the Bishop, that then they went vnto the Tower and possessed the same, and there killed and spoyled all the kinges officers, and put in new officers geuyng them charge to keepe the same for the Queene and her sonne the Princes vse. And when these thinges were done, the Maior sente vnto the Queene and her sonne three graue personages, and certefied them of all that the Citezens had done, with promise that they would obey whatsoeuer shoulde please the Queene and her sonne to commaund them, and that the Citie was quiet and at their commaundement: The which message the Queene and her sonne accepted very thankfully, and suffered not the Messengers to depart vnrewarded.

The Quene and her Lordes beyng thus assembled, as aforesayd, commsayled and agreed among themselues to go the streight way to Bristowe, where as the king was, who had with him the Spencers. The which was a good towne and a strong, and well closed, standyng on a good port of the sea, and a strong Castell, the sea beatyng round about it. And therein was the king, and sir Hugh Spencer the elder, who was aboue ninetie yeres of age, and sir Hugh Spencer his sonne, who was the chiefe gouernour of the king, and and coũsayled him in all his euill dedes. Also there was the Erle of Arondell, who had maryed the daughter of sir Hugh Spencer, & diuers other knightes and Esquiers attendyng and waytyng on the kinges Court.

The Queene besieged the citie of Bristow wherein the king was

Then the Queene and all her companie, the Lordes of Heynault Erles and Barons, and all other Englishe men, tooke the right way to the towne of Bristowe, and in euery towne where they entered, they were receyued with great feast and honour, and alwayes their people encreased, and so long they roade by their iourneyes, that at the last they came to Bristow, and besieged the towne round about as nere as they might. But the king and Sir Hugh Spencer the ponger helde them in the Castell, and the olde sir Hugh, and the Erle of Arondell abode in the towne.

And when the people of the towne sawe and considered what a power the Quene had, (for the greatest part of the whole power of England came with her,) and also perceiued what perill and daunger they themselues were presently in: They tooke counsaile among themselues, and determined to yelde vp the towne to the Queene, so that their lyues and goodes might be saued. And forthwith they sent to treate with the Queene and her counsaile in this matter: But the Queene nor her Counsayle would not agree therevnto, without she might do with sir Hugh Spencer, and with the Erle of Arondell, what her pleasure was.

When the people of the towne saw they could haue no peace otherwise, neyther saue the towne, their goodes, nor their lyues, beyng in that distresse they agreed to the Queene, and opened the Gates, so that sir John of Heynault, and all her Barons, knightes, and Esquires, entered into the towne, and tooke their lodgyngs within as many as might, and the rest without.

Sir Hugh Spencer the elder and the Erle of Arondell are taken and brought before the Queene.

Then sir Hugh Spencer, and the Erle of Arondell were taken, and brought before the Queene, to do her pleasure with them. Then also was brought to the Queene her awne childzen, John her sonne, & her two daughters, which had beene in the kepyng of the sayd Sir Hugh Spencer: At the sight of whome the Queene much ioyed, because she had not seene them long before. And at this tyme, it may well be coniectured, that the king and Sir Hugh Spencer the ponger, had great sorow and care, to see that they themselues were fast enclosed, and that the greatest part of the realme turned to the ayde and succour of the Queene, and to Edward her eldest sonne.

The heauy & daungerous estate of king Edward the second and the pong sir Hugh Spencer stood in.

Nowe when the Queene and her Barons, and all the companie that came with her, were lodged at their ease, then they besieged the Castell as nere as they might. And the Quene caused sir Hugh Spencer the elder, & the Erle of Arondell to be brought forth before her, and her sonne, & before all the Barons that were present: and sayd, that she and her sonne would take right and lawe vpon them accordyng to their desertes. Then sir Hugh Spencer said, Madame, God be to you a good iudge, and graunt vnto you good iudgement: and if we cannot haue it in this worlde, I pray God we may haue it in another. Then stood forth a good knight called sir Thomas Wage which was Marshall of the Queenes hoste, and there openly he red and rehersed their deedes in wrytyng: and turned him vnto another auncient knight, that he should proue him guiltie, and to shewe his opinion what was to be done with those persons, and what iudgement they should haue for such offences. Then the sayd knight counsayled with others, that is to say, with the Barons rons and Erles, and knightes there present, and then he reported their opinions and iudgementes. The which was, that they had well deserued death for their diuerse and horrible deedes that they had committed, and to haue iudgement three maner of wayes. First to be drawne, and after to be headed, and then their bodyes to be hanged on a Gibbet. And as this iudgement was geuen, so was it executed before the Castell gate of Bristow, in the sight of the king, and of sir Hugh Spencer the ponger. 1325.

The iudgement geuen against Sir Hugh Spẽcer the elder and the Erle of Arondell.

And after thys execution, the king and the yong Spencer seyng themselues thus trapped and besieged, and beyng wythout hope of any comfort: In a morning betymes, they two with a small companye entred into a little Vessell behinde the Castell, thinking to haue fled into the Countrie of Wales. And they were.xi. dayes in the ship, and enforced it to sayle as much as they might: But whatsoeuer they did, the winde was so contrary vnto them (for it seemed that God would so haue it) that euery daye once or twise they were brought againe within a quarter of a myle of the sayde Castell. At the last it happened Sir Henry Beamond, sonne to the Vicount Beamond in England (espyeng the sayd small Vessell so often to come before the Castell) to enter into a Barge and certaine companye with hym, and rowed after this Vessell so long, that the ship wherin the king was, could not make any great way before them, but at the last they were ouer taken, & so brought agayne to the Towne of Bristowe, and deliuered to the Queene and her sonne as prisoners.

The king and Sir Hugh Spẽcer the ponger fled, but fortune fauored them not.

The king and Sir Hugh Spẽcer the ponger taken.

Thus it befell of this high and hardy enterprize of syr John of Henault and his company. For when they came out of their countrie and entred into their shippes at Hurdzight, they were but three hundred men of armes. And thus by their helpe and the Lordes of England, Queene Isabell conquered agayne all her estate and dignitie, and put vnto execution her great enemies, to the great comfort and reioysing of the greatest parte of the realme.

A great enterprise of Sir John of Heynault a courageous and faithfull knight.

And when the king and Sir Hugh Spencer were brought to Bristow by the aforesayde Sir Henry Beamond. Then the king by the counsayle of all the Barons and knightes was sent vnto the strong Castell of Barkeley, and put in good and honest keeping, for there were ordeyned people of estate about him and such as knewe right well what they ought to doe: But they were streightly commaunded, that they should in no wise suffer him to passe out of the Castell. Then Sir Hugh Spencer the sonne was deliuered to Sir Thomas Wage Marshall of the hoste.

The king committed to the Castell of Barkeley.

These things done, the Quene set forward towards London, the chiefest Citie in Englande, and her grace and her sonne with all her hoste and company, tooke so their iourneyes, that at the last they came to the City of Hartford. And in all the waye, Sir Thomas Wage had caused syr Hugh Spencer to be bounde and to be set vpon a lewde Jade, and was lead after the Quene, and he had put vpon him a Tabarte, such as Traytors & theeues were wont to weare, & thus he passed thorough the townes with Trumpes & Pipes of Reedes blowen before him, to do him the more scorne & despight.

Sir Hugh Spencer the ponger lead about for wondermẽt, lyke a beast.

And when the Quene was come to Hertford, the Citizens receaued her very honorably with great solempnitie. And there she and all her company remayned & kept the feast of all Saintes very royally, and the more bountifully and honorably it was done, because of her sonne and the straũgers that were were preſent.

Nowe when this feaſt was done: then Sir Hugh Spencer the ſonne who was nothing beloued, was brought foorth before the Queene and all the Lordes and knightes. And before him in writyng was reherſed all hys deedes, vnto the which he would make no maner of aunſwere. And ſo was he then iudged by playne ſentence. Firſt, to be drawen on a hardell with Trompes and Trumpettes throughout all the Citie of Hertford, and after to be brought into the market place, where as all the people were aſſembled, and there to be tyed vpon an high ladder that euery man might ſee hym: & in the ſame place a great fyre to be made, and there hys priuie members to be cut from hym, and to be brent in the fyre before his face. And then his harte to be drawen out of his body and caſt into the fyre becauſe he had conſpired treaſon and was a falſe traytour in his heart, and that by his Trayterous counſell and extorcion the king had ſhamed his realme and brought the people thereof to a great michiefe, for he had cauſed to be beheaded the greateſt Lordes of his realme, by whome this Realme ought to haue beene gouerned and defended. And he had ſo enduced the king, that he would not ſee the Quene his wyfe, nor Edward his eldeſt ſonne, and cauſed hym to chaſe them out of the realme for feare of their lyues. And then his head was ſtryken off and ſent to London, and ſo according to his iudgement he was executed.

The arreignment & iudgement of Sir Hugh Spencer the yonger.

After this execution the Quene and all her Lordes tooke their waye to London, whereof the Citizens both ſhe and her ſonne, were very honorably and ioyfully receaued. Now after the ſtraungers had bene there feaſted.xb. dayes, they, namely Sir John of Heynault and all his company, had great deſyre to returne agayne into their awne countries, for they thought they had well done their deuoyre and atcheued great honor: and therefore tooke their leaue of the Quene and of the Lordes of the realme. But the Queene and the Lordes entreated them earneſtly to tary lenger, and chiefly that they ſhoulde ſee what ſhould be done with the king before they went. But the ſtraungers had ſuch minde home, that they would not be entreated to tarye any lenger. And when the Quene and her counſayle ſawe that, then yet ſhe intreated Sir John of Heynault to tarie vntill it was paſt Chriſtmas, and to reteigne with him ſuch of his company as pleaſed him beſt. And he lyke a gentle knight would not leaue to performe his ſeruice, but curteouſly graunted the Quene to tarrie as long as it ſhould pleaſe her, and he cauſed of hys company ſuch to tarie as he could entreat, which was but a fewe, for the reſt would needes awaye, with the which he was diſpleaſed.

Sir John of Henault deſireth licence to depart to his countrie.

The ſtraungers depart, but ſir John of Henault tarryeth.

When the Quene and her counſayle ſawe that no intreatie could cauſe them to tarie any lenger: Then ſhe made vnto them great chere and feaſtes. And the Queene cauſed to be geuen vnto them plentie of Golde and Syluer for their coſtes and ſeruices, and alſo rewarded euerye of them with riche and goodly Jewelles, according to their eſtates and degrees, ſo as they all helde themſelues right well pleaſed and contented. And beſides this, they had money for their horſſes, ſuch as they would leaue behinde them at their awne price, without any grudging.

And thus Sir John of Henault abode ſtill in Englande with a ſmall company, but he was ſo beloued, chered, and feaſted of the Engliſhe men (who honored him in the best maner that they could imagyne) and recreated him with sundrie disportes and pastymes, that the time seemed the lesse vnto him. And in lyke maner he was welcomed to the Ladies and Damosels: for at that tyme there was with the Quene many Ladies and Countesses, which came specially to accompany the Quene.

Nowe after that the most part of the companie of Henault were departed, and sir John of Henault Lorde of Beamond taryed: The Queene discharged her armie, and gaue them leaue to returne home euery man to his Countrie and place, sauyng certeine noble men, which she still kept about her and her sonne as their counsaylors, and all the other knightes and gentlemen she commaunded to returne againe at Christmasse, at which tyme she promised to keepe open houshold, and so she did. And immediately after the dispatche of these people, the Queene with her sonne, by the aduice of her counsaile sommoned her high Court of Parliament at Westminster, which began the.xxj. day of January. And in this assembly it was declared that this realm could not continue without a heade and gouernour: And therefore first they agreed to drawe into articles the misgouernement of the king that was in prison, and all his euill doynges, which he had done by euill and naughtie counsaile: And when the sayd articles were read and made knowen to all the Lordes, Nobles, and Commons of the realme, then they consulted howe the realme should be gouerned thencefoorth: and after good deliberation and consideration of the aforesaid articles of the kinges euill gouernement, they concluded, that such a man was not worthie to be a king, nor to weare a crowne royall. And therfore they all agreed that Edward his eldest sonne, who was there present, and was rightfull heyre, should be crowned king in steed of his father, so that he would take about him, sage, true, and good counsaile, and that from thencefoorth the realme might be better gouerned, then before it had bene. And it was also agreed, that the olde king his father should be well and honestly kept as long as he lyued, accordyng to his estate.

A parliament at westminster.

And so sone as all things were cõcluded, as aforesayd, it was then further ordred & agreed, that during the Parliament time, a solemne message should be sent vnto the king to Kenelworth Castell, to declare vnto him not onely the determination of the three estates concernyng his deposyng from the kingdome, but also to resigne vnto him in the name of the whole realme, all their homages that before tyme they had done vnto him. And to do this message there was assigned three Bishops, three Erles, two Abbots, two Barons, and two Justices, with the speaker of the Parliament, whose name was sir William Trussell. And when these Messengers were come into the kinges presence at Kenelworth aforesayde, the aforenamed sir William Trussell the xxb. day of January by the authoritie of his office in the heering of the aforesayd Lordes, vsed vnto the king these wordes folowyng.

Kenelworth Castell.

I William Trussell in the name of all men of this land of England, and speaker of the Parliament, resigne to thee Edward, the homage that sometime was made vnto thee, and from this time foorth depriue thee of all kingly power, and I shall neuer be attendant vnto thee as king, after this time.

The deposition of king Edward the seconde.

Nowe sir John of Heynault, who had remayned with the Queene all the Christmasse, and perceyuyng king Edwarde deposed, who had reigned king of this realme fully.xviij. yeres. vj. monethes, and odde dayes, desired licence of the Queene, and would needes depart, and could by no meanes be entreated to tary any lenger: Wherefore the Queene by the assent of her sonne and counsaile gaue vnto him foure hundreth markes sterlyng, of rent, heritable to holde of the king in fee, to be payde euery yere in the towne of Bridges. This gift after the rate that money was then valued, which was at .xx. pence the ounce, and our money is now valued at fiue shillynges the ounce, was after that rate of our money nowe currant .viij. hundreth pound yerely. And likewise the Queene rewarded Philip of Chasteaux his chiefe Esquier and Counsaylour, with one hundreth markes of yerely rent, to be payde at the aforesayde place. And also she deliuered vnto them great summes of money to pay for their costes and charges, when they were ouer the sea, beside many riche and massy Cheynes, and costly Jewelles, that she rewarded all the Gentlemen withall that came with him. And when this noble knight was readie to depart, the Queene caused him to be conducted with many noble knightes and Gentlemen to Douer, and there deliuered him and all his passage free. And to the Ladyes that were come into England with the Queene, and namely to the Countesse of Garennes, who was sister to the Erle of Barre, and to diuerse other Ladyes and Damosells, there were geuen many riche and fayre Jewelles at their departure.

King Edward kept in the Castell of Kenelworth.

And here to ende and finishe this history of king Edward the seconde, ye haue heard howe he was deposed, and remayned in the Castell of Kenelworth vnder the custody and kepyng of Sir Henry Erle of Lancaster, which was brother vnto Erle Thomas of Lancaster, that was behedded at Pomfret. And Robert Baldocke, who was the kinges Chauncelour beyng a man of very euill name and fame, was committed to the prison of Newegate in London, where shortly after he dyed miserably. And the Erle Iohn of Arondell was put to death at Herforde within foure dayes after sir Hugh Spencer the sonne.

Edwarde the thirde.

After the depolicion of king Edward the seconde, as before ye haue heard, then Edward hys sonne, begotten of Isabell the only daughter and child of Philip le Beaw ỳ French king, was proclaymed king of Englande by the name of king Edward the thirde (hys father yet lyuyng) the .xxvj. day of Januarij. 1326. and was crowned at Westminster vpon Candlemas daye then next followyng, beyng then of the age of .xv. yeres.

And first he confirmed the liberties and Fraunchises of the Citie of Lõdon, and ordeyned that the Maior for the tyme beyng should sit in all places of iudgement within the liberties of the same for chiefe Justice, the kinges person onely except. And that euery Alderman that had bene Maior, should be Justice in all London, and Middlesex, and euery Alderman that had not bene Maior, should be Justice of peace within his awne warde. And also he graunted to the Citezens, the Fee farme of London for three hundred pound by the yere, & that they should not be cõstreyned to go out of the Citie to fight or defend the land for any neede. Also that after ỳ day, the Fraunchises of the Citie should not be seased into the kings hands, but onely for treason & rebellion done by the whole City. And at that time also Southwarke was admitted to be vnder the gouernement and rule of the Citie, and the Maiour of London to be Bailyfe of Southwarke, and the Maior to chose vnder hym suche a Bailife of that Borough as him lyketh, the which ordynaunce endureth to this day.

Every Alderman that hath bene Maior, is a Justice in London and Myddlesex, and euery other Alderman to be a Justice of peace in his awne Wardes.

About the Moneth of Aprill, many great and sundrie sutes were made for the releasing of king Edward that was in prison. But among all other, the Freer preachers, commonly called the Black Fryers, laboured most earnestly for him, and practised sundry deuises both by night and day which way to get him out of prison. And among the companye that the Fryers had priuely procured & brought, there was one Fryer called Dunhed, which should haue bene the chife Capitaine and worker of their enterprice, but he was bewrayed and taken, and then put into the Castell of Pomfret, and there he dyed in prison.

Shortly after, syr Henry Erle of Lancaster that had Edward the kinges father in keeping, did by the commaundement of the king deliuer the sayde Edward by Indenture to Sir Moryce of Barkeley. And then Sir John Matreuers and the sayde Sir Moryce led him to the Castell of Barkeley, and kept him there safely. And often tymes while the king was there imprisoned, he would say vnto his keepers. What haue I trespassed Isabell my my wife or Edward my sonne which nowe is made king, that none of them will come and visit me? And then his keepers answered, my worthy Lorde be not offended that I tell you a truth: the cause is, for that they are certefied, in thys wise, that if the Quene your wyfe came any thing nere you, that ye would strangle and kyll her. And that ye would doe lykewise to the king your sonne. Then answered he with heauie chere: alas, alas, am not I here in prison, & at your awne will? and God I take to witnesse I neuer thought it: But I would to God I were deade, for then were I past all my trouble.

The olde king is remoued to Barkley Castell.

And shortly after, the king thorough the counsell of Sir Roger Mortymer, as sayth Carton in his Chronicle (which he calleth the Frute of Tyme) graunted the keeping and garde of Sir Edward his father vnto Sir Thomas Colourley, and to the aforesayde Sir John Matreuers by his letter sealed, and cleerely discharged the aforesayde Sir Moryce of the keeping of him. And then they toke and led the king vnto the Castell of Corfe, the which Castell the king hated to the death: But other writers saye, that he was brought to the Castell of Barkeley, but what Castell soeuer it was, there, sayth mine Authour, they kept him vntill September next follo-wyng. And then the aforesayde Sir Roger sent a letter vnto them, signifyeng howe and in what wise he should be put to death. And anone after that the aforesayde Thomas and John had receyued the letter, and considered the contents therof, they made the king good cheere and good countenaunce at his supper, when he thought least of the purposed treason. And when bed tyme came, the king went to his bed and laye and slept soundely. And he beyng in his sound sleepe, these traytours and false forswoorne persons agaynst their homage and fealtie, came priuely into his Chamber, and their company with them, and layde a great Table vpon his belly, and with strength of men at all the foure corners pressed it downe vpon his body, wherewith the king awooke and beyng sore afrayde of death, turned hys bodye, so that then he laye grouelyng. Then these murderers tooke a horne and thrust it vp into his fundement as farre as they might, and then tooke a hote burnyng Spit, and put it thorough the horne into his body, and in the ende kylled and vilye murdered him: but yet in suche wise, that after his death it could not be perceyued howe he came by his death, but being dead he was after buryed at Gloucester.

Sir Roger Mortimer deuiled the maner how king Edward should be put to death.

The maner how king Edward was murdered.

Now, sayth Froissart, after the departure of Sir John of Heynault, the yong king of England, and the Queene his mother gouerned the realme by the counsayle of the Erle of Kent Uncle vnto the king, and by the counsaile of sir Roger Mortimer, of whome mencion is made before in the .xvij. yere of king Edward the second, the which Mortimer was taken when the Barons and Lords were taken, as aforesayd, and he was no smal doer among them, and therefore was committed to the tower of London, where in the begynnyng of August next folowyng, by the meane of a sleapyng poyson or drinke that he gaue to his kepers (as the common fame went) he escaped, and went with the Queene into Fraunce, and returned againe with her, as before you haue heard. And besydes these counsaylors, the king vsed much counsaile of Sir Thomas Wage, who was accomted for a very sage and graue counsaylour, but these counsaylours were not without some enemies, as fewe counsaylors are (as sayth Froyssart) the which commonly happeneth, not only in England, but also in all other countries.

Sir Thomas Wage a graue counsaylour.

About this tyme, Robert le Bruze king of Scottes, who had bene hardie and suffered much trauaile against Englishe men, and oftentimes in the life of king Edward the first, Graundfather to this yong king Edward the thirde, he had bene chased and discomfited, and was nowe become very aged, and sicke (as it was sayde) of the great euill and maladie: He nowe herryng of the troubles of late happened in England, and of the deposyng of the olde king, and also of the puttyng to death of certeine of his counsaylors (as before you haue heard) thought a meete tyme for him to enter this realme, and to inuade the same, and the rather because king Edward the third was yong. And therefore about Easter in the yere of our Lorde. 1327. he sent his letters of defiaunce vnto the aforesayd yong king, sendyng him worde how that he would enter into the realme of England, and brenne before him as he had done before tyme, at suche season as the discomfiture was at the Castell of Estreuelyn, where the Englishe men receyued great damnage.

Robert le Bruze king of Scottes. sendeth letters of defiance to king Edward.

When the king of England and his counsaile perceyued that they were defied, they caused it to be knowen ouer all the realme, and commaunded that the the Nobles, and all the other ſhould be in a redineſſe, euerye man after his eſtate by Aſcention day next after, at the Citie of Yorke. The king ſent much people before to kepe the frontiers againſt Scotland, and with much ſpeede he ſent a great Imbaſſade to ſir John of Heynault, prayyng him right effectuouſly that he would ayde him, and accompanie him in this voyage againſt the Scottes, and that he would be with him at Yorke the day before appoynted, with ſuch companie as he might get of men of warre in thoſe partes.

Sir John of Heynault ſent for to ayde king Edward.

When ſir John of Henault Lord of Beamond hearde the kinges deſire, he ſent ſtreight his letters, and his meſſengers into euery place where as he thought to recouer or atteyne any company of men of warre. And ſhortly to tell, the ſayde ſir John Henault made ſuch ſpeede that he landed at Douer, accompanied with a great number of valiaunt knightes, to the number of fiue hundreth men of armes, whoſe names for tediouſneſſe I ouerpaſſe, and within three dayes of Whitſonday, he with all his Lordes and knightes came to Yorke, where the king and his mother then were, being accompanied with all their Nobles, and a great hoſte tarying the commyng of ſir John of Heynault: But the king had ſente many of his Lordes and men of armes and common people before, and lodged them fiue or ſixe mile before him. And when ſir John of Henault was come to the king and Queene, he and hys Lordes and knightes were moſt ioyouſly receyued, and heartely welcõmed. And ſuch as came with ſir John of Henault, were lodged in the Suburbes of the Citie of Yorke, and ſir John Henault himſelfe was lodged in an Abbey of white Monkes, where he and his houſholde remayned.

Sir John of Heynault and his company are hartely welcommed to the king and Quene.

And the king of England the better to feaſt and enterteyne the ſtraunge Lordes and knightes, helde a great feaſt on Trinitie Sonday in the Friers, where he and the Queene his mother were lodged, kepyng their houſe eche of them apart. At this feaſt the king had there beſyde his Nobles, fiue hundreth knightes that gaue their attendaunce vpon the ſtraungers, and lykewiſe had the Queene aboue. lx. Ladyes and Damoſelles, and all to chere ſir John Heynault and the ſtraungers.

The king feaſteth the ſtraungers.

There might haue bene ſeene much noblenеſſe: And there were Ladies and Damoſels freſhly apparelled ready to haue daunced if they might haue had leaue. But ſuch was the vnhappy chaunce, ꝑ incontinent after diner there began a great fray betweene ſome of the gromes and pages of the ſtraũgers, and of the Archers of England, which were lodged among them in the ſayd ſuburbes: And anone all the Archers aſſembled them together with their Bowes, and droue the ſtraungers home to their lodgings. And the moſt parte of the knights and Maſters of them were as then in the kings Court: But aſſone as they heard tydings of the fray, eche of them drew to their lodgyngs in great haſte, ſo many as might enter, & ſuch as could not get in, were in great perill. For the Archers who were to the number of three thouſand ſhot fiercely, ſparyng neyther maſters nor varlets. And it was thought and ſuppoſed that this fray was begonne by ſome of the friendes of the Spencers and of the Erle of Arondels, who were put to death before by the ayde and counſayle of Sir John of Henault, as is afore ſayde, and as then thought to be ſomewhat reuenged by ſetting of diſcord in the hoſte. And the Engliſhmen that were Hoſts to theſe ſtraungers, ſhut faſt their dores & Wyndowes, and would not ſuffer them to enter into their lodgings: Howbeit ſome gate in on the backside and quicklie armed themselues, but they durst not issue out into the streete for feare of arrowes: Then the straungers breakyng out on the backsydes, brake downe Pales and hedges of Gardyns and drew them into a certaine playne place, and there taryed for their company, till at the last they were an hundreth men of armes and mo, and as manye mo vnharnessed, which could not get into their lodgings. And when they were assembled together, they made speede to succour and releue their companions who defended their lodgings in the great strete. And as they went forth, they passed by the lodging of the Lorde of Denghyen, where as there was greate gates both before and behynde openyng into the streete, and the Archers of Englande shot fiercely at that house, and there were many of the Henawdes hurt. But finally the Archers that were at that fray were discomfited and put to chase, and there were of them dead in that place about the number of three hundred, & as the report was, they were all Lincolnshiremen. But continually after thys fray the straungers were in great feare. And the king was greatly offended therewith, but the numbers were so great, and the tales so diuerse of the begynnyng of this Fray, that no certaintie was had, neyther might the king as then go about the examination thereof. And after thys fray they soiourned and remayned in the same place the space of three weekes, but the straungers beyng afeard of the Englishmen, did in the meane time make many good deuises and ordynaunces for their awne sauegarde. And at the ende of three weekes, knowledge came from the king to the Marshals of the hoste, that the next weeke euery man should prouyde for Cartes and Chariots with Tentes and Pauilions to lye in the field, & for all other necessaries therevnto belonging, to the entent to draw into Scotland. And when the time came, the king of England and his hoste heard of the fyres that the Scottes made daylie in England, for the Scottes vnknowne to the kings armie were gotten ouer the ryuer of Tyne and were entred into Englande: But the king with all his power in all possible hast folowed them, and hunted them from towne to towne, and from mountayne to mountayne, and from place to place, from day to day, and weeke to weeke, by the space of v. weekes and when the king thought himselfe most sure of them and had hedged them in, they escaped at Midnight and were gone where the king could not follow them, for his people, were tyred, and the wayes were ouer such mountaynes and thorough marishes and such combersome places that he lost both manye of his people and also of hys carryages. And so this puyssaunt armye, which was deuided into three battailes, wherein were .xxx. thousand armed men, and .xxiiij. thousande Archers, beside two wynges, wherein were fiue hundreth good men of armes, returned home agayne with euill luck, and did nothing at all worthy the wryting. But surely it was a very chargeable armye vnto the king and the realme, for besides the prouision of all the Englishmen and their munition, the very charges of Sir John Henault and the straungers that came with him were so great, that the king lacked money presentlye to pay them, and Sir John of Heynault tooke vpon hym to promise the payment therof, which, as Froissart sayth, was payd within one yere followyng, euery man accordyng to his awne askyng. But the euil hap of this iourney, was imputed to Sir Roger Mortymer who afterwarde was charged therewith as ye shall here.

The straungers were in great feare of the Englishmen.

The king with his armie setteth forward into Scotland.

The Scots came ouer the ryuer of Tyne, and so entred into England, and our army nothing prouided therevnto.

The king of England returneth without doyng anye thing in Scotland.

The greatnesse and strength of the armie of Englande.

Now

Now after the returne of the king out of Scotland, and breakyng vp of the ſayd warre, the gentle knight ſir Iohn of Henault tooke his leaue of the king and Queene, and departed with all his men of armes into their coũtrie. Sir Iohn of Heynault taketh his leue of the king.

And ſhortly after, the king and the Queene his mother, the Erle of kent his Uncle, the Erle of Lancaſter, and ſir Roger Mortimer, who then bare the chiefe rule of this realme vnder the king, and all the Barons of England with the aduice and conſent of the kinges Counſaile, ſent a Biſhop and two knightes Banerettes, with two notable Clerkes, to Sir Iohn of Heynault, praiyng him to be a meane that theyr Lorde the yong king of England might haue in mariage the yongeſt daughter of the Erle of Henault his brother, named Philip: for the king and all the Nobles of the Realme deſyred rather to haue her then any other Ladye, chiefely for the loue they bare vnto the ſaid Sir Iohn of Henault. And when the Ambaſſadors were come to Sir Iohn of Henault (who right gently and honourably enterteyned them) and that they had ſhewed their meſſage and ambaſſade vnto him. He then (after that he had feaſted them and made vnto them great cheere) brought them to Ualenciens to the Erle his brother, who alſo right honourably receyued them, and made vnto them merueylous great and coſtly cheere, which were to long here to reherſe. But when they had expreſſed and ſhewed the content of the meſſage or ambaſſade vnto the Erle. The Erle ſayd, Sirs I thanke greatly and moſt hartely the king your Prince, and the Queene his mother, and all the Lordes of England, for that they haue ſent ſuch ſufficient perſons as you be, to do me ſuche honour as to treate for the mariage, to the which requeſt I do right well agree, if our holy father the Pope will conſent therevnto. With the which aunſwere the Ambaſſadors were right well content, and forthwith they ſent two knightes, and two Clerkes to the Pope to Auignion to purchaſe a diſpenſation for this mariage. For without licence they might not mary, becauſe they were of kinne in the thirde degree, for their two mothers were coſyn Germaynes, and iſſued of two brethren. And to be ſhort, the licence was graunted, and the Meſſengers returned and brought the ſame from the Pope, vnto Ualenciens, and then was this mariage concluded on both partes. And the mariage was forthwith made, and ſolempnized by procuration from the king of England. And after the ſolemnitie thereof, and the feaſtes ended: this yong Queene came onward of her iourney, and tooke ſhippyng at Wiſant, and ſafely arriued with all her companie at Douer. And ſir Iohn of Henault her Uncle did conduct her to the Citie of London, where ſhe was moſt honourably and triumphantly receyued. Froiſſart. But Fabian ſayth, this marryage was ſolemnized in Yorke. In Ambaſſade ſent vnto ſir Iohn Heynault for a mariage to be concluded for king Edward with his brother the Erle of Henaultes daughter named Philip.

Nowe when all thinges were finiſhed that belonged to the receyuyng of the yong Quene, then ſir Iohn of Henault Uncle to the Queene, tooke hys leaue of the king and the yong Queene, and alſo of the olde Queene, and of all the Lordes and Barons of England, and ſo departed towardes his countrie, beyng conducted to the See with the companie of diuers and ſundrye Lordes.

Soone after his departure, the king at whitſontide folowyng called his high Court of Parliament at Northhampton. At the which Parliament (as ſayth Fabian) by ỹ enill counſaile of ſyr Roger Mortimer, & the old Quene, (as the common fame and report was) the king made with the Scottes an vnprofitable A parliamẽt at Northhampton.

A dishonourable peace made with the Scottes.

vnprofitable and a dishonorable peace, to endure three yeres. For first, he released vnto them their fealtie and homage, and he deliuered vnto them theyr olde and auncient writyngs, sealed with the Seales of the kinges of Scots, and of diuerse Lordes of the land, both spirituall & temporal, with many other Charters and Patentes, namely one called Ragman, by the which the king of Scottes bound himselfe and them to be Feodaries to the Crowne of England. At the which tyme also were delyuered certeine Jewelles, which before tymes had bene wonne from the Scottes by kinges of England, and among other, the blacke crosse of Scotland is chiefely named. And not onely the king by thys doyng lost the right and title that he had to the realme of Scotland, so farre as he could passe from it, but also all the Lordes and Barons, and all other men of Englande that had any landes or rentes within Scotland, lost their right in lyke maner, except they would dwell vpon the sayde landes, and become the king of Scottes liege men. And shortly after was concluded a mariage, betweene Dauid le Bruze, sonne of Robert le Bruze, and Jane the kinges sister, which of diuers writers is surnamed Johan of Towres.

A parliamẽt at Sarisbury

Shortly after, there was another Parliament holden at Salsbury, or rather Sarisbury, at the which Parliament sir Roger Mortimer was made Erle of Marche against the minde and will of all the Barons, and sir John of Eltham the kinges brother, was made Erle of Cornewall: To the which Parliament, Henry Erle of Lancaster would not come. Wherefore the king was brought in beliefe, that he ment euill towardes him, and that he purposed the destruction of his person. For the which, the king by the meane of sir Roger Mortimer, caused to be assembled a great hoste, and made towardes Bedford, where Erle Henry lay with his company. Then the Erle Marshal, and the Erle of Kent, made a peace betweene the king and the Erle of Lancaster: on whose part was sir Henry Lord Beamond, sir Fouke Fytzwayn, sir Thomas Rocellyn, sir William Trussell, sir Thomas Wyther, and about an hundreth knightes, who all were exiled and banished Englande, by the counsaile of Queene Isabell, and the Erle Mortimer. For the sayd Mortimer was couetous, and thought to haue obteyned all their landes.

This yere Robert le Bruze the false king of Scottes dyed of a leapory, leauyng behinde him his sonne Dauid of the age of. viij. yeres, whome the Scottes receyued willyngly for their king.

Sir Edmõd of woodstock Erle of Kent apprehended.

Also about this tyme (as sayth Fabian) sir Edmond of Woodstock Erle of Kent, supposyng that his brother king Edward the second had beene aliue, (for so he was informed,) and mindyng a reformation of the misorder of the realme, wrote certeine letters vnto him, conteynyng deuyses for his deliuery, and sent them vnto him: Of the which doyng he was shortly after accused, by the procurement of sir Roger Mortimer, who ought him malice. And by authoritie of parliament holden at Winchester, about Whitsontide folowyng, he for that deede was adiudged to haue his heade smitten off, which execution was done in the sayd Citie of Winchester the. xrb. day of May folowyng.

But Froissart sayth, he was behedded the. x. daye of October. And not long after sayth he (it was openly reported) that Isabell the kinges mother was with childe by Mortymer: and howe that the sayde Mortymer had caused the king to put to death his Uncle without reasonable or iust cause, for all the realme accompted him for a noble and good man.

The .xv. daye of June was borne the kinges firſt ſonne at Woodſtock, and was named Edward, which in proceſſe of tyme did grow to a noble and famous man, and was in his dayes accompted the Flower of all Chyualrye throughout all the worlde, and alſo ſome writers name him the black prince.

In this time the king helde his high Court of Parliament at London (as ſayth Fabian) duryng which tyme the king cauſed Sir Roger Mortymer Erle of Marche to be apprehended at Nottyngham, and brought to Lõdon. And before the Lordes and nobles were expreſſed and declared in wrytyng, the wickednelle and offences of the ſayde Mortymer. Then the king demaunded of his counſaile what ſhould be done with him: And all the Lords by one aſſent gaue iudgement and ſayd, he hath deſerued to die the ſame death that Sir Hugh Spencer the ſonne dyed. And after thys iudgement there was no ſparyng, reſpite or delaye could be graunted: but incontinent, he was drawen on a hardell thorough London, and then ſet on a Ladder, and hys members cut from him, and caſt into the fyre, and hys heart alſo, becauſe he had conſpired treaſon, and then quartered, and his quarters ſent to foure of the beſt Cities of the realme, and his head ſet vpon London Bridge. Thus farre Froiſſart. 1329

The like iudgement that Mortimer procured for Spencer the ponger he taſted nowe of himſelfe.

But Fabian ſayth, he was charged and condempned for ſundry articles, whereof he maketh mencion of fyue eſpeciall, which follow.

Articles alleged againſt ſir Roger Mortimer.

1 Firſt, that Sir Edwarde of Carnarlian, which was king Edward the ſecond, was by his meanes, by moſt tyrannous death murthered in the Caſtel of Barkeley.

2 The ſecond, that to the kings great diſhonour and dammage, the Scots by his meanes and treaſon, eſcaped from the king at the Parke on Stanhope, which then ſhould haue fallen in the kings daunger, if the ſayd Roger had not fauoured them.

3 The thirde, that he for the execution of the ſayde Treaſon, receaued of the Capitaine of the ſayde Scottes, named Sir James Douglas, great ſummes of money: but another writer ſayth, he receaued .xx. thouſand pound and alſo that he had for lyke meede, to the great diſhonour of the king, and hurt of this realme, concluded a peace betwene the king and the Scottes, and cauſed to be delyuered vnto them, the Chartre or Indenture called Ragman, with many other things, to the Scottes great aduantage, and to the great diſhonour of the imperiall ſtate of this realme of England.

4 The fourth, he was charged, that by ſiniſter and vnlawfull meanes, contrary to the kings pleaſure and will, or aſſent of the Lordes of the kings counſaile, he had gotten into his poſſeſſion much of the kings treaſure, and that he had prodigally and vnſkilfully waſted and ſpent the ſame. By reaſon wherof, the king was in neceſſity and driuen perforce to aſſay his friends.

5 The fift, that he had impropered vnto him diuers wards, belonging vnto the king, to his great gayne, and the kinges great hurte: and that he was more ſecret with Quene Iſabell the kings mother, then was to Gods pleaſure or the kings honour.

The Quene committed to priſon.

Sone after this, the king by the aduiſe of his counſell, commaunded that the Quene his mother ſhould be kept cloſe in a Caſtell, and to haue appointed to attende vpon her certaine Ladies and damozelles, and knightes and Eſquires according to her eſtate, and certaine landes were aſſigned wherewith to maintayne her noble eſtate during her lyfe: But ſpeciall commiſſion was geuen, that ſhe ſhould not departe out of the Caſtell, onleſſe it were to ſee ſuch ſpoꝛtes as ſometime were ſhewed beſoꝛe the Caſtell gate foꝛ her recreation. Thus this Lady led there her lyfe meekely, and once oꝛ twiſe a yere the king her ſonne came to viſite and ſee her.

In this yere, ſayth Polidoꝛe, John Archbiſhop of Cauntoꝛbury aſſembled hys clergie together at a Synode holden at London, in the which after dyuers abuſes remoued, and other good things reſtoꝛed in their places, he then and there among other things, by the conſent of the ſaide Synode, excommunicated all thoſe, whatſoeuer they were, generally, that were guiltie of the death of Walter Stapleton Biſhop of Exceſter, oꝛ did pꝛocure oꝛ conſent to the ſame, oꝛ layde any handes vpon him. The which maner of doyng ſeemeth ſomewhat ſtraunge to mee, foꝛ the ſayde Stapleton as beſoꝛe ye haue heard was put to death by the Citezens as an enimie to the Quene, and was alſo the ſame yere and in the firſt Parliament that king Edwarde the thirde helde, attaynted of high treaſon by name, with the two Spencers afoꝛe mencioned, but I leaue this to the conſideration and iudgement of the reader.

And Polidoꝛe ſayth moꝛeouer, that the ſayde Stapleton Biſhop of Exceſter paraduenture did foꝛeſee that he could not long continue in the ſeruice of pꝛinces with the ſauetie of his lyfe, and therefoꝛe (when he had time) he builded at Oxfoꝛd two notable houſes, that ſhould endure many hundꝛeds of yeres, whereof the one to this day is called Exceſter Colledge, and the other is called Hartes hall, in the which he placed a number of ſcholers, with right woꝛthy and good maintenance.

Now after that the king had cauſed to be done the afoꝛeſayd executions, he choſe vnto hym newe counſaylours of the nobleſt and ſageſt perſons of his realme. And towarde the ende of thys yere Philip Ualoys, beyng newly crowned king of Fraunce, all the Barons of hys realme came to him to doe their homage and Fealtie, and likewiſe did all other noble perſonages that helde of him, except the king of England, who had not done his homage foꝛ the Duchy of Guyan, neyther was he ſommoned therevnto. Wherefoꝛe, the French king by the aduiſe of his counſayle, ſent as an Ambaſſade into Englande, the Loꝛde Aupetnes, the Loꝛde Beaulſalt, and two noble Clarkes Mayſters of the Parliament of Paris, whoſe names were, Mayſter Petꝛ of Oꝛlyaunce and Mayſter Peter of Maſiers. Theſe foure departed from Paris, and came into Englande to the king then beyng at Wyndſoꝛe. The king of Englande foꝛ the honour of the French king his Coſyn, cauſed them to come into his pꝛeſence, and receaued them honoꝛably, and then they publiſhed their meſſage vnto the king. And the king aunſwered that as then the nobles of his realme was not about him, neyther was his counſell then pꝛeſent, wherefoꝛe he pꝛayed them to reſoꝛt to the Citie of London, and there to ſtay awhile, and they ſhould haue aunſwere to their contentation. And ſo they dyned in the kinges Chamber, and after departed, and laye the ſame night at Colbꝛoke, and the next day at London.

Ambaſſadoꝛs ſent from the French king to king Edward to demaunde homage foꝛ the Duchie of Guian.

And ſhoꝛtly after, the king came to his palace at Weſtminſter where he aſſembled all his counſaile: And thether came the French Ambaſſadoꝛs, and there agayne declared the occaſion of their comming, and deliuered their letters. Then the king and his counſell went aſide into the counſell Chamber, and and counſayled what was to be done. And they agreed that the Imbaſſadors ſhould be aunſwered by the ordynaunce and ſtile of his predeceſſors, by the Biſhop of London. Then were the Frenchmen called into the counſayle Chamber.

The Biſhop of London then ſayde, ye Lordes that are here aſſembled for the king of Fraunce. The kings grace my ſouereigne Lorde hath heard your wordes and read the tenour of your letters. And for aunſwere, we ſay vnto you, that we will counſell the king our ſouereigne Lorde here preſent, that he go into Fraunce to ſee your maſter his deare Coſyn, who right louingly hath ſent for him. And as touching his faith and homage, he will doe his deuoyre in euery thing that of right he ought to doe. And ye may ſhewe vnto the king your maſter, that within ſhort ſpace that the king of England our maſter will arryue in Fraunce, and there to doe all that reaſon ſhall require. An anſwere made to the Imbaſſadors by the Biſhop of London.

Then theſe Meſſengers, after they had beene feaſted, and that the king had rewarded them with great giftes, and riche Jewelles, they tooke their leaue, and at the laſt came to Parys to king Philip, to whome they declared their aunſwere and meſſage: Whereof the Frenche king was right glad and ioyfull, when he vnderſtood of the kinges commyng, for he was very deſyrous to ſee him, becauſe he neuer ſawe him, and yet was hys nere Coſyn and kinſman. Then the French king cauſed this to be ſpread abroade throughout all Fraunce. Then Dukes, Erles, and other Lordes apparelled and appoynted themſelues in their beſt maner. And the Frenche king wrote his letters to king Charles of Behaygne his Coſyn, and to the king of Nauerre, certefiyng them of the day and time when the king of England would be in Fraunce, deſiryng them to be with him at the ſame day and tyme, and ſo they came with a great aray. Then was it counſailed the French king, that he ſhould receyue the king of England at the Citie of Amyas, and there to make prouiſion for his commyng: There were Halles, Chambers, Hoſteries, and lodgynges made redy, and apparelled to receaue them all and their companie. And alſo for the Duke of Burgoyne, the Duke of Burbon, the Duke of Lorreyn, and Sir John of Arthoys. There was prouiſion made for a thouſand horſe, and for ſixe hundreth horſe that ſhould come wyth the king of England.

The yong king forgate not his voyage into Fraunce, and beyng furniſhed of all thing mete for him and his trayne, he departed out of England, accompanied with three Biſhoppes, foure Erles whoſe names were, Henry Erle of Darby, the Erle of Salſbury, the Erle of Warwike, and the Erle of Herſford, and ſixe Barons, the Lorde Reignold Cobham, the Lorde Thomas Wage Marſhall of England, the Lorde Percey, the Lorde Manney, and the Lorde Mowbray, and mo then .xl. knightes, ſo that the king and hys companie were aboue a thouſand horſe, and the king was two dayes in paſſing betweene Douer and Wyſant. King Edward goeth into Fraūce.

Then the king and his company roade to Boleyn, and there taryed one day, and this was about the middeſt of Auguſt. And anone tidynges came to king Philip of Fraunce, howe the king of England was at Boleyn. Then the French king ſent his Conſtable with a great number of knightes to mete the king of Englande, who then was come to Mountrell, and there were great embracynges and ſhewynges of frendſhip on both ſydes, from thence the king of England, nowe beyng accompanied with the Constable of Fraūce and other French Lordes, and his awne Lordes, road forwarde so long vntill they came to the Citie of Amyas, where the French king, and the king of Bohaingne, the king of Maiorgues, and the king of Nauerre, beyng well appoynted, were ready to receyue him, with many other Dukes, Erles, and Barons. For there were all the .xij. Peeres of Fraunce, ready to feast, and to cheere the king of England and his Nobles, and also to be there in peaceable maner to beare witnesse of the king of Englandes homage.

And thus the king of England beyng nobly and honourably receyued, taryed and was feasted with these kinges, and other Princes in Amyas. xb. dayes. And in that meane tyme, there were sondrie wayes deuysed howe the king should do his homage, but so farre (sayth Froissart) as I could learne, the king of England made his homage vnto the French king, onely by word and not by puttyng of his handes betwene the frenche kinges handes, nor none other Prince nor Prelate limited nor appoynted to do it for him, neyther would the king of England do his homage any otherwise, but was determined rather to returne againe into England. And there was red openly the priuileges that of auncient tyme were graunted, the which declared how and in what maner the king should do his homage to the French king, and what seruice he should do him. Then sayd the French king: Cosyn, we will not at this tyme any further trouble you, for that ye haue nowe done, contenteth vs well, vntill ye be returned home againe into your realme, and that ye haue seene vnder the seales of your predecessors, howe and in what wise ye should do your homage.

King Edwarde did homage to the French king for the Duchie of Guyan,

And shortly after, the king of England toke his leaue of the French king, and of all the other Princes that were there, and departed very louingly, the one embracyng the other. Then the king made hast homeward, and with good speede returned into England, and so to Windsore, where of the Quene he was receyued right ioyfully. Then she demaunded howe her Vncle the French king did, and her kinsfolkes that were about him. The king shewed her all that he knew, and of the great cheere & honor that he had there, and sayde that in hys opinion, there was no Realme to be compared to the Realme of Fraunce.

The king geueth a great commendation to Fraunce.

It was not long after, but that the French king sent a newe Ambassade to the king of Englande, who were certeine of his priuie counsaile, as the Bishop of Charters, the Bishop of Beauuoys, the Lorde Lewes of Clermount, the Duke of Burbon, the Erle of Hercourt, and the Erle of Tankeruile, with diuerse other knightes and Clerkes, who, as afore sayd, were sent to the king, and to the Counsaile of England, which was then holden and kept at London, about the performance of the kinges homage, whereof ye heard before.

A newe Ambassade sent out of Fraūce to king Edward for the doyng of hys homage for the Duchy of Guyan and Aquitaine.

Now when the king of England and his counsaile had well considered the maner of his predecessors in doyng their homage for the Duchie of Aquitaine (although there were many in England that murmured and sayde, that the king their Lorde was nerer by succession vnto the crowne of Fraunce, then Philip of Valoys that was nowe French king) yet the king nor hys counsaile would not know it at this time, nor speake a worde thereof, but the counsaile and assembly afore said had much ado about this homage. And they were so long in the matter, that the Ambassadors were inforced to tary here all the winter vntill May folowyng, before they had any aunswere definitiue. But finally the king with the aduice of his counsayle, vpon the sight of former presidentes, to the which they gaue great credite, did determine to write letters in the maner of patentes, sealed with his great seale, knowledgyng therein the homage that he ought to do to the Frenche king, as in Froissard ye may read more at large.

were

The king of Englande was now enformed that king Dauid of Scotlande, who had maried his sister, was seased of the towne of Barwike, the which ought to apperteine to the realme of Englande, for king Edward the first, his Grandfather, had it in his peaceable possession. Also the king was enformed that the realme of Scotland should holde in chiefe of the Crowne of England: and how the young king of Scottes had not as then done his homage. Wherefore the king of England sent his Ambassade to the king of Scottes, desyryng him to make deliuerance of the towne of Barwike, for it perteyned to his heritage. And also that they should sommon the sayd king of Scottes to come vnto the king of Englande, and to do his homage for the realme of Scotland.

The king of Scottes is sommoned to come and do his homage to the king of England for the kingdome of Scotland.

Then the king of Scottes tooke counsaile howe to aunswere this matter. And at the last, he aunswered the Ambassadors and sayd, sirs, both I and all the Nobles of my realme meruayle greatly of that ye haue required vs to do, for we finde no auncient record that the realme of Scotlande should be subiect to the realme of England, neyther by homage, nor other wayes: neyther did the noble king our father any homage vnto the kinges of England, for any warre that was made vnto him by anye of them, and no more doe I purpose to do. And as for the towne of Barwike, our father conquered it by force of armes against king Edward your kinges father, and by right helde it all the dayes of his life, as his good heritage, and we purpose to the best of our power to do lykewise. Notwithstandyng, we require you Lordes to be meanes to the king your Maister, whose sister we haue maryed, that he will suffer vs peaceably to enioy our fraunches and rightes, as his auncetours haue done here before.

The answere of the king of Scottes.

Then the Ambassadors aunswered and sayde, sir we haue well vnderstand your aunswere, and we will declare it vnto the king our Lorde. And so tooke their leaue and returned into England to the king, and declared their aunswere, wherewithall the king was nothing contented.

Then the king sommoned a Parliament to be holden at Westmynster, where all the nobles and wise men of this realme were assembled, to determine what was meetest to be done in this matter. And they concluded, that it was not for the kinges honour to beare those iniuries and wronges that the Scottes did daylie vnto him, and they besought him to prouyde his force and strength of men of warre, to attayne thereby the Towne of Barwike, and to enter into the realme of Scotland with such force, that he should constrayne the king of Scottes to be glad to come and doe his homage. And all the nobles and commons of the Realme of England sayd, they would gladly and wyllingly go with him in that iourney. And for their good willes the king thanked them and prayed them to be in a readynesse, at a day assigned to be together at New Castell vpon Tyne. And then euery man went home and prepared for that iourney.

A defiaunce made to the Scottish king.

Then the king sent other Ambassadors to the king of Scottes sufficiently to sommon him: and that if he would not be otherwise aduised, then the king gaue them full auctoritie to defye him.

Sone after the day of the assembly of the kinges hoste drewe on, at the which day the king with all his armie arryued at New Castell vpon Tyne, and there taried three dayes for some of the armie that were not come. And the fourth day he departed with all hys power toward Scotland, and passed thorough the landes of the Lorde Perry, and of the Lorde Neuell, who marched on the Scottes, and so did the Lorde Rosse, and the Lorde Ligye, and the Lord Mowbray.

Then the king with his armie drew nere to Barwike, for the king of Scots made none other answere then he did at the first, wherfore they somoned him, & then openly defyed him. And so the king of England taried not at Barwike, but went forward into Scotlande and burned the Countrey as he went. In the which iourney he wasted & destroyed all the plaine countrey of Scotland, & brent and destroied many townes and villages & toke the strong Castel of Edynborough and set therein a garison. And then he passed ouer the second ryuer in Scotland, & ran ouer all the countrey thereabout to Scone, and destroyed the good towne of Donfremlyn, Dondy & Dombritayne, and many other, for there were no Scottes that would appere before the Englishmen, for they were fled into the Forest of Gedwoorth with all their goods and they cared not much for that they left behinde. And it was no great mervayle though they were thus driuen, for the king of Scottes was but. xv. yeres of age, and the Erle of Murrey was but yong, and the Nephewe of Wylliam Dowglas, that was slaine in Spayne, was also of the seme age. So as at that time the realme of Scotland was vnprouyded of Capitaines.

The king entreth into Scotlande & a great power

Now when the king had runne ouer all the playne Countrie of Scotlande, and had taryed there the space of. vj. Moneths, and sawe that none would appere against him: Then he strengthened and furnished certayne Castels that he had wonne, thinking by them to make warre to all the other. And afterwarde he withdrew hymselfe fayre and easily towarde Barwike, where the king layed his siege round about, and sayde he woulde neuer departe thence vntill he had wonne it. But after manye assaultes and sharpe skirmishes had with the Scottes for suche as kept the Towne defended the same manfully, yet at the last they yeelded the Towne to the king conditionally that they might haue their lyues and goodes saued, and that the souldyours might departe into their Countrie without any dammage. And then the king entred into the Towne with great solempnitie, and taryed there. xij. dayes, & made Capitain there syr Edward Bailleol, whom also he made king of the Scots, and betooke the gouernement of the whole realme vnto him.

And when the king had thus set all thinges in good order, he returned to London, where he was right ioyfully receaued and saluted of all hys people. And thus at thys tyme the king wanne the greatest parte of Scotlande, as sayth Froyssart.

In the meane while that the king prepared the aforesayde voyage and army into Scotland, it chaunced sir Robert de Arthoys, who was one of the noblest men in Fraunce, vpon displeasure had betweene him and the French king king, to flie out of Fraunce and came into England to the king disguysed in a Marchaunts apparell. This Sir Robert was he, of whom before ye haue heard, that in the great distresse of the Quene and her sonne, beyng in France with her brother the French king, she found him an especiall friend and helper vnto her, and it was his counsell that she passed into Henault, where shee was releeued and by the good helpe of the gentle knight Sir John of Henault was restored to the quiet state and possession of the crowne of England. And at the comming of the sayde Sir Robert, the king receyued him right ioyfully, and reteined him as one of his counsell and to him assigned the Erledome of Richemond. This knight hauyng a sentence passed agaynst him of the Erledome of Artoys, and the same giuen from him to Jone Countesse of Artoys by the French king and his nobles, was with that sentence so sore displeased, that he sayde openly against the Frenche king: By me he was made a king and by me he shal be dismissed againe. For the which words when they came to the kinges vnderstandyng, he caused the sayde Sir Robert to be proclayned an enimie vnto the Crowne of Fraunce, wherevpon he fled, as is afore sayde.

Sir Robert Erle of Arthoys fled out of Fraunce to the king of England for succour.

Sir Robert of Arthoys made Erle of Richemond.

The cause why sir Robert fled out of Fraunce.

Duryng the time of the aforesayde voyage into Scotlande, and the king hauyng with him the aforesayde Sir Robert, who went with him all that iourney, the sayde Sir Robert was often tymes in hande with the king (espyeng the Countrie of Scotland to be bareyne and beggerly) to leaue his warres in that countrey, and to clayme his right and lawfull inheritaunce of the crowne of Fraunce, and the whole realme of the same, which iustly and rightly did belong and apperteigne vnto hym, but the king gaue no care therevnto.

The king this yere in Wynter, in the month of November went againe toward Scotlande, and kept his Christmas at Yorke. And after that feast, he went into Scotlande, where he layde siege to the Castell of Kylbrydge, and at the last wanne it by strength and then he set the countrie in some quietnesse, and after he returned to New Castell vpon Tyne, and taried there a certaine of time, and kept there his Whitsontyde with great royaltie. And within short space after, thether came Sir Edward Baliol king of Scots, and the. xix. day of June made his homage vnto king Edward for the kingdome of Scotland, in the presence of many of the nobles of both the realmes, and sware vnto him fealty and fidelity. And that being done, he returned into Scotland, and king Edward went vnto Yorke and so to Wynsor. Then were all suche Lordes of Englande as before tyme in king Edward the secondes dayes, dissessed of suche landes as they held in Scotland, restored againe to their possessions, and for them made their homage vnto ỹ king of Scots, sauyng their allegeaunce vnto their souereigne Lorde. Now shortly after, certaine Ambassadours were sent from the French king, as the Byshop of Thurayne and the Lorde of Ferrey, and Peynguy for to conclude certaine articles of variaunce, betwene their Lorde and the king of England. But this purpose toke none effect, sauyng that the king graunted to send vnto the French king shortly after, certayne of hys Lords to haue further communication with him touchyng the sayde articles.

And this yere the king kept his Christmas in the Castell of Rokesborough in Scotlande, which Castell he caused to be newly repayred. And when when he had ſet ſuche things in order as before he purpoſed: Then he returned agayne into England. And ſone after he ſent the Archbyſhop of Cauntorbury, Sir Philip de Mountague & Sir Geoffrey Scrope, into ỹ realme of Fraunce, to the entent to haue concluded an amity betweene him & the French king, which before in the laſt yere was moued by the French Ambaſſadors. But when theſe ſayde Lordes were landed in Fraunce, they were long delayed before they could come to the kinges preſence, in ſomuch that they ſayde playnely vnto ſuch Lordes of Fraunce as were by the French king aſſigned to paſſe the time with them, that they ſuppoſed that it was not the kings pleaſure to ſpeake with them.

By meane of which wordes, they were ſhortly after brought vnto the kinges preſence, of whome they were receyued with ioyous countenaunce, and ſo continued a certeine tyme in furtheryng of their Ambaſſade, ſo that at the laſt, a concluſion of peace betweene England and Fraunce was agreed vpon, ſo farre forth as the ſame ſhould haue bene publiſhed the next day in Parys by proclamation. But howe the French kinges minde altered, the Engliſhe Ambaſſadors were ſcantly returned vnto their lodgynges, but they were ſent for againe, and further enformed, that the French kinges pleaſure and minde was, to haue Dauid late king of Scottes to be included within the ſame peace, and that he ſhould againe be reſtored vnto his kingdome. Wherevnto it was aunſwered by the Engliſhe Ambaſſadors, that their commiſſion ſtretched not ſo farre, neyther that their Prince had geuen them any ſuch aucthoritie. Wherefore all the former communication was reuoked and adnulled, and they returned into England without making any concluſion.

I finde written in an olde Engliſhe Chronicle, which beareth the name of one Robert of Auesbury, that this king Edwarde the thirde, did about this tyme chaunge and aduaunce his coyne, that is to ſay, from.xx. pence the ounce ſterlyng, vnto.xxb. pence the ounce, which maketh of currant money the pound weight of ſiluer.xxb.ſhillynges, and before it was currant for.xx. ſhillynges.

The coyne aduaunced.

Warre proclaymed betweene Fraunce and England.

Nowe for ſomuch as no concluſion of peace might be had betweene the French king and the king of Englande, warre was proclaymed vpon both partes, the which warre was greatly procured by ſir Robert of Arthoys, for as ſaith Froiſſart, he was euer nere about king Edward, and alwayes counſailyng him to defie the French king, who kept his heritage from him wrongfully. Of the which matter the king oftentymes conferred with his priuie counſayle, for gladly he deſired to haue obteyned his right, but the meane to come by it was very difficult and chargeable. And he alſo conſidered wyth himſelfe, that to make a clayme to the Crowne of Fraunce, and not to go through with his claime, it ſhould be better for him to ſay little, and to be ſtill, rather then to make a great ſturre, and then nothyng ſhould followe nor come of it that ſhould be to any purpoſe: And therefore after certaine meetynges and conference vpon this matter, his counſaylours aunſwered him ſayyng: Sir the matter is ſo weightie, and of ſo highe an enterprize, that we dare not ſpeake therein, neyther to geue you any counſayle. But ſir, if it may pleaſe you, we thinke it were meete that you ſent ſufficient Meſſengers well enformed of your meanyng to the Erle of Henault (whoſe daughter ye haue maryed) and to ſir John of Henault his brother, who hath valiantly ſerued you at all tymes: And to desyre them in the way of amitie and friendship, to geue you their counsaile in this matter, for they knowe better what is meete for such an enterprice than we do: And sir, if they agree to your entent, then will they counsaile you what way you shall worke, and what friendes you were best to make.

The king when he had heard the aduise of his counsaylours, and had well considered the same, he thought well of it, and iudged it to be a good way of entraunce vnto his enterprice: and forthwith the king appoynted the Bishop of Lincolne, and with him two Baneretes, and two Doctors to do this message. And they made them readie and tooke shippyng, and arryued at Dunkerke, and roade through Flaunders, vntill they came to Valenciens, where they found the Erle lyng in his bed sicke of the Goute, and with him sir John his brother. And after the Erle vnderstoode their message, he answered and sayde. As helpe me God, if the king might attaine his desire, I would be right glad thereof, for I had rather the welth of him that hath maryed my daughter, then of him that neuer did any thing for me: Though I haue maryed his sister. And to say truth, I haue no cause to do for him, for he letted the marryage of the yong Duke of Brabant, which should haue maried one of my daughters, wherefore I will not faile to ayde my dere and welbeloued sonne the king of England, and counsaile him to the best of my power, and so shall John my brother do, who hath serued him or this. Howbeit, he must haue more helpe then ours. For Heynault is but a small countrie in respect of the realme of Fraunce, and England is farre off to ayde vs.

Ambassadors sent to the Erle of Henault.

Then sayd the Bishop, we thanke you on our maysters behalfe, for the comfort that ye haue geuen vs: Nowe we hartely desyre you to geue our maister counsaile what friendes he were best to labour vnto for his ayde. Surely sayde the Erle, I cannot deuise a more puysaunt Prince to assist him then the Duke of Brabant, who is his Cosin Germaine: and the Bishop of Liege, the Duke of Guerles, who hath maried his sister. The Archebishop of Coleyn: the Marques of Jullers, Sir Arnolde de Baquehen, and the Lorde of Falkemount. These Lordes are they that may make most men of warre, in shortest space of any that I know: they are good men of warre and they may well make ten thousand men, so that they haue wages thereafter.

The Erle of Henault geueth counsaile to king Edwarde.

After that the Erle had thus declared his mind of the best wayes to enter into the sayd enterprise, the aforesayd Ambassadors returned into England, and so to the king, and shewed him all that the Erle had sayd, & counsayled. At the which message the king did greatly reioyce, and tooke much comfort. And shortly after, the king appoynted ten Baneretes, and. xl. other knightes, and sent them in Ambassade to Valenciens, and with them went the bishop of Lincolne to treate with the Lordes of the Empire, such as the Erle of Henault had named. And when these Ambassadors were come to Valenciens, eche of them kept a great estate and port, and spared no cost, no more then if the king of England had beene there in proper person, whereby they did get great renowme and prayse.

A great Ambassade sent to ye Erle of Henault.

Now while these thinges were thus in compassyng at Valenciens: The French king sent a crewe of Soudiours into Scotland to ayde the Scottes against the Englishe men: By reason whereof the Scottes made sharpe warre vpon the king of Englandes subiectes and friendes, and put the lande to great veration and trouble, insomuch that the king was inforced to assemble his power, and to spede him againe thether.

About Mydsomer the king entred Scotland by Sea and warred vpon the Scottes and French men, at which tyme the king subdued his enimies and had the victory and tooke dyuers prisoners. Among the which one called the Erle of Moret a Frenchman, was chiefe, which afterwarde was deliuered in exchaunge for the Erle of Namur, another French Lord.

The Erle of Moret a French Lord taken prisoner.

When king Edward had now againe pacefied the Scottes, and had taken homage of such as before rebelled, he then stablished agayne the aforenamed Edward Baylioll as king of Scottes, and committed the rule of the lande vnto him as before times he had done. Then the king of Scottes and the nobles for the great kindnesse they had founde in the king, and partly in recompence of the great charges which he sundrie times had beene at, in the defending and ordering of that realme, graunted and bound themselues vnto him and to his heyres, kings of England, that they would ayde and assist him agaynst all princes. And whensoeuer he or any king of Englande had warre, eyther within his awne lande or with any other prince: The Scots of their proper expences and charges should finde him three hundreth horsemen well armed, and a thousande footemen well and substancially furnished for the warre, the which. xiij. hundred men the Scottes should wage for a whole yere. And if the king of Englande ended not his warre within the yere, then he to hyre and wage the sayde Scottes as he did his other souldyours. And sone after that these grauntes and agreements were made, the king returned into England.

The Scots againe did homage vnto king Edwards.

The Scots make a larger offer vnto king Edward, then euer they purposed to performe.

1336

About thys tyme the French king, hauing purposed a iourney into the holy lande agaynst the Turck, and for the furniture of that iourney hauing made such prouision as neuer christian prince had done the lyke before, and vnto the same iourney requesting the company and ayde of the king of Englande, who, as aforesayd, was otherwise minded and occupied: and hauing also prepared for his sayde voyage at sundrie portes, as Marcile, Aquis Mortuis, Narbone and Mountpillier suche a number of Uessels, Ships, Carickes and Galeys, as were sufficient to passe ouer three hundred thousand men of armes, which ships also were most plentifully furnished with Bisket, Wyne, freshe Water, salt Fishe and all other victualles necessary for the aforesayde number of men of warre for the space of three yeres. And moreouer, hauyng obtayned by his Ambassadors of the king of Hungary (who not a little reioyced at that message) that he would be in a readynesse, and open the passages and streytes of his Countrey, that the kinges souldyours and armie (whom he called the Pilgrimes of God) might quietly passe through. And in lyke maner sendyng to the king of Cypres, to the king of Cicille, to the Uenecians, to the Genowayes and to all the Cities that were situate vpon the ryuer of Geane, and hauing aunswere of them all, that they were readie to obey. And the sayde Frenche king being aunswered by the great Prior of Fraunce, whom he had sent to the Isle of Rhodes, and also to the Uenecians to prouide in the Isle of Crete which was vnder their seigniory, for the receyuing of him, his associates and armie, that all things were prepared and in a readynesse.

The French king purposed a iourney into the holy land.

About this tyme, I say, newes came vnto him of all the king of Englands lands entent and purpose agaynst the realme of Fraunce, and of the assembly of king Edwardes Ambassadors, who at that tyme were with the Erle of Henault, and of all their counsailes and deuises. Wherevpon this voyage to the Turkes was vtterly dashed and all the former trauailes and prouisions came to nothing, neyther coulde he abide to here of them, but bent himselfe wholy to make defence against the king of Englande, who purposed the inuasion of his realme, and to make clayme therevnto as right inheritour to the same, as after more at large shall appere.

In this meane time the kinges Ambassadors which were sent into Henault as aforesayd, so applyed their Ambassade, ꝑ they had obteyned the good will and fauour of all, or the greatest parte of those persons whom the Erle of Henault thought meete to be laborer vnto for the ayde of the king in thys enterprise. And to bring the same to a full conclusion and effect, king Edward himselfe went ouer into Flaundyrs and there allyed himselfe with Jaques Dartuell gouernour of all Flaundyrs, and then came to Andwarp in Brabant, where he kept a most honorable estate and royall houshold, and thether came vnto him people from all partes, to see him and to beholde the great estate that he kept. And duryng the time of his abode there, he sent for his Cosyn the Duke of Brabant, and the Duke of Guerles, the Marques of Jullers, the Lorde John of Henault, and all suche as he trusted to haue any comfort of, and they all came vnto him betwene Whitsontyde and Mydsomer. And when the king had well feasted them, he desyred to knowe their good willes towardes him, and when they would be in a readynesse: for saide he, I am vpon the promise of your good willes come hether my selfe, & not only remaine here at great expences, but also the season and conuenient tyme of the yere passeth away, therefore I pray you to let me know your mindes. They altogether aunswered, that they were at that time come onely to see his grace, and not to determine any thing: but they would returne home and speake with their seuerall counsayles, and within three weekes next followyng to make direct aunswer what and when they would attend vpon his enterprise. And about the time of their appoyntment, they sent aunswere vnto ꝑ king that they and all their men which they had promised were in a readynesse, so that the Duke of Brabant woulde be ready for his parte: So that the king was enforced once againe to talke with the Duke of Brabant, who for that he had before made promise to the French king, that though the king of Englande were in his Countrey, whome he might not denie, because he was his Cosyn Germayne, yet he would in no wise conclude any amitie or friendship with him agaynst the sayd French king, with much ado at the last agreed to ayde the king of England, but first he desyred that he might once again speake with the aforesayd Lordes: and he sent for them & after long cõmunication, they agreed and made vnto the king of England this aunswere: we haue (sayde they) assembled and conferred together, and we cannot consyder any lawfull cause that we maye defye the French king: But if your grace can obtaine the fauour and good will of the Emperour, who may commaunde vs, then we wyll be readie: And the Emperour can no lesse do, consydering how that many yeres past, there was a couenaunt sworne and sealed, that it should not be lawfull for the French king to make warre, or by any meanes to apprehend or take into his possession any thing appertayning to the Empire: and it is euydently sene and knowne that Philip now French king hath taken the Castell of Creuecure in Cambresey, and the Castell of Alues in Pallieull, & also the Citie of Cambrey, and therfore the Emperour hath good cause to defie hym, and then will we be readie. The king then consydering with himselfe how farre he had enterprised, and seing now his purpose would come to none effect, onelesse he followed the determination and deuyses of the sayde Lordes, did therefore with all speede send his Ambassadors vnto the Emperour, with whome the sayde Lordes, for that they did beare vnto the king right true and harty good wyll, sent also Ambassadors of their owne, the which might more certainely declare their good meanings towards the king of England, if it might please the Emperours Maiestie to licence them therevnto, and so much was done therein, and chiefly by the labour of the Lady Margaret of Henault, whom Sir Lewes of Bauyer beyng Emperour had then maryed, that the Emperour graunted a commission vnto foure right honorable personages, and vnto two Doctours which were of his priuie counsayle, to authorise and make king Edward of Englande his Vicare generall throughout all the Empire, and of the same the Lordes abouenamed had instrumentes and Seales sufficiently authorised by the Emperour.

King Edwarde was made Vicare generall of al the Empire.

In this meane while, king Edwarde considering his great charge of warres that he had continually with Scotland: But chiefely and most specially foreseeyng the great and inestimable charges that must folowe of this his enterprice in Fraunce, did gather in England by diuers and sundrie meanes great and inestimable summes of money, so that for lacke of money in this realme of England (as sayth Fabian) victuall came to such reasonable cheapnesse and price, that at London a quarter of wheate was solde for two shillynges, and a fat Ore for .vj. shillynges and .viij. pence, a fat sheepe for .vj. pence, and .vj. Pigeons for a pennie, a fat Goose for twopence, a fat Pigge for a pennie, and so all other victuall after the same rate.

Lacke of money causeth plenty & good cheepe of victualles.

And in this .xij. yere of his reigne, he helde his Parliament in England at Westminster, wherein great summes of money were graunted vnto him for the maintenance of his warres. And so soone as the same Parliament was finished, and that he had put the realme of Englande in good order, he then returned againe into Flaundrys, and at the last stayed at Louayne Castell in Brabant, where he attended his aunswere from the Emperour, and also expected the comming of the former Lordes. And king Edward beyng in the Castell aforesayde, kept there an honourable and Princely house, and sent into England for the Queene, for that he purposed not to returne into England vntill he had done some notable acte in Fraunce.

A reformation of fond apparell.

And in the aforesayd Parliament there was made an acte for the reformation of apparell, and good cause there was that it should so be, for the people did exceede meruellously, not so much in costly and chargeable apparell, as in fond and foolishe apparell, for, as sayth Caxton in his Chronicle, called the fruite of tyme, The Englishe men (sayth he) so much folowed and counterfeated the madnesse and the folly of the straungers, that from the first comming in of the Henaultes, they dayly chaunged their apparel, sometime long and wide, and at another tyme, cutted, short and streight, and altogether vnsemely and vnhonest. And the apparel of the women was more fond then the men, men. For their clothes were made so streyt to their bodyes, that they were faine to sowe fore tayles vnder their clothes, for to set forth and hyde their buttockes, the which foolish pride the Scottes deryded, and made foolishe rimes and ieastes of them.

In the moneth of Nouember next folowyng, the king sent first to the Duke of Brabant, and then to all the other Lordes that were allied vnto him, desyring to know of them where their place of meting and Parliament shoulde be kept and holden: And the Duke of Brabant aunswered, it was best to kepe it at Arques in the Countie of Loz. And then the king sent thether, and caused the great hall of the towne to be apparelled and appoynted in as rich maner as if it had bene the kinges Chamber. And there the king sate crowned with a crowne of Golde, fiue foote higher then any other, and there was read openly the letters of the Emperour, by the which the king was made Vicare generall, & Lieutenant for the Emperour, and had power geuen him to make lawes, and to minister iustice to euery person in the Emperours name, and to coyne money of Golde and Siluer. And it was further ordered and commaunded by the Emperour, that all persons of his Empire, and all other his subiectes should obey to the king of England his Vicare, as to himselfe, and to do him homage. And forthwith there was claime and aunswere made betweene parties as before the Emperour, and order and iudgement geuen. And when all these thinges were done, the Lordes tooke a day that they all would appere at Cambray (which towne was then French) three Weekes after Midsommer next followyng, and then euerye man departed to his awne. King Edward as Vicare of the Empire, went then to the Castell of Louayne to the Queene his wyfe, who was newely come thether out of England with great noblenesse, and well accompanyed with beutifull Ladyes, and goodly Damozelles of England. And there the king and the Queene kept their house right honourably all that Winter, and caused great sommes of money, both of Golde and Syluer to be coyned at Andwarpe.

Letters patents graunted by the Emperour vnto king Edward the thirde openly read to the Lordes of the Empire.

King Edward coyned both Golde and Siluer at Andwarp.

The Frenche king beyng nowe credibly informed that king Edwarde would enter the realme of Fraunce to make warre vpon the same, did therefore make great prouision to resist him: For the common fame was then in Fraunce, that king Edward entended not onely to claime Gascoyn and Guian, but also all Fraunce as his proper and rightfull inheritaunce, as in the right of his mother. Wherefore the French king assembled an hooge hoste, and committed the gouernement thereof vnto the king of Nauerne, and to the Erle of Alanson, brother vnto the sayde French king: The which sayde Capitaynes with their people awayted dayly the king of Englandes comyng, who disappoynted them for that yere.

And this yere it is noted that the king graunted, that the Officers of the Maior and Shirifes of London, should from that tyme forth vse Maces of Siluer and percell gilt.

Maces of siluer and gilt.

Now when the Winter was passed, and the Sommer come, Midsommer which was the tyme appoynted drewe nere. And the Lordes of Almain that were allyed with king Edward, began to set forth themselues to accomplish their promise. And in like maner the French king, who vnderstood most of king Edwardes doynges, made marueylous great prouision to mete him, and and to withstand him. But king Edward caused first his prouision for men of warre that came out of England to passe by Sea, and they were with him anone after Midsommer, and he himselfe lodged at Villenoyt, and there caused as many of his people as he might, to be lodged in the towne, and the rest lay along on the ryuer syde in Tentes and Pauillions, and there he tarryed from the middest of July vntill the. viij. day of September, euer lookyng for the Lordes of the Empire, specially for the Duke of Brabant, on whose commyng all the other wayted. And when the king of England sawe that they came not, he sent great and honourable Messengers to euery of them, sommonyng them to come as they before had promised, & to meete him at Machlyn at a day appoynted, and then to shewe him for what occasion they tarryed so long. Thus king Edward lay at Villenoyt, and kept dayly at his cost and charge, xiij. hundreth men of armes, and. x. thousand Archers that came ouer the Sea, beside all other prouisions, and beside the great rewardes that he had geuen to the Lordes, and beside the great Armyes that he had vpon the Sea.

The French king on his part, had set Scots, Genowayes, Normanes, Britons, Picardes, and Spanyardes to be ready on the Sea, to enter into England assoone as the warre was opened.

In the ende, the aforesayd Lordes at the sommons of the king of England came vnto him to Machlyn, as he had appoynted them, but not without much businesse: But at the last they agreed, that the king of England might well set forward within. xv. dayes next after. And to the entent their warre should be the more laudable, they agreed to sende euery of their defiaunces to the French king: that is to say. First the king of England, then the Duke of Guerles, the Marques of Jullers, Sir Robert de Arthoys, Sir John of Heynault, the Marques of Musse, the Marques of Blanquebource, the Lord of Falquemount, Sir Arnolde of Baquehen, the Archebishop of Coleyn, Sir Galeas his brother, and all other Lordes of the Empire. These defiaunces were written and sealed by all the Lordes (except the Duke of Brabant) who sayde he would do his dede himselfe at tyme conuenient. To carie these defiances into Fraunce, was appoynted the Bishop of Lincolne, who caried them to Paris, and there did his message in such sort, that he was much commended, and had his safe conduit to returne safely vnto the king of England to Machlyn.

Lyonell the kinges third sonne borne in Andwarp.

In this meane tyme Queene Philip the wife of king Edward, lying at Andwarpe, was brought a bed and deliuered of a man childe, which afterward was named Lionell.

Immediately after the defiaunces were made and sent, as aforesayde, the French king stirred not a little, but gathered vnto him an innumerable number of people, and taryed with them at Amias, from the ende of August vnto the beginning of October. And when he sawe that king Edward came not, he deuided his great hoste, and sent many of them home to their owne houses, and the other he placed in diuers Castels, and Fortes thereabouts, to let the passage of king Edward into Fraunce. And in this tyme also the French king had sent diuers Ships vnto the Sea with men of warre for to take the English Marchauntes, and other that came in their course. And it so chaunced, that they encountered with two great Shippes of England called led the Edward and the Chriſtopher, the which (as ſayth the French Chronicle) were fraight with great richeſſe, and alſo well manned. Aſſone as eyther of them was ware of the other, Gonnes went off, and Bowes and Arblaſters ſhot, ſo that betwene them was a mortall and cruell fight, but not egall. For of the Frenchmen were.xiij.ſayles great & ſmall, and of the Engliſhe men but fiue, that is to ſay, theſe two great ſhippes, two Barkes and a Caruell, and the three ſmall ſhippes eſcaped by ſwiftneſſe of ſayling, but the two great abode, and fought more then.iv.houres, inſomuch as there were ſlaine vpon both partes aboue.vj.hundreth men: But in the ende the ſayde two ſhippes were taken, and brought into the French kinges ſtreames, and many of the Engliſh men that were wounded, were caſt into the Sea. And ſone after the ſayde French nauie landed at Southhamton, and brent and ſpoyled the towne, and ſo departed.

Aſſone as king Edward had brought all things into a readyneſſe, he ſet forward towarde his purpoſed iourney into Fraunce, and firſt paſſed from Machlyn vnto Bruzelles, and all his people paſſed by the Towne, and thether came to king Edward.xx.thouſand Almaynes. And then the king ſent once agayne to the Duke of Brabant, to know whether he mynded to go to Cambrey, or whether he thought it good to leaue it. And the Duke anſwered, it was beſt to go to Cambrey, and that aſſone as he heard that he had beſieged the Towne, he would come thether with twelue hundred ſpeares of good men of warre. Then the king paſſed forward, and the firſt night came to Nyuell, and there laye one night, and the nert daye remoued to Mons in Henault, and there he found the yong Erle of Heynault, who receaued him right ioyouſly, and remayned with him two dayes, and from thence remoued to Ualenciaines, and he and only.xij. with him entered the Towne, and no mo perſons, and thether was come the Erle of Henault and Sir John of Heynault his Uncle, and the Lorde of Faguynelles, the Lorde of Uerchyn, the Lorde of Haureth, and dyuers other who were about the Erle their Lorde. And the king and the Erle went hand in hand to the great Hall of the Towne, which was appointed and appareled meete for them. And as they went vp the ſteyres of the Hall: The Byſhop of Lyncolne who was there preſent, ſpake out a lowde and ſayde: Wylliam Biſhop of Cambrey, I admoniſhe you as procurer to the king of England, Uicare of the Empire of Rome, that ye open the gates of the Citie of Cambrey, and if ye doe not, then ſhall ye forfayt your lands, and we will enter by force. There was none that anſwered to that matter, for the Biſhop was not there preſent. Then the Biſhop of Lyncolne ſayde agayne, Erle of Heynault, we admoniſh you in the name of the Emperour, that ye come and ſerue the king of Englande hys Uycare before the Citie of Cambrey, with ſuche number as ye ought to doe. The Erle who was there preſent, ſayde, with a right good will I am ready. And then they entered into the Hall, and the Erle brought the king into his Chamber, and anone Supper was readie. The nert day the king departed and went to Alſper and there taried two dayes, and ſuffered all hys people to paſſe forward. And then they came to Cambraye and lodged at Wys, and beſieged the Citie of Cambray rounde about, and daylie hys power encreaſed. Thether came the young Erle of Henault in great aray, and Sir John hys Uncle, and they lodged nere to the king, and ſo did the Duke of Guerles and his other Lordes of the Empire, ſuche as were alyed with the king of England.

The Duke of Brabant ſendeth his deffiaunce vnto the French king. And within. vj. dayes next after the ſiege was layed to the Citie of Cambrey, the Duke of Brabant came thether with.ix. C. ſpeares, beſide other ſouldyours. And aſſone as he was come, he ſent to defye the French king, who was then at Compeigne. The ſiege afore ſayde thus continuyng, daylie aſſaultes and ſkirmiſhes were made, and many good feates of armes done:
But in the ende the ſouldyours of Cambrey ſo valiauntly defended the Citie that it was thought but time loſt to continue the ſiege any lenger, & namely they perceaued wynter to approche, and that as yet they had done nothing, but had lyen at great expences and charges, wherefore the king determined to breake vp the ſiege, and to enter into Fraunce, and ſo cauſed the Lordes to diſlodge and truſſe vp their Tents and Pauilions, and all maner of armor and ſo departed toward Mount S. Martyn, the which was at the entrie of Fraunce, and thus they roade forth in good order, and paſſed the ryuer of Leſcault at their eaſe. And when the Erle of Heynault had accompanied the king vnto the departyng out of the Empire, and that he ſhould paſſe the riuer and enter into the realme of Fraunce: Then he tooke his leaue of the king and ſayde he would ryde no farther with him at that time, becauſe king Philip the French king was his Uncle, and that he would not haue his euill wil, and therefore he did ſay that he would now go and ſerue the French king in Fraunce, as he before had ſerued the king of England in the Empire: And thus the Erle of Henault and the Erle of Namure forſooke the king and departed from him and all their people with them, ready to ſerue the Frenche king, as afore ſayde, againſt king Edward.

But king Edward with thoſe that remayned with him paſſed forward into Fraunce, waſtyng, ſpoylyng and brennyng the Countrie as they went, and at the laſt came ſo nere the Frenche armie, that they were within two leagues the one armie of the other. And the French king hauing. lx. thou-he ſayde that he minded to geue the French king battayle. Then the Lordes beheld eche other, and they deſyred the Duke of Brabant to ſaye firſt his ſayde he, they coulde not ſaue their honours: And therefore he counſayled that Heraulds ſhould be ſent to the French king to demaunde a daye of bat-which was within two dayes after. And when knowledge thereof came to

Duke of Guerles, the Marques of Mulle, the Marques of Blanque-bource, Sir John of Heynault, the Erle of Mouns, the Erle of Saupnes, the Lorde of Falquemount, Sir Guillam du Fort, Sir Arnold of Baquehen and the Almaynes, and among them was. xxij. Banners and. lx. Pennons, and in the whole. viij. thousand men.

The second battayle had the Duke of Brabant, and the Lordes and knightes of his countrey. First the Lorde Kulle, the Lorde Bergues, the Lorde of Bredangh, the Lorde of Rodes, the Lorde of Vaucelare, the Lord of Borgnynall, the Lorde of Stoneuort, the Lorde of Wyten, the Lorde of Elka, the Lorde of Callebegne, the Lorde of Duffle, Sir Thyrre of Valcourte, Sir Raufe of the Grees, Sir John of Callebegne, Sir John Fulke, Sir Giles of Cotereby, Sir Water of Hotebergue, the three brethren of Harlebecque, Sir Henry of Flaundyrs, and diuers other Barons & knights of Flaundyrs, who were all vnder the Duke of Brabants Baner, as the Lorde of Hallen, the Lorde of Guyten, Sir Hector Villaynes, Sir John of Rodes, Sir Valflart of Guystell, Sir Wylliam of Strates, Sir Golwyn de la Mule and many other. The Duke of Brabant had. xxiiij. Banners and. lxxx Pennons, and in all. vij. thousand men. The seconde battaile.

The third battaile, and the greatest had king Edward, & with him his cosyn the Erle of Darby, the bishop of Lincoln, the bishop of Durham, the Erle of Salsbury, the Erle of Northhampton, & of Glouceſter the Erle of Suffolke, sir Robert de Arthoys who was then Erle of Richemond, the Lorde Reynold Cobham, the Lord Percey, the Lord Roose, the Lorde Mowbray, sir Lewes, and sir John Beauchamp, the Lord Delaware, the Lord of Laucome, the Lord Baslet, the Lorde Fitzwater, sir Water Manny, Sir Hugh Hastynges, sir John Lisle, and diuers other that I can not name, and among other was sir John Chandos, of whome much honour was spoken. The king had with him. xxviij. Banners, and. xc. Pennons, and in his battaile. vj. thousand men of armes, and. vj. thousand Archers. And he had set another battaile as in a wyng, wherof the Erle of Warwike, the Erle of Pembroke, the Lorde Barkeley, the Lorde Multon, and diuers other were chiefe, and they were on horsebacke. Thus when euery Lorde was vnder his Banner as it was comaunded by the Marshalles: The king of England mounted on a Palfrey, beyng accompanyed onely with sir Robert de Arthoys, sir Reynold Cobham, and sir Water of Manny, roade along before all the battailes, and right gently and earnestly desyred all his Lordes and others, that they would that day defend his honour, and the honour of England, and they all willyngly promised him so to do. Then he returned vnto his owne battaile, and set euery thing in good order, and commaunded that none should go before the Marshals Banners. Now let vs speake of the Lordes of Fraunce, what they did. The thirde battaile. The kinges battaile at Witron fosse.

In the armie of the French king, were. CCxx. Banners, foure kings, fiue Dukes, xxvj. Erles, and mo then foure thousand knightes, and of the Commons of Fraunce, mo then. lx. thousand. The kinges that were there with the French king, were the king of Behayne, the king of Nauarre, and the king of Scotland. The Duke of Normandie, the Duke of Britayne, the Duke of Burbone, the Duke of Loreyne, and the Duke of Athenes. It was a beutifull ſight to beholde the Banners and Standerds wauyng in the winde, and horſes richely barded, and knightes and Eſquiers richely armed. The Frenche men oꝛdeyned thꝛee battayles, and in euery Battaile. xv. thouſand men of armes, and. xx. thouſand footmen.

Fraunce is of great power.

Now when both the armies afoꝛeſayd were thus in a redineſſe to geue battaile, and eche of them within ſight of other, it was meruelous ſtraunge that they both departed without any ſtroke ſtriken. But the Frenche men were not all of one mynde. Some ſayde it were a great ſhame if they fought not, ſeyng their enemies were ſo nere them in their awne Countrie, & raunged in field: And ſome other ſayd, it ſhould be a great folly to fight, foꝛ it was heard to knowe euery mannes minde and ieopardie of treaſon, foꝛ they ſayd, if foꝛtune were contrary to their king, as to leeſe the field, he then ſhould put all his whole realme in a ieopardie to be loſt. And though he did diſcomfite his enimies, yet foꝛ al that, he ſhould be neuer the nere of the realme of England, noꝛ of the landes apperteynyng to any of the Loꝛdes that were alyed with him. Thus contendyng among themſelues, the day paſſed vntill noone, and then ſodainely their ſtarted a Hare in the French armie, and ſuch as ſaw her, made a great ſhoute and crie, by reaſon whereof, they that were behind, thought that they that were beforꝛe were a fightyng, and therefoꝛe put on their Helmettes, and tooke their ſpeares in hand: And foꝛthwith were made diuerſe newe knightes, and ſpecially the Erle of Heynault made. xiiij. who were euer after called knightes of the Hare. And thus the battaile ſtood ſtill all that day, and at night, the French king diſlodged his armie, and departed into Fraunce. And in like maner king Edward bꝛake vp his armie, and departed into Bꝛaband, and ſo this iourney ended.

Knightes of the Hare.

A coſtly foꝛney to ſmall effect.

Now when king Edward was returned into Bꝛaband, he went ſtreight vnto Bꝛuſſelles, where the Duke of Guerles, the Duke of Jullers, the Marques of Blanquebource, the Erle of Mouns, Sir John of Heynault, the Loꝛde of Falquemount, and all the Loꝛdes of the Empire, ſuche as had bene in the foꝛmer iourney, did there take aduice and counſayle what ſhould be moꝛe done in the matter that they had begon. And foꝛ the moꝛe expedicion to be had in the cauſe, they oꝛdeyned a Parliament to be holden at Bꝛuſſels, and to come thether was deſyꝛed Jaques Dartuell of Gaunt, who came thether with a great compaw, and all the Counſayles of the good townes of Flaundyꝛs. In the which Parliament king Edward was greatly entreated and deſyꝛed of all his alyes of the Empire, that he would require them of Flaundyꝛs, to ayde and mainteyne his warre, and to defie the Frenche king, and to go with him whꝛere as he would haue them: and in their ſo doyng, he to pꝛomiſe them to recouer the Ille Doway, and Bethayne. This requeſt was well heard of the Flemyngs, and therevpon they deſyꝛed to take counſaile saile among themselues, and so they did, and then after said to king Edward. Sir where ye haue made a requeſt vnto vs to ayde you, truely if we might do it sauyng your honour and our selues, we would gladly do it: But Sir, we are bound by fayth and othe, and in the summe of two Myllyons of Florens in the Popes Chamber, that we may make nor moue no warre against the king of Fraunce, who soeuer it be, vpon payne to forfeit and lose the sayd summe, and beſydes that, to incurre the sentence of cursyng. But sir, if you will take on you the armes of Fraunce, and quarter them with the armes of Englande, and call your selfe king of Fraunce, as of right ye ought to doe: Then we will take you for rightfull king of Fraunce, and demaund of you quittaunce of our bandes, and so you to geue vs pardon therefor as king of Fraunce, and by this meanes we shall be assured and dispenced withall, and then will we go with you whether soeuer you will haue vs.

The first occasion of the quartring of the armes of Fraunce with the armes of England.

Then king Edward tooke counsaile, for he thought that it was a sore matter to take on him the armes of Fraunce and the name, and as then had conquered no peece thereof, neyther could tell what might come of that enterprice: And on the other syde he was very loth to refuse the offer of the aide made vnto him by the Flemynges, who might ayde him more then any of the other. After that the king had taken counsayle of the Lordes of the Empire, and of the Lorde Robert de Arthoys, and other of his speciall friendes: He then aunswered the Fleminges, that if they would sweare, and seale to this accorde and promise to mainteyne his warre, he would with a good will do all that they requyred, and promised also to get them againe, Leyle, Doway, and Bethayne: And all they with one voyce aunswered that they were content. Then there was a day assigned to meete at Gaunt, at which day the king was there and the most part of the aforesayd Lordes, and all the Counsayles generally in Flaundyrs, where all the aforesayd matters were reherſed, sworne and sealed. And then the king quartered the armes of Fraunce with the armes of England: And from thenceforth tooke on him the name of the king of Fraunce, and so continued still vntill he left it by compoſition, as after shall be shewed.

A daye of meeting at Gaunt.

The armes of England quartered with the armes of Fraunce.

And at this counsell they determyned agaynst the nert sommer folowyng to prouide to make great warre vpon Fraunce, prompsing to beſiege the Citie of Torney, whereof the Flemings were ioyfull, for they thought themselues strong inough to get it. And thus the parliament ended, and euery mā departed home: The king of England went to Andwarp, and the Queene abode still at Gaunt, and was oftentimes visited by Jaques Dartuell, and by other Lordes, Ladyes, and Damoselles of Gaunt. And when the kinges shippes were readie, he tooke the See, and then sayled into England, and so came to London, where he was honorably receaued. And shortly after he had many complaintes made vnto him, howe the Frenchmen had brent and destroyed the Towne of Southampton, and had done sundrie other hurtes in England, namely vpon the Sea coastes. And the king aunswered that he trusted before it were a yere lenger, it should be well reuenged.

And soone after the returne of the king into Englande, he called hys high Court of Parliament at Westmynster, in the which was graunted vnto him toward the recouery of his right in Fraunce the.v. parte of the moueable goodes of euerye inhabitaunt within the Realme, and the Custome of

And for that the king was forced to occupie money before these payments could be made, he was therefore compelled to borow of sundrie persons great somes of money, namely of the Citie of London, of whome he borowed twentie thousande Marke, which was leuyed vpon sundrie wardes in London, as appereth in Fabian.

When king Edward had set all his lande in good order, and when also he had prepared all things in a readynesse for the warres of Fraunce, he toke Shyppping and sayled toward Flaundyrs, and had with him two hundred sayle of good shyppes well furnished with men of warre, and the king kept his course to Sluce, and betweene Sluce and Blanqueberque on the See, there was Sir Hugh Kyryell, Sir Peter Bahuchet and Barbanoyr and aboue. CCC. great Vessels beside other, and in them were of Normans, Genowes and Picardes aboue the number of. xl. thousande. And there they were purposely layde to resist and withstande the landyng of king Edward when he should come to Sluce. And when the king drewe somewhat neere them and espied such a number of shippes, whose Maستes a farre of seemed as it had bene a great Forest or Wood: The king demaunded of the Master of his Ship what people he thought they were. And he answered: I thinke they be Normans, layde here by the french king to let your passage, and I thinke they be euen the same that burned Southampton, and that tooke your great Ship called the Christopher. A quoth the king, I haue long desyred to fight with the french men, and now by the grace of God I shall meete wyth some of them, for they haue done me many displeasures. Then the king caused all his shippes to be set in order, the greatest before, well furnished wyth Archers, and euer betweene two shippes of Archers he placed one ship wyth men of armes: And then he made another battaile to lye alofe, with Archers to comfort them that were most wearie if neede were. And in the sayde ships were a great number of Countesses, Ladyes, Knightes wyues and other Damoselles that were goyng to see the Quene at Gaunt: These Ladyes the king caused to be well kept with three hundred men of armes, and fyue hundreth Archers.

A great fleete of French shippes.

The battell at Sluse vpon the sea.

Assoone as the king and his Marshalles had ordered hys battayle, he drewe vp the sayles and came with a quarter winde to haue the vauntage of the sonne. And so at the last they turned a little, to haue the winde at will. But when the Normans sawe them retule back, they had maruell why they did so. And some sayde they are afrayde to medle wyth vs, and therefore they go backe.

Then the french men beganne to set themselues in order. for they were good men of warre on the Sea, and they did set the Christopher, which before they had won, as afore sayde, formost, furnished with many Trumpets & Instruments

Inſtruments and ſo gaue the onſet vpon their enimies. And then began a ſore battayle vpon both partes: Archers and Croſbowes beganne to ſhoote, and men of armes approched and fought hande to hande: and the better to come together, they had great hookes and grappelers of Iron to caſt out of one Ship into another, and ſo tyed them faſt together. There were manye worthy deedes of armes done in taking and reſcuyng againe. And at the laſt the great Chriſtopher was firſt wonne by the Engliſhmen, and all that were within it drowned or ſlaine. Then was there great crye and pitifull noyſe, and the Engliſhmen fortefied the Chriſtopher with archers, and cauſed him to paſſe before to meete with the Genowayes. This battaile was right fierce and terrible, for the battayles on the Sea are more fierce and more daungerous, then are the battayles by lande. For on the Sea there is no reculyng or flyeng, there is no remedy but to fight and to abide fortune, and euery man to ſhew his proweſſe.

And in this fight Sir Hugh Kyrpell and ſyr Bahuchet and Barbenoyr which were the Admyrals to the french flete, ſhewed themſelues to be right good and expert men of warre. This battayle continued from the morning vntill it was noone, & the Engliſhmen (ſayth Froyſſart) endured great paine, for their enemies were foure againſt one, and all good men on the ſea.

And in this fight the king of Englande ſhewed himſelfe a noble and valyaunt Prince of his awne handes, for he was then in the chiefe flowres of his youth. And in lyke maner did the Erle of Darby, Pembrooke, Herford, Huntyngdon, Northampton and Glouceſter: Sir Raynold Cobham, Sir Richard Stafford, the Lorde Perry, Sir Water of Manny, Sir Henry of Flaundyrs, Sir John Beauchamp, the Lord Felton, the Lorde Bralleton, Sir Chandos, the Lorde Delaware, the Lorde of Multon, Sir Robert de Artoys called the Erle of Richmond, and dyuers other Lords & knights, who ſhewed themſelues ſo valyauntly that they obteyned the victorie: So that the Frenchmen, Normans and other were diſcomfited, ſlayne and drowned, and there was not one that eſcaped.

A great victorie that king Edward had of the French men.

After this victorie thus atcheeued, the king all that night abode in hys ſhip before Sluce with great noyſe of Trompets and other Inſtruments. And thether came to ſee the king dyuers of Flaundyrs, ſuche as had heard of the kinges comming: and then the king demaunded of the Burgeſſes of Bridges how Jaques Dartuell did: and they aunſwered that he was gone to the Erle of Henault againſt the Duke of Normandy with three ſcore thouſande Flemyngs.

And on the next day after this battaile, which was Midſommer day, the king and all his tooke land, and the king went in Pilgrimage a foote to the Lady of Ardenborough, now called Odenbourgh, and there dyned, and then tooke his horſe and roade to Gaunt, where the Queene receyued him wyth great ioy, and all his cariage came after him by little and little.

Shortly after, the king wrote to the Erle Heynault, and to them that were within the Caſtell of Thyne, certefiyng them of his arriuall and victory. And aſſoone as the Erle knewe thereof, and that he had diſcomfited the French armie vpon the Sea, he diſlodged, and gaue leaue to all the Souldiours to depart, and tooke with him all the great Lordes to Valenciens, and there feaſted them honourably, and ſpecially the Duke of Brabant, and Jaques Dartuell. And there Jaques Dartuell openly in the Market place in the preſence of all the Lordes, and of all ſuch as would here him, declared what right the king of Englande had to the Crowne of Fraunce: And alſo what puyſſaunce the three Countries were of, Flaundyrs, Heynault, and Brabant, and howe they were ſurely ioyned in one allyaunce. And he did vtter it ſo grauely, and ſo eloquently, that all the people that heard hun, prayſed him much, and ſayd he had nobly ſpoken, and as a man of great experience. And then the Lordes departed, and promiſed within. viij. dayes to meete at Gaunt to viſite the king of Englande, and ſo they did, and the king feaſted them right honorably, and ſo did the Queene who then was newly churched of a ſonne called John of Gaunt, who was after Duke of Lancaſter by hys wife, which was daughter to Henry Duke of Lancaſter. And ſhortly after king Edward held a counſaile at Villenort, at a day limited.

Jaques Dartuell.

John of Gaūt Duke of Lancaſter.

When the French king heard howe his armie on the ſea was diſcomfited, he diſlodged and drewe to Arras, and gaue leaue to his mey to depart vntill he heard other tydynges. And he ſent Sir Godmer du Foye to Tourney, to ſee that there lacked nothyng, for he feared more the Flemynges then any other. And he ſent the Lorde of Beauiewe to Mortayne, to kepe the frontiers agaynſt Heynault: And he ſent alſo many men to Saint Omers, to Ayre and to Saint Uenaunt, and prouided ſufficiently for all the fortreſſes frontyng on Flaundyrs.

In this ſeaſon there reigned a king in Cicille called Robert, who was reported to be a great Aſtronomer, and he alwayes fauouryng and louyng the French king, did counſaile and warne him in no wiſe to deale, nor haue to do with the king of England, for ſayd he, it is geuen to the king of England to be right luckie and fortunate in all his enterprices. This king Robert would gladly haue ſet theſe two kinges at a good accorde, for he bare ſuche loue and affection vnto the crowne of Fraunce, that he was right ſory to ſee or thinke of the deſolation thereof. And in lykewiſe the ſayd king Robert laboured to the Pope to be a meane to appeaſe theſe two kinges, but all their labor tooke none effect.

Robert king of Cicile.

Ye haue heard a little before, that a day of counſayle was appoynted to be holden at Villenort, which day was now come. And at this counſayle were preſent, the king of England, the Duke of Brabant, the Erle of Heynault, Sir John his Uncle, the Duke of Guerles, the Erle of Juliers, the Marques of Falquebource, the Marques of Muſſe, the Erle of Mouns, Sir Robert de Arthoys, the Lorde of Falquemount, Sir William du Mort, the Erle of Namure, Jaques Dartuell and many other great Lordes, and of euery good towne of Flaundyrs three or foure perſonages, as counſailors.

A counſaile holden at Villenort.

And in this counſayle was made a league betweene the three countries, namely, Flaundyrs, Brabant, and Heynault, that from thence forth eche of them ſhould ayde and comfort other in all caſes. And further they concluded, that if any of them had to do with any countrie, the other two ſhould geue them ayde. And alſo that if hereafter it ſhould fortune any of them to be at diſcorde one with another, that then the thirde ſhould ſet an agreement betweene them. And if he were not able ſo to do, that then they ſhould abyde the order of the king of England, vnto whoſe handes they did willyngly commit the ſame, and tooke their othes to ſtand, abyde, and obey his iudgement. And for

for further and better confirmation of this loue and amitie, they ordeined this agreement to be made a lawe, and to be published throughout those three countries, and the same afterward was called the lawe of the Companions or Allyes. And in the same counsaile it was also determined that the king of England should in the moneth of July next folowyng, beyng accompanyed with the ayde of the aforesaid Lordes, and the powers of all the good townes lay siege to Tourney. And so the Counsayle brake vp, and euery man departed home to make prouision against the tyme appoynted.

The French king after the departure of these Lordes from the aforesayde counsayle, was informed of the most part of theyr determination, and therefore forthwyth sent to Tourney the chiefe men of warre that he had in all Fraunce, as the Erle of Ewe, the yong Erle of Guynes his sonne, Constable of Fraunce, the Erle of Foyts and his brethren, the Erle Amery of Narbon, Sir Aymer of Poyters, Sir Geoffrey of Charney, Sir Garard of Mountfaucon, the two Marshalles, Sir Robert Bertrand, and Sir Mathewe de Troy, the Lord of Cayeux, the Seneschall of Poyteau, the Lord of Chastelayne, and Sir John of Landas, and these also had with them many other valiaunt knightes, and Esquiers, and came to Tourney, and founde there sir Godmer du Foy, who was placed there, as before you haue heard. And so soone as they were come thether, they diligently considered the state of the towne, first for furniture of all necessary victualles, and after for men, municion, and armor. The French king fortefieth the townes of Tourney.

And nowe approched the time that king Edward and his Allyes should mete before Turney, for then the Corne began to rype, which was the.xxiij. day of July, and the king departed from Gaunt, accompanied with.vij. Erles of England.viij. Bishoppes, xxviij. Baronettes. CC. knightes, foure thousand men of armes, and.ix. thousand Archers, beside men of foote, and all out of Englande: And all his hoste passed thorough the Towne of Andwarpe, and so passed the ryuer of Lescault, & lodged before Tourney, at the gate of Saint Martyn, which was the way toward Lille and Doway. And shortly after came the duke of Brabant, with mo then.xx. thousand men, knightes, Esquiers, and Commons, and he lodged at the bridge of Arpes, by the riuer of Lescault, betwene the Abbey of Saint Nicholas, and the gate of Valentenoys. And not long after, came the Erle of Heynault with a goodly company of his Countrie, with many of Holland, and Zeland, and he was lodged betweene the king, and the Duke of Brabant. Then came Jaques Dartuell with mo then.lx. thousand Flemyngs, beside them of Ipre, Poppynguy, Cassell, and Bergues, and they were sent to the other syde. The sayde Jaques Dartuell lodged at the gate called Saint Fountayne. And the Duke of Guerles, the Erle of Jullers, the Marques of Blanquebource, the Marques of Musse, the Erle of Mouns, the Erle of Sauines, the Lord of Faulquemount, Sir Arnold of Baquehen, and all the Almaynes were lodged on the other syde toward Heynault. And thus the Citie of Tourney was enuyroned round about, and euery hoste might resort eche to other, so that none could issue out without espiyng. The siege of Tourney.

During the tyme of the siege, although they were so great a number, yet were they well prouyded and furnished of freshe victualles, and at reasonable price, for the people came from all partes to victuall them. And while this this ſiege continued, there were daylie outrodes, and dyuers prayes and booties taken, and many Villages brent, and the Countries thereabouts greatly annoyed and hurt. And many and ſundrie times there were ſundrie ſkirmiſhes and many feates of armes done. But this ſiege continued long, for that the Souldyours of Tourney defended the ſame very valiauntly, yet at the laſt, victualles within the Towne waxyng very ſcant, they were forced to put out all their needie and poore people, which paſſed thorough the Duke of Brabants hoſte, who cauſed them to be conducted to the french kinges Campe, who lay then at Arras, accompanied with a great & houge hoſte, to whome the poore people made a moſt lamentable and pittifull reporte of the ſtate of Tourney.

All the time that this ſiege continued, which was by the ſpace of ten weekes and more, the Lady Jane of Valoys, ſiſter to the French king, and mother to the Queene of England, and to the Erle of Heynault, trauayled greatly, as well on the one parte as on the other to haue a truce and a reſpite betweene the french king and the king of England and his Allyes for a ſeaſon, that they might depart without battayle. And dyuers times ſhe kneeled at the feete of the french king in that behalfe. And in lyke maner made great laboure to the Lordes of the Empire, and ſpecially to the Duke of Brabant and to the Duke of Jullers, who had her daughter in mariage, and alſo to Sir John of Heynault. Inſomuch that the good Lady procured, with the ayde and counſayle of Lewes Daugymount, who was welbeloued with both parties, that at the laſt it was graunted that ech partie ſhould ſend foure ſufficient perſons to treate by the ſpace of three dayes of ſome good wayes for the agreement of a truce. The perſons that ſhould be appointed ſhoulde meete in a little Chapell ſtandyng in the fieldes called Eſplotyn. And at the daye appointed theſe perſons met, and the good Ladye with them. Of the Frenche parte, there was Charles king of Behayne, Charles Erle of Dalanſon brother to the french king, the Biſhop of Liege, the Erle of Flaundyrs, and the Erle of Armanack. Of the Engliſhe parte there was the Duke of Brabant, the Biſhop of Lyncolne, the Duke of Gueries, the Duke of Jullers, and Sir John of Heynault.

Ambaſſadors appoynted to common and determine a peace betwene ỹ king of England & the Frenche king.

And when they were all met, they made eche vnto other louyng ſalutations and great cheere, and then entred into their treatie, and all that daye they commoned of dyuers wayes of accorde: And alwayes the good Lady of Valoys was among them, effecteouſly entreatyng them on both ſydes that they would doe their endeuour to make a peace: howbeit that daye paſſed without anye thing done, and ſo they returned and agreed to meete there agayne the next day, the which day they met, and ſtreight waye entered to the matter of their treatie: and at the laſt agreed vpon certaine pointes: but it was then ſo late that they coulde not finiſhe in good order, that which they had agreed vpon. The thirde day they met agayne, and finally agreed on a truce to remayne for one yere next to come betweene all parties and all their men, and alſo betweene them that were in Scotlande, and all ſuche as made warre in Gaſcoyn, Poyteau, and Xanton, and the ſame truce to beginne. xl. dayes next enſuyng: and within that ſpace euery perſon to geue knowledge vnto his men without male engyne: and if ſuche companies will not keepe the peace, let them be at their choiſe. But as for Fraunce, Picardy, Burgoin,

A truce agreed and concluded betwene the king of Englande and the French king for one yere.

Britayne

Britayne and Normandy to be bounde to this peace without any exception: and this peace to beginne incontinent betwene the hostes of the two kinges, namely of England and of Fraunce. And it was further determyned that eyther of the sayde kinges should send foure or fiue personages as their Ambassadors, and to meete at Arras: and the Pope in lyke maner to send thether foure, and there to make a full confirmation without any meane. Also by this truce it was ordered, that euery partie should enioye and possesse euerie thing that they were then in possession of. This truce was foorthwith proclaymed in both the hostes: whereof the Brabanters were right glad, for they were sore weryed with the lyeng so long at the siege, so that the nexte day, assone as it was daye light, ye should haue sene such pullyng downe of Tentes and Pauilions, such charging and lading of Waggons, such casting and throwing of their armour, such shooting off of ordynaunce, both great and small, and the people remouing so thick, that to such as sawe it, it might haue appered to haue bene a new worlde.

Thus the king of Englande departed from Tourney, sore against hys minde, if he could haue done otherwise, but he was fayne to yeelde to the other Lordes, and to folow their counsayles, and then he came to Gaunt to the Queene his wife, and shortly after returned into Englande with all his people, except such as were left behind to attend vpon the assembly at Arras, as aforesayde, and vnto this assembly or counsaile of Arras, there came first from the Pope as Legates, the Cardinall of Naples, the Cardinall of Cleremount, who first came to Paris where the french king receaued them with great honor and after conueyed them to Arras. For the French king thether came, the Erle of Alanson the brother of the French king, the Duke of Burbon, the Erle of Flaundrys, the Erle of Bloys, the Archebishop of Senes, the Bishop of Beawayes, and the Bishop of Aucerre. For the king of Englande, came the Bishop of Lyncolne, The Bishop of Durham, the Erle of Warwike, Sir Robert de Arthoys which was Erle of Richemond, Sir John of Heynault, and Sir Henry of Flaundrys. In the which treaty many matters were commoned of, and they continued. xv. dayes, but agreed to no one point of effect, for euer the Englishmen demaunded, and the frenchmen would nothing graunt, but onely to render the Countie of Poyteau, the which was geuen to Quene Isabel in mariage with king Edward ỳ secõd. So this assembly brake vp, and nothing done, but that the truce was yet prolonged two yeres more, & that was al that the Cardinals could get graunted vnto them. And thus euery man departed, & the two Cardynals went thorough Henault at the desire of ỳ erle, who feasted them right nobly. Froissart.

A meetyng at Arras.

The truce continued for two yeres lenger.

After king Edward was returned out of Fraunce into England, in the which voyage and passage of the Sea, he had an exceedyng and most horrible tempest, and escaped with great daunger, which tempest after the opynion of sundrie wryters was rered and sturred vp by the Necromanciers of the French king to the intent to haue destroyed the king, or else to haue abated his courage for attemptyng the Sea any more.

A tempest on the Sea.

In the time that the king lay at the siege of Tourney, as aforesayde, the Scottes had agayne recouered the greatest parte of their lande, & all their fortes except three, wherefore the king was now counsayled to make a voyage into Scotland and so he did, and roade thetherward betweene Mighelmas mas and Halontyde, commaundyng certaine Capteynes to gather their men together and to folow him to Barwike, so euery man began to shyre, and came thether as they were commaunded. The king at the last came to Yorke and there taryed for his people. The Lordes of Scotland were enformed of the comming of the king of Englande, wherefore they gaue most sore and fierce assaultes to the Castell of Estreuelyne, which before they had long besieged, and so constrayned those that kept it, with engynes and Canons, that they were fayne to yeelde vp the Castell, sauyng their lyues and members: but nothing should they carie awaye.

The Castell of Estreuelyn yelded vp to the Scottes.

These tydings came to the king of Englande where as he was, and then he departed and drewe towarde Estreuelyn, and came to New Castell vpon Tyne, where he taried more then a Moneth, abyding prouision for hys armie, the which was shipped to come by sea, betwene Alhalontyde and the last of Nouember, but many of the shippes were cast awaye vpon the Sea, so that it was a small prouision of victuall that came thether. And some of the shippes were driuen into Holland and into Friseland, by reason whereof the English armie had great lack of victualles, and euery thing waxed vnreasonably deare, and Winter was at hand, so that they knewe not where to haue forage, and in Scotland the Scottes had put all their goods into fortresses, and the king of England had there mo then. vj. thousand horsemen and. xl. thousand footemen.

A great army.

The Lordes of Scotland after theyr winnyng of Estreuelyne, drewe themselues into the Forestes of Gedeours, and they vnderstood well howe that the king of England lay at newe Castell with a great number to brenne and spoyle Scotland. Then they tooke counsaile what they should do, they thought themselues to weake and to small a company to maintein the warre, and the rather for that they had continued the warres almost seuen yeres without head or Capitaine, neyther as then they could not perceyue any succour to come from their awne king, and therefore they determined to send to the king of England, a Bishop and an Abbot to desyre a truce. The which Messengers departed from Scotland and came to Newcastell, where they found the king.

A truce concluded with the Scottes for foure monethes.

These Messengers shewed to the king and his counsaile the cause of their comming: and at the last a truce was concluded for foure monethes, on this condicion, that they of Scotland should sende sufficient Ambassadors into Fraunce to king Dauid, saiyng, that if he came not before the ende of the moneth of May nexte folowyng with puyssaunce and force sufficient to defende his realme, that then they would yelde themselues to the king of England, and neuer after to take Dauid for their king. So thus these two prelates returned againe into Scotland, and incontinent they ordeyned to send into Fraunce, Sir Robert Uersay, and Sir Robert Percye, and Sir Simon Frysell and two other knightes to shew to the king their appoyntment.

The king of England agreed the sooner to this truce, because his hoste lacked victuall, and so he came backe againe, and sent euery man home. The Scottishe Messengers went toward Fraunce, and toke shippyng at Douer.

Nowe king Dauid of Scotland, who had beene. vij. yere in Fraunce, and knewe well that his realme was sore distressed, tooke his leaue of the French king, to the entent to come home to comfort his awne people: and so he

he tooke shippyng with his wyfe and such small company as he had, and put himselfe vnder the guidyng of a Mariner called Richard Flamont, and so arriued in Scotlande at a port called Mozoyse, or euer that any in Scotlande knewe thereof: Neyther knewe he any thing of the Messengers that were gone into Fraunce to speake with him, nor they knewe not of his returnyng home. The returne of Dauid king of Scottes out of Fraunce.

So sone as the commyng of king Dauid was knowen to the Scottes, they came about him with great ioy, and solempnitie, and brought him to the towne of Saint Johns, and thether came to him people from all partes of his countrey, greatly complaynyng and cryng out of the dammages and great hurtes that they had susteyned in his absence by the Englishmen: To whom he aunswered that he trusted right shortly to be reuenged vpon them, or else it should cost him both his life and his realme.

Then he sent Messengers to all partes of his Countrie, both farre and nere, requyryng euery of them to helpe him forwarde in his enterprice. And shortly after came vnto him the Erle of Orkeney, a great Prince and a puyssant, he had maryed the kinges sister, and with him came a great number of men of warre, and diuers other Lordes and knightes of Souegne, of Nebegne, and of Denmarch, some for loue and some for wages, so that when they were all together, they were. lx. thousand footmen, and three thousand horsemen armed after their maner: and when they were all ready, they remoued settyng forward toward England, and to do therein as much hurt as they might, for the truce was as then expired, or else to fight with the king of England, who had so much greued and annoyed them. A great army of the Scottes.

Thus the Scots departed from S. Johns towne, & went to Donfremelyn, & the next day there they passed a little arme of the Sea: Then they went with great diligence, and passed by Edenbourgh, & after by Roustourgh, the which was as then English, but they made there no tariance, for they purposed to do a great feat, before they returned again into Scotland. And so they passed forward and went not farre from Barwike, and passyng it also without any assault geuyng, they entered into the Countrie of Northumberland, and came to the ryuer of Tyne, brennyng all the countrie round about them, and at the last came to New Castel vpon Tyne, and there the king of Scots and all his people lay about that towne all night. The Scots beseige newe Castell vpon Tyne.

In the morning a certeine number of Gentlemen that were within the towne issued out to the number of two hundreth Speares, to make a skrye in the Scottes hoste. They dashed in so sodeynely vpon the Scottes, and namely vpon the Erle of Mozettes tentes, who bare in his armor Syluer, three Dreylles Goules, and there they toke him in his bed, and slue many, before the host was moued, and wanne great pillage. A skirmishe made by the Englishmen vpō ỹ Scots wherein the Erle of Morest was take.

Then they returned into the Towne valiauntly, and with great ioye, and delyuered the Erle Moret as prisoner to the Capitaine of the Castell, which then was the Lorde John Neuell.

When the Scottes were vp, they armed them, and ranne lyke mad men to the Barryers of the towne, and gaue a great assault therunto, the which endured long, but little it auayled them, and the Scots lost there many men, for there were very many good men of warre within the towne, the which defended the same so manfully and wisely, that the Scots to their great losse were fayne and glad to withdraw their siege.

Now when the Scottishe king sawe that their tarying at New Castell was daungerous, and that he had there neyther hope of gayne nor honour, then he departed and entred the Countrie of the Bishoprick of Durham, and there brent and wasted all that was before him, and at the last came to the Citie of Durham, and besieged it rounde about, and made many terrible and desperate assaultes lyke mad men, because they had lost the Erle of Moret, and also they knewe well that there was much ryches in that towne, for all the countrie there about was fled thether.

The Scots besieged Durham.

The Scots made Ingines and Instruments to come to the walles to make the fiercer assault. But when the Scots were gone from New Castell as you heard before, then syr John Neuell Captaine there, mounted on a good horse, and tooke away farre of from the Scottes, and made suche good speede that within fiue dayes he came to Chyrtsay, where as king Edward lay then, & there declared vnto him the doyngs and enterprices of the Scots.

Then king Edward sent foorth Messengers into euerye parte of his realme, commaundyng euery man betwene the age of.xv. and. lx. all excuses set aparte, to drawe Northward, and to meete him in that Countrie, for the ayde and defence of England, which the Scottes attempted to destroy, and foorthwith the king departed and taryed for no man, and suffred euery man to come after as well as they might.

King Edwarde goeth into Scotlande.

Then the Lordes, knightes, Esquiers, and gentlemen drewe together, euery one bringing with them as many men as they coulde make, and drew toward the North, folowyng the king.

The Scots wynne the towne of Durham.

In this meane tyme the Scottes gaue a most cruell assault vnto the towne of Dureham, and folowed the same so fiercely with Ingines and Instruments, that they that were within were not hable to make any lenger defence, but that the Scottes entered the towne by force, and robbed and spoyled the same, and then set it on fyre, and destroyed all the people that were therein, men, women, children, Monke, Fryer, Nonne, Chanon, and suffred not one person to escape on lyue, & then set a fyre the Churches, Chapels and all that euer was there, sparyng nothing that myght be spoyled or brent.

And when the Scottishe king had finished this hys tiranny vpon the Towne of Durham, he was then aduised to drawe back agayne along the ryuer of Tyne, and to come to Carleyle, and as he and his armie passed that way, he lodged beside a Castell of the Erle of Salisburies, the which was well furnished and kept with men of warre, and syr Wylliam Mountagew sonne to the Erle of Salsburyes sister was Captaine thereof. The next day the Scottes dislodged and went toward Carleyle (they had much caryage with them of suche pillage as they had at Durham) and when Sir Wylliam Mountagew sawe howe the Scottes passed by without restyng, then he with.xl. with him mounted on horsback, and issued out of the Castell, and folowed couertly the hinder trayne of the Scottes, who had horses so charged with baggage, that they might scant go any great pace. And he ouertoke them at the entring into a Wood, and set vpon them, and there slue and hurt of the Scottes mo then. CC. and tooke mo then. ward, and as then he was past the wood. When he sawe the Scottes came flyeng ouer the dales and mountaines, he had great maruell, and then he and all his company ranne foorth and rested not vntill they came to the foote of the Castell, and mounted the hill in hast. But or he came to the Bayles the Englishmen were entred, and had closed the Barryers, and put the pray in saferie. Then the Scottes beganne to assayle fiercely, and they within defended manfully. There these two Wylliams did what they might eche to greue other. This assault dured so long, that at the last the king and all the hoste came back agayne and layde siege to the Castle.

When the Scottish king and his counsayle sawe howe his men were slaine, lyng in the field, and the Assaylauntes sore hurt, without winnyng of any thing, then he commaunded to ceasse the assault and to lodge. Then euery man began to seeke for his lodgyng, and to gather together the dead men, and to dresse them that were hurt. The next day the king commaunded that euery man should be ready to assaile, and they within were as redy to defend. There was a sore assault and a perillous: But there might haue beene seene that day many a noble feate and deede of armes. There was within the Castell, the noble Countesse of Sarisbury, who was as then reputed and taken for the sagest and fayrest Lady that was in all England, whose husband was taken prisoner with the Erle of Suffolke before Lisle in Flaunders. The king of England gaue the sayde Castell to the sayde Erle, when he maryed first the sayd Lady, for the prowes and good seruice that he had done before, when he was called but sir William Mountagew. This noble Lady comforted them greatly which were within, for by her sweete countenaunce and gentle speche, she made euery man worth twaine. This assault dured long, and the Scottes lost many of their men, for they aduentured themselues very hardly, and caryed wood and tymber to haue filled the ditches, to the entent to bring their engines to the walles, but they within defended them so valiauntly, that the assaylauntes were faine to drawe back. Then the king of Scottes commaunded the Ingines to be well kept that night, and the next day to enforce the assault, and then euery man drewe backe to his lodgyng. Some wept & bewailed their frendes that were slaine, another sort comforted them that were hurt: and they of the Castell sawe well that if king Dauid continued his siege, that they should haue much ado to defende their Castell, and therefore they tooke counsaile among themselues to sende to king Edward, who then lay at Yorke, as it was shewed them by such prisoners as they had taken of the Scottes. Then one of them beheld another, as who should say, who is he that dare go foorth to cary this message, and not one of them would offer him selfe, which thing sir William Mountagew perceyuyng, stepped forth and sayd, sirs I will put my body in aduenture to do this Message, for I haue such trust in you, that you will right well defende thys Castell vntill my returne: and on the other side I haue such trust in the king, that I shall shortly bring you succours, which will cause you to be ioyful, and I trust the king will so reward you, that ye shall be content. And when night came, the sayde sir William made him readie as priuely as he might, and it happened well for him, for it rayned all night, so that the Scottes kept still within their lodgynges. At midnyght sir William passed through the hoste of the Scottes, and was not seene, and so roade forth vntill it was day, and then he met with two Scots a mile from the hoste, dryuyng before them two Oxen, and a Cowe towarde the hoste. Sir William knewe well that they were Scottes, and therefore set vpon them, and wounded them both, and slue the Cattaile, to the entent that they of the hoste should take no profite by them, and then sayde vnto the two hurt Scottes, go your wayes, and say to your king, that William of Mountagew hath thus passed through his hoste, and is goyng to fetch ayde of the king of England, and so departed.

In the mornyng the king of Scottes made a fierse assault, but yet he preuayled nothing, and dayly they assaulted it, but all in vaine. Then the king of Scottes and his counsayle, conslderyng that there they did but lose theyr men, and that the king of England might wel come thether before the Castel were wonne, and therefore by one assent they sayd vnto the king, that theyr abydyng there, was neyther for his profite, nor yet for his honour. And further they sayd, Sir ye haue right honourably atchieued your enterprice, and haue done great despyte to the Englishe men, in that you haue bene nowe in this Countrie of England. xij. dayes, and taken and destroyed the Citie of Durham. Wherefore sir all thinges considered, it were good now that you returned, and to take with you the Pillage that ye haue wonne, and another time ye may returne againe when it pleaseth you. The king who would not do against the opinions of all his counsayle, agreed to them sore against hys minde, and the next mornyng he dislodged, and tooke the way streight to the great Forest of Gedours, there to tary at their ease, and to vnderstand what the king of England purposed further to do, eyther to go backe againe, or else to go further into Scotland.

The Scottishe king flieth for feare of king Edward.

The same day that the Scots departed from the sayd Castell, king Edward came thether with all his hoste aboute Noone, and came to the same place where as the Scottes had lodged, and he was sore displeased that he found not the Scottes there, for he came thether in such haste, that hys horse and men were sore trauayled. Then he commaunded to lodge there all that night, and sayd that he would go see the Castell and the noble Lady therein, for he had not sene her sith she was maryed before, then euery man tooke his lodgyng as he list.

And alsoone as the king was vnarmed, he tooke .x. or .xij. knightes with him, and went vp to the Castell to salute the Countesse of Sarisbury, and to see the maner of the assaultes of the Scottes, and the defence that was made against them. Alsoone as the Lady knewe of the kinges comming, she set open the Gates, and came out so richely besene, that euery man marueyled at her beutie, and could not cease to regarde her noblenesse, and the pleasant wordes and gracious countenaunce that she had. And when shee came to the king, she kneled downe on the earth, thanking him of his succours, and so led him into the Castell, where she made him honourable chere, as she was one that could right well do it. The king beyng in the Castell went into a Window, and leaned on his elbow as one beyng in a great studie: The Ladie went about to make cheere to the Lordes and knightes that were there, and commaunded the Hall to be dressed for dinner. And when shee had made all thinges in a readinesse, then shee came to the kyng with a merye cheere, who was in a great studie, and she sayde: dere Sir, what meaneth your grace so to studie without cause, it doth not apperteyne vnto

you ſir ſo to do, but rather ye ſhould make good chere and be ioyfull, chiefly e for that you haue chaſed away your enemies, who durſt not abyde your comyng, and let other men ſtudie for the remnaunt. Then the king ſayd, A dere Lady, know for a truth, that ſithe my entrance into this Caſtell, there is ſuch a matter entered into my minde, that I can not chooſe but muſe, neyther can I tell what may fall thereof, for put it out of my heart I can not. Sir quoth the Lady, ye ought alwayes to make good cheere to comfort therewith your people, and chiefely ye haue cauſe to reioyce in God, for that he hath ayded and ſupported you in all your great affayres and enterpriſes, and hath made you the moſt renowmed and famous Prince in all Chriſtendome: And if the Scottiſhe king haue done you any diſpite or dammage, ye may well reuenge it when it ſhall pleaſe you. Wherfore ſir, I pray you leaue your muſyng, and come into the Hall (if it pleaſe you) for your dinner is all ready. A fayre Lady quoth the king, other thinges lie in my heart that ye know not off, but ſurely the ſwete and gentle behauiour of you, the great wiſedome, nobleneſſe, and excellent beautie which I beholde in you, hath ſo ſore ſurpriſed my heart, that I can not but loue you, and without your loue I am but dead. Then aunſwered the Lady ſaiyng: A right noble Prince, for Goddes ſake mocke not, nor tempt me not, I can not beleue that it is true that ye ſay, neyther that ſo noble a Prince as ye are, could haue ſo euill a thought, as to diſhonour me and my Lord my huſband, who is ſo valiant a knight, and hath done your grace ſuch good ſeruice, and as yet remayneth priſoner in Fraunce for your cauſe and quarell: Certeinly ſir, ye ſhould in this caſe haue but a ſmal praiſe, and nothing the better thereby: I geue almightie God thankes, that hetherto I had neuer ſuch a thought in my heart, nor I truſt in God ſhall haue at the requeſt or perſwaſion of any man: And if I had any ſuch lewde intencion, your grace ought not onely to blame me, but alſo to puniſh my bodie, and by true iuſtice to be diſmembred: and therewith the Ladie ſodenly departed from the king, and went into the Hall to haſt forward the dinner, and then ſhe came againe and brought ſome of his knightes with her, and ſayd: ſir, if it pleaſe you to come into the Hall, your knightes abideth for you to waſche, ye haue bene to long faſtyng. Then the king went into the Hall and waſhed, and ſate downe among his Lordes and knightes, and the Lady alſo. The king did eate very little, but ſate ſtill muſing, and euer as he durſt, he caſt his eyne vpon the Lady. Of his ſadneſſe the knightes had much maruell, for he was not accuſtomed ſo to be: Some thought it was becauſe the Scottes were eſcaped from him. But to be ſhort, although the king fared right honourably, yet could he not by any meanes be made mery, ſo that after dinner done, yet remayned he there all that day. And beyng wrapt in the ſnares and bondes of loue, he had ſundrie imaginations: Sometime he imagined that honour and truth forbad him to ſet his heart in ſuch a caſe, to diſhonour ſuch a Lady, and ſo true a knight as her huſband was, who had alwayes ſerued him ſo truely and valiauntly: On the other part, loue ſo conſtrained him, that the power thereof, ſurmounted both honour and truth: And thus was the king troubled in himſelfe all that day and night. In the Morning the king aroſe and diſlodged all his hoſte, and drewe after the Scottes to chaſe them out of his realme. And at his departure he tooke his leaue of the Lady, and ſayd, my dere Lady, to God I commend you vntill I returne againe, requiryng ryng you to aduyse you otherwise then you haue sayde to me. Noble Prince quoth the Lady, God the father most glorious be your guide and conduct, and remoue from you all vileyne thoughts: & sir, I am and euer shall be redy to do your grace such seruice, as may be to your honour and mine, & therewith the king departed, altogether abashed.

Then the king folowed the Scottes vntill he came to Berwick, & went still forward, vntill he came within foure leagues of the Forest of Gedours, where as king Dauid and all his company was entred, in trust of the great wildernesse. The king of Englande taryed there three dayes, to see if the Scottes woulde issue out to fight with him, in the which tyme there were sundrie skirmishes on both partes, and dyuers of the Scottes taken, slayne and sore hurt. Sir William Dowglas was he that did most hurt to the Englishmen, he bare Azure a Comble siluer, and three starres Goules.

A truce taken with the Scottes for two yeres, if the French king would agree thereunto.

In this tyme that king Edwarde laye there, there were certayne noble men vpon both partes that treated for a peace to be had betweene these two kinges: And the same treatie tooke suche effect, that a truce was agreed to endure for two yere, if the French king would thereto agree. For the king of Scottes was so allyed to the French king, that he might take no peace with the king of Englande without the consent of the french king. And therfore it was then agreed, that if the French king would not agree to the peace, then the truce to endure vntill the first day of May next folowyng. And it was also agreed that the Erle of Moret which was prisoner in Newcastel, should be deliuered of his imprisonment, if the king of Scottes could doe so muche with the french king as to purchace that the Erle of Salsburie might lykewise be quyte out of prison in Fraunce, and the same to be done before the feast of saint John Baptist next after.

King Edward agreed the rather to this truce, for that at this instant he had warre in Fraunce, in Gascoyn, in Poyteau, in Xaynton, in Britayne and almost in euerye place he had men in wages to hys maruellous great costes and charges: And when all thinges were concluded, as afore sayde, then the king returned into Englande.

The Erle of Sarisbury, husband to the Ladie a little before spoke of was exchaunged for another prisoner in Fraunce, and sent home to his wyfe.

And sone after, the king of Scottes sent great messengers to the french king to agree vnto this truce: The French king was content at the desyre of the king of Scottes, and then was the Erle of Salsburie, who had beene long prisoner in Fraunce, sent home into Englande. And the king of Englande sent incontynent the Erle Moret into Scotland.

And in the ende of this yere the Queene was deliuered of a man childe at the Towne of Langley, the which after was named Edmond, and surnamed Edmond of Langley.

A little before ye haue heard how the king was striken in loue with the Countesse of Salsbury. And now it happened, that for the loue of the sayde Lady, who yet was not out of his minde, he caused a great feast to be publyshed abroad, and a Justes to be holden in the Citie of London (in the place now called west Smithfield) in the middes of August next folowyng, the which was also proclaymed in Flaundyrs, in Henault, in Brabant, and in Fraunce, graunting to all commers out of euery Countrie safe conduyte to come and go. And also he gaue speciall commaundement thorough his owne Realme, that all Lords, Knights, Esquyers, Ladyes and Damosels should be

be there without any excuſe, and commaunded expreſly the Erle of Salſbury, that the Lady his wyfe ſhould be there, and to bring with her all the Ladyes and Damoſelles of that Countrie. The Erle graunted the king, as he that thought none euill. The good Ladye durſt not ſaye nay, although ſhee knewe right well what was ment thereby: But yet ſhee durſt not diſcouer the matter to her huſband, notwithſtanding ſhe thought within her ſelfe that ſhe would order the matter well ynough.

A great feaſt and royall Juſtes.

Thys was a royall feaſt, and at the ſame was the Erle Wylliam of Heynault, and ſyr John of Heynault his Uncle, and a great number of Lordes and knightes of high lynage. There was great triumphyng and iuſtyng the ſpace of.xv. dayes. And running at the ſame iuſtes was ſlaine the Lorde John, eldeſt ſonne to the Vycount of Beaumond of England. And at this triumph all the Ladyes and Damoſelles of England were freſhly trimmed and attyred, according to their degrees, except the Lady Alice Counteſſe of Salſbury, for ſhe went as ſimply as ſhe might, to thentent that the king ſhould not phanſie her, for ſhe was fully determyned that ſhe would doe nothing that ſhould diſhonour her huſband and her ſelfe. At this feaſt were ſyr Henry with the wyde neck Erle of Lancaſter, and ſyr Henry his ſonne Erle of Darby, ſyr Robert de Artoys Erle of Richemond, the Erles of Northhampton, of Glouceſter, of Warwike, of Salſburie, of Pembroke, of Hereford, of Arondell, of Cornewall, of Orenford, and of Suffolke, and the Baron of Staumforde and dyuers other Lordes and knightes of England.

And before this great triumph was altogether ended, and the Noble men departed, king Edward receaued ſundrie and dyuers Letters out of ſundrie Countries, as Gaſcoyn, Bayon, Flaundyrs from Jaques Dartuell, and out of Scotland from the Lorde Roſe, and the Lorde Percy, and from ſyr Edward Baileoll Captaine of Barwike, who certefied the king, that the Scottes held but ſimply the truce concluded the laſt yere, for they newly aſſembled together much people, but for what entent they could not tell. Alſo the Capitaines in Poyteau, Xanton, Rochell and Burdeloys, wrote to the king how the Frenchmen made great preparations for the warre, becauſe the peace that was made at Arras was almoſt expired, which cauſed ỹ king to haſten the ende of his feaſting. And ſo ſone as the ſtraungers were departed: The king by the aduiſe of his counſayle did anſwere the former letters.

A parliamẽt holden at weſtminſter.

Edward the Kinges firſt ſonne created Prince of Wales.

After the former feaſt ended, the king called his Court of Parliament, who aſſembled together at Weſtmynſter ſhortly after Eaſter, then next folowyng. And in the time of the ſayde Parliament, the king created Edward his firſt begotten ſonne (who was borne in the thirde yere of his reigne) Prince of Wales, and he prooued the moſt royall Prince in Chiualrie that was in all Chriſtendome. And in the ſayde Parliament was graunted vnto the king toward the finiſhyng and ending of his warres with Fraunce of the commons and of the Townes and Cities of the Realme of Englande, foure fiftenes to be paid in two yeres next folowing. And likewiſe ỹ Clergy graũted vnto him three fiftenes to be paide in three yeres, but both the commons and the clergie had graunted vnto them by the king ſuche liberties as ye may read in the ſtatute made in the ſayd. xviij. yere, as counterueyled their gift. And theſe fiftenes were alſo graũted with theſe cõdicions, that all ſuch ſomes of money as ſhould be leuied of the aforeſayde grauntes, ſhould be onely and wholy

The Clergie are politique.

It shoulde seme that the king was here partye out of credite with ỹ comons because he had consumed so great summes of money in his warres as before had bene leuied of his subiectes, & the same came to smal purpose.

wholy employed vpon the exployte and expedition of the full fynishing and ending of the warres with Fraunce, and the same to be disposed by the aduice of certayne Lordes and other great men that were specially nominated and appointed therunto by the Parliament house. And also, that the king should not for any friend, letter or letters, entreatie or entreaties, nor for any fayre promises, withdraw his enterprice in the expence of this money in his warres of Fraunce vntill he had fully ended and fynished the same eyther by conquest, or elles by the conclusion of a finall peace. And herevpon the Lordes of the realme graunted to go with the king, and to aduenture their lyues with him in the same.

A new coyne called the Floreyn.

And at this time also the king made a newe coyne of Golde and named it the Floreyn, that is to saye, the penny of the value of. vj. shyllings. viij. pence, the halfe penny of the value of three shyllings, foure pence, and the farthyng of the value of twentie pence, the which Coyne was specially ordeyned for his warres in Fraunce: For the Golde thereof was not so fyne as was the Noble, which as before in the. xiiij. yere of hys reigne he caused to be coyned.

The death of Sir Robert de Arthoys Erle of Richemond.

Nowe after the aforesayde Parliament ended, king Edward woulde needes ayde the Countesse of Mountforde agaynst the Lorde Charles of Bloys. And for her relefe he sent Sir Robert de Arthoys, Erle of Richemond accompanied with a certayne number of good men of warre, and Archers, the which Sir Robert by reason of tempestes on the Sea, was long before he came thether: But for the time he remayned there, he did very valiauntly, notwithstanding at the last he was sore wounded, and returned into England and dyed in London and was buried in the Quier, or vpper parte of Paules Churche, whome king Edward caused to be buried with as solempne an obsequy, and as nobly was it done, as if it had bene for his awne Cosyn Germayn the Erle of Darby.

King Edward with a great power landeth in Britayne.

King Edwarde being greatly offended with the death of Sir Robert de Arthoys, sware a great othe that he would neuer reast but he woulde reuenge his death, wherefore incontinently he sent out letters thorough out all the Realme, commaunding euery noble man and other to attend vpon hym within one Moneth next after. And in the meane tyme he prepared a great number of shippes, and at the ende of the Moneth he tooke the Seas and landed in Britayne not farre from Uannes, where Sir Robert de Arthoys arryued before: he was three dayes in landyng of all his prouision, and the fourth day he went toward Uannes. And all this meane tyme the Erle of Salsbury and the Erle of Pembrooke lay at the siege of Renes. And shortly after, the king besieged Uannes, and did many noble feates of warre, and at the last the Duke of Normandy came with a mightye power to breake vp the siege: But in the ende, by the meanes and labour of two Cardynalles, a truce for three yeres was agreed vpon, and so the warres brake vp, and the king returned againe into England about Christmas.

A peace made with the French king for three yere.

Windsore castell first builded by king Arthure.

After the king was thus returned, he went to his Castell of Windsore, the which was first builded by king Arthure (as sayth sir John Froyssard) and nowe newely reedified by king Edwarde, wherein he tooke great pleasure. And the sayde sir John Froissart sayth, that in this Castell king Arthure did first begin the order of the round table, whereby sprang the fame of so so many noble knightes throughout all the worlde, But other write that the same was ordeyned first at Winchester, for there is yet the table that is called king Arthures round table. And nowe king Edward purposyng a lyke encouragement of noble and worthie knightes, beyng at Windsore as afore sayde, did ordeyne and establishe in the same Castell the most honourable order of knighthood of the blewe Garter, and a solempne feast to be kept for the same yerely vpon Saint Georges day. And to begin this noble order, the king caused to be assembled together all the Erles, Lordes, and knightes of his realme, and expressed vnto them his purposed deuice, wherin they toke great pleasure, because they sawe it was that which tended to great honour, and that by the same, great amitie, frienship, & loue might growe among the nobles of this realme. And then were there chosen out a certeine number of the most valiauntest men in ỹ realme, and they right gladly swore and were content to seale, to mainteine those ordinaunces that then were deuised for the sayde order.

The order of the Garter.

And then also the king builded a Chappell of Saint George within the sayde Castell of Windsore, and stablished therein certein Chanons, and other Ministers for the saiyng of deuine and dayly seruice, and endued them with right good liuynges and possessions.

The Chappell within the Castell of windsore builded by king Edward ỹ third.

Then the king sent to publish this his royall feast by his Heraults, into Fraunce, Scotland, Burgoyn, Henault, Flaundyrs, Brabant, and into the Empire of Almaine, geuyng and promisyng euery knight and Esquier that would come to the sayd feast. xv. dayes of safe conduict, before the feast, and xv. dayes after the feast, the same feast to begyn on the day of Saint George next folowyng, which was in the yere of our Lorde. 1344. and the Queene to be there, accompanyed with three hundred Ladyes and Damoselles, all of noble linage, and apparelled accordingly.

A royall feast.

When the day of this royall feast drew nere, thether came a noble company of Erles, Barons, Ladyes and Damoselles, knightes and Esquiers. And also diuerse Lordes and knightes of straunge Countries came thether out of dyuerse places, as out of Flaundyrs, Heynault, and Brabant, but out of Fraunce came none.

Duryng the time of this feast, newes came to the king out of dyuerse Countries: Thether came knightes out of Gascoyne, as the Lorde of Lespare, the Lorde of Chawmount, the Lord of Musident, who were sent from the other Lordes of the Countrie, such as were Englishe: as the Lorde de Labreth, the Lord of Puniers, the Lord of Moũtferaunt, ỹ Lord of Duras, the Lorde of Carton, the Lorde of Grayly, and diuers other. And in like maner came sundrie Messengers from sundrie other places, and all aduised the king to send vnto them succours in due season, for they were in great feare of their enemy the French king, who made great prouision to annoy them.

These troubleous newes caused the king the soner to shorten his feast and triumph. And when the same was ended, and all the straungers departed, and the Ladyes and Damoselles, then the king went to counsayle wyth his Lordes what was best to be done. And shortly they agreed that it were meete some chiefe Capitaine and succours were sent vnto Burdeaux, for the defence thereof, and for the rest of Gascoyne. Then the king agreed to sende ouer the Erle of Darby his Cosyn Germaine as Cheuetaine, who wyth all possible possible speede prepared himselfe, and he was accompanied with the Erle of Pembrooke, the Erle of Norffolke, the Baron of Stafford, Sir Gualtier of Manny, Sir Richard Haydon, the Lorde Franque de la hall, the Lieure de Brabant, sir Hugh Hastynges, sir Stephen de Tombey, the Lorde of Manny, the Lord Normant of Fynefroyde, sir Robert of Lerney, sir John Norwich, sir Richard Rockclefe, sir Robert of Quenton, and diuers other, to the number of.v. C. knightes and Esquiers, and two thousand Archers. And the king sayd to his Cosyn the Erle of Darby, take with you Gold and Siluer ynough, ye shall not lacke, and depart largely thereof vnto your men of warre, whereby ye shall get their loue and fauor, and thus the Erle of Darby departed vnto Burdeaux, who after his comming thether did many noble and valiaunt deedes of armes, aswell in assaultyng of diuerse townes, as also in conquering & recouering from ỳ French men many rich Cities & townes.

The Erle of of Derby sent to Burdeaux with a goodly company to withstand the malice of the French king.

In this time (as before you haue heard) reigned in Flaundyrs in great prosperitie and puyssaunce, Jaques Dartuell of Gaunt, who was a speciall friend and louer of king Edward. And the same Jaques had promised the king that he would make him Lorde and inheritour of Flaundyrs, and to endue his sonne the Prince of Wales therewith. For the which cause, aboute the feast of Saint John Baptist, king Edward went ouer vnto Sluce with many of his Lordes and knightes, and brought thether with him the young Prince his sonne, vpon the worde and promise of Jaques Dartuell. The king with all his naue laye in the Hauen of Sluce, and there he kept hys house, and thether came to visite him his friendes of Flaundyrs. There were great counsayles betwene the king and Jaques Dartuell on the one parte, and the Counsayles of the good townes of the other part. So that they of the Countrie were not of the agrement with the king, neyther with Jaques Dartuell, who went aboute to perswade them to disenherite the Erle Loys their awne naturall Lorde, and also his yong sonne Loys, and to inherite the sonne of the king of Englande, to the which they sayde they would neuer agree vnto. And so the last day of their Counsaile, which was kept in the Hauen at Sluce in the kinges great ship called the Katheryn: They with one minde and voyce gaue a determinate aunswere and sayd: sir, ye haue desired vs to a thing that is great and weightie, the which hereafter may sore touche the Countrie of Flaundyrs and our heyres: Truely we knowe none at thys day whose preferment and honour we would be more glad to aduaunce then yours: But sir, this thing we can not do alone, we must haue herevnto the whole commonaltie of Flaundyrs. Therefore for this present we will go home, and euery man to speake with his friendes generally within euery towne, and as we finde the most part to agree, so will we be right well content: and within a moneth we will be here againe with you, and geue you such aunswere as we trust ye will be content. The king neyther Jaques Dartuell could haue none other aunswere at that time: Howbeit they required a shorter day, but that would not be.

Jaques Dartuell of Gaūt a great louer & friend to King Edward.

So thus departed that Counsaile, and euery man went home to their awne townes: But Jaques Dartuell taryed a little with the king, and still he promised the king that he would bring them vnto his entent, but he was foule deceyued as after will appere.

Jaques Dartuell tooke his leaue of the king and went first to Bruges and and perſwaded with the Lords there, and lykewiſe with the rulers of Ipre, and in the ende they graunted vnto him, ſo that Jaques made a full accompt that he had obteyned and ended this matter, for he aſſured himſelfe of the towne of Gaunt, whom as he thought he might rule as he luſt, but he found it otherwiſe. When he had ended at Bruges he returned to Gaunt, not ſuſpecting any thing, but that they were his verie friends: and before he came to the towne, it was tolde to the inhabitaunts that Jaques Dartuell went about to diſenherite the right Erle of Flaundyrs and his ſonne, and to geue the inheritaunce vnto the ſonne of king Edward of England, a ſtraunger, at the hering wherof they aſſembled themſelues in the Market place, and were in a great furie againſt Jaques Dartuell, but at the laſt they departed from the Market place, and euery man went home to his awne houſe. Shortly after about noone, came Jaques Dartuell into Gaunt, not knowyng anye thing of the former doing of the men of the towne, but they knewe well of his comming, and therefore walked in the ſtreetes in heapes, euen where he ſhould paſſe. And when they ſawe him, they beganne to murmour, and began to whiſper together and to fall to ſecret talke, and at the laſt they ſpake out alowde one to another and ſayde. Beholde, ponder commeth the great maiſter that will rule all Flaundyrs as he luſt, and geue the inheritance therof where he thinketh meete. Alſo there was a brute blowen abroade among the inhabitaunts of the Towne, that Jaques Dartuell for the ſpace of. ir. yeres paſt had in his handes all the reuennes of Flaundyrs, and neuer did accompt for the ſame. And farther, that he had ſent great ryches and treaſure vnto the king of England: Theſe tales ſet them of Gaunt on a fyre. And as Jaques Dartuell roade through the ſtreete, he perceaued that there was ſome matter in framing againſt him, for he ſaw, as he came by, ſuch as were wont to doe reuerence vnto him, turne their faces from him, and went into their houſes. Then he began to doubt, and allone as he was alighted in his lodging, he cloſed faſt his gates, dores and wyndowes. This was ſcant done, but all the ſtreete was full of men, and ſpecially of them of meaneſt occupations, then they beſet his houſe both behinde and before and round about, and began to breake vp the houſe: But he and his defended themſelues within the houſe along ſpace, and ſlue and hurt many without. But finally he could not endure, for three partes of the men of that towne were at that aſſault. When Jaques ſawe that he was ſo ſore oppreſſed, he came to a wyndow with great humilitie bareheded and ſpake in gentle maner and ſayde: Good people, what ayleth you, why are you ſo ſore offended at me? Wherein haue I diſpleaſed you, let me vnderſtande it, and I will gladly make ſuche amends as I truſt ſhall content you. Then ſuch as heard him, anſwered all with one voyce, we will haue accompt made of the great treaſure of Flaundyrs, that you haue ſent out of the waye without any title or reaſon. Then Jaques meekely anſwered and ſayde: Certainely Sirs, of the treaſure of Flaundyrs I neuer tooke any thing. I pray you withdraw your ſelues paciently into your houſes, and come againe to morow in the morning, and I will make you ſo good an accompt, that ye ſhall be well pleaſed and contented withall. Then they all cryed and ſayde, nay, we will haue an accompt incontynent, thou ſhalt not eſcape oure handes ſo: we knowe for truth that thou haſt ſent great riches into England without our knowledge, and therefore thou

Jaques Dartuell was greatlye deceaued.

The pooreſt and of leaſt diſcretion are euer commōly the moſt buſieſt.

The wiſe and mylde ſpeech of Jaques Dartuell to the common people.

A hard matter to satisfie rude and disorderly persons.

thou shalt die. When Jaques heard that worde, he ioyned his handes together and sore weeping sayde: Sirs, such as I am ye haue made me: and ye haue swoorne to me or this to defende me agaynst all persons. And will you now slay me agaynst all reason, and no cause heard nor examined? ye maye doe it if ye will, for I am but one man amongst you all, but yet for Gods sake take better aduise, and remember the tyme past, and consyder the great graces and frienship that I haue shewed and done vnto you: and then I trust ye will not so vngently reward me, and chiefely for the great goodnesse that I haue shewed vnto your towne. Ye know right well that the trade of marchaundise was cleerely decayed in this towne, and countrey, and by my meanes ye haue recouered it. Also I haue gouerned you in great peace and rest, for in the time of my gouernement ye haue had all things as your harts desyred, corne and all other marchaundise.

Then the people cryed all with one voyce, come downe to vs & preach not so high, and geue vs accompt of the great treasure of Flaundyrs which ye haue gouerned so long without compt making, which becommeth no officer so to doe, to receaue the goodes of hys Lorde, or of hys Countrie, and make none accompt.

Jaques Dartuell taken & slaine without all mercy and pitie.

When Jaques sawe that he could not appease them: he drewe in his head and closed in his Wyndow, and thought to haue stollen out on the backside into the Church that ioyned to his house: But his house was so broken that foure hundred persons were entred into it, and finally, there he was taken and slaine without any pitie or mercie, and one Thomas Denyce gaue him his deathes stroke. And thus ended Jaques Dartuell.

King Edward hearing of the death of Jaques Dartuell returneth into England.

When king Edward, who lay all this while at Sluse, abyding the aunswere of the Flemyngs, heard how they of Gaunt had slaine Jaques Dartuell his great friend, he was sore displeased. Wherefore incontinent he departed from Sluce, and entred into the Sea, sore threatning the Fleminges and the countrie of Flaundyrs, and sayde, how his death should be reuenged.

Then the Counsaylours of the good townes of Flaundyrs thought no lesse but that the king of England would take the death of Jaques Dartuell greeuously, wherefore they determined to go to the king and excuse themselues, and specially they of Bruges, Courtray, Iper, Andwarp & Franke: They sent into Englande to the king for a safe conduyt that they might come to their excuse. The king then being somewhat cooled of his great furie, graunted their desire. And then there came into England men of estate out of the good Townes of Flaundyrs, except out of Gaunt there came none. This was aboute Mighelmas, and the same time the King laye at Westmynster besides London.

The rulers of ỳ townes in Flandyrs come to king Edward to make their excuse for the death of Jaques Dartuell.

When they were come vnto the kinges presence, they in most lowly maner humbled themselues before the king, and cleerely excused themselues of the death of Jaques Dartuell, and sware solemply that they knewe nothing thereof vntill it was done. And if they had, he was the man that they would haue defended to the best of their powers, and sayde that they were vyght sorie of his death, for he had gouerned the Countrie right politikely and wisely. And also they sayde, that though they of Gaunt had done that dede, yet should they make a sufficient amendes. And further they sayd vnto the king and his counsaile, that though he be deede, yet the king of England was ne-

uer the further off from the loue & fauour of them in Flaundyrs in all things, except the enheritance of Flaundyrs, which by no meane nor way they wyll put from the right heyres. And saying also further vnto the king: Sir you haue a yong daughter, and we haue a yong Lorde, who is the enheritour of Flaundyrs, we haue him in our kepyng, may it please you to consent to a mariage to be made betweene them two, and by that meanes the Countie of Flaundyrs may for euer be in the issue of your Childe. These wordes and many such like did greatly pacifie the king, and finally the king was content with the Flemyngs, and they with him, and so by little and little the death of Jaques Dartuell was quite forgotten.

A new offer of amitie made by the Flemynges to king Edward.

And shortly after the death of Jaques Dartuell, dyed also William Erle of Henault, the kinges great louer and friend, and not long after sir John of Heynault the kinges most chiefe and speciall friende (who from the first begimyng and entraunce of the king into the Realme and kingdome of England, assisted and defended him) did now refuse the king of England and became French, because as some write, that the king of Englande, refused to pay him his pencion that he graunted vnto him. And thus was king Edward destitute of a great many of his chiefe and speciall friendes, euen vpon a sodeyne.

The death of Wyllia Erle of Heynault the louer and great friend of king Edward.

About this time the king heard howe his men were in sore distresse at the siege of the Castell of Aguillon in Gascoyne, and therefore prepared him selfe with a great and puissaunt army to go ouer for their reskue. And in this meane time, the Lord Godfrey of Harecourt, beyng banished out of Fraunce came into England, and was well receyued with the king, and he retayned him to remaine and continue about him, and assigned him landes in England to mainteine his degree. 1345 20

The Lorde Godfrey of Harecourt being banished out of France was ioyfully receaued in Englande by king Edward.

Then the king caused a great nauy of shippes to be readie in the Hauen of Southhampton, and caused all maner of men of warre to be there at the feast of Saint John Baptist. 1345. And at that time the king departed from the Queene, and left her in the guidyng of the Erle of Cane his Cosyn. And he ordeyned and appoynted the Lorde Percey, and the Lorde Neuell to be Wardeynes of his realme, with the Archbishop of Yorke, the Bishop of Lincolne, and the Bishop of Durham: For the king at no tyme departed out of this realme, but that he left sufficient behind him to defend the realme if nede were. Then the king roade to Hampton, and taryed there for winde: And at the last he entered into Ship, and the Prince of Wales with him, and the Lorde Godfray of Harecourt, and all other Erles, Barons, Lordes, and Knightes, with all their companies. They were in number foure thousand men of armes, and ten thousand Archers, beside Irishemen and Welshmen that followed the host on foote, and.xj.C. sayle of shippes, as some write.

A royall nauy and army that sayled with the king into Fraūce.

And here I thinke it not amisse to name vnto you all the Lordes that went in this iourney with the king. First Edward his eldest sonne Prince of Wales, who as then was of the age of.xvj. yeres, or there aboutes, the Erles of Herford, Northhampton, Arondell, Cornewall, Warwike, Huntyngdon, Suffolke, and Orenford. And of Barons, the Lorde Mortimer, who was after Erle of Marche, the Lordes, John, Lewes, and Roger of Beauchamp, and the Lorde Reynold Cobham. Of Lordes, the Lord of Mowbray, Rose, Lucy, Felton, Braston, Myllon, Labey, Maule, Basset, Barlet, let, & Willoughby, and diuers other Lordes. And of Bachelers, there were John Chandoys, Fitzwaren, Peter and James Audeley, Roger of Uertuall, Bartholomew of Burges, Richard of Pembruges, with diuers other that I can not name.

Thus they sayled forth that day in the name of God, and they were well onward on their way toward Gascoyn: But on the thirde day, there arose a contrary wynde, and draue them on the Marches of Cornewall, and there they lay at anker. vj. dayes. In that space the king had other Counsayle by the meanes of Sir Godfrey Harecourt: he counsayled the king not to go into Gascoyn, but rather to set a land in Normandie, and he sayde to the king, Sir the Countrie of Normandie is one of the most plenteous Countries of the worlde. And Sir, on ieopardie on my head, if ye will land there, there is none that will resist you: The people of Normandie haue not bene vsed to warre, and all the knightes and Esquiers of the Countrie are nowe at the siege before Aguillon with the Duke. And Sir, there ye shall finde great Townes that be not walled, whereby your men shall haue such wynnyng that they shall be the better therby. xx. yere after: & ye may follow with your armie vntill ye come to Cane in Normandy. And Sir, I pray you beleue me, and take this voyage. The king who was as then but in the flower of hys youth, for he passed not. xxvj. yeres of age, and desiryng nothing so much as to haue deedes of Armes, enclined greatly to the saiyng of the Lorde Harecourt, whome he called Cosin. Then the king commaunded the Mariners to set their course to Normandie: And he tooke into his ship the Baner or Badge of the Admirall the Erle of Warwike, and sayde howe he would be Admirall in that voyage, and so sayled on before, as gouernour of the nauie. And they had wind at wil: Then the king arriued in the Isle of Constantine, at a port called Hoggue Saint Waste.

The counsail of sir Godfray Harecourt to king Edwarde, which counsayle was good as it after proued.

King Edward tooke vpon him to be Admirall to the whole naupe.

The king arriued at Cõstantine an Isle in Normandie.

Tydings anone spreade abroade, howe the Englishmen were landed: The townes of Constantyne sent downe woord to Parys to king Philip. And he had heard before how that king Edward was on the sea with a great armie, but he vnderstood not what waye he woulde take, whether into Normandy, Gascoyne, or Byteyn.

Assoone as he knewe that the king of Englande was landed in Normandy, he sent his Conestable the Erle of Guynes, and the Erle of Tankernile, who were but newly come to him from his sonne from the siege of Aguillon, to the towne of Cane, commaunding them to keepe that towne agaynst the Englishmen: They sayde they would doe their best, and so departed from Parys with a good number of men of warre, and daylie there came mo vnto them by the waye. And so at the last came to the towne of Cane, where the men and people of that towne receyued them with great ioy. And assone as these Lordes were come, they bussily prouyded for the good defence of the sayde Towne, and set all things in good order.

The king of England, as afore sayd, was arriued at the Porte Hoggue Saint Waste, neere to Saint Saupour the vicount, which was the right heritage to the Lord Godfray of Harecourt, who as then was there with the king of England. Assone as the king was arriued in the afore sayde porte, as he lept out of his ship, the first foote that he stepped on the grounde he fell so vntowardly, that the blood braste out of his nose. The knightes that were about about him, tooke him vp and sayde, syr for Gods sake enter againe into your Ship, and come not a lande this daye, for this is but an euill signe for vs. Then the king aunswered quickly and sayd, wherfore? this is a good token for mee, for the lande desyreth to haue mee. Of the which aunswere all his men were ioyfull: So that day and night the king lodged on the sandes. And in the meane time discharged the ships of their horses and other baggages. There the king made two Marshalles of his hoste, the one, Lorde Godfray of Harecourte, and the other the Erle of Warwike, and the Erle of Arondell Constable. And he ordeyned that the Erle of Huntyngdon should keepe the Fleete of shippes with an hundreth men of armes and foure hundred Archers. And also he ordeyned three battayles, one to go on his right hande close to the sea side, and the other on his left hande, and the king himselfe in the middes, and euery night to lodge all in one field.

The Lorde Godfrey of Harecourt & the Erle of warwike made Marshalles of the kings armie.

Thus they set foorth as they were ordeyned, and they that went by the Sea tooke all the shippes that came in their wayes, and so long they went foorth what by sea, and what by lande, that at the last they came to a good porte, & to a good towne called Harflew, the which incontinent was wonne: For they within gaue vp for feare of death. And albeit the sayde towne was robbed and spoyled, and much Golde, Siluer, and riche Jewels taken out of the same, yet there remayned so muche riches that the boyes and villaynes of the hoste set nothing by good furred Gownes. And before they entred into the rifelyng of the Towne, they caused all the inhabitauntes of the towne to come foorth and go into their shippes, because they would not suffer them to be behinde them for feare of rebellyng againe. And thus was the towne of Harflewe taken and spoyled without brennyng.

Harflewe wonne.

Then the armie spreade abroade in the Countrie, and did what they lust, for there was none to resist them. And at the last they came to a great and riche towne called Chierbourgh. The towne they wanne and spoyled and brent parte of it: But into the Castell they coulde not come, it was so strong and well furnished with men of warre. Then they passed forth & came to Mountbourgh, and tooke and spoyled it and brent it cleane. In thys maner they spoyled and brent many other townes in that countrey, and wanne so much ryches that it was incredible. Then they came to a great towne called Quarentyne, where there was also a strong Castell, and many souldyours within to keepe it. Then the Lordes came out of their shippes and made a fierce assault: The Burgesses of the towne were in great feare of their lyues, wyues and children. And they gladly suffered the Englishmen to enter into the towne against the minde and will of all the souldyours there: They put all their goodes vnto the Englishmens pleasures, because they thought they should so the better obtaine their fauour, and mitigate their rygour. When the French souldyours sawe the Englishmen enter into the towne, then they fled, and went into the Castell. And the Englishmen kept the towne two dayes, and therein made sore assaults vnto the Castell, and at the last the Frenchmen seing no remedy, did geue it ouer. And thus were the Englishmen possessed both of that good towne and Castell. And when they sawe they might not maintaine nor keepe it, they set it on fyre, and brent both towne and Castell. And while they were thus spoyling of the Towne, they made all the Burgesses and people of the towne to go into their shippes as before they had done with them of Harflew, Chierbourgh & Mountbourgh and other townes that they had wonne on the Sea side. All this was done by the battayle that went on the Sea side, and by them on the sea together.

Now let vs speake of the kinges battayle, when he had sent his first battaile along by the sea side, as ye haue heard before, whereof the Erle of Warwyke was Captaine and the Lorde Cobham with him. Then he made his other Marshall to leade his hoste on the left hande, for he knewe the issues and entries of Normandy better then any other did. The Lorde Godfray as Marshall roade foorth with fiue hundred men of armes, and roade of from the kings battayle fiue or seauen leagues, in burnyng and spoylyng the Countrey, the which Countrie was plentifull in euery thing. The Granges were full of Corne, the houses full of all ryches, riche Burgesses and Citezens, Horse, Swine, Sheepe and other beastes and Cattell great plenty: They tooke what pleased them, and brought into the kinges hoste. But the souldyours made none accompt to the king nor to none other of his officers of the Golde, Siluer, and Jewels that they did get, for that they kept to themselues.

Thus Sir Godfray of Harecourt road euery day from the kings host, and yet for the most parte euery night he resorted into the kings fielde.

The king tooke his way to Saint Clowe in Constantine, but before he came there, he lodged by a ryuer, abyding for his men that went along the Sea side. And when they were come, they set foorth their caryage: And the Erle of Warwike and the Erle of Suffolke, Syr Thomas Holland and Syr Raynold Cobham, and their company road out on the one side & wasted and spoyled the countrey as the Lorde of Harecourt had done. And the king euer roade betwene these battayles, and euery night they lodged together.

The French king gathereth together a great power.

In this meane time the French king sent for Sir John of Heynault, who came to him with a great number of men. And in like maner the sayde king sent for other men of armes, Dukes, Erles, Barons, Knightes, and Esquiers, and assembled together such a great number of people as had not bene sene in an hundreth yeres before. He sent also for men into so farre Countries, that it was long before they came, so that the king of Englande did what him lyst in the meane season. The French king knew well ynough what he did, and sware that he shoulde neuer returne out of his Realme vnfought withall, and that such hurtes and dammages as they had done, should be deerely reuenged.

King Edward hauing in his battaile three thousand men of armes, and vj. thousand Archers, and ten thousand footemen, besydes them that roade with the Marshals, left the Citie of Constance, and went to the great towne called Saint Clowe, which was a rich towne of Drapery, and many riche Burgesses therein. When the King came thether, he tooke his lodging without the towne, for he would neuer lodge within any towne for feare of fire: But he sent his men before, and the towne was immediately taken and spoyled. The ryches of that towne was very great, namely in Canuas. Then the king went towarde Cane, the which was a greater towne, and full of Drapery of Lynnen and Wollen cloth, and other riche Marchandise, and the inhabitauntes of the towne were very riche men, noble Ladies, beutifull Damoselles, goodly and riche Churches, and two great riche Abbeyes, one of the Trinitie, another of Saint Stephen. And on the one syde of the towne one of the fayrest Castels in all Normandy, of the which sir Robert of Blargny was Capitaine, with three hundreth Genowayes, and in the Towne was the Erle of Ewe, and of Guynes Constable of Fraunce, and the Erle of Tankeruile with a good number of men of warre.

The king of England roade all that day in good order, and lodged all his battayles together that night, about two leagues from Cane, in a towne with a little hauen called Haustreham: and thether came also all his nauie of ships with the Erle of Huntyngdon, who was gouernour of them.

The Constable and other Lordes of Fraunce that night watched well the towne of Cane, and in the mornyng armed themselues, and all the fightyng people in the Towne. And then the Constable tooke order that none should issue out of the Towne, but kepe their defences on the Walles, Gate, Bridge, and Riuer, and left the suburbes voyde, because they were not closed: For they thought they should haue ynough to do to defende the towne, because it was not closed, but with the riuer. But they of the towne sayd they would issue out, for they were strong ynough to fight with the king of England. When the Constable sawe them so bent, he sayde, in the name of God be it, ye shall not fight without me. Then they issued out in good order, and made good face and shewe to fight with the Englishe men, and to put theyr liues in aduenture.

The Englishe men roase earely in the mornyng, and made themselues ready to go to Cane. The king heard noyse before the sonne risyng, & therefore he and the Prince his sonne tooke their horse, and sir Godfrey of Harecourt, Marshall and leader of the host, whose counsaile the king much followed. And the kinges army went forward in good array, and approched nere to the good towne of Cane.

When they of the Towne, who then were ready in the field, sawe these three battayles comming in good array, with their Banners and Standards wauyng with the winde, and the Archers which they had not bene accustomed to see: they were so sore afrayde that they fled towarde the towne, without any order or good array, and the Constable could not stay them: But the Englishe men pursued them egerly.

Cane besiged taken and spoyled.

When the Constable and the Erle of Tankerupll sawe that, they tooke a Gate at the entrie and saued themselues and certeine with them, for the English men were entred into the towne as sone as they. And suche of the Frenche as knewe the way to the Castell, went thether, and the Capitaine there of receyued them all, for the Castell was large. The Englishe men in the chace slue many, for they tooke none to mercy.

Then the Constable and the Erle of Tankerupll beyng in the little towre at the Bridge foote, looked along the strete, and sawe their men slaine without mercy, they doubted to fall in their handes. At the last they sawe an English knight with one eye called Sir Thomas Holland, and fiue or sixe other knightes with him, they knewe them, for they had seene them before in Prusse, in Granado, and in other voyages. Then they called to sir Thomas and sayde, howe they would yelde themselues prisoners. Then sir Thomas came thether with his companie, and went vp into the Gate, and there found the sayd Lordes, and .xxv. knightes with them, who yelded them all vnto sir

Thomas, and he tooke them for his prisoners, and left companie to keepe them. And then he tooke his horse againe and roade into the streetes, and saued the lyues of many Ladies and Damoseles, and Cloysterers from deflowryng, for the Souldiours were without all compassion and mercie. And it chaunced so happely the same time for the Englishmen, that the riuer which was well able to beare shippes, at that tyme was so lowe, that men went in and out beside the bridge. And such of the towne as were entred into their houses, cast downe into the streete, stones, timber, and yron, and slue & hurt mo then fiue hundreth English men, with the which doing the King was sore displeased. And at night when he heard thereof, he commaunded that the next day that all should be put to the sworde, and the towne to be brent. But then sir Godfray of Haretourt sayd: dere sir, for Goddes sake asswage somewhat your courage, and let it suffice you that ye haue done, ye haue a great exployt to do before ye come to Calice, whether ye purpose to go: And Sir, in thys towne there are much people that will defende their houses, and it will cost many of your mennes liues, before that ye haue all your will, and by that meane ye may fortune to be disapoynted of your voyage to Calice, the which would turne to your great griefe: Wherefore sir, saue your people, for ye may chaunce to haue nede of them before this moneth passe, For I thinke verely that your aduersarie king Phillip will meete with you to fight, and ye shall find many streight passages and reencountries. Wherefore your men, and ye had mo shall stande you in good steede, and Sir without any further sleaping, ye shall be Lorde of this towne, men and women will put themselues and all that euer they haue vnto your pleasure.

Then the king sayd, Sir Godfray, you are our Marshall, order euery thing as best shall seeme vnto you. Then sir Godfray with his Banner roade from streete to streete, and commaunded in the kinges name, none to be so hardy as to put fire in any house, to slay any person, or to violate any woman.

When they of the towne heard that crie, they receyued the Englishmen into their houses, and made them good cheere. And some opened their Cofers, and bad them take what they would, so that they might be assured of their lyues: Howbeit at that time there were many murders, robberyes and euill deedes done in that towne.

Caen taken and sacked by the Englishe men.

Thus the Englishmen were Lordes of the towne of Caen three dayes, & wanne great ryches, the which they sent awaye by Barkes and Barges by the ryuer of Austrehen vnto their Nauie with two hundred men of Armes and foure hundred Archers, and so the Nauie departed into Englande wyth great riches and many riche prisoners. And the king bought of syr Thomas Holland two of his prisoners, which was the Constable of Fraunce, and the Erle of Tankeruyll, & gaue him for them ten thousand Marks in old nobles.

Then the king departed from Caen, and roade in the order that he did before, brennyng and spoylyng the Countrie, and tooke the way to Ewreus, and so past by it. And from thence they road to a great towne called Louyers, it was the chiefe towne of all Normandy of Drapery, ryche and full of all Marchandise: The Englishmen soone entred into it, for as then it was not closed, and it was ouer runne, ransacked and spoyled without all mercie, and there was wonne great rychesse.

Louyers taken & spoiled.

Then they entered into the Countrie of Eureux, and brent and spoyled

the Countrie, except the walled townes and Castells, to the which the king made none assault for sparyng of his people and his artillery.

On the ryuer of Seyn nere vnto Roane, there was the Erle of Harecourte brother to Sir Godfray of Harecourt, but he was on the French partie, and the Erle of Dreux with him, with a good number of men of warre. But the Englishmen left Roane and went to Gysours, where was a strong Castell, they brent the towne, and after brent Uernon and all the Countrie about Roan and Pount de Larche, and came to Naumtes and to Meulence and wasted all the Countrie about, and passed by the strong Castell of Robboys, and in euerie place along the ryuer of Seyne they founde the bridges broken. At the last they came to Poysley and found the bridge broken, but the Arches and Joystes laye in the ryuer. The king laye there fiue dayes, and in the meane time the bridge was made to passe the hoste without perill. The Englishe Marshalles ranne abroade euen iust to Parys, and brent Saint Germayns in Lay, and Mountiope and S. Clowde, and pety Boleyn by Parys, and the Quenes Bourgh. They of Parys were not well assured of themselues, for it was not as then walled nor closed.

Gysors, Uernon, & Pontlarche brent and spoyled.

Saint Germain, Pontiope, Saint Cloude, Pety Boleyn, all destroyed.

The French king vnderstanding the king of Englande to be so nere, remoued from Paris to Saint Dionyce which is nere vnto Paris: and before he went, he caused all the Penthehouses of the Towne of Parys to be pulled downe. And vnto Saint Denyce there were al ready come to the aide of the French king, the king of Behayne, the Lorde John of Heynault, the Duke of Lorreyne, the Erle of Flaundyrs, the Erle of Bloys and many other great Lordes and knightes.

When the people of Paris saw their king depart, they came to him and kneeled downe and sayde: A syr, and right Noble king, what will you doe? will ye nowe departe and leaue both vs and this noble Citie as a spoyle to your enimies? The king answered them and sayde, be not afrayde good people, for the Englishmen will come no nere you then they are. Why so syr quoth they, for they be within these two leagues: And assone as they knowe of your departure they will come and assayle vs, and we be not able to defend them, wherefore good syr, for Gods sake tarie here still and helpe to defende your noble Citie of Paris. Speake no more to me quoth the king, for I will go to Saint Dionyce to my men of warre, and I will encounter the Englishmen and fight with them, whatsoeuer fall therof.

At this time the king of Englande being at Poysly, lay at the Nonery there, and kept there the feast of our Ladye the Assumption, and sate in his robes of Skarlet furred with Ermins, and that feast being ended, he then went forth in the same order that he did before.

The Lorde Godfrey of Harecourt road out on the syde with.v.C. men of Armes and.xiij.C. Archers: And by aduenture he encountred a great number of the Burgesses of Ampens on horseback, who were ryding by the kinges commaundement to Paris. The Englishmen quickly gaue them the onset, and they valiauntly defended themselues, for they were a great number and well armed, and had to their Capitaines foure knights of Ampens. This skirmish dured long, at the first meeting many were ouerthrowne of both partes: But finally the Burgesses were taken and almost all slaine, and the Englishmen tooke all their carpages and harnesse: Of this number there were slaine. xij. hundred that lay in the field.

Then the king of England entred into Beauuosyn brennyng and spoyling the plaine countrie, and lodged at a fayre Abbey and a riche, called saint Wellene, nere to Beaways, and there the king taried one night, and in the morning departed. And when he was on his way, he looked back and saw the Abbey on fyre, and he caused incontinent. xx. of them to be hanged that set it on fyre, for he had commaunded before vpon paine of death none to spoyle any Church, nor to brenne any Abbey or Monastery.

Then the king passed by the Citie of Beaways wythout anye assault geuing, because he would not trouble his people nor wast his artillery. And so that daye he tooke his lodging betimes in a little towne called Nully. The two Marshalles came so neere to Beaways, that they made a skirmishe at the Barryers in three places, the which assault dured a long space: But the Towne within was so well defended by the meane of the Byshop, who at that tyme was within the towne, that finally the Englishmen departed and brent cleane heard to the gates all the suburbes of the same. And at night they came into the kinges field.

The next day the king departed, brennyng and spoyling all before him, and at night lodged in a good village called Gracuiellure. And the next daye the king passed by Argies, and there was none to defend the Castell, wherefore it was soone taken and brent. Then they went forth, destroyeng the Countrie all about, and so came to the Castell of Poys, where there was a good towne and two Castels. There was no body in them, but two fayre Damoselles daughters to the Lorde of Poys, and they were sone taken, and had bene violated if two Englishe knightes had not beene, syr John Chandos and Sir Basset: They defended them and brought them to the king, who for his honour made them good cheere, and demaunded of them whether they woulde fayrest go, and they sayde to Corbe, and the king caused them to be brought thether without any perill. That night the king lodged in the Towne of Poys. And they of the towne and of the Castels spake that night with the two Marshals of the host, to saue them and their towne from brennyng, and they to paye a certaine some of Floreyns, and the same was graunted vnto them. The next daye the king departed in the morning with all his hoste, except certayne that were left there to receaue the money which the towne had promised to paye. When they of the towne sawe the hoste departed and gone, and that there were few left behinde: then they sayde, that they would pay neuer a penny, and so ranne vpon the Englishmen, who defended themselues as well as they might, and sent after the host for succour.

Poys brent & destroyed.

When Sir Thomas Holland, and Sir Reignold Cobham, who had the rule of the reregarde, heard therof, they returned & cried treason, treason and so came againe to Poys ward, & found their Companions fighting still with them of the towne. Then anone they of the towne were nighe all slaine, and the towne brent, and the two Castelles beaten downe. Then they returned to the kinges Hoste, who was as then at Araynes, and there lodged, and commaunded all maner of men vpon paine of death to do no hurt to no towne of Arsyn, for there the king was minded to lie a day or two to take aduise howe he might passe the riuer of Some: For it was necessary for him to passe the riuer, as after ye shall here.

The

The Frenche king was nowe in great readineſſe to folowe the king of England, and was ſo farre forward, that he with a merueylous great armie of the number of a hundreth thouſande men and mo, were come as farre as Ampens, and thought to haue encloſed the king of England with the water of Some, for he had cauſed all the Bridges to be broken, and thoſe that remayned to be ſo garded and kept, that there was no way left for the king of England to eſcape.

The king of England beyng thus encloſed, firſt cauſed his two Marſhalles with a thouſand men of armes and two thouſand archers to go along the ryuer to ſeeke out ſome paſſage. And as they went, they entered into a towne called Founteynes, that ſtandeth on the riuer of Some, and by reaſon it was not cloſed, they ſone conquered, ſpoyled, and brent it. And from thence they went to ſundrie paſſages, but all were ſo well defended, that there was no way for the king of England to paſſe the riuer of Some.

Founteynes ſpoyled and brent.

The king of England beyng verye penſife, did the next morning riſe very earely and diſlodged, and euery man folowed the Marſhals Banners, and ſo roade into the Countrie of Vimew, approchyng to the good towne of Abbeuile, and found a towne thereby whereunto was come many people of the Countrie, in truſt of a little defence that was ther: But the Engliſh men ſhortly wanne it, and all that were within were ſlaine, and many taken of the towne and of the Countrie. The king tooke his lodgyng in a great Hoſpitall that was there. And the ſame day that the king departed from Araynes, the French king the next day came thether with all his armie into the ſame lodgyng where the king was, and found there a great deale of the prouiſion of the king of England, which for haſt he was faine to leaue behinde him.

Vimew won.

That night the King of Englande was lodged at a towne called Oyſement, And at night when his two Marſhalles were returned, who had that day ouerrunne the Countrie to the Gates of Abbeuile, and to Saint Valery, where they had made a great ſkirmiſhe, who brought him worde that they could find no paſſage: wherefore the king cauſed to be called before him all the priſoners that he had taken in the Countries of Ponthieu, and Vimew, and gently demaunded of them, that if there were any among them that knewe any paſſage beneth Abbeuile, that he and his hoſt might paſſe the ryuer of Some, if any of them would ſhewe him thereof, he ſhould be acquited of his raunſome, and twentie of his companie for his loue. There was at that time among the Priſoners, a verlet called Gobyn a Grace, who hering the kinges requeſt, ſtepped forth and ſayd to the king. Sir, I promiſe you on the iopardie of my head, that I will bring you to ſuch a place, where as you and all your hoſt ſhall paſſe the ryuer of Some without perill. There are certeyne places in the paſſage that ye ſhall paſſe. xij. men on front two times in a day and night, & that ye ſhall not go in the water aboue the knees: but when the flood commeth, then the riuer encreaſeth ſo great, that no man can paſſe, but when the flood is gone, it is ſo low, ỹ it may be paſſed without all daunger, both on horſebacke and on foote, and the paſſage is hard in the bottome, ſo that all your carryage may go ſafely through, and therefore the paſſage is called Blanchtaque, and if you make readie to depart betymes, ye may be there before the ſonne riſyng or ſoone after. The king beyng ſomewhat comforted with this tale, anſwered and ſayde: if this be true that thou haſt haſt ſayde, I will quite the thy raunſome and all thy company, and moreouer I will geue thee an hundreth nobles in thy purſe. Then the king commaunded euery man to be readie at the ſound of the Trompet, and to depart.

At the breakyng of the day, the king with all his hoſte departed from Oyſement, and roade after the guidyng of Gobyn of Grace, ſo that they came by the ſonne riſyng to Blanche taque: but as then the flood was vp, ſo that they might not paſſe, wherefore the king taried the ebbe.

The Frenche king had his currours in the Countrie, who brought him worde of the demeanor of the Engliſhe men, then he thought verily to haue cloſed the king of England in betweene Abuile and the riuer of Some, and then to haue fought with him at his pleaſure. And whyle the French king was at Amience, he appoynted a great Baron of Normandy, called Sir Godmar du Foy, to go and keepe the paſſage of Blanche taque, where the Engliſh men muſt paſſe, or elſe in none other place: he had with him a thouſand men of armes, and fyre thouſand a foote with the Genowayes. And alſo he had with him a great number of the men of that Country, and alſo a great nunber of them of Mutterell, ſo that they were a. rij. thouſande men one and other.

A great ſkirmiſhe with the French men at the paſſage of Blanchtaque.

When the Engliſhe hoſte was come thether, Sir Godmer du Foy arraunged all his companie to defende the paſſage. The king of Englande ſtayed not for all that, but when the Tyde ſerued, entered into the water, & ſo did they on the other ſyde, and many a man drowned. There were ſome of the French men of Arthoys in Picardie, that were as glad to iuſt on the water as on the drie land. The French men defended ſo well the paſſage at the iſſuyng out of the water, that the Engliſhe men had much ado to recouer the land, the Genowayes did them great trouble with their Croſbowes: And on the other ſyde the Archers of England ſhot ſo wholy together, that the Frenche men were faine to geue place to the Engliſhe men. There was a ſore Battaile, and many a noble feate of armes done on both ſides: Finally, the Engliſh men paſſed ouer, and aſſembled themſelues together in the field, and the king and the Prince paſſed, and all the Lordes, and then the Frenche men kept none aray. When Sir Godmar ſaw this diſcomfiture, he fled and ſaued himſelfe. Some fled to Abuyle, and ſome to Saint Reignyer: but thoſe French men that were there on foote could not flee, ſo that there were ſlaine a great number of them, & the chaſe endured more then a great league. And as yet all the Engliſhe men were not paſſed the riuer, and certeine currours of the king of Behayne, and of Sir John of Heynaultes, came vpon them that were behinde, and tooke horſes and carpages, and flue dyuerſe before they could take paſſage.

The Frenche king the ſame morning was departed from Areines, truſting to haue found the Engliſhe men betwene him and the riuer of Some: But when he heard how that ſir Godmar du Foy and his company were diſcõfited, he taryed in the field, & demaunded of his Marſhals what was beſt to do: and they ſayde, Sir ye can not paſſe the ryuer but at the Bridge of Abbeuile, for the flood is come in at Blanche taque, wherefore he returned and lodged at Abbeuyle.

The king of England, when he was paſt the riuer, thanked God, and ſo roade forth in like maner as he did before. Then the king called vnto him him Gobyn a Grace, and did quite him his raunſome, and all his companie, and gaue him an hundreth nobles, and a good horſe. And ſo the king roade forth fayre and eaſily, and thought to haue lodged in a great towne called Noyell: But when he knewe that the towne did apperteyne to the Counteſſe of Dammerle, ſiſter to the Lorde Robert of Arthoys, the king aſſured the towne and Countrie, aſmuch as apperteyned to her, and ſo went forth, and his Marſhalles roade to Crotoy on the See ſyde, and brent the towne, and found in the Hauen many Shippes laden with wynes of Ponthieu belonging to the Marchauntes of Faynton, and of Rochell: They brought the beſt thereof to the kinges hoſte. Crotoy brent.

Then one of the Marſhalles road to the gates of Abbeuyle, and from thence to Saint Reignyer, and after to the towne of Rue Saint Eſpirite. And this was on a Friday, and both the Marſhalles battayles returned to the kinges hoſte about noone, and ſo lodged all together neere vnto Creſſy in Ponthieu.

The king of Englande was well informed howe the French king folowed after him to fight, And therefore he ſayde vnto his company, let vs take here ſome place of grounde, for we will go no farther vntill we haue ſeene our enimies: I haue good cauſe here to abyde them, for I am on the right heritage of the Quene my mother, the which land was geuen her at her mariage: I will challenge it of mine aduerſarie Philip of Valoys. And becauſe he had not the eight man that the French king had, therfore he commaunded his Marſhalles to choſe out a plot of ground, ſomewhat for his aduantage, and ſo they did, and thether the king and his hoſte went. And then he ſent his Currours vnto Abbeuyle to ſee if the French king drewe that daye into the field or not. They went forth and returned agayne, and ſayde they ſawe none apparence of his comming. Then euery man tooke their lodging for that day, and to be readie in the Morning at the ſounde of the Trumpet in the ſame place.

Thus all the Fridaye the French king taried ſtill in Abbeuyle, abidyng for his company, and ſent his two Marſhalles to ryde out to ſee the dealing of the Engliſhmen: And at night they returned and ſayde, howe that the Engliſhmen were lodged in the fieldes.

And that night the French king made a Supper to all the chiefe Lords that were there with him, and after Supper, the king deſyred them to be friends eche with other: The French king looked for the Erle of Sauoye who promiſed to haue come vnto him with a thouſand Speares, for he had receaued wages for three Monethes of them at Troy in Champaigne.

The.xxvj. of Auguſt in the morning very early, being Saturday, the king of Englande aroſe and ſet forward his armie, commaunding euerye man to drawe to the field to the ſame place before appointed. And then the king cauſed a Parke to be made by the Wood ſyde behynde his hoſte: and there was ſet all Cartes and cariages: and within the Parke were all their horſes, for euery man was on foote. And into this Parke there was but one entrie. And then he ordeyned three battailes.

In the firſt was the yong Prince of Wales, with him the Erle of Warwike and Canford, the Lorde Godfrey of Harecourt, Sir Reignald Cobham, Sir Thomas Holland, the Lorde Stafford, the Lorde Manny, the Lorde The order of king Edwards battayles.

Lorde de latware, Sir John Chandos, Sir Bartholomewe de Borres, Sir Robert Neuyll, the Lorde Thomas Clyfford, the Lorde Bourchier, the Lord de la Tumier and dyuers other knightes and squires that I cannot name: They were eight hundred men of armes and two thousand Archers, and a thousand of other with the Welshmen, euery Lorde drewe to the field appointed, vnder his awne penone and Banner.

In the second battayle was the Erle of Northampton, the Erle of Arondell, the Lorde Rosse, the Lorde Lygo, The Lorde Willoughby, the Lorde Basset, the Lorde of Saint Aubyne, Sir Lewes Tueton, the Lord of Myleton, the Lorde de la Sell and dyuers other, they had eyght hundred men of armes and. xij. hundred Archers.

The thirde battayle had the king: he had. vij. hundred men of armes and two thousand Archers, beside Lords and knights that I cannot name. When all these battayles were set in an order, then the king lept on a Hobby with a whyte rodde in his hande, one of his Marshalles on the one hande, and another on the other hande, and he road from ranke to ranke, desyring euery man to take heede that day to his right and honour. And he spake it so gently and with so good a countenaunce, that all suche as heard him tooke great courage and comfort by him.

And when he had thus ordered and visited all his battailes, it was then ix. of the clock in the forenoone. And then he caused euery man to eate and drinke a little, and so they did at their leasure. And afterward they ordered againe their battayles, and then euery man layde him downe on the grounde and his Salet and Bowe by hym, to be the more freshe when the enimies shoulde come.

This Saturday also early in the morning the French king came forwarde, and when he was come about two leagues from Abbeuyle, some of his Lordes sayd vnto him: Sir, it were good that ye ordered your battailes, and let your footemen passe on somewhat before, that they be not troubled with the horsemen. Then the king sent foure knightes, the Moyne Bastell, the Lorde of Noyers, the Lorde of Beauiewe and the Lorde Dambegny to ryde to viewe the Englishe hoste: And they roade so nere, that they might well see parte of their dealyng. For the Englishmen sawe them well, and knewe that they were come thether to vewe them, and they let them alone, and made no countenaunce toward them, but suffered them to go as they came. And when the French king sawe these foure knightes returne, he taried vntill they came vnto him, and sayde, Sirs what tydings? These foure knightes eche of them looked on other, for there was none that offered to speake: finally, the king sayde to Moyne which belonged to the king of Behayn, and had done in his dayes suche good seruice, that he was reputed one of the valyauntest knightes in the worlde. And the French king bade hym speake. And he sayde, Sir we haue ridden and seene the behauing of your enemies, and knowe ye for a truth that they are rested in three battailes abidyng for you. Sir, I would counsayle you for my part, sauing your displeasure, that you and all your company woulde rest here and lodge this night. For or they that be behinde of your company come hether, and or your battayles can be set in good order, it will be very late, and your people be werie and out of araye, and ye shall finde your enimies freshe and readie to receaue you:

you: Earely in the morning ye may order your battayles at more leasure, and aduise vpon your enimies with better deliberation, and to consyder well what waye ye will assayle them: for Sir surely, they will abide you. Then the king commaunded it should be so done. Then his two Marshalles, one roade before and another behinde, sayeng to euery Banner: tarie and abide here in the name of God and Saint Dionyce. They that were formost stayed a little, but they that were behinde, would not staye vntill they were come as farre as the formost. And when they before sawe them come on behinde, then they roade forward agayne, so that the king nor his Marshalles could not rule them: And so they roade without order or good array, vntill they came within the sight of their enimies. And assone as the formost sawe them, then they reculed back without all order: whereof they that were behinde had great maruaile and were amased at the matter, and thought that the formost company had bene fighting, and that then they might haue had leasure to haue gone forward if that they would. Some went foorth and some aboade still. The common people, of whome all the high wayes betweene Abbeuile and Cressy, stood full. When they sawe that they were nere to their enemies, they drewe out their swordes and cryed out, downe with them, let vs slay them all. There was no man though he were present at this battayle that was hable to imagine or declare the euill order that was among the Frenche partie, and yet they were a maruellous great number. That I write in this thing (sayth Sir John Froissart) I learned it specially of the Englishmen, who well behelde their dealyng, and also of certaine knightes of syr John of Heynaultes, who was alwayes about king Philip, and they shewed me as they knewe.

The Englishmen lyeng on the ground to rest them, assone as they saw the Frenchmen approche, they roase fayre and easely, and stood vpon their feete and aranged in their battayles. The first which was the Princes battaile, the Archers therein stood in maner of a herse and the men of armes in the bottome of the battayle. The Erle of Northampton and the Erle of Arondell, with the second battayle were on a wyng in very good order, readie to comfort the Princes battayle if neede were.

The Lordes and knightes of Fraunce came not to the assemblie in good order, for some came before, & some came after, in such hast that one of them troubled another. When the French king sawe the English men, his countenaunce chaunged, and he sayde to his Marshalles, make the Genowayes go on before and begin the battaile in the name of God and saint Dionice. There were of the Genowayes Crosbowes about. xv. thousand: But they were so wery in goyng on foote that day a fire leagues armed with their Crosbowes, that they sayde to their Constables, we be not well ordered to fight this day, for we be not in case to do any deedes of armes, we haue more neede of rest. These wordes came to the Erle of Alanson, who sayde, a man is well at ease to be charged with such a sort of Rascalles to be faint and faile nowe at most neede. And the same season there fell a great raine and a clipse, with a terrible thunder: and before the raine there came fleyng ouer both the battayles a great number of Crowes, for feare of the tempest commyng. Then anone the ayre began to waxe cleare, and the sonne to shine fayre and bright, the which was right in the French mennes eyen. When the Genowayes wayes were ſet in order and began to approche they made a great leape and crie to haue abaſhed the Engliſh men: but they ſtood ſtill and ſtirred not one foote. Then the Genowayes againe the ſeconde time made another leape and a foule crie, and ſtepped forwarde a little, and the Engliſhe men remoued not one foote: Thirdely, againe they lept and cryed vnreaſonably, and ſo went forth vntill they came within ſhot, and then ſhot off fiercely with their Croſſbowes. Then the Engliſhe Archers ſtepped forwarde, and let flie their arrowes, ſo wholy and ſo thicke, that it ſeemed Snowe. When the Genowayes felt the Arrowes pearcyng thorough their heades, armes & breaſtes, many of them caſt downe their Croſſbowes, and cut their ſtringes, and returned diſcomfited. When the French king ſaw them flie away, he ſayd, ſlay theſe Raſkalles, for they will let and trouble vs without all reaſon. Then ye ſhould haue ſeene the men of armes haue daſhed in among them, and killed a great number of them. And euer ſtill the Engliſhe men ſhot where as they ſawe thickeſt preaſſe: The ſharpe arrowes pearced the men of armes and their horſſes, and many fell horſe and men among the Genowayes, and when they were downe, they could not releue again, the preaſe was ſo thicke that one ouerthrew another. And alſo among the Engliſhe men there were certaine Raſkalles that went a foote with great knines, and they went in among the men of armes and ſlue and murdered many of them as they lay on the ground, both Erles, Barons, knightes and Eſquiers, wherewith the king of England was afterward ſore diſpleaſed, for he had rather they had bene taken priſoners.

The valiant king of Behaine, called Charles Luzenbourgh, ſonne to the noble Emperor Henry of Luzenbourgh, for al that he was nere blind. When he vnderſtood the order of the battaile, he ſayde to them about him, where is the Lorde Charles my ſonne? And his men aunſwered, ſir we can not tell, wie thinke he be fightyng. Then he ſayd, ſirs ye are my men, my companions and my friendes in this iourney. I require you bring me ſo farre forwarde, that I may ſtrike one ſtroke with my ſworde, they ſayde they would do his commaundement. And to the entent ꝑ they ſhould not leeſe him in the preaſe, they tyed all the reynes of their Bridels eche to other, and ſet the king before to accompliſhe his deſyre, and ſo they went on their enemyes. The Lorde Charles of Behayne his ſonne, who wrote himſelfe king of Behayne and bare the Armes, he came in good order to the battaile: But when he ſawe the matter went awrye on their partie, he departed, I can not tell you which way. The king his father was ſo farre forwarde, that he ſtrake a ſtroke with his ſworde, ye and more then foure, and fought valiauntly.

The French king would faine haue come thether when he ſawe their Banners, but there was a great hedge of Archers before him. The ſame day the French king had geuen a great blacke Courſer to Sir John of Heynault, and he made the Lorde John of Fuſſelles to ryde on him, and to beare his Banner. The ſame horſe tooke the Bridle in the teeth, and brought him through all the Currours of the Engliſhe men: and as he would haue returned againe, he fell into a great ditche and was ſore hurt, and there had dyed if his Page had not beene.

This Battaile betweene Broye and Creſſye was right cruell and ſore foughten, and many a feate of armes there done that came not to my knowledge.

ledge. And when night came, diuerſe knightes and Eſquiers loſt their maſters, and ſometime or they knew, they came vpon the Engliſh men, who receyued them in ſuch wiſe that they were ſlaine downe right, for there was no taking to mercie nor raunſome, for ſo the Engliſhe men were determined in the mornyng. At one tyme duryng this battaile, it chaunced certeine French men and Almaynes to geue ſuch a charge and onſet of the Engliſh hoſte, that perforce they opened the Archers of the Princes battaile, and came & fought hand to hand with the men of armes. Then the ſecond battaile of the Engliſh men came to ſuccour the Princes battaile, the which was tyme: For they had as then much ado. And they that were with the Prince, ſent a Meſſenger to the king, who was on a little windemill hill heard by, and ſayde vnto him, Sir, the Erle of Warwike, the Erle of Camfort, and ſir Reignold Cobham, and other ſuch as are aboute the Prince your ſonne, are nowe fiercelye fought withall, and are ſore handeled: Wherefore they deſyre that you and your battaile will come and ayde them. Then the king ſayde, is my ſonne dead or hurt, or felled to the ground? No Sir quoth the knight, but he is hardly matched, and therefore hath neede of your ayde. Well ſayd the king returne againe to him and them that ſent you hether, and bid them that they ſend no more to me for any aduenture that falleth, as long as my ſonne is aliue: and ſay alſo to them that they ſuffer him this day to winne his ſpurres: For if God be pleaſed I will this iourney to be his, and the honour thereof, and to them that are about him.

Then the knight returned againe, and ſhewed the kinges wordes, the which greatly encouraged them, and then they repented that they did ſend to the king as they did.

Sir Godfrey of Harecourt, would gladly that the Erle of Harecourt his brother might haue bene ſaued, for he heard ſay by them that ſawe his Banner, how that he was there in the fielde on the French partie: But ſyr Godfrey could not come to him betimes, for he was ſlaine before he coulde come at him, and ſo was alſo the Erle of Aumerle his Nephew. In another place the Erle of Alanſon and the Erle of Flaundyrs fought valiauntly, euery Lorde vnder his owne Banner, but finally they could not reſiſt againſt the puyſſaunce of the Engliſhmen, and ſo there they were alſo ſlaine and dyuers other knights and ſquires. Alſo the Erle Lewes of Bloys Nephewe vnto the French king, and the Duke of Lorreyn fought vnder their Banners, but at the laſt they were cloſed in with Engliſhmen and Welſhmen, and there were ſlaine for all their prowes. Alſo there was ſlaine the Erle of Auſſer, the Erle of S. Paule and many other. And in the euening the French king, who had as then left about him a. lx. perſons one and other, whereof Sir John of Heynault was one, who had remounted once agayne, for his horſe was ſlaine with an arow. Then he ſayde to the king, Sir departe hence, for it is time, leeſe not your ſelfe wilfully, if ye haue loſſe at this time, ye ſhall recouer it agayne at another ſeaſon. And ſo he tooke the kinges horſe by the bridle, and led him away, in maner perforce. Then the king roade, vntill he came to the Caſtell of Broy, the gate was cloſed, becauſe it was at that time darke. Then the king called the Captaine, who came to the walles & ſayde: who is it that calleth there at this time of night: Then the king ſayde, open your gate quickly, for thys is the fortune of Fraunce. The Capitaine knewe then that it was the king, and opened the gate and let downe the bridge, and then the king entred in, and had with him but fiue Barones, Sir John of Heynault, Sir Charles of Momorency, the Lorde of Beauiewe, the Lorde Dabegny and the Lorde of Mountford. The king woulde not tarie there, but dranke and departed thence about Midnight and so roade to Ampence and there rested. And the Englishmen kept the fielde all this Saturday at night.

The victory of the Englishe men at the battaile of Cressie.

And assone as night was come, and the Englishmen perceauing that no mo Frenchmen approched, then they accompted among themselues that the victorie was theirs, for the Frenchmen were discomfited, slayne or runne away. Then they made great fyres and lighted vp Torches and Candels, for it was very darke. Then the king came downe from the little hill where as he had stande all the day long, and his Helmet neuer came of his head.

Then he went with all his battayle to his sonne the Prince, and embraced him in his armes and kissed him and sayde, good sonne, God geue you good perseueraunce, you are my good sonne, and you haue done very nobly, ye are worthie to keepe a realme. The Prince bowed himselfe to the earth honouring the king his father. This night they thanked God for their good aduenture, and did neither crake nor boast therof, but wholy gaue the prayse and thankes vnto almightie God the geuer of victorie.

The nexte daye in the morning, which was Sunday there was suche a Miste, that a man coulde not see the breadth of an Acre of lande from him. And then the king commaunded his Marshalles to go abroad, and to viewe whether any Frenchmen gathered agayne together in any place, and they had with them fiue hundred Speares and to thousande Archers. And the same morning out of Abbeuile and Saint Reignyer in Ponthew, the commons of Roane and of Beuioys issued out of their townes, not knowyng of the discomfiture the day before, and sodainely met with the Englishe Marshalles, wenyng to them they had bene Frenchmen.

And when the Englishmen sawe them, they set on them freshly: and there was a sore fight, but at the last the Frenchmen brake their araye and fled, and there were slaine in the wayes, and in the hedges and bushes mo then .vij. thousand. And if the day had bene clere, there had not escaped a mã.

And anone after, another companye of Frenchmen were met by the Englishmen. The Archbishop of Roane, and the great Priour of Fraunce, who also knewe nothing of the discomfiture the daye before, for they were enformed that the French king should haue fought the same Sonday, and they were going thetherwarde. But when they met with the Englishmen there was a great battayle, for they were a great number, but they coulde not endure against the Englishmen, for they were nigh all slayne, few scaped, the two Lordes were slayne. And this morning also the Englishmen met with diuers companies that had lost their way on the Saturday, and had lyen all night in the fieldes, and wist not where the king was, nor their Capitaines: and the Englishmen slue them all as many as they met. And it was shewed me (sayth Froyssart) that of the commons and men on foote of the Cities and good Townes of Fraunce, there were slayne foure times as many on the Sunday, as there were slain on the Saturday at the great battayle. And after these sundrie great and wonderfull victories, the Marshalles ſhalles of the Engliſhmen with their men returned to the kinges battayle, and ſayde vnto the king, Sir, we thinke ſurely that there is nowe no moze apparence of your enimies.

And then the king commaunded Sir Reignold Cobham and ſyr Richard Stafford with three Heraulides, to ſerche the field and countrie for the number of them that were ſlaine, and they roade in the fieldes all that daye, and made a diligent vewe, and returned agayne about Supper time, and made repozte to the king and ſayde, howe there were in the field dead. rj. great Pzinces. lxxx. Banners, twelue hundzed knightes and mo then. xxx. thouſand other. The Engliſhmen kept ſtill their fielde all that night, and on the Monday in the mozning the king pzepared to departe. But befoze hys departure he cauſed pzoclamation in the Countrie to be made, and graunted a truce for three dayes to the entent they ſhould come and bury the dead. And all the great Lozdes he cauſed to be bzought with him and caryed them to Mounterell, and there were buried, and his Marſhalles went toward Hedyn, and bzent Uambam and Seram, but they did nothing to the Caſtell, it was ſo ſtrong and ſo well kept. They lodged that night on the riuer of Hedyn towardes Blangye. The next day, they roade towardes Boleyn, and came to the towne of Unyſame: There the king and the Pzince lodged and taried a daye to refreſhe his men. And on the Wedneſday, the king came befoze the ſtrong towne of Calice.

A notable victozy at the battayle of Creſſy.

Uambam and Seram bzent.

At the ſame time in the towne of Calice was a knight called Sir John Uien chiefe Captaine thereof, and with him alſo was Syz Andzewe Dandzehen, ſyz John de Sury, ſyz Bardon de Belbozne, ſyz Godfrey de lament, ſyz Peyn de Uzmew, and diuers other knights and ſquiers.

When king Edwarde was come befoze Calice, he layde his ſiege thereVnto, the thirde day of September, and ozdeyned Baſtides betweene the towne and the hauen. And he cauſed Carpenters to make houſes and lodgynges of great timber, and ſet the houſes like ſtreetes, and couered them with Reede and Bzoome: ſo that it was like a ſittle towne, & there was euery thing to ſell, and a Market place, and Market kept euery Tueſday, and euery Saturday, foz flecſhe and fiſhe, foz Mercery ware, houſes foz cloth both linnen and wollen: Alſo there was bzead, wine, and all other neceſſary thinges, which came out of England, and out of Flaundyzs, and there they might buy what they luſt.

Calyce beſieged.

The king would not aſſayle the towne of Calice, foz he thought it but a loſt labour, and therefoze he ſpared his people and artillarie, and ſayde he would famiſhe them within the towne with long ſiege, without the Frenche king came to rayſe his ſiege perforce.

When the Capitaine of Calice ſawe the maner and ozder of the Engliſhemen, then he conſtreyned all meane and pooze people to iſſue out of the towne. And on a Wedneſday there iſſued out of the towne, of men, women, and childzen, mo than. rvij. hundzeth. And as they paſſed thzough the hoſte, they were demaunded why they departed, and they aunſwered and ſayde, becauſe they had nothing to liue vpon. Then the king of his mere pity and mercye ſuffered them to paſſe thzough his hoſte without daunger, and gaue them meate and dzinke to dyner, and vnto euery perſon two pence ſterlyng in almoſe, foz the which diuerſe of them pzayed foz the kinges pzoſperitie.

The Scots rebell.

In this meane while that the king lay at the siege of Calice, Dauid king of Scotland by the styrryng of the French king, made his sommons to his people to mete him at Saint Johns Towne, vpon the riuer of Taye in Scotland. Thether came Erles, Barons, and Prelates of Scotland, and there agreed that in all haste possible they should enter into England, and to ayde them in that iourney, John of the Isles, who ruled the wilde Scottes should go with them. The same John came with a three thousand of the most outrageous people in the whole worlde. When all the Scottes were assembled, they were one and other fiftie thousand fightyng men.

A great army of the Scots.

The Scots could not make their assembly so secret, but that the Quene had knowledge thereof, beyng at that tyme at Yorke. Then she sent all about for men, and then with as much speede as might be, the people came to the Queene from all places. But the Scottes were fully perswaded that there were no men left in England, for they were eyther with the king at the siege of Calice, or else in Gascoyne and Bretayne defendyng of the French king.

In this meane time the king of Scottes departed from Saint Johns towne, and went to Domefremlyne the first day, and the next day they passed a little arme of the Sea, and so came to Estreuelyne, & then to Edenbourgh. And there they numbred their people, and they were a three thousand men of armes, knightes and Esquiers, and a. xxx. thousand of other vpon small Hacqueneyes, beside foote men. Then they came to Rousbourgh the first fortresse Englishe on that part, whereof Sir William Mountagew was Capitaine. The Scottes passed by without offeryng of any assault, and so went forth brennyng and destroiyng the Countrie of Northumberland, and their Currours ran to Yorke, and brent as much as was without the walles, and returned againe vnto their host, which then was within a myle of newe Castell vpon Tyne.

The Queene of England who desyred to defend her Countrie, came to newe Castell vpon Tine, and there taried for her men, who came dayly from all the partes of the Realme.

The Queene of England gathered a great power agaynst the Scottes, and gaue them battaile.

When the Scottes knewe that the Englishmen were assembled at new Castell, they drewe thetherward, and their Currours came runnyng before the towne: and at their returnyng they brent certeine small Hamlets thereabouts, so that the smoke therof came into the towne of new Castell. Some of the Englishe men would haue issued out, to haue fought with them that made the fyre: But the Capitaynes would not suffer them to go out.

The next day, the king of Scottes with. xl. thousand men one and other came and lodged within three English myles of the towne of newe Castell, in the land of the Lorde Neuyll: and the king sent to them within the towne, that if they would issue out into the fielde, he would fight with them gladly, and they had answere, that they would come out & fight with him in the field. Then the Lordes and Prelates of England sayde vnto the Queene, we are content to aduenture our lyues with the right and heritage of the king of England our Maister. And then they all issued out of the Towne, and were in number. xij. hundreth men of armes, three thousande Archers, and. vij. thousand of other with the Welshemen.

Then the Scottes came and lodged agaynst them nere together: and euery man was set in order of battaile. And then the Queene came among her her men, and her battayles were thus ordered.

There was ordeyned foure battayles, one to ayde another. The first was in the gouernaunce of the Bishop of Durham, and the Lorde Percy: The seconde, the Archebishop of Yorke, and the Lorde Neuyll: The thirde, the Bishop of Lincolne, & the Lord Mowebray: The fourth, the Lorde Edward Baliol Capitaine of Barwike, and the Archebishop of Cauntorbury, and the Lord Rosse, euery battaile had like number after their quantity: and the Quene went from battaile to battaile, prayeng them to do their deuoyre for the defence of the honour of their Lord and maister the king of England, and in the name of God euery man to be of good heart and courage, promisyng them that to her power, she would remember them as well and better, as though the king her Lorde were there personally. And so the Queene departed from them, recommendyng them to God. The order of the Queenes battailes.

And anone after, the battayles of the Scottes began to set forward: and in likewise, so did the Englishmen. Then the Archers begamne to shote on both parties: howbeit the shot of the Scottes endured but a short space: But the shot of the Englishmen was long and fierce. So that when the battayles approched, the battayle was cruell and daungerous. They began at nyne of the clock in the morning, fought vntill it was noone. The Scottes had great Axes heard and sharpe, and gaue with them many sore and cruell strokes: howbeit in the ende the Englishmen obteyned the victorie of the fielde, but they lost many of their men. A cruell battaile.

There were slaine of the Scots, the Erle of Sys, the Erle of Oistre, the Erle of Patrys, the Erle of Surlant, the Erle of Dastre dare, the Erle Mare, the Erle John Dowglas and the Lorde Alexander Ramsey, who bare the kings Banner, and diuers other knightes and squiers. And there the Scottishe king was taken, who had fought valiauntly and was sore hurt: A squire of Northumberland tooke him called John Copland. And allone as he had taken the king, he went with him out of the field with an eyght of his seruaunts with him, and roade all that daye vntill he was .xv. leagues from the place of the battayle, and at night he came to a Castell called Orgulus. And then he sayd that he would not deliuer the king of Scots to no man nor woman lyuyng, but onely to the king of England his Lorde. The same day there was also taken in the fielde the Erle Moret, the Erle of Marche, the Lord Wylliam Dowglas, the Lorde Robert Uesy, the Bishop of Dadudame, the Bishop of Saint Andrewys & diuers other knights and Barones. And there were slaine of one and other .xv. thousand, and the other saued them selues as well as they might. This battaile was foughten besides New Castell vpon Tyne in the yere of our Lorde. 1346. The Scottishe king taken by a Squire of Northumberlande called John Copland. Prisoners taken.

Now when the Quene of Englande being at New Castell vnderstood of the victorie: she then tooke her horse and roade to the place where the battayle had bene. And there it was shewed her how the king of Scottes was taken by a squire called John Copland, and he had caryed him awaye, no man knew whether. Then the Quene wrote to the squire, commaunding him to bring his prisoner the king of Scottes vnto her, and that he had not well done to depart with him without leaue. All that day the Englishmen taried in that place, and the Queene with them. And the next day they returned to New Castell.

The answere of Iohn Copland.

When the Quenes letter was brought to Iohn Copland, he answered and sayde: That as for the king of Scottes his prisoner, he would not delyuer him to no man nor woman lyuing but onely to the king of England his souereigne Lorde. As for the king of Scottes he sayde should be safely kept, and he would geue accompt for him. Then the Queene sent letters to the king to Calice, wherby the king was informed of the state of his realme. Then the king sent incontinent to Iohn Copland, commaunding him forthwith to come ouer the sea to him to Calice. Then the sayde Iohn did put his sayde prisoner in a strong Castell in safe keeping, and so rode thorow England vntill he came to Douer, and there toke the sea & arriued before Calice.

When the king of England sawe the squire, he tooke him by the hande and sayde, welcome my squire, which by your valiauntnesse haue taken mine aduersarie the king of Scottes. The squire kneeled downe and sayde: syr, if God by his grace haue suffered me to take the king of Scottes by true conquest of armes, I thinke no man ought to haue any enuie thereat: for as well God maye sende by his grace suche a fortune to a poore Squire, as to a great Lorde. And Sir, I require your grace not to be miscontent with me, though I did not delyuer the king of Scottes to the Queene at her commaundement. For syr I holde of you as mine othe is to you, and not of her, but in all good maner.

The king sayde to him, Iohn, the good seruice that ye haue done and your valiauntnes is so much worth, that it must counteruayle your trespace, and to be taken for excuse, and blame haue they that beare you any euill will. Therefore ye shall returne againe home to your house, and then my will and pleasure is, that ye delyuer your prisoner the king of Scottes to the Quene my wyfe. And in rewarde, I assigne you here to your house, where as ye thinke best your selfe fiue hundreth pound starling of yerely rent to you and to your heyres for euer: and here I make you squire for my body.

Then the thirde daye he departed into Englande, and when he came home to his owne house, he assembled together his friendes and kinsmen, and so they tooke the king of Scottes and rode with him to the Citie of Yorke, and there from the king of England he presented to the Queene the king of Scottes, and excused himselfe so discretely as the Queene and the counsayle were content.

Then the Quene made good prouision for the Citie of Yorke, the Castell of Rokesbourgh, the Citie of Dureham, the towne of New Castell vpon Tyne, and in all other garrisons on the marches of Scotlande: And left in those Marches the Lorde Percy and the Lorde Neuyll as Gouernours there, and then the Quene departed from Yorke to London.

Then she placed the king of Scottes in the strong tower of London, and the Erle Mortet and all the other prisoners with him, and set good keepyng ouer them. Then she went to Douer and there tooke the Sea, and had so good winde, that within a short space she arriued before Calice, three dayes before the feast of all Saintes: For whose comming the king made a great feast and dinner to all the Lordes and Ladies that were there. The Quene brought many Ladies and Damoselles with her, as well to accompany her, as also to see their husbandes, fathers, brethren and other friendes that laye at that siege.

The

The Frenche king vnderstanding well that his men in Calyce were charged sore, sent forth his commaundement throughout Fraunce, that euery man should be with him at the towne of Amyens at Whytsontyde next followyng, and there was none that durst say naye. And when Whytsontyde came, the French king kept there a great feast, and thether came vnto him the Duke of Odes and of Burgoyn, and the Duke of Normandy his eldest sonne, and the Duke of Orleance his youngest sonne, the Duke of Burbon, the Erle of Foyx, the Lorde Lewes of Sauoy, Sir John of Heynault, the Erle of Armanack, the Erle of Fozestes, the Erle of Valentenoys, and dyuers other Erles, Barons, Lordes, and knightes.

The French king assembleth his lordes at Amiens, & counsayleth which way to raise the siege at Calice.

When they were all at Amiens, they counsayled together, howe they might best enter towarde Calice, to rayse the siege. And some counsayled the French king to make meanes to the Fleminges to haue the passages of Flaundyrs open, and then might he come in by Grauelyng, and not only raise the siege, but also on that syde he might easely geue them battaile. And soone after the Frenche king sent great Ambassadors into Flaundyrs, to treate in the aforesayde matter. But the king of England had made there suche fast friendship, that they would not agree to that request: And then the Frenche king sayde that he would enter on the syde towarde Burgoyn.

In this meane time the king of England saw that he could not get Calice, but by famine, and therefore he made a strong Castell, and a highe, to close vp the passage by the sea: And this Castell was set betwene the towne and the sea, & was well fortefied with Springaldes, Bombardes, Bowes, and other Artillery. And in this Castell were.lx.men of armes, and two hundreth Archers, and they kept the Hauen in suche wise, that nothing coulde come in nor out, but by their licence.

And in this time also the king of Englande had so laboured and solicited the Counsaile of Flaundyrs, that they came out of Flaundyrs with an hundreth thousand men, and went and layd siege to the towne of Ayse, and brent the Countrie round about, as Menyuell la Gorge, Estelles Le Uentre, and a Marshe called la Loe, and to the Gates of Turwyn, and Saint Omere. Then the French king went to the towne of Aras, & sent many men of warre to the Garrison of Arthoys, and specially he sent his Constable, sir Charles of Spaine to S. Omers: For the Erle of Ewe, and of Guynes, who was Constable of Fraunce, was then prisoner in England, as before it is shewed.

The Fleminges did the French men great trouble before they departed. And when the Fleminges were returned, then the French king and his companie departed from Arras, and went to Hedyn. His host with their cariages helde well in length three Leagues of that Countrie, and there he taried one day, and the next day he went to Blangy: And there he rested to take aduice what waye to go forth: Then he was counsayled to go through the Country called la Belme: and that way he toke, and with him two hundreth thousand one and other, and so passed by the County of Franquebergh, and so came streight to the hill of Sangates, betwene Calice and Wyssant. They came thether in goodly order, theyr Banners displayed, that it was greate beutie to beholde theyr puyssant array. They of Calice, when they saw them lodge, it seemed to them to be a newe siege.

A houge armie of french men.

When the king of Englande knewe and sawe the Frenche king come with with such a power to rayse the siege. Then he had made so good prouision for the stoppage of the passages, that he was sure that the French king coulde not with his armie come nere to Calice, except it were in two places, the one was by the downes by the sea syde, or else aboue by the high way: and there were many ditches, rockes, and marishes, and but one way to passe ouer a Bridge called Newland Bridge. And all alongest the Downes, the king of England caused all his nauye to lie, and euery ship wel furnished with Bombardes, Crosbowes, Archers, Springalles, and other artillary, whereby the French hoste might not passe that way.

And the king caused the Erle of Darby to go and keepe Newelande Bridge with a great number of men of armes, & Archers, so that the French men coulde passe no way, without they would haue gone through the Marshes, the which was a thing impossible.

On the other syde towarde Calice, there was a high Tower kept with xxx. Archers, and they kept the passage of the Downes from the Frenche men, the which was well fortefied with great and double Ditches.

When the French men were thus lodged on the hill of Sangate: The Commons of Tourney who were. xb. C. came to the Tower last aboue named, and they within shot at them: But they passed the ditches, and came to the foote of the wall with Pikes and Hookes, and there was a sore assault, and many of them of Tourney hurt: But at the last they wanne the Tower, and slue all that were therein, and the Tower beaten downe.

The French king sent his Marshalles to aduyse what way hee might approche to fight with the Englishe men: and so they went forth, and when they had well aduised the passages and streytes, they returned to the king and sayde, that by no meanes he could not come at the Englishe men without he would leese his people. So the matter rested all that day and night. The nexte day the French king sent to the king of England, the Lorde Godfrey of Charney, the Lorde Eustace of Rybamount, Guy of Nele, and the Lorde of Beauiewe: and as they roade that strong way, they sawe well that it was harde to passe that way. They praysed much the order that the Erle of Darby kept at Newland bridge, by the which way they passed. Then they road forth vntill they came to the king of England, who was well accompanied wyth Noble men about him.

Then they foure alighted, and came to the king, and did their reuerence vnto him: Then the Lorde Eustace of Rybamount sayde, Sir, the king my Maister sendeth you worde by vs, that he is come to the hill of Sangate to do battaile with you, but he can finde no way to come at you: And therefore sir he would that ye should apoynt certeyne of your counsaile, and he will do likewise of his, and they betweene them to deuise a place for the Battaile.

The king of Englande was readie to aunswere and sayde, Sirs, I haue well vnderstand that ye desire me on the behalfe of mine aduersary, who keepeth wrongfully from me mine heritage: Wherefore I am sory. Say vnto him from me if ye list, that I am here, and so haue bene nere a whole yere: and all this he knewe right well: he might haue come hether sooner if he had would, but he hath suffered me to abide here so long, the which hath beene greatly to my costes and charges. And I now could do so much if I would, soone to be Lorde of Calice. And therefore I am not determined to folowe your maisters aduice, nor to depart from that which I am at a poynt to win. Wherefore if he nor his men can passe this way, let them seeke some other passage if they thinke to come hether, for I entende not to styre my siege to come to them.

Then these Lordes departed, and were conueyed vntill they were past Newelande Bridge: And then they shewed the Frenche king, the king of Englandes answere.

And in this tyme, while the French king studyed howe to fight with the king of England, there came into his host two Cardinalles from Pope Clement in message, who tooke great paine to ryde vp and downe betwene the se two hostes, and they laboured and endeuoured themselues so much, that they obteyned a graunt for an entreatie of an accorde and peace, and a respite betwene the two kings, beyng the one at the siege, & the other in the field onely. And so there were foure Lordes appoynted on eyther party to counsayle together for a peace. For the French king, there was the Duke of Burgoyn, and the Duke of Burbon, Sir Lewes of Sauoy, and Sir John of Heynault. And for the English partie, the Erle of Darby, the Erle of Northhampton, the Lorde Reignald Cobham, and the Lord Gualtier of Manny, and the two Cardinals were as indifferent meanes betwene both parties.

Two Cardinalles labored betwene ✠ two kinges for peace.

These Lordes met three dayes, and many deuises put forth, but none tooke effect: And in the meane season the king of Englande alwayes fortefied his hoste and fielde and made diches on the downes, that the Frenche men should not come sodainely vpon him. These three dayes passed without any agreement, and then the two Cardinalles returned to Saint Omers. And when the French king sawe that he could doe nothing, the next daye he dislodged betymes and tooke hys waye to Ampens and gaue euerye manne leaue to departe.

The French king departeth with all his great and houge armie.

When they within Calyce sawe their king departe, they made great sorowe. Some of the Englishmen folowed the taple of the French armie, and wanne Sommers, Cartes and cariages, horse, wine and other things, and tooke diuers prisoners and brought them to Calyce.

After the departure of the frenche king from Sandgate, then they within the towne perceauing they were vtterly without relefe and succor, cryed vpon their Capitaine syr John of Vyen that he would entreate the king of Englande for mercie. And at the last the Capitaine graunted so to doe, and went to the walles, and made a signe to speake with some of the hoste: whereof knowledge was immediatly brought to the king. And when the king heard thereof, he sent thether syr Gualtier of Manny and syr Basset. Then syr John of Vyen sayde vnto them: Sirs, ye be right valiant knights in deedes of armes, and you knowe well how that the king my master hath sent me and other vnto this towne, and commaunded vs to keepe it to his behoofe, in such wise as we take no blame nor yet be to him any dammage, and we haue done all that lyeth in our power to doe: And now our succours hath fayled vs, and we be so sore streyned, that we haue not to lyue withall, but that we must all die or perish by famine: except the noble & gentle king of yours will take vs to mercy, the which thing to doe we praye you to be a meane of entreatie for vs, that it would please him to take pitie of vs, and to let vs go and departe as we be, and let him take the towne and the Castell and and all the goodes that be therein, the which is a great abundaunce.

Then syr Gaultier of Manny sayde, Sir we knowe partly the kinges minde, for he hath shewed it vnto vs. And therefore know you for a truth, it is not his minde that you nor they that are within the towne should departe so: For it is his will that ye all shall yeelde your selues simply to hys wyll and pleasure, to raunsome or put to death whom & as he please. Then sayd the Capitaine, this is to heard a matter to vs, we are in thys towne a small sorte of knightes and squiers, who haue as truely serued the king our master, as yon haue serued yours, and in lyke maner we haue endured great veration and paine, and we will endure as much paine as euer knights did rather then to consent that the worst lad in the towne that should susteyne any more euill then the greatest or best of vs all, therfore syr we pray you of your humanitie and gentlenesse that ye will go and speake with the king of England and desire him to haue pittie vpon vs, for we trust so much in his gracious goodnesse that his minde will chaunge, and that he will take pittie and compassion vpon vs.

Sir Gualtier of Manny and syr Basset returned to the king, and declared to him all that had bene sayde. The king being in a great furie, sayde that he would none otherwise but that they should yelde themselues vp simply to his will and pleasure. And then syr Gualtyer sayde, syr sauyng your displeasure, in this ye may be in the wrong: For ye shall geue by this an euill ensample, if ye sende any of vs your seruauntes into any fortresse, we will not be very glad to go, if ye put any of the towne to death after they be yeelded, for in lyke case they will deale with vs, if the case fall lyke, the which sayeng diuers other Lords that were there susteyned and mainteyned. Then the king sayde: Sirs, I will not be alone against you all, therefore Syr Gualtier of Manny, ye shall go agayne to the Capitaine and saye, that all the grace that ye nowe can finde at oure handes is, that they let. vj. of the chiefe Burgesses of the Towne come out barehedded, barefooted and barelegged, and in their shertes with halters about their neckes, with the keyes of the Castell and towne in their handes: and let them. vj. yelde themselues simply to my will, and the residew I will take to mercy.

How king Edward required sixe Burgesses of the towne to be deliuered vnto his mercy.

Then Sir Gualtier returned and found Sir John of Vpen still on the wall, abyding for an answere: Then sir Gualtier shewed him all the grace that he could get of the king: well sayde syr John, I require you to tarie here a certaine space till I go into the towne, and shewe this vnto the commons who sent me hether.

Then syr John went into the market place, and there tolled the common Bell, and then incontinent men and women assembled there.

Then the Capitaine made report of all that he had done, and sayde, Sirs, it will be none otherwise, and therefore nowe take aduise and make a short aunswere. Then all the people beganne to weepe and to make suche sorow and lamentation that there was not so heard a hart, if they had seene them but would haue had pittie vpon them. The Captaine himselfe wept also and that pittifully. At the last the most riche Burgesse of all the towne called Eustace of Saint Peters, rose vp and sayd openly: Sirs, both great and small, a most pittifull and horrible thing were it, to suffer such a number of people to dye as are in this Towne, eyther by famine or otherwise, so long as there is any meane to saue them: I thinke he or they shoulde haue great merite of our Lorde God that would delyuer them from such mischiefe as for my parte I haue so good a trust in our Lorde God, that if I dye in the quarell to saue the residew, that God wyll pardon mee, wherefore to saue them I will be the first to put my lyfe in ieopardie. When he had thus sayde, euery man worshipped him, and diuers kneeled downe at his feete, weeping and wringing their hands most greuously. Then another honest Burgesse stood out and sayde, I will keepe company with my Gossyp Eustace, his name was John Dayze, then came Jaques of Wyssaunt who was riche both in goodes and heritage, he sayde also that he would keepe companye with his two Cosyns, and so sayde Peter of Wyssaunt his brother, and after came two other and sayde they would doe the same, and then they went and appareled them as the king desyred. Then the Captaine went with them to the gate, there was great mone and lamentation made at their departyng both of men, women and childzen. Then the gate was opened, and the Captaine issued out with the. vj. Burgesses, and closed the gate agayne: So that they were betweene the gate and the barryers. Then he sayde to syr Gualtier of Manny: Sir, I delyuer here to you as Captaine of Calice, by the whole consent of the people of the towne these. vj. Burgesses, & I sweare to you truely that they be and were to day the most notable, riche and worthyest Burgesses of all the towne of Calice: wherefore, gentle knight I require you to pray the king to haue mercy vpon them that they die not. Then sayde syr Gualtier, I cannot tell, neyther can I say what the king will doe, but I will doe for them the best I can. Then the Barryers were opened and the. vj. Burgesses went towardes the king, and the Capitayne entered agayne into the Towne.

When Sir Gualtier presented those Burgesses vnto the king, they kneled downe and helde vp their handes, and sayde: Gentle king, beholde here vs sixe who were Burgesses of Calice, and great merchauntes, we haue brought to you the keyes of the towne and Castell of Calice, and we submit our selues wholy vnto your will and pleasure, onely for the safetie of the rest of the people of Calice, who haue suffered great paine and miserie: Sir we beseech your grace to haue mercie and pitie vpon vs through your high noblenesse. Then all the Erles and Barons, and other that were there, wept for pitie. The king looked felly and cruelly vpon them, for greatly he hated the people of Calice, because of the great dammages and displeasures that they had done him on the Sea before. Then the king commaunded their heades to be stryken off: Then euery man cryed and besought the king to haue mercie, but he would here no man in that behalfe. Then Sir Gualter of Manny said, I noble king, for Gods sake refraine your courage, ye haue the name of souereigne noblenesse, therefore nowe do not a thing that should blemishe your renowne, neither geue occasion for any to speake vilanie of you: for euery man will say it is a great tyranny to put to death suche honest personnes, who of themselues haue willingly put themselues into the handes of your grace, for the safetie of their companie. Then the king turned from him, and commaunded him to send for the Hangman, and sayd: They of Calice haue caused a great number of my men to be slaine, and therefore these also shall die likewise. Then the Queene beyng great with childe, kneled downe, and

O gracious king, sithe I passed the sea in great perill, I haue desired nothyng of you: Therefore now I humbly require you in the honour of the virgin Mary, and for the loue of me, that ye will take mercy of these sixe Burgesses. The king beheld the Queene and stood still in a study a little while, and then sayde, A Dame, I would ye had bene as now in some other place, for I am not able to denie your request: Wherfore I geue them to you, to do your pleasure with them. Then the Queene caused them to be caryed to her Chamber, and made the halters to be taken from their neckes, and caused them to be new apparayled, and gaue them their dinner at their leysure. And then she gaue eche of them sixe Nobles in his purse, and made them to be brought out of the hoste in safegard, and set at their libertie.

Thus was Calice yelded and geuen vp to the king in the latter ende of September, so that he had laide siege therevnto one whole yere and more. And then the king called vnto him Sir Gualtier of Manny, and his two Marshalles, the Erle of Warwike, and the Erle of Staffordе, and sayde to them, Sirs take ye here the keyes of the Castell, and towne of Calice. Go and take possession thereof, and put in prison all the knightes that be there: And all other Souldiours that came simplie to winne their liuyng, cause them to auuoyde the towne. And in like maner auuoyde the towne of all other men, women, and children, for I will repeople the towne againe with mere Englishe men.

Certaine Lordes are sent to take possession of Calice.

So these three Lordes with an hundreth with them, went and tooke possession of Calice, and first did put in prison, Sir John de Vien, sir John of Surrey, Sir John of Belborne and other: Then they caused all the souldiours to bring all their harnesse into a place appointed, and layde it all on an heape in the hall of Calice. Then they caused all maner of people to voide, and kept there no mo persons but one priest, and two other auncient personages, such as knewe the customes, lawes and ordinaunces of the towne, and to signe out the heritages howe they were deuided. Then they prepared the Castell to lodge the king and Queene in, and prepared other houses for the kinges companie.

The king entereth into Calice triumphantly.

Then the king mounted on his horsse, and entered into the towne, with Trumpettes, Drommes, and other Instrumentes of Musicke, and there the king laye vntill the Queene was brought in bed and deliuered of a faire Ladye named Margaret. The king gaue to Sir Gualtier of Manny diuerse fayre houses within the towne, and to the Lorde of Staffordе, to the Lord of Bethene, to sir Bartholomew of Bomes, & to diuerse other Lordes and knightes, to repeople the towne againe. The kinges minde was when he came into England, to sende out of London. xxvj. good Citezens to Calice to dwell there, and by that meanes to people the towne with pure Englishe men, the which the king afterward performed.

Then the newe towne and Bastide that was made without the towne was pulled downe, and the Castell that stood on the Hauen, was likewyse pulled downe, and the great timber and stones brought into the towne. Then the king ordeyned men to kepe the Gates, walles and Barriers, and amended all thinges within the towne. And sir John de Vien, and his companie were sent into England, and were halfe a yere at London before they were put to raunsome.

A pitifull sight was it when the Burgesses and other men of the towne of Calice, and women, and children, were put out of the Towne, and faine to forsake houses, heritages and goodes, and to take nothing with them: Neyther had they any restitution of the French king, for whose sake they lost all. The most part of that people went to Saint Omers.

At this tyme the Cardinall called Guy de Bologne as a Legate from Clement the first, came vnto the French king his Cosyn in the Citie of Amiens. And he applyed the matter so, betweene ỹ king of England & the French king, that a truce was concluded and taken to endure for two yeres. To thys truce all parties were agreed: But Britaine was clerely excepted, for the two Ladyes made still warre one against another.

A truce concluded betweene the king of England and the French king for two yeres

Then the king of Englande, and the Queene returned into England: And the king made capitaine of Calice, Sir Amery of Pauy a Lombard borne, who the king had greatly aduaunced. Then the king sent from London. xxvj. Citezens to Calice, who were riche and sage, and their wyues, and children, and dayly the number encreased: For the king graunted there such liberties and franchesses, that men were glad to go and dwell there.

Sir Amery a Lõbard made Capitaine of Calice.

The same time was brought to London Sir Charles de Bloys, who called himselfe Duke of Briteine, who was taken in Briteine by the kinges people, duryng the tyme of the siege of Calice, and was nowe committed into Curtoyse prison in the Tower of London, with the king of Scottes, and the Erle Mozette: But he had not bene there long, but at the request of the Queene of England, Sir Charles, who was her Cosyn Germaine was receyued on his fayth and truth, and road round about London at his pleasure: But he might not lye past one night out of London, without it were in the Court where the King and Queene lay: Also the same tyme there was prisoner in England the Erle of Ewe, and Guynes, which was Constable of Fraunce, a right gentle knight, and his behauiour was suche, that he was welcome whereseuer he came, both with the king, Queene, Lordes, Ladyes, and Damoselles.

Sir Charles de Bloys Duke of Britayn.

At this time in the towne of Saint Omers was the Lorde Geoffrey of Charney Capitaine, and he kept the Frontiers there, and vsed and ordered euery thing concerning the warre as king. This Lord Geoffrey callyng to his minde, which way he might compasse or deuise how he might practise to get agayne the Towne of Calice, and considered with himselfe that Lombardes are couetous, he thought he would practise with syr Amery the Captaine of Calice, and he knewe he might the better do it without all suspition because at that time they might by reason of the truce the one frankly resorte vnto the other. Then syr Geoffrey espyeng a conuenient time, fell secretly in communication with syr Amery for the towne of Calice. And in the ende syr Amery promised for the some of twentie thousand crownes to delyuer Sir Geoffrey the towne of Calice.

A practice of the French men for the recouering agayne of Calice.

This compact was not so secretly made, but it came to the knowledge and vnderstanding of the king of Englande: wherefore the king sent for Sir Amerie de Pauie to come vnto him into England to speake with hym, and so he came, and when the king sawe hym, he toke him a parte and sayd: Thou knowest well that I haue geuen thee in keeping the thing that in this worlde I loue best, next my wyfe and children, that is to saye, the Towne and Caſtell of Calyce, and thou haſt ſolde it to the Frenchmen, and therfore thou haſt well deſerued to die. Then the Lombard kneeled downe (and ſayd) A noble king, I crye you mercy, it is true that ye haue ſayde: But ſyr, the bargayne maye well be broken, for as yet I haue receyued neuer a penny. The king loued well the Lombard and ſayde, Amery, I will that thou go forward on thy bargayn and the day and time that thou appointeſt to deliuer the towne let me haue true knowledge therof before: And on this condition I will forgiue thee thy treſpaſſe. And ſo the Lombard returned agayne to Calice and kept his matter ſecret.

Sir Geoffrey of Charney aſſured himſelfe to haue receiued Calice, and therfore prouided a certeine number to ſtrengthen him.

Then ſyr Geoffrey of Charney thought well to haue Calice, and aſſembled a certain number ſecretly, about a fiue hundred ſpeares, and there were but a fewe that knewe what he purpoſed: And it was to be thought that he neuer made the French king a counſayle thereof, for if he had, it was not lykely that he would haue conſented therevnto for breaking of the truce.

King Edward tooke paſſage to Calice to preuent the betraying therof.

This Lumbard had appointed to haue delyuered the towne and Caſtell of Calyce the laſt day of December at night, and he ſent worde thereof by a brother of his vnto the king of Englande.

When the king knewe the certaine day appointed, he departed out of Englande with three hundred men of armes, and tooke ſhipping at Douer, and in the euening arryued at Calice, ſo ſecretly that no man knewe thereof, and went and layde his men in buſhmentes in the Chambers and Towres within the Caſtell.

Sir Gualtier Manny.

Then the king ſayde to ſyr Gualtier Manny, I will that ye be chiefe of this enterpriſe, for I and my ſonne the Prince wil fight vnder your banner.

The Lorde Geoffrey Charney, the laſt daye of December at night departed with all his company from Arras, and came nere to Calice about the houre of midnight, and there taried awhile abyding for his company, and in the meane time he ſent two ſquires to the poſterne gate of the Caſtell of Calice, and there they founde Sir Amery ready. Then they demaunded of him if it were time that the Lorde Geoffrey ſhould come, and the Lombard ſayde yea. Then they returned to their maſter and ſhewed him as the Lombard had ſayde: Then he made his men to paſſe Newland Bridge in good order of battayle. Then he ſent. xij. knightes with an hundreth men of armes to go and take poſſeſſion of the Caſtell of Calice: for he thought if he might haue the Caſtell, he ſhould ſoone get the Towne. And he delyuered to the Lorde Edward of Rency twentie thouſand Crownes to pay the Lombard. And ſyr Geoffrey houed ſtill in the fieldes priuely with his Banner before him. His intent was to enter into the towne by the gate, or elſe not, and the Lombard had let downe the bridge of the poſterne, and ſuffred the hundred men of armes to paſſe peaceably: and ſyr Edward at the Poſterne deliuered twentie thouſand Crownes in a bagge to the Lombard, who ſayde, I truſt here be all, for I haue no leaſure now to tell them, and it will be day anone. Then he caſt the bagge with the Crownes into a Cofer, and ſayde to the Frenchmen: come on Sirs, ye ſhal enter into the Dungeon, for then ſhall ye be ſure to be Lordes of the Caſtell, and they went thether, and he drewe apart the barre, and the gate opened.

The Frenchmen conueyed into a Dongeon.

Within this Caſtell was the king of Englande wyth two hundreth ſpeares, who iſſued out with their ſwordes and axes in their handes, cryeng

Manny,

Manny, Manny, to the reskewe, what? weneth the Frenchmen with so fewe men to wynne the Castell of Calice? Then the Frenchmen seyng well that defence coulde not auayle them: Then they yeelded themselues prisoners, and so there were but a fewe hurte, and the rest were closed vp in the same Towre in prison.

And the English men issued out of the Castell into the towne, and mounted on their horses, for they had all the French prisoners horses. Then the Archers roade to Boleyn gate where syr Geoffrey was with his Banner before him of Goules, three shotcheons of Siluer. He had a great desyre to be the first that should enter into the towne: he sayde to the knightes that were about him: without this Lombard open the gate shortely, we are lyke to dye here for colde. In the name of God sayde Sir Pepy dewere, Lombards are malicious people and subtile, he is now looking on your crownes, whether all be good or not, and to recken if he haue his whole some or no.

Therewith the king of Englande and the Prince his sonne was readie at the gate vnder the Banner of Sir Gualtier of Manny, with dyuers other Banners, as the Erle of Stafford, the Erle of Suffolke, the Lorde John Mountagew, brother to the Erle of Salsburie, the Lorde Beauchampe, the Lorde Barkeley, and the Lord delawarre: All these were Lords and had Banners, there were no mo in that iourney.

Then the great gate was set open, and all they issued out: when the Frenchmen sawe them issue, and heard them crye Manny to the reskewe, they knewe well they were betrayed. Then Sir Geoffray sayde to his company, Sirs if we flie we are cleane lost: yet were we better to fight with a good courage, in hope the iourney shall be oures.

The Englishe men heard these wordes and sayde, by saint George ye say truely, shame haue he that flieth. The Frenchmen alighted on foote, and put their horses from them, and ordered themselues in good aray of battaile.

When the king sawe that, he stood still (and sayde) let vs put our selues in order to fight, for our enimies will abyde vs. The king sent parte of hys company to Newlande Bridge, for he heard saye, that there were a great number of Frenchmen. Then thether went a. vj. Banners, and three hundred Archers, and there they founde the Lorde Nonau of Frenes, and the Lorde of Creques keeping the Bridge. And betwene the Bridge and Calice there were manye Crosbowes of Saint Omers and Ayze: So there was a sore fraye, and there were slaine and drowned mo then. vj. hundreth Frenchmen, for they were sone discomfited and chaced into the water. This was early in the morning, and incontinent it was day. The French men kept their ground awhile, and manye feates of armes were there done on both parties: But the Englishmen euer encreased by comming out of Calyce, and the Frenchmen discreased. Then the Frenchmen sawe well that they could not long kepe the Bridge, wherfore they that had their horses by them mounted vpon them, and shewed their horse heeles, and the Englishmen followed them in chace. There was many a man ouerthrowne, and many were taken of their owne courage, which might haue scaped if they had list.

When it was fayre day, that euery man might know other: Then some of the French knightes and Esquiers assembled together againe, and turned and fought manfully with the Englishe men: So that there were some of the Frenchmen that tooke good prisoners, whereby they had both honour and profite.

How valyauntly the king of England quit him selfe against the French men.

Nowe let vs speake of the king of England, who was there vnknowen to his enemies, vnder the Banner of Sir Gualter of Manny, and was on foote among his men to seeke his enemyes, who stood close together with their speares a fiue foote long. At the first meetyng, there was a sore rencountrie: and the king chaunced to light vpon the Lorde Eustace of Rybamount, who was a strong and valiaunt knight, and there was a long fight betwene the king and him, that it was ioy to behold them, but at the last they were put asunder, for a great company of both partes came the same waye, and fought there fiercely together.

The Frenche men did there right valiauntly: But specially the Lorde Eustace of Rybamount, who strake the king the same day two tymes on his knees: But finally the king himselfe tooke him prisoner: and so he yelded his swoorde to the king, and sayd, Sir knight I yeelde me vnto you as your prisoner, he knew not at that time that it was the king. And so this iourney was for the king of England: and all that were there with Sir Geoffrey, were eyther slaine or taken, for very fewe escaped. There was slaine Sir Henry of Boys, and Sir Peyn de Lawarre, and Sir Geoffrey taken. Thus this iourney was achieued beside Calice, the yere of our Lorde. 1348. the last day of the moneth of December, and in the beginnyng of the. xxiij. yere of the reigne of king Edward.

When this battaile was done, the king returned againe to the Castell of Calice, and caused all the prisoners to be brought thether. Then the french men knew well that the king of England had bene there personally himselfe, vnder the Banner of Sir Gualter of Manny. The king sayde he would geue them all a Supper that night in the Castell of Calice: And when the houre of Supper was come, and the tables couered: The king and hys knightes were there euery man in newe apparell: And the French men also were there, and made good cheere, though they were prisoners.

The king sate downe and the Lordes and knights about him right honourably. The Prince, Lordes and knightes of England, serued the king at the first messe. And at the second they sate downe at another table: they were all well serued and at great leasure.

Then when supper was done, and the Tables taken away: The king taryed still in the Hall with his knightes and with the Frenche men, and he was bare headed, sauyng a Chapelet of fine Perles that he ware on his hed. Then the king went from one to another of the French men: And when he came to Sir Geoffrey of Charney, a little he chaunged his countenaunce, and looked vpon him, and sayd, Sir Geoffrey ye haue geuen me occasion to loue you but a little, when ye would steale by night that thing from me which I haue so derely bought: But yet this pleaseth me best, that I haue taken you with the maner. Ye would haue come to a better market then I came vnto, when you thought to haue had Calice for. xx. thousand Crownes: But God hath holpen me, and ye haue fayled of your purpose, and therewith the king went from him, and he gaue him neuer a woorde to aunswere.

The wise spech of king Edward vnto sir Geoffrey of Charney.

Then the king came to Sir Eustace of Rybamount, and ioyously to him he said, Sir Eustace ye are the knight that among all other are the most valiauntest launtest that I haue seene, as well in the assaylyng of your enemie as in the defendyng of your selfe, neyther was it my chaunce to mete with any knight that euer put me to aunswere, and defende myselfe body to body as ye haue done this day, wherefore I geue you the prise aboue all the knightes of my Court, by right sentence. Then the king tooke the Chapelet that was vpon his head, beyng both fayre, goodly, and riche, and sayd, Sir Eustace I geue you this Chapelet for the best doer in armes in this iourney past on eyther partie, and I desyre you to beare it this yere for the loue of me. I know wel ye be freshe and amorous, and often tymes ye are among Ladyes, and Damoselles: Say wheresoeuer ye come, that I did geue it you, and I requite and discharge you of your imprisonment and raunsome, and ye shall depart to morowe if it please you.

And in the end of this yere, the plague of Pestilence reigned fore in England, but chiefely in the Citie of London, that beside the bodyes that were buryed in sundrie Churches and Churchyardes in London, there were also buryed in the Charterhouse Churchyard fiftie thousand persons and aboue. A great plague and pestilence.

This yere and the.xrij. day of August, dyed Philip the French king at Nogent, and was buryed in Parys: And the. xrvj. day of September folowyng, John eldest sonne to king Philip was crowned French king at Reynes, and the same day also the Queene his wife was crowned with him, and at the same tyme, the king made also manye knightes, and created Erles Marqueses, and Dukes. 1349. 24. Philip the French king dead.

This yere about the latter ende of August, a noble man of Spaine called Sir Charles, to whome king John of Fraunce had newely geuen the Eriedome of Angolesme, entendyng to wynne some honour vpon the English men, with a strong nauie of Spanyardes entered the English streames, and did much harme vnto king Edwardes friendes. So that the king about the tyme aboue sayde met with the sayde nauye vpon the coast of Winchelsey, where betwene the king and them was a long and cruell fight, to the great losse of many people vpon both partes: But in the ende God sent vnto the king the victory, so that he chased his enemies, and wanne from them. xrij. of their Shippes, with many prisoners. In the ende of this yere, there were solempne Messengers sent in Ambassade to Rome, for to conclude a perfite peace betwene the two kinges of England and of Fraunce, so that king Edward should resigne and geue vp all his title and claime that he made vnto the Crowne of Fraunce: And the French king should clerely geue vnto him all the Duchy of Guyan, with all such landes as at any time before, were taken by any of his progenitors from it. And that king Edward and his heyres kinges, should freely holde and occupie the sayde Duchie, without doyng of any homage to any French king after that day. But the conclusion of this matter was so prolonged and deferred by the Pope, that the Erle of Darby, and other which were appoynted for the king of England, returned without speding of their cause. Wherfore king Edward made new prouision to warre vpon king John of Fraūce.

In the.xrvj. yere of the reigne of this king, the Castell of Guynes nere vnto Calice was yelden vnto the Englishe men, by the treason of a French man called Guyllam de Beaucourt, for the which treason the sayde Guyllam was shortly after put to execution by ỹ French king in the towne of Amiens. 1351. 26.

A victory ouer ỳ French men.

And the same yere Sir Guy of Neale then Marshall of Fraunce with a strong companie gaue battaile vnto the Englishe men then beyng in Bri-teyn, in the which the sayde Sir Guy, with the Lorde of Brikebet, and the Chasteleyn of Beaunoyes, with manie other noble men were slaine, and ma-ny taken prisoners.

The drie or hote Somer.

At this time happened throughout Englande so hote a Sommer, that many yeres after it was called the drie Sommer, for from the later ende of Marche vntill the later ende of July, then next followyng there fell little or no rayne, by reason whereof, many great inconueniences followed. And chiefely the price of Corne this yere beganne greatly to be aduaunced, and the yere followyng it was more dere, and so lykewise were Befes and Mot-tons greatly aduaunced by reason of the lack of pasture and feeding, which thing happened in Fraunce as well as in Englande.

A parliament at Westmin-ster.

This yere the king called his high Court of Parliament at Westmin-ster, and about Whitsontyde folowyng the king created the Erle of Derby, Duke of Lancaster, and Syr Raufe Stafford, Erle of Stafford. Then thys Duke of Lancaster was sent agayne ouer the Sea, where in the ende of of this yere (as sayth Froyssart) he was appealed of the Duke of Bruns-wike, a Duke of the Countrie of Almayne, of certaine wordes that were agaynst his honour: For the which he offered to wage his battayle with the sayde Duke in the court of the French king.

The Erle of Derby was appealed be-fore ỳ French king by the Duke of Brunswick.

Then thys Henry, which some call Henry of Bolyngbroke Duke of Lancaster, purchaced his safeconduite of the French king, and kept his daye apointed for that battaile in a field called in the French, La preux Clers, where was for them ordeyned a place listed and closed in goodly wise: king John beyng there present with the greatest parte of the Nobles of Fraunce.

And there came in first into that field the aforenamed Duke of Bruns-wike appellaunt, and after him came the Noble Duke of Lancaster, to the great honour of all England. And soone after (dyuers obseruances accor-ding to the laiwe of armes done) and solempne othes taken, eyther of them set hys speare in the rest to haue runne the first course. But then king John of his speciall grace ceassed the matter, and tooke the quarell into his awne hands, so that eyther of them departed the field without any stroke striking: and then the French king pacified the appeale to the honour of the Duke of Lancaster although he was the French kings enemie.

The French king taketh vp the matter

And shortly after this, the sayde Duke of Lancaster, with other nobles assigned vnto hym by the king of Englande, went vnto Auinion with the Archebishop of Rone then Chauncelour of the Realme of Fraunce, and also the Duke of Burbone, and other that were apointed for the king of Fraunce to conclude a peace betweene their two princes aforesayde, who were at the Citie aforesayd and there heard at length of the election of a new Pope, then called Innocent the. vi. which also lyke vnto his predecessor was a French man borne. In conclusion after many and great arguments made on both sides, it was there agreed that the peace betweene the two sayde kinges should be kept and holden inuiolable vntill Mydsomer then next followyng.

Now for as much as the townes of Flaundrys did refuse to keepe the bandes bandes of amity that before time had beene made betweene the king of Englande and them, in the tyme and lyfe of Jaques Dartuell afore mencioned: But that now they begamne to fauour the French king, therefore the king withdrewe from them the Martes or Markets and staples of woolles which to their great aduauntage by the procurement of the sayde Jaques de Artuell was in sundrie of their townes vsed and kept. And the king caused the same to be kept in sundrie good townes of England, as Westminster, Chichester, Lyncolne, Bristow, and Cauntorburie.

Staple of Wolles kept in England.

And shortly after Easter the French king sent his eldest sonne Charles Dolphyn of Vyenne into Normandy for to take the rule of that country, and specially for to cease certaine lands and Castels, which at that day belonged vnto the king of Nauarre, which then was out of the french kings fauor for the death of syr Charles of Spayne late Constable of Fraunce which by his meanes was murdered in a towne called Aigle in Normãdy.ij.yeres before.

And while the Dolphyn was thus busied in Normendy, he made such meane to the rulers thereof, that they graunted him ayde of three thousand men for three Monethes at their proper costes and charges.

Of this sone after sprang such tydings, that the king of England was informed that the French king had geuen to his sonne Charles the Duchy of Normandy, with all Gascoyne and Guyan: and how the Normans had graunted to the sayde Charles three thousande men for three moneths to warre at their costes on the Englishmen, which (as the French boke sayth) was graunted him onely to defende the king of Nauerre, which came to Constantyne shortlye after, to repossesse suche landes as the Dolphyn had seased there of his, and therefore he made warre vpon the Dolphyn.

But howsoeuer it were, in October next followyng the Prince of Wales with a great hoste entred into Gascoyne, and passed by Tholous and the ryuer of Geround and so by Carcassion, and brent the Bulwarks of that Citie, and from thence to Narbon in brennyng and spoylyng all as he went.

The Prince of Wales entreth into Gascoyne.

And in the same yere king Edward with his power landed at his towne of Calice, where he rested him all the winter followyng.

Ye haue heard in the last yere that the Prince of Wales with an army of men went ouer into Gascoigne, where he did many a noble dede and feate of armes, and tooke many townes and Castels and subdued his enemies with great courage. At the last the French king made suche great prouision to encounter with him, that there was no remedy but he must fight with him. Wherfore he made all the prouision he could, and sayde courageously for the comforting of his men beyng God wote but a handefull in comparison to the French armie, well syrs sayth he, although we be but fewe in regarde to the multitude of our enimies: Let vs not be abashed therefore, for the victorie lyeth not in the multitude of the people, but where it pleaseth almighty God to geue it. If it fortune that the iourney be ours, we shall be honoured thorough the whole worlde: And if we die in a right and good quarell, I haue a king to my father and I haue brethren, and you haue good friendes and kinsmen that will reuenge ours deathes. Therefore Syrs, for Gods sake take the good heartes of Englishmen vnto you this daye, for if God will, this daye shall ye see me doe the parte of a good knight. These wordes and suche other that the Prince spake, did greatly encourage his people. The Prince Edwarde commonly called the black Prince was of great courage.

Prince

Prince had placed himselfe with his armie among the Vynes and had closed in the weakest parte thereof with the carryages.

Now that the time of battaile approched, the Prince hauyng by hym the Lorde Sir John Chandos and the Lord James Audeley, who assisted him and neuer went from him all the time of the battayle. But the Lorde Audeley kneeled downe (and sayde vnto the Prince) Sir I haue serued alwayes truely my Lorde your father and you also, and will doe as long as I lyue. I saye this because I made once a vowe that the first battaile that eyther the king your father or any of his children should be at, how that I would be one of the first setters on, or else to die in the trauaile: Therefore I beseeche your grace as in reward for anye seruice that euer I did to the king your father or to you, that you will giue me licence to depart from you, and to set my selfe there as I may accomplishe my vowe.

The Lorde James Audley his wordes to the Prince.

The Prince agreed to his desyre, and sayde, Sir James, God ayde you so this day, that ye may proue the best knight of all other, and so tooke hym by the hande. And the knight departed from the Prince, and went to the formost front of all the battayles, beyng only accompanied with foure Esquiers in whom he put great trust & confidence, and they promised not to fayle him. This Lorde James was a right sage and Vertuous knight, and by him was much of the hoste ordered and gouerned. Thus Sir James was readie to fight in the front of the Battaile, against the battayles of the Marshalles of Fraunce. Then the battaile began of all partes, and the battayles of the Marshalles of Fraunce approched, and they set forth that were appointed to breake the array of the Archers: They entred on horsebacke into the way where the great hedges were on both sydes set full of Archers: As soone as the men of armes entered, the Archers beganne to shoote on both sydes, and did slay and hurt knightes and horsses a great number. So that the horses when they felt the sharpe Arrowes, they would in no wise go forward, but drue backe and flang, and tooke on so fiercely, that many of them fell vpon their maisters: So that for preace they could neuer rise againe. In so much, that the Marshalles battaile could neuer come at the Prince: But yet certein knightes and Esquiers that were well horsed, passed through the Archers, and thought to haue approched to the Prince, but they could not. The Lord Audely with his foure Esquiers was in the front of that battaile, and there did marueiles in Armes, and by great prowes he came & fought with Sir Arnolde Dandrehen, vnder his owne Banner, and there they fought long together, and Sir Arnold was there sore handled. The battaile of the Marshalles began to disorder, by reason of the shotte of the Archers, with the ayde of the men of armes, who came in among them, and slue of them, and did what they list. And there was the Lorde Arnold Dandrehen taken prisoner by other men, and not by the Lorde Audeley, for that day he neuer tooke prisoner, but alwayes fought and went on his enemies. Also on the French part the Lorde John Cleremount fought vnder his owne Banner as long as he could endure, but there he was beaten downe, and coulde not be relieued nor raunsomed, but was slaine without mercie. So within a short space the Marshalles battailes were discomfited, for they fell one vpon another, and could not go forward. And the Frenchmen that were behinde, and could not come forwarde, reculed backe, and came on the battaile of the

Duke

Duke of Normandy, the which was great and thicke, and were on foote, but anone they began to open behynde. For when they knewe that the Marshalles battail was discomfited, they tooke their horses and departed he that might best make way to be gone: Also they sawe a rowte of Englishe men comming downe a litle hill on horseback, and many Archers with them, who brake in on the one syde of the Dukes battaile. To say the truth, the Archers did their company that day great seruice, for they shot so thick, that the French men wist not on what syde to take hede, and little and little the English men wanne ground on them. And when the men of Armes of England sawe that the Marshalles battaile was discomfited, and that the Dukes battaile began to disorder & open, they lept then on their horses, the which they had redy by them. Then they assembled together, & cryed Saint George. And the Lorde Chandos sayde to the Prince: Sir, take your horse and ryde forth, thys iourney is yours: God is this day with you, and fighteth for you, and let vs go vnto the French kinges battaile, for there lyeth all the sore of this matter. I thinke verely by his valyantnesse that he will not flie, I trust by the helpe of God and Saint George we shall haue him, if he be well fought withall: And Sir in the beginning of the battaile I heard you say, that this day I should see you a good knight, nowe is the tyme therefore, folowe it. The Prince sayd, let vs go forth, ye shall not see me this day returne backe, and then sayd the Prince, aduaunce forth your Banner in the name of God and Saint George: The knight that bare it, did his commaundement. There was then a sore battaile and a daungerous, and many a man ouerthrowne, and he that was once downe could not be relieued againe without great succour & ayde. Then the Prince and his company gaue the onset of the battaile of the Duke of Athens Constable of Fraunce, and there was many a man slaine and cast to the earth. And as the Frenche men fought in companies they cryed (Moune ioye Saint Dionice) and the Englishe men, Saint George. Anone the Prince with his companie met with the battaile of the Almaynes, whereof the Erle of Salesbyrie, the Erle of Nosco, and the Erle Neydo were Capitaines: But in a short space they were put to flight. The Archers shot so wholy together, that none durst come in their daungers, they slue many a man that could not come to raunsome, and the afore sayde three Erles were slaine, and diuerse other knightes and Esquiers of their company. Then the kinges battaile came on the Englishe men, there was a sore fight, and many a harde stroke both geuen and receyued: The French king and his ponges sonne mette with the battaile of the Englishe Marshalles, the Erle of Warwike, and the Erle of Suffolke, and with them of Gascoynes, the Captall of Buz, the Lorde of Pompers, the Lorde Amery of Charre, the Lorde of Mucident, the Lorde of Langram, and the Lorde de la Strade. To the Frenche partie there came time ynough, the Lorde John of Landas, and the Lorde of Woodney, they alighted on foote, and wente into the kinges battaile. And a litle beside fought the Duke of Athens, constable of Fraunce, and a litle aboue him the Duke of Burbon, and many good knightes of Burbonoys, and of Picardie with him. And a litle on the other syde, there were the Poytenynes, the Lorde de Pons, the Lorde of Partney, the Lorde of Dampmar, the Lorde of Montabaton, the Lorde of Suggers, the Lorde John Sayntre, the Lorde Argenton, the Lorde

In another part there was the Erle of Uantadowre, and of Mountpencer, the Lorde James of Burbone, the Lorde John de Arthoys, and also the Lord James his brother, the Lord Arnold of Cernolle called the Archepriest, armed for the yong Erle of Alanson. And of Auuergne, there was the Lord Marcuell, the Lord de la Towre, the Lorde of Chalenton, the Lorde of Mountagew, the Lorde of Rochefort, the Lorde de la Chayre, the Lorde Dachone. And of Limosin, there was the Lorde Delmall, the Lorde of Norwell, and the Lord of Piers Buffier. And of Picardie, there was the Lorde William of Nerle, the Lord Arnolde of Reinewall, the Lorde Geoffrey of Saint Digier, the Lorde of Chamy, the Lorde of Heley, the Lorde of Mounsaunt, the Lord of Hangies, and diuers other. And also in the kinges battaile was the Erle Douglas of Scotland, who fought a season right valiauntly: But when he sawe the discomfiture, he departed and saued himselfe, for in no wise he would be taken of the English men, he had rather haue bene slaine.

On the English part the Lord James Audeley with the ayde of his foure squiers, fought alwayes in the chiefe of the battayle: he was sore hurt in the bodye and in the visage, but yet as long as his breth serued him, he fought. At the last towarde the ende of the battayle, hys foure squiers tooke and brought him out of the field, and layed him vnder a hedge side for to refreshe hym: and they vnarmed him, and bounde vp his woundes as well as they coulde.

Lord James Audeley.

On the French part, king John was that day a full right good knight, if the fourth parte of his men had done their deuoyres as well as he did, the iourney had bene his by all lykelyhood: howbeit they were all slaine and taken that were there, except a very fewe that were with the king, which saued themselues by flyeng.

John the French king.

There were slaine the Duke Peter of Burbone, the Lorde Guysshard of Beauiewe, the Lorde of Landas, and the Duke of Athens Conestable of Fraunce, the Bishop of Chalons in Champeyne, the Lorde William of Neele, the Lorde Eustace of Rybamount, the Lorde de la Towre, the Lorde William of Mountagew, syr Guyuenton of Chambley, syr Baudyn de la house and many other as they fought by companies. And there were taken prisoners, the Lorde of Woodney, the Lorde of Pompador, and the Archepriest sore hurt, the Erle of Uandos, syr Loys of Welwall, the Lord Piers Buffier and the Lord of Senetache: There were at that bront slaine and taken mo then two hundreth knightes.

French men slaine.

This battayle was fought nere vnto Poyetiers in the fields of Beaumount and Walpertnes, the which was great and perillous, and manye worthie deedes of armes were there done that came not at all to my knowledge, sayth Froissart. The fighters on both partes endured muche trauaile and paine: king John with his owne hands did that day like a valiant Prince, he had an Axe in his hande, wherewith he fought in the breaking of preasse to haue come to the Prince, very courageously and manfully. And nere vnto the French king was taken the Erle of Tankerupll, Sir James of Burbon Erle of Ponthieu, and the Lorde John of Arthoyes Erle of Ewe.

French men taken.

Ewe. And a little aboue that vnder the Banner of ỳ Capitol of Buz was taken syr Charles of Arthoys, & diuers other knightes and squires. The chace endured to the gates of Poytiers: There were manye slaine and beaten downe horse and man, for they of Poytiers had closed their gates, & would suffer none to enter: wherefore in the streete before the gate, was a great & horrible murther, and many men hurt and beaten downe: The Frenchmen yelded themselues as farre off as they might know an Englishman. There were diuers Englishe Archers that had foure, fiue, or sixe prisoners, the Lorde of Pons a great Baron of Poyton was there slayne, and many other knightes and squires. And there was taken the Erle of Rocheuart, the Lord of Daumaueinent, the Lorde of Pertney and of Faynton, the Lord of Motendre and the Lord Saint Iohn: But he was so sore hurt that he neuer had helth after, he was accompted for one of the best knightes in Fraunce. And there was lefte for deade among other deade men, the Lorde Richard Dangle, who fought that daye by the king right valiauntly, and so did the Lord Charney, on whom was great prayse, because he bare the souereigne Banner of the kinges: his awne Banner was also in the fielde, the which was Goules three Scotcheons Siluer.

So manye Englishmen and Gascoynes came to that parte, that perforce they opened the kings battayle, so that the French men were so mingled among their enemies, that some time there was fiue men vpon one Gentleman. There was taken the Lord of Pompadour, and the Lord Bartholomew de Buzmes: and there was slaine Sir Geoffrey of Charney with the kinges Banner in his handes. Also the Lorde Reynould Cobham slue the Erle of Dammartyn. Then was there great prealling to take the king, and suche as knewe him cryed vnto him and sayde, Sir, yeelde you, or else ye are but dead. At that tyme there was a knight of Saint Omers retayned in wages with the king of Englande called syr Thomas Holbeck, who had serued the king of Englande, fiue yere before, because in his youth he had forfeyted the Realme of Fraunce for a murder that he did at Saint Omers. It happened so well for this knight, that he was next to the king when they were about to take him, and he stepped forth into the prease, and by strength he came to the French king and sayde vnto him in good French (Sir yeelde you) the king beheld the knight and sayde vnto him, to whom shall I yeelde me? where is my Cosyn the Prince of Wales, if I myght see him I would speake with him, Sir Denyse answered and sayde, Sir he is not here, but yeelde you to me, and I will bring you to him: who be you quoth the king? Sir sayth he, I am Denyse of Holbeck, a knight of Arthoys: But I serue the king of England, because I am banished the realme of Fraunce, and I haue forfayted all that I had there: Then the king gaue him his right Gauntlet, sayeng I yeelde me vnto you. There was a great prease about the king, for euerye man cryed that he had taken the King, so that the king coulde not go forwarde wyth hys young sonne Philip wyth him for the prease.

This Sir Geoffrey was he that woulde haue stollen Calyce.

The French king is taken

The prince of Wales, who was courageous and cruell as a Lyon, toke that day great pleasure to fight and chase his enimies: The Lorde John Chandos, who was with him of all that daye and neuer left him, nor neuer tooke heede of taking anye prisoner, at the ende of the battayle sayde to the Prince, Sir, it were good that you rested here, and set your Banner a high in this Bushe, that your people maye draw hether, for they be sore scattered abrode, neyther can I see any mo Banners or Pennons on the French partie: wherefore syr, rest and refreshe you, for ye are sore chafed.

Then the princes Banner was set vp high on a Bushe, and Trumpets and Clarions begamne to sounde, and then the Prince did of his Basenet, and the knightes for his body, and they of his Chamber were readie about him, and pight a Read paulion presently, and then drinke was brought vnto hym and to suche Lordes as were about him, who still encreased as they came from the chase, and their prisoners with them.

And when the two Marshalles were come to the Prince, he demaunded of them, and if they heard any tydings of the French king: and they answered and sayde, Sir we heare none of certaintie, but we thinke verily that he is eyther dead or taken, for he is not gone out of the battayles. Then the prince sayde to the Erle of Warwike, and to Sir Reignold of Cobham: Sirs I requyre you to go forth and hearken and inquire a truth, & returne agayne so soone as you can. These two Lordes tooke their horses and departed from the Prince, and roade vp a little hill to looke about them. And they perceaued a flocke of men of armes comming together right worily: There was the French king on foote in great perill, for Englishmen and Gascons were his masters, they had taken him from Sir Denyse Morbeck perforce, and such as were the strongest sayde, I haue taken him, nay quoth another I haue taken him, so they straue who should haue him: Then the French king, to eschewe that perill, spake vnto them and sayde, Sirs, striue not, leade me and my sonne curteously to my Cosyn the prince, and fall not out for my taking, for I am so great a Lorde as maye make you all riche: the which wordes did somewhat pacefie them: howbeit, still as they went, they made ryot and brawled for the taking of the king.

Sir Dionise Morbecke tooke the French king.

When the aforesayde Lordes sawe and heard the noyes and strife amongest them, they came vnto them and sayde, Sirs, what is the matter that ye striue for? Sir sayde one of them, it is for the French king, who is here taken prisoner, and there are mo then.x. knights and squires that challenge the taking of him and of his sonne: Then the two Lordes entered into the preasse and caused euery man to drawe a back, and commaunded them in the Princes name vpon paine of their heades to make no more noyes, nor to approche to the king any neerer, without they were commaunded. Then euery man gaue rome to the Lordes, and they alighted, and did their reuerence vnto the king, and so brought him and his sonne quietly vnto the Prince of Wales.

Assone as the two Marshalles were departed from the Prince, as before you haue heard: Then the Prince demaunded of the knights that were about him, whether any of them could tell him of the Lord James Audeley: and answere was made, that he was sore hurt, and lay in a Litter, not farre off. Nowe truely sayde the Prince, I am sory for his hurtes: But go knowe if he may be brought hether, or else I will go see him where he is. Then two knights came to the Lord Audley, and sayd, sir, the Prince hath earnestly asked for you, and is very desyrous to see you, and sayth that if you cannot come to him, he will come to you. A syr quoth the knight, I thanke the prince that will thinke on so poore a Knight as I am. And then he called. viij. of his seruauntes to beare him in his Litter to the place where the Prince was. Then the Prince tooke him in his armes and kissed him, and made to him most louyng countenaunce, and great cheere (and sayd) sir James I ought greatly to honour you, for by your valyantnes ye haue this day obteyned the commendation and fame by all our iudgements to be the most valiant knight of all other that fought at this battaile. O Sir, sayde the knight, ye say your pleasure, I would it were so, but if I haue this day put forth my selfe in your seruice (and for the accomplishement of the bowe that before I had made) it ought not to be reputed to my prowes or force, but to dutie. Sir James, sayd the Prince, I and all ours repute and declare you in this battaile to be the best doer in Armes: And to the entent to furnishe you the better in the warres, and to encourage you to follow the same, I retaine you for euer to be my knight with fiue hundreth markes of yerely reuenewes, the which I will assigne you out of myne inheritance in England. Sir sayde the knight God make me able to deserue the great goodnesse that ye shew me, and so he tooke his leaue of the Prince, for he was very weake.

A gentle gracious Prince.

The bountifull reward of a Prince.

So soone as sir James Lorde Audeley was brought to his lodgyng, he sent for sir Peter Audeley his brother, and for the Lorde Bartholomewe of Burnes, the Lorde Stephen of Gouseton, the Lord of Wylly, and the Lord Raufe Ferrers: All these were of his Linage. And he called before them his foure Esquiers that had serued him that day so well and truly: And then he sayde to the Lordes: Where it hath pleased my Lorde the Prince to geue me this day.v. C Markes of yerely reuenewes, for the which gift I haue done him small seruice with my body: Sirs, sayde he to the Lordes, beholde here these foure Esquiers, who haue alwayes serued me truly, and specially this day, for the honour that I haue, is by their valiantnesse, and therefore I am bound to reward them. Wherefore, here before you all, I geue and resigne into their handes the gift that my Lorde Prince hath geuen me of fiue hundreth markes of yerely reuenewes, to them and to their heyres for euer, in like maner as it was geuen me, and I cleerely disenherite my selfe thereof, and enherite them to hold the same, without any variaunce or contradiction.

A noble & liberal knight.

The Lordes and other that were present, euery of them beheld other, and sayde among themselues, this commeth of a noble and valiant courage, thus to depart with so great a gift: and they answered him with one voyce, Sir, be it as God will, we will beare witnesse in this behalfe, when & whersoeuer we become, and so they tooke their leaue and departed.

The next day as the king departed and was going in his iourney, it was tolde the king howe the Lorde Audeley had geuen to his foure Esquiers the gift of the fiue hundreth Markes that he had geuen vnto him. Then the Prince sent for him, and he was brought vnto the Prince in his Litter, who receyued him right curteously (and sayde) Sir James, we haue knowledge that the reuenewes that we gaue you, assoone as ye came to your lodgyng, ye gaue the same to foure Esquiers: We would knowe why ye did so, and whether ye thought the gift sufficient and worthie for you or not? Sir sayde the knight, it is of truth that I haue geuen it to them, and I will vtter vnto vnto you the cause why I did so: Those foure Esquiers haue of long tyme serued me well and truely in many great daungers: And Sir at this tyme, they ſerued me in ſuch wiſe, that if they had neuer done any thing elſe, I was and am bound towardes them, and before this day they neuer had any thing of me in reward. And Sir, as ye know, I was and am but a man alone, but by the courage, ayde, and comfort of them, I tooke on me to accompliſhe my vowe to you before reherſed, and certeinely I had bene deade in the battayle if they had not beene. Wherefore ſir, when as nature and duetye dyd binde me to conſider the loue that they bare vnto me, I ſhould haue ſhewed my ſelfe to muche vnthankefull if I had not rewarded them: And God I thanke him, I haue and ſhall haue inough to mainteine my poore eſtate, as long as I liue, and I feare nothing leſſe then lacke of ſubſtance. And foraſmuch as I haue done this without your licence and knowledge, I humbly beſeech you to pardon me, and Sir be you well aſſured, that both I and my Eſquiers, will ſerue you as well and as truely as euer we did.

A noble and gracious prince.

Then the Prince ſayd, Sir James, I muſt needes commend you very much in all your doings, chiefely for your valiantnes ſhewed in this battaile: and for the good ſeruice of theſe Eſquiers, whome ye haue ſo much prayſed, I agree and allowe to them your gift, and I will render againe to you fiue C. markes in the lyke maner as ye had the other graunted vnto you before.

Thus this battaile ended as you haue heard, which was fought the .xvij. day of September two leagues from Poytiers. And it beganne in the morning, and ended at noone: But as then the Engliſhmen were not returned from the chaſe of their enimies. Therefore, as ye haue heard, the Princes Banner ſtood in a buſhe to drawe all his men together, but it was night before all came from the chace. And as it was reported, there were ſlaine al the Flowre and chiualrie of Fraunce. And there was taken wyth the King and the Lord Philip his ſonne .xvij. Erles, beſide Barons, knights, and ſquiers, and there were ſlaine. v. or .vj. thouſand one and other.

When euery man was come from the chace, they had as manye priſoners as the whole armie of the Engliſhmen were twiſe in number. Wherefore it was agreed and concluded among them, becauſe of the great charge and doubt to keepe ſo many priſoners, that they ſhould put manye of them to raunſome incontinent in the fielde, and ſo they did. And the priſoners founde the Engliſhmen and Gaſcons right curteous and gentle vnto them. And all that night the prince with his armie and priſoners laye in the fielde, and euery manne made good cheere vnto his priſoner, for that day whoſoeuer tooke any priſoner, he was cleere his, and might quyte and raunſome him at his pleaſure.

A notable victorie.

All ſuche as were at this battayle, were all made riche with honour and goodes, as well by raunſoming of priſoners, as by wynning of Golde, Siluer, plate, and Jewels, that was there found in the ſpoyle. There was no man that did ſet anye thing by riche harneys, whereof there was great plentye, for the Frenchmen came thether very richly beſene, wenyng to haue obteyned the glorie of that iourney.

The honorable behauiour of the prince, to ỹ French king.

When night came, the prince made to the French king and his ſonne, and to the other Lordes that were taken priſoners, a ſupper. And firſt the Prince placed the French king and his ſonne, the Lorde James of Burbone, the Lorde John de Arthoys, the Erle of Tankeruyll, the Erle of Stampes, the Erle of Dampmartyn, the Erle of Grauyll, and the Lorde of Partenay to ſit all at one boꝛde, and other Loꝛdes knightes and ſquires at other Tables. And the pꝛince himſelfe ſeꝛued all that ſupper time, neyther woulde he ſit downe foꝛ no requeſt that the French king coulde make vnto him: Foꝛ he ſayde, he was not meete to ſit at that table with ſo great and high a pꝛince as the French king was. And then he ſayde to the king, Sir foꝛ Gods ſake be not ſad noꝛ ſhewe not anye heauie countenaunce, foꝛ though God thys daye hath not conſented to folow youꝛ will: yet Sir ſurely the king my father I dare boldely ſay will beare you ſo much honoꝛ and amitie as he maye doe, and I doubt nothing but that ye ſhall ſo reaſonably accoꝛde and agree, that ye ſhall be friendes foꝛ euer together. And ſyꝛ mee thinketh that ye ought to reioyce, though the tourney be not as ye woulde haue had it, foꝛ this daye ye haue wonne the high renowne of Pꝛowes, and haue this daye in valyauntneſſe exceeded all other of youꝛ partie. Sir, I ſpeake not this to mock you, foꝛ all that be on oure partie and ſawe euery mannes deedes, doe plainely agree and conclude in one ſentence to geue you the Chapelet. Therewith the French men beganne to muttoꝛ, and ſayde among themſelues, the pꝛince had ſpoken nobly, and by all coniectures he was lyke to pꝛoue a noble and woꝛthie pꝛince, if God did ſende him lyfe.

When ſupper was done, euery man went to his lodging with their pꝛiſoners, the next daye in the mooꝛning when euery thing was readie truſſed vp, then they tooke their hoꝛſes and roade towardes Poytiers. The ſame night there was come to Poytiers the Loꝛd of Roy with an hundꝛed ſpeares he was not at the battail, but he met the Duke of Noꝛmandy nere to Chauuigny, and the Duke ſent him to Poytiers to keepe the towne, vntill they heard other tydinges.

When the Loꝛde of Roye knewe that the Engliſh men were comming ſo nere the Citie: he cauſed euerie man to be armed, and euery man to go to his defence to the walles, Towꝛes and gates: and the Engliſhmen paſſed by without anye appꝛochyng, foꝛ they were ſo laden with Golde, Siluer, plate, Jewels and pꝛiſoners that in their returning they aſſauted no foꝛtes.

They thought it much if they coulde bꝛing the French king and other pꝛiſoners with all their ſpoyle in ſafetie to Burdeaux. And they roade but ſmall iourneyes becauſe of their pꝛiſoners and carpages, ſo that they roade in a whole daye not paſt foure oꝛ fiue leagues at the moſt, and lodged euer betimes, and roade cloſe together in good aray, ſauyng the Marſhalles battayles, who roade euer befoꝛe with fiue hundꝛed men of armes to open the paſſages as the Pꝛince ſhould paſſe. But they met with no encounteꝛers, foꝛ euery man was ſo afrayde that they were fled to the Foꝛtreſſes.

Thus the Pꝛince and his company did ſo muche, that they paſſed thoꝛough Poyteau and Paynton without dammage, and came to Blay, and there paſſed the ryuer of Geron, & arryued in the good City of Bourdeaux.

It cannot be expꝛeſſed what great feaſtyng and cheere they of the Citie and the Clergie made to the Pꝛince, and how honoꝛably they were there receaued. The pꝛince bꝛought the French king into the Abbey of Saint Andꝛowes, and there they lodged both, the king in the one parte and the pꝛince in the other.

And here were many chaloners of the French king to be their pꝛiſoner: But in the ende, partly by the confeſſion of the French king, and partly by right of armes and tokens shewed by Sir Denyse Norbeck, it was thought his right: but notwithstanding for the appeasing of all things the prince differred the iudgement of the matter to his father the king, when they should come into Englande. And yet in the meane season, the prince secretly caused two thousande Nobles to be delyuered to Syr Denyse Norbeck to maintaine his estate.

Great ioy made in England for the taking of the French king.

In England when newes came of the victorie of the battaile of Poyters, and of the taking of the French king, there was great ioy and gladnesse, and great solemnities were made in all churches, Cities, and Townes, throughout all the Realme.

The Prince of Wales returneth into England with the French king and his other prisoners.

Nowe approched the tyme that the Prince of Wales had made prouision of Ships and furniture to the same, for the conueyaunce and bringing ouer of the French king, and his other Prisoners into England. And when he had all thynges in a redinesse, he called vnto him the Lorde Dalbert, the Lorde Musident, the Lorde Laspare, the Lorde of Punyers, and the Lorde of Rosen, and gaue them commaundement to kepe the Countrie there vntill his returne againe.

Then he tooke the Sea, and certaine Lordes of Gascoyne with him. The Frenche king was in a vessell by himselfe to be the more at his ease, and was accompanyed with two hundreth men of armes, and two thousand Archers. For it was shewed the Prince that the three Estates, by whome the Realme of Fraunce was gouerned, had layde in Normandye, and Crotoye two great armyes, to the entent to meete with him, and to get the Frenche king out of his handes if they might. But there appered no such matter, and yet they were on the sea. xj. dayes, and on the. xij. day they arryued at Sandwich. Then they issued out of their Ship, and landed and lay there all that night, and taryed there two dayes after to refreshe them: And on the thirde day they roade to Cauntorbury.

The French king landeth at Sandwich

When the king of England knewe of their comming, he commaunded the Citezens of London to prepare themselues and their Citie, and to make the same seemely and meete to receyue such a man as the French king was, which the Citezens of London did accordyngly.

And from Cauntorbury they came to Rochester, and there taryed a day, and from Rochester to Dartford, and there taryed a day, and from thence the next day to London, where they were honourably receyued, and so they were in euery good towne as they passed.

The French king is honorably receyued into London.

The French king roade through London on a white Courser well apparelled: and the Prince on a little blacke Hobby by him. Thus the French king was conueyed along the Citie vntill he came to the Sauoy, the which house apperteyned to the heritage of the Duke of Lancaster. And there the French king kept his house a long season, and often tymes the king and Queene came thether to see him, and made him great feastyng and cheere.

In Ambassade set from the Pope to intreate a peace.

Soone after by the commaundement of Pope Innocent the first, there came into Englande the Lorde Taylleran, Cardinall of Piergort, and the Lorde Nicholas, Cardinall of Dargell. They treated for a peace betweene the two kinges, but nothing came to effect: But yet at the last a truce betwene the two kinges & all their assistentes was concluded for to endure vnto the feast of Saint Iohn baptist. 1359. that is to say, for three yeres. And out of this truce was excepted the Lorde Philip of Nauerre and his ayes, the Countesse of Mountford, and the Duchie of Britaine.

Anone after, the French king was remoued from the Sauoy vnto the Castell of Windsore, and all his householde, and went on huntyng and hawking there at his pleasure, and the Lorde Philip his sonne with him: but all the other prisoners abode stil at London, and yet went to see the king at their pleasure, and were receyued onely vpon their faythes.

In the latter ende of this yere, sayth Fabian, the king did holde a royall Justes in Smithfielde in London, and many a noble feate of Armes was there done to the great honour of the king and of all the realme of England. At the which disport were present, the king of England, and the French king and the king of Scottes his prisoners, with many noble Estates of all the three prouinces or kingdomes: whereof the greater number of the straungers were then prisoners. A Justes holden in Smithfield.

Ye haue heard before of the taking of the king of Scottes prisoner, by the Queene in the tyme that king Edward was occupied about the siege of Calice, which now was. xj. yeres past and more. And so soone as the aforesayde Cardinalles had concluded a truce betweene the king of England and the French king, they also accompanied with the bishop of Saint Andrewes in Scotland, fell to a treatie with the king of England, for the deliuerance of the king of Scottes. And the same was concluded in this maner. 1357 32

That the king of Scottes should neuer after arme him selfe against the king of England in his realme, nor counsayle, nor consent to any of his subiectes to arme them, nor to grieue nor make warre against England. A truce or peace concluded betweene the French king and the king of England.

Also the king of Scottes after his returne into his realme, should endeuour himselfe with all diligence that his people should agree, that the realme of Scotland should holde in fee, and do homage to the king of England. And if the realme would not agree thereunto: Yet the king of Scottes to swere solemply to keepe good peace with the king of Englande, and to binde himselfe and his Realme to paye within. x. yeres after, fiue hundreth thousande Nobles as Froissart sayth: But Fabian sayth one hundreth thousand Marckes. And at the sommoning of the king of England, to sende good pledges and hostages for the same: as the Erle of Douglas, the Erle of Moret, the Erle of Mare, the Erle of Surlant, the Erle of Fife, the Baron of Uersey, and Sir William of Caumoyse. And all these to abide in England as prisoners and hostages for the king their Lorde, vnto the tyme that the seuerall paymentes of the money aforesayd were fully contented and payde. The Scottishe kinges raunsome.

Of these ordinaunces and bondes, were made instrumentes publiques, and letters patentes, sealed by both the kinges.

When all these thinges were ordered and done, then the Scottish king departed and went into his realme, & his wife Queene Isabell sister to king Edward, with him. And when he came within his realme, he was honorably receyued, and he lay at Saint Johns towne vpon the ryuer of Trye, while his Castell of Edenbourgh was newly reedified. The Scottish king and his wife departeth into Scotland.

Now before the day of the truce last concluded with Fraunce, were fully expired, the warre was newely begon. But anone after that, a peace was made betweene the king of Nauarre, and the Duke of Normandy. 1358 33

And in this tyme the king of Englande and the Prince his sonne, the French king, and the Lord Jaques of Burbon met at London, & they foure beyng alone together in counsaile, agreed vpon a peace vpon certein articles written in a letter, and sent the same into Fraunce to the Duke of Normandie. When the Duke had receyued these letters, he demaunded counsaile of the king of Nauerre who then was present with him, and he counsayled him that the Prelates and Nobles of Fraunce, and the good townes should assemble themselues, and to say their mindes therein: the which thing was done. And it seemed to the king of Nauarre, and to the Duke, and to his, and to all the counsayle of the Realme, that the sayde treatie was to grieuous to be borne: Wherefore they aunswered all with one voyce, that the peace and condicions cõteyned in that letter, was so preiudicial to them & to the realme, that they yet would endure greater mischiefe then they had done, rather then in such wise to minish and abace the state of Fraunce: and sayd also that they would rather suffer their king to lie still in England.

A peace commoned of and agreed vpon, betweene the French king and the king of England.

And when the French king vnderstood howe the Realme of Fraunce would not agree to his appointment he sayd. A sonne Charles: ye be counsayled by the king of Nauarre, who deceaueth you, and will deceaue suche rl. as you be.

And when the King of Englande knew what aunswere was brought, he sayde: Before Winter be past I will enter into Fraunce, in puyssaunt and valyaunt maner, and there will abyde so long tyll I haue an ende of thys warre, or else peace at my pleasure and to myne honour, and then he made the greatest prouision for warre, that euer he made.

A noble and courageous Prince.

The same season, about the middes of August, the Lorde John of Craon Archebishop of Reynes, and they of the Citie of Paris, and of the Countrie thereabout, with certaine knightes and squires of the Countrie of Rochell and Laon, went and layde siege to the Castell of Roucy, and there laye fyue weekes. And then they within yeelded vp their lyues and goodes saued, and to go whether they list.

And of this they had letters patents sealed by the Archbishop, by the Erle Porcien and the Erle of Brayne: But for all that, when they departed, the commons that were there, rose against them and slue the most parte of them, for all the Lordes, and they had much paine to saue the Captaine called Hankyn Frauncoys. And thus the Erle of Roucy had agayne his owne Castell.

Sir Robert Knolles. Sir James Pipe. Thomlyn Foulke.

And in this time (sayth Fabian) Sir Robert Knolles and Sir James Pipe Englishmen warred in Briteyne, and with the helpe of one Thomlyn Fowlke, they came earely in a morning vnto a towne that was nere vnto Ancre called Kegennez, which then was in the rule of the Englishmen and out of that towne they tooke more strength and went streight to Ancre being within two English myles, and scaled the walles with ladders, and quit them so manfully that they had the rule of the towne before the Sunne rysing. And in that Castell was taken prisoner Sir Guyllam de Chalyn the sonne of the Erle of Ancerre, his wyfe and many other.

Ancre taken

In taking of which towne and Castell, few were slayne, howbeit there came of armed men aboue to thousand to defend the towne, but it was taken before they came. Then the Englishmen searched so neere, that as the common report went, they founde Jewels as though they had bene priuie to the hyding hyding of them, and they were of great value: Among the which they found certaine skinnes of Furres which were valued at v.M. Mottons of Gold. Mottons of Golde.

The Motton of Golde was a coyne vsed in Fraunce and Bziteyn, and is of the value of fiue shyllings sterlyng.

When the Englishmen had pilled and spoyled the towne by the space of viij. dayes, and raunsomed such as were of substaunce: Then they shewed vnto the rulers of the towne, that they would set it on fyze, except they would geue vnto them a certayne some of money. Foz the which the rulers, after conference had among themselues, agreed to geue the English Capitaines, xl.thousand Mottons and.lx.pearles valued at ten thousande Mottons, the which fiftie thousand Mottons amounted neere vnto.xij. thousand and fiue hundzed pounde sterling.

The king of Englande in all this time made his pzouision foz his voyage into Fraunce, suche and so great as had not beene sene befoze: Foz he had sent into Almain to al the Lozdes of the Empire that serued him befoze, and they came at their daye appointed vnto Calice, and there came a great number mo then were required, foz they came of themselues, vpon hope and gayne of the spoyle of Fraunce, and they taried foz the king, from the beginning of August vntill October following. And to saye truth, they taried so long, that by reason victuals waxed skant and dere there were many of them that were fayne to sell the best Jewels they had. 1359 34

Then the king of Englande sent otley befoze the Duke of Lancaster with foure hundzed speares and two thousande Archers. And when the Duke came to Calice, the Lozdes that were straungers made great ioy and were glad of him, and demaunded tydinges of the kinges comming. The Duke excused the king and sayde that all his pzouision was not full readye: and he sayde vnto them, gentle lozdes to tarie here is to no purpose, I will ryde fozth into Fraunce and see what we can finde there, and I pzay you to ryde fozth with me, and I will delyuer you a certaine some of money to pay your costes in your lodgings, and ye shall haue furniture of victuall to carie with you. And the Lozdes graunted the Duke, and so roade foozth and passed by Saint Omers, they were a two thousande speares, beside Archers and other footemen, and at the last came to Mount Eloy a good Abbey and a riche neere to Arras, and there taried foure dayes to refreshe them and their hozses. From thence they went to Cambzey and there made a great assault, but they within defended themselues valiauntly by the ayde and comfort of the Erle of Saint Paule. And when the Englishmen sawe that nothing was there to be had, they departed and went ouer the ryuer of Some, and came to a Towne called Theresey, where they founde great plentie of Bread and Wyne. And here the Duke had knowledge that the king was arryued at Calice, who had sent him wozde that he and all his companie should come back agayne to him. And then the Duke and his companie returned toward Calice & met with the king by the way, within foure leagues of Calice. And with the king were a great company of Lozdes both straungers and other, whose names I ouerpasse. And when the king and the Duke and all their companie were met, the company was so great, that all the Countrie was couered with them. And there the Almaynes, Mercenaries, Brabanters, Behennoys, they altogether shewed vnto the king how they

they had ſpent all their goodes, horſes and harneſſes ſolde. So that little or nothing was left them to doe him ſeruice, for which purpoſe they came: neyther had they wherwith to beare their charges home agayne into their countries, wherefore they deſyred his nobleneſſe to haue ſome conſideration of them. The king aunſwered and ſayd, how he was not as then readie to geue them a playne aunſwere: But ſayde, Sirs, I thinke ye be ſore trauayled, wherefore go your wayes and refreſhe you two or three dayes in Calice, and this night or to morow I will take counſayle and ſend you ſuch an aunſwere that of reaſon ye will be content withall.

King Edwarde diſchargeth ſome of thoſe that came vnſent for.

Then theſe ſtraungers departed from the king and from the Duke, and roade towarde Calice, and they had not ryd halfe a league, but they met a great multitude of cariages. And after them came the Prince of Wales, nobly and richely beſene and all his company: whereof there were ſuch a number, that all the Countrey was couered with them. And the Prince roade a ſoft pace readie raunged in battaile, as though they ſhould incontinent haue fought. Thus the prince roade euer a league or two after the kinges hoſte, and euer the cariages went betweene both the hoſtes, the which order the ſtraungers lyked meruelouſly well.

When theſe ſtraungers had well beheld this company, and had reuerently ſaluted the prince and ſuche Lordes as were with him, and the prince louingly receaued them, as he could doe it right well. Then in taking their leaue of him, they ſhewed him their neceſſitie, deſyring him to conſyder of them, and he promiſed them ſo to doe.

So the ſtraungers roade on vntill they came to Calice, and the ſecond day after the king ſent them their aunſwere by three worthy knights, which was that the king had not brought ſufficient treaſure with him to pay all that they deſyred, and alſo to perfourme the enterprice that he hath taken in hand: But if they would go forth with him, and to take ſuch fortune as ſhall happen, good or euill, they to haue their parte: So that they demaunded no wages, neyther allowaunce for horſe nor expence, nor any dammage that they may happen to haue: For ſayd they, the king hath brought men enough out of his realme to furniſhe his enterprice.

This aunſwere pleaſed not greatly the ſtraunge Lordes, and the companye that were about them: Howbeit, they could haue none other, but yet the king of his goodneſſe gaue them a ſomme of money to bring them home. Howbeit, ſome of them went againe to the king & ſerued at their aduenture.

The order that the king toke in England before his departure

And before the king departed Englande, he tooke this order: Firſt he cauſed all the Lordes of Fraunce that were Priſoners, to be put into diuers Caſtelles, and other ſure places. And the French king was committed to the Tower of London, and his yong ſonne with him, and kept cloſe: And then placed certeine Lordes for the ſafe keping & good gouernment of the realme.

The maner and order of the kinges battaile.

But to returne, the kyng paſſed forward, hauing his Conſtable the Erle of Marche before him, which had in his battaile fiue hundreth knightes, and a thouſand Archers.

Then folowed the king, who had in his battaile three thouſand men of armes, and fiue thouſand Archers, well trimmed, and in good order.

Then came all the cariages, the which contayned two leagues in length, and they caryed with them, hande Milles, Ouens to bake in, and forges forges for Iron, and other neceſſaryes.

Then followed the Pzinces battaile and of his bzethzen, wherein were a thouſand ſpeares nobly horſſed, and richely beſene in order, ready to fight,

And in the end of the Kinges battaile, there were. v.C. Uerlettes wyth Mattockes and Arcs, to make euen the wayes for the caryages to paſſe.

The king thus paſſed forward into Fraunce with his armie, and at the laſt came to Reynes, where he layde ſiege ſeuen weekes, but could not pzeuaile, and ſo paſſed to Paris, and from thence to Charters, fore ſpoylyng, bzennyng, and deſtroiyng the Countrie as he went, & likewiſe did the pzince his ſonne with his battaile. So that the Countrie of Fraunce was ſo greatly waſted, ſpoyled and decayed, that they were glad to ſeeke for peace. And at the laſt by the ſpeciall labour of a Frier called Symond of Langres, and was alſo a Legate from the Pope, a day of entreatie was appoynted, and a place of metyng for the ſame.

Reynes beſieged.

Symond of Langres a Fryer.

And at the ſayde day and place, there came for the king of England, the Duke of Lancaſter, the Erles of Warwike, and of Northhampton, with ſir John Chandos, ſir Gualter of Mainy, and ſir William Cheyney knightes.

An intreatie and communication for a peace, but it tooke none effect.

And for the Regent of Fraunce appeared there, the Lorde Fewe Conſtable of Fraunce, the Lord Bociquant then Marſhall of Fraunce, the Lord of Saranciers, the Lord Uigney of the Countrie of Uienne, ſir Symond Buey, ſir Guichard of Anglie knightes, the which treatie came to none effect.

And there came vnto the king to a place called Bones, the Biſhop of Beauuays then Chaunceloz of Normandy, with other, and ſo behaued themſelues vnto the king, that a newe day of treatie was appoynted to be holden at Bzetynguy within a Myle of Charters, vpon the firſt day of May then nert enſuyng.

At which day of appoyntment, the afozeſayde Duke of Lancaſter, with the ſayd Erles of Warwike, and Northhampton, and other, appeared at the the ſame place for king Edward.

And for the Regent there appered the afozenamed Biſhop with many other Lozdes and knightes, and Spirituall men, to the number of. xxij. perſonnes, whoſe names Iouerpaſſe for length of tyme.

A peace concluded.

Theſe perſonnes applied them ſo diligently, that within the ſpace of. viij dayes they agreed vpon an vnitie and peace, the which was compziſed in. xlj. articles, the effect whereof hereafter follow.

The ſome and effect of the articles conteyned in the peace.

¶ Firſt the king of England and his heyzes kings, with all the landes that he then had in Gaſcoyne, and Guyan, ſhould haue to him and to his heyzes for euer, the Citie and Caſtell of Poytiers with all the appurtenaunces to that Lordſhip belongyng. Alſo the Citie of Limoges, with all the landes of Limoſyn, and all other their appurtenaunces. The Citie and Caſtell of Pirigozt, with all the landes and reuenewes to the ſame Lozdeſhip belongyng. The Erledome of Bygozt, with all that therevnto belongeth, the Erledome of Poytiau, with all the appurtenaunces: the Seigniozy of Beluyle, the Lozdeſhip of Eranctes, Eranchour and Erancon, the Cities of Agen, Agenoys, and of Caours, and Lozdeſhippe of Caourſyn. The Cities of Tharbe, of Gaure, Angoleſme, of Rodes, and of Rauerne. The Lozdſhip of Mounſtrell, with all the reuenewes therevnto belongyng. The ſeigniozy of Calice, Marguiſe, of Sandgate & Coligne. The Lozdſhip of Hammes, of Wales and of Duy. The Erledome of Guynes, with all the profites therunto belongyng. All which Lordshippes, honoures, Castelles, Towres, Cities, and Townes, king Edward the thirde and his heyres should haue and holde for euermore, in as royall wyse and like maner as haue done the kings of Fraunce, without doyng for them any homage, fealtie, or other duetie.

The king here agreeth to refuse the name of the French king and no more to call himselfe by that name.

2 And the sayd king Edward after that day, for him and his heyres kinges of England, should cleerely renounce and geue ouer all his title, right, and interest that he had vnto the Crowne of Fraunce, and spetially the name of the king of Fraunce.

3 Also all his right that he had to the Duchie of Normandie, of Thoraine, of Aniow, of Britaine, and of the souereintie of the Erledome of Flaundres, and of all other Lordships, Cities, Castels, honours, Townes or Towres, that anye king of Englande before that day had any right vnto within the realme of Fraunce: and to holde him content with the abouenamed Lordeshippes, without any further claime.

The raunsome which the French king payde was .v. hundreth thousande pounde.

4 Furthermore it was agreed that the Frenche king shoulde pay for hys raunsome three Millions of Scutes of Golde, whereof two should alwaye make a noble Englishe, the which do come vnto sterlyng money, fyue hundreth thousand pound.

Of the which three Millions of Scutes, ten hundreth thousand, which is one Million, to be payed at Calice the first day of June next folowing the sayde treatie. And another Million to be payde at the sayd towne of Calice within .viij. Monethes after the French king was come to Calice. And the thirde Million, to be payde at London in two yeres and a halfe, that is to say, at Myghelmas come a yere after the agreement, foure hundreth thousande Scutes: And at Myghelmasse next after ensuyng, foure hundreth thousand Scutes: And at Easter folowyng two hundreth thousande Scutes, in full payment of the three Millions, or .xxx. C. thousand Scutes.

5 And further it was agreed that after the French king was come to Calice, he should rest him there foure Monethes: Whereof the first Moneth should be at the charge of king Edward, and the other three Monethes to be at the cost and charge of the sayd French king, and to pay for euery of the sayd three Monethes, ten thousand Royalles of Fraunce, which at that tyme were in value euery Royall .xxj. pence, and so a Monethes charge after the accoumpt of our money was .viij. C. lxxb. pound.

The charge of the French kinges diet for a moneth.

And it was also agreed, that John the French king for the tyme, nor any king of Fraunce after him should ayde or assist the Scottes against king Edward, nor against his heyres kinges of England. Neyther shall king Edward nor his heyres kinges, allie them with the Fleminges, nor ayde nor assist them agaynst the sayd king John, nor his heyres kinges of Fraunce.

6 And for the title and right of the Duchy of Britteyn, which was in question betweene the Erles of Bloys and of Mountforde, it was agreed that both the kinges beyng at Calice, the sayde parties should be called before them. And if a peace betweene them by the two kings might not be set, then the sayde kinges to assigne certaine indifferent persons to agree the sayde Erles, and they to haue halfe a yere of respite for to quiet the matter. And if the sayde persons so by the two kinges assigned, could not agree the sayde Erles by the time aforesayde: That then eyther of the sayde Erles to make the beſt prouiſion for himſelfe with the helpe of his friendes or otherwiſe, whereby they might attayne to their right and clayme of the ſayde Duchy.

7 Prouyded alwayes, that neyther of the ſayd kinges, nor anye of their ſonnes ſhall ayde or aſſiſt any of the ſayde Erles, by reaſon whereof the peace betwene them agreed might be loſed or broken. And it is alſo further prouided, that vnto whether of the ſayd two Erles the ſayd Duchy ſhall fall by ſentence of man or otherwiſe, that the homage of it ſhall alwayes be done to the Frenche king.

All which ordynances and agreements, with many mo that would aſke long leaſure to write, were ratefied and confirmed by the inſtruments and ſeales of the prince of Wales, vpon the party of king Edward for Englands partie, and by Charles Regent of Fraunce for that partie, as by their letters patents and their ſeales then ſealed appered, bearyng date that one at Louuers in Normandye the. xvj. day of May, and that other at Paris the tenth daye of the ſayde Moneth and yere.

And moreouer, eyther of the ſayd two princes, that is to ſaye Edward prince of Wales was ſworne in the preſence of. vj. French knightes vpon the Sacrament of the Aultar after the thirde Agnus was ſayde in time of a lowe Maſſe, at the foreſayde Louuers, ſong or ſayde, that he to the vttermoſt of hys power ſhoulde vpholde and keepe the aforeſayde peace in euery point, as farre as in him was. And in lyke maner was Charles then Regent of Fraunce ſworne in the preſence of. vj. Engliſh knights to performe the ſame.

After which treatie thus finiſhed and ended, king Edward with hys ſonnes and Nobles of Englande tooke ſhypping at Homflet in Normandy the twentie day of Maye, and ſayled into Englande, leauyng behinde hym the Erle of Warwike for to guyde the Engliſhmen that remayned in Guyan and other places, & to ſee that peace which was then proclaymed thorough France were kept & not broken by them, which for al that endured not long.

And in thys time of king Edwards being in Fraunce, John the French king and his ſonne, who were in the Tower of London, did at the returne of king Edward feaſt him and all his Lords in the ſayd Towre of London, and then peace was proclaymed, and the French king ſet at his libertie. Peace proclaymed.

The eyght day of the Moneth of Julie next enſuyng, the French king landed at Calice and was lodged in the Caſtell, and there taried the comming of king Edwarde. The French king goeth to Calice.

The.ix. day of October king Edward arryued at Calice, and went ſtreight vnto the Caſtell to viſite king John, which welcommed him with a louing and friendly countenaunce, and when the king ſhould departe to his lodging into the towne, the French king required him, that he with hys ſonnes would dyne with him the morow folowyng, which the king graunted. At which dynner the king was firſt ſet and kept the eſtate, and then ſecondarily the French king ſate: Thirdely the prince of Wales, and fourthly the Duke of Lancaſter, and no mo at that table. In the time of which dynner came to the Caſtle the Erle of Flaundyrs, whome the French king welcomed in moſt louing maner. King Edward arryueth at Calice.

And when the ſayde dyner with all honor was ended, two of the kings ſonnes of England, and two of the French kinges ſonnes, tooke leaue of their fathers, and roade toward Boleyne, where at that time the Regent of Fraunce was. The which met them in the mid waye betweene Calice and Boleyne, and so conueyghed them vnto Boleyn, and rested there with them that night. And vpon the morow the Regent himselfe came to Calice to hys father, and after his father and he came both to the kinges palace to dyner, whome king Edward receaued with much ioye and honour, and made vnto them a sumptuous feast.

Fraunce

And after two dayes, the Regent departed from Calice, and returned vnto Boleyne, and the two sonnes of king Edward returned from Boleyne to Calice.

The. xxiiij. day of October next followyng, both the kinges beyng in two trauerses, and in one Chapel at Calice, a Masse was sayde before them, to the offering of which Masse neither of them came. But when the Pace was borne first to the French king, and then to king Edward, and eyther of them refused to kisse it first: The French king roase vp and came toward king Edward: wherof he beyng aware, roase vp and met with him, and refused the Pace, and eyther killed other. At the which masse, eyther of them was solemply sworne to maintaine the articles of the sayde peace. And for more assuraunce of the same, many Lordes vpon both parties were also sworne, to maintaine the same to their powers.

The cause that the French king thus soiourned at Calice, as before it was agreed, was for the discharge of the first paymem of his raunsome, and also for the deliuerie of certaine townes which yet the Englishmen had not in possession.

The next day after the takyng of the aforesayd othe by the two kinges, that was the. xxb. day of October, the French king was freely deliuered, and then he departed from Calice, and roade toward Boleyn: Whome king Edward conueyed a myle vpon his way, at which myles ende they departed with killing, and other louing maner: And Prince Edward kept on his way with the French king, and so conueyed him to Boleyn, where he tarryed that night. And vpon the morow the sayde Prince Edward, and Charles Duke of Normandie, with the Erle of Estampes and other noble men there then beyng present, were againe sworne to mainteyne and holde the sayde peace, without fraud, colour, or deceyt. And that done, the sayde Prince takyng his leaue, returned that night to Calice. And so it may appeare vnto you that king John stood as prisoner by the space of foure yeres, and more. And after king Edwarde had dispatched all his businesse at Calice, he returned into England. But before the king came from Calice, he sent into England such hostages as the French king had left for the performance of ỹ Articles conteined in the last peace, and the names of the hostages were these, as folowe.

Philip Duke of Orleaunce sometyme son to king Philip of Fraunce, and also his two Nephewes.
The Duke of Aniowe.
The Duke of Berry.
The Duke of Burbon.
The Erle of Alanson.
The Lorde John of Stampes.
Guy of Bloys Erle of that Countie.
Lewes of Bloys his brother.
The Erle of Saint Paule.
The Erle of Harecourt.
The Erle Daulphyn of Auergne.
Sir Ingram Lorde Cowcy.
The Erle of Porceu.
The Erle of Breme.
The Lorde Womorency.
The Lorde Roye.

The

The Lorde of Peaur.
The Lorde of Stoutuyle.
The Lorde of Clerettes.
The Lorde of Swenaunt.
The Lorde of Towze.
The Lorde of Auergne, and diuers other Lordes and knightes: Beſydes theſe there were two or thze of the beſt Citizens of euery of the beſt Cities of Fraunce.

And all theſe the king ſent ouer, and commiſſions alſo that they ſhould be well vſed and intreated, the which was well obſerued: for they paſſed their tyme in the Citie of London, and about where they woulde, euen as they would themſelus. And ſhortly after king Edward returned into Englande.

And in this yere the Lady Elizabeth daughter to the Erle of Glouceſter reedefied Vniuerſitie Hall in Cambridge, which had beene conſumed wyth fyze, and named it Clare hall. Clare hall in Cambridge.

Sone after the returne of the Frenche king into Fraunce, there were generally throughout all Fraunce, ſundrie companies went together robbyng and ſpoylyng the Countrie, and they were called the Companions. And the number of them ſo encreaſed, that they could be none otherwiſe ſubdued, but by a ſtrong army: But they ſo preuayled againſt the french kings power and did ſo much miſchiefe in Fraunce, that it was ſayde and affirmed, that they did more harme then all the warres that Englande had with Fraunce. And truely before they were ſuppreſſed, it coſt many a man his life. The number of them as ſayth Froyſſart, at the firſt were foure thouſand, and after increaſed to ten thouſand, and ſo to. xx. thouſande, and. xxx. thouſande and mo. The occaſion of their beginnyng, as is alleged in the French Chronicle, was the warres of England, who made ſuch a ſpoyle and deſtruction in Fraunce, by bzennyng of Villages and otherwiſe, that the huſbandmen and their ſeruauntes, and other labouryng men entered into an ydleneſſe, and ſo flocked in companies: whereof ſprang theſe Companions. This company were named by the Frenchmen Companions. The cauſe of ſtealyng and pylfring is idleneſſe.

And in this yere (as ſayth Fabian) was a great dearth in England, both of men and beaſtes, duryng the which tyme the noble Duke Henry of Lancaſter dyed. And after his death Sir John of Gaunt Erle of Richemond the kinges third ſonne, which had maryed the ſayd Dukes daughter, was made Duke of that Duchie. And in this tyme John Wiclife did read the diuinitie lecture in Oxforde. 1361 / 36 Henry Duke of Lancaſter dyed.

This yere the Frenche king, bearyng great loue and fauor to king Edward and to the Queene his wife, and to their children, came into England to viſite them, and to make mery with them, and the. xxiiij. day of January, he came to Eltham, where then the king and Queene was, and there dined, and after dinner the king conueyed him moſt honourably through the Citie of London vnto the Sauoye: where he lay vntill the begynnyng of Marche nert folowyng, and then a grieuous ſickneſſe tooke him, of the which he dyed the. viij. day of Apzill next folowyng. 1363. and after was caryed into Fraũce, and was buryed at Saint Dioniſe beſyde Paris. 1362 / 37 The death of John the French king.

And this yere king Edward created Lionell his ſonne Duke of Clarence, and ſir Edmond his other ſonne, Erle of Cambridge. Lionell the kings ſecond ſonne made Duke of Clarence.

And in this yere there were three kinges that came to viſite and ſee king Edward. Firſt the king of Fraunce, the king of Cipres, & the king of Scots.

About this time king Edward helde a great counſayle in Englande for the better ordering of the realme, and ſpecially for the kinges children. 1363 / 38

For it was considered, that the prince of Wales helde a great and a noble estate (as it was right meete for him to doe) for he was valiaunt, puissaunt and riche, and had great possessions & heritage in Aquytayne, where was aboundance of al riches welth and prosperity. Wherfore it was thought most meteſt ỳ the prince did remayne in those parts, for ỳ he had sufficient in that Duchy to maintaine his estate. And also al the Barons and knights of Aquitayne did earnestly desyre to haue him among them, for the which they had made their earnest request to the king. For although Sir John Chandos was to them right curteous and friendly: yet they rather coueted to haue their awne naturall Lorde and Souereigne.

Edward the prince did homage to his father for the Duchye of Guyan.

The prince was very wylling to agree vnto this deuise, and so was the good Ladye his Wyfe, and they prepared themselues with all speede accordyng to their estates. And when euery thing was readie, they tooke their leaue of the king, and of the Quene, and of their brethren, and departed out of England, and with a prosperous winde came to Burdeaur, and shortly after tooke possession of his Duchy of Guyan, and afterward did homage to his father for the same.

Isabell daughter vnto the french king and wife vnto king Edwarde the seconde buried in the Church that now is called Christes Church with in Newgate in London.

About this time also dyed the Lady Isabell the kinges mother, which was wyfe to king Edward the second, and daughter vnto Philip le Beau, sometime French king. And she was buried in London, at the Frier Minors, commonly called the Gray Fryers (which nowe is a parishe Church and is called Christes Church) right nobly and honourably, with all the prelates and Barons of Englande, and all the Lordes of Fraunce that then lay here as hostages.

A complaint made of the Lawyers for pleadyng in french.

It were a good order, that all the Lawe were in Latyne.

In this time, or a little before, a great and greuous complaynt was made by the Lordes and commons of Englande to the king, that the realme sustayned many mischiefes and inconueniences, for that the Lawyers pleaded all their plees in lawe in French, and not in English: wherefore it was ordeyned and enacted by parliament that from thencefoorth all plees, which are to be pleded in any of the kinges Courtes, before any of his iustices, or in any other his Courts, or before any his other ministers, or in the Courts and places of any other Lordes within the Realme, shalbe pleaded, sued, and defended, aunswered, debated and iudged in the Englishe tongue, and that the same be entred and enrolled in Latyn.

Charles the french kings sonne crowned king of Fraunce.

This yere on Trinitie Sunday Charles sonne and heyre to John the French king, was crowned king of Fraunce in the Citie of Reyns, with great pompe and solempnitie, and so was the Queene his wyfe daughter to Peter Duke of Burbone.

And as Fabian sayth, in this yere, because vpon S. Stephyns day the king finished and ended all his warres with Fraunce, he therefore in the worshyp of S. Stephyn began the foundation of S. Stephyns Chapell at Westminster, and Richard the second sonne of Prince Edwarde, called the black prince, fynished the same.

Edward the first sonne of Prince Edward.

In this yere was borne Edward, the first sonne of Prince Edward, the which died when he was about eyght yeres of age.

And about this time one Barthram de Claicon a Norman with an army of Frenchmen entered the lande of Castile, and warred vpon Peter, then king of that lande, and so behaued him, that in lesse then foure Moneths, he chased

chaled the sayde Peter out of his awne lande, and crowned his brother named Henrye king of Castile, at a Towne called Burges vpon Easter daye: wherefore the sayde Peter constreyned by necessitie, was compelled to come to Burdeaux to craue ayde of Prince Edward.

This Peter was rightfull heyre vnto the Crowne of Castile, and Henry his brother (as most writers affirme) was a bastard. But this Peter was of so vile conditions, that his subiectes fauoured him not. And so thys warre continued a season betweene his brother and him, in the which the Prince with his Archers tooke partie with this Peter, and the French king with speares tooke party with Henry.

The king forbiddeth Peter pence to be gathered.

And in this time King Edwarde forbade that any money, commonly called Peter pence, should eyther be gathered or payde to Rome.

In this yere also prince Edward had his second sonne borne at Burdeaux, whose name was Richard, and was afterwarde king, by the name of Richarde the second.

Richard the second sonne of prince Edward borne at Burdeaux

This yere at the importunitie, sute and great entreatie of Done Peter king of Spaine, Edwarde prince of Wales went with him into Spayne with a strong power, and the Prince ouercame the Spaniards and Frenchmen in a strong battayle, where the number of them were foure to one of the princes power, and the prince restored king Peter to his former estate as king of Spaine. But not long after the princes returnyng home agayne to Burdeaux, the aforesayde Henry so repayred his army and gaue a new onset, that in the ende he vtterly vanquished Peter and put him to death, and then reigned himselfe quietly. I am the shorter herein because this properly doth not touch the warres and affayres of Englande, which is the chiefe thing that I purpose in this Collection.

Prince Edward goeth into Spaine and restoreth king Peter to his former estate.

Prince Edward after his comming out of Spayne where he had spent a great some of money, and yet a number of the Souldyours that went out with him, whome king Peter promised to pay, came home agayne vnpayde and lyngered and still hanged vpon the prince, wherefore he to rayse a masse or great some of money, deuysed to set great taxes and impositions vpon the people of Aquitayne: which thing the Erle of Arminack, of Bret, of Berygorte, and other noble men would not in any wise consent vnto, but appealed to the French king for remedy, and in such wise perswaded him, that he contrary to the league and peace lately made, sommoned the prince to appeare at Paris: By meane whereof the peace was broken, and open warre agayne proclayned betweene both princes to the great mortalitie and desolation of people on both parties, but the most losse and dammage fell alwayes to the king of England. In so much that in the ende, he lost the more parte of the lands which were graunted him by the composition and agreement of peace. And nowe fortune, which pleasauntly had smiled vpon king Edwarde the space of .xl. yeres, in hys latter dayes frowardlye frowned and chaunged her Copie.

The reysing of a taxe or masse of money was the losse of all Aquitaine.

warre againe proclaymed vp Fraunce.

This yere in the moneth of May the Frenche king in his high court of parliament holden at Paris proceeded in iudgement vpon the appellations before made by the Erle of Arminack, the Lorde of Bret, and Erle of Berygort, agaynst prince Edward: whereupon discord and variaunce began to take place betwene the two kings, insomuch, that by meane of the sayd three Lordes (notwithstanding that they were before sworne to be to the king of Englande true liege men) diuers townes of the Countrie of Poyteau yelded them to the french king, as Aubeuyle, Rue and the more parte of the townes of the sayde Countrie.

Wherevpon Ambassadours were sent vppon both partes, and diuers meanes of intreatie were commoned of, but in the ende, it came all to none effect. Thus the peace which before was so substantially made & with great solempnity and circumstaunces established, was now vtterly violate and broken, and eyther king for his parte made prouision for warre.

Charles the French king went to Roan in Normandie and there in the moneth of July rigged his ships, & set them forward to war vpon England.

The Duke of Lancaster landeth in Normandy.

And while king Charles was occupied in Normandie, the Duke of Lancaster landed at Calice with a strong companie of Archers, and other warriours, and from thence passed to Thorouenne, and so to Ayze, in wasting and spoylyng the Countrie with yron and fyre as he went. Wherefore the French king in the defence of those partes sent foorth the Duke of Burgoyn with a puyssant armie to withstand the sayd Duke of Lancaster. The which Duke of Burgoyn sped him in such wise, that aboute the. xxiiij. day of August he lodged his host vpon the Hill of Turneham, nere vnto Arde. And the Englishe hoste was lodged betwene Gygowne, and Arde, so that the fronts of both the hostes were within a myle: Betwene whome were dayly skirmishes and small bickerynges: And when the sayd Duke of Burgoyn had kept the foresayde hill, from the. xxiiij. day of August, vnto the. xij. day of September folowyng, he remoued his host, and went to Hesden: For the which deede, he was after blamed of his brother.

After which departure of the Frenchmen, the Duke of Lancaster with his host tooke the way towarde Caux, and passed the ryuer of Some, and so roade toward Harflew, entendyng to haue fyred the French kinges nauye: But at their commyng thether, the towne was so strongly manned, that they did but little hurt. Wherefore the sayde Duke departed shortly thence, and sped him into the Country of Poiteau, & so came vnto the towne of Aubeuile. Where the Frenche men encountered him and gaue him battaile. In the which was taken Sir Hugh Chatellon knight, with other knightes, Esquiers, and Burgesses of the towne, and there were slaine of the Frenchmen mo then three hundreth, and they had taken prisoners to the number of. xlv. which they sent to Calice. And then the Duke with his companie went to Burdeaux, and brent and spoyled the Countrey as he went.

And in this time dyed at Calice the Erle of Warwike, after that he was returned from the Duke of Lancaster, which was a noble and valiant man.

The death of the Noble Quene Philip daughter of the Erle of Heynault, and wife vnto king Edwarde the thirde.

And in the moneth of August folowyng, dyed that noble woman Quene Philip, wife of king Edward the thirde, the which was a great benefactor vnto the Chanons of Saint Stephens at Westmynster. And sone after died Dame Blaunche, sometime the wife of Henry Duke of Lancaster, and was buried at Paules vpon the Northside of the high Aultare by her husbande. Where she ordeyned for him and her (as sayth Fabian) foure Chauntreyes for euer, and an Anniuersary perely to be kept: At the which beside other great thinges appointed to the Deane and Chanons of the Church: Shee ordeyned that the Maior of London beyng present at the Masse, should offer a penny, a penny, and take by.xx. shillynges. The Shirifes eyther of them a penny, and to receyue eyther of them a Marke. The Chamberleyn of the Citie ten shillinges, the Swoorde bearer, by.shillinges. viij. pence, and euery officer of the Maiors beyng there present. xxij. pence, and to. viij. officers of the Shirifes eyther of them. viij. pence: But this obite is not nowe kept, for the landes are gone, as I thinke.

This yere also the King helde his Parliament at Westminster. In the which was graunted vnto him three fiftenes to be payed in three yeres folowyng. And by the Clergie was graunted vnto him three Dismes to be payd in lyke maner. A parliamẽt holden at westminster.

And in this yere was a thirde mortalitie or death of men: and likewise a marueylous moreyn vpon Cattell, so that the like had not bene sene in many yeres before. And then fell merueylous aboundaunce of raine, so that the corne was drowned in ꝑ earth, by reason whereof, the next yere after wheate was solde for three shillinges foure pence the Bushell. A third mortalitie of men and beastes.

And in the ende of the Moneth of July, Sir Robert Knolles beyng accompanied with diuers noble men and souldiours, entered Saint Omers. And when they had done their pleasures there, and in the Countrie rounde about, then they road vnto Arras, in wastyng and spoylyng all the Countrie as they went. And when they had brent the Bulwarkes of the sayde towne of Arras, they passed by Noyen, and Vermendoys, and brent the houses of all suche as would not to them geue due raunsome. And thus holdyng their way, they passed the ryuers of Oyse, and of Syze, and so came vnto the Citie of Reynes, and passed there the ryuer, and road toward Troys, and passed the riuers of Aube, and of Seyne, and so helde their way toward Saint Florentyne, and there passed the ryuer of Jon, in holdyng their course towarde Joigny, and so to Corbeuile, and Esson. And the. xrij. of September they lodged themselues vpon the Mount Saint Albon, and in the Countrie there about. And within two dayes folowyng, they embattayled themselues in a fielde, betweene the townes of Jumy, and Paris. In all which tyme, they passed without battaile through all the Countries aforesayde, in spoylyng and brennyng the townes, and in raunsomyng of the Inhabitantes thereof, without resistence or impediment. And albeit that in the Citie of Paris at that day were two hundreth men of armes waged by the French king, beside the Souldiours and strength of the Citizens of that Citie: Yet the sayd hoste of Englishemen lay, as before is sayde, embattelled vntill it was past noone of the aforesayd day. At which tyme, forsomuch as they were credibly enformed, that they should there haue no battaile, they brake vp their fielde, and went to a place or towne called Antoygnye, and there lodged that night, and vpon the next day, they tooke their iourney toward Normandie. But after foure dayes labour, they turned to Estamps, in pillyng and dammagyng the Countrie as before they had done, and so went forth vntill they came to the Eriedome of Angeou, where they wanne by strength the townes of Vaas, and Ruylly, with other strong holdes thereaboutes. Sir Robert Knolles with a great power taketh his iourney into Fraunce

But then it came infortunately to passe, for it so chaunced that the Lorde Fitzwater, and the Lorde Grauntson fell at a variaunce with Sir Robert Knolles and his companie, which encreased to such hatred and displeasure, that Sir Robert Knolles with the flower of the Archers and Souldiours Variance betweene the Lord Grantson and Sir Robert Knolles.

departed from the sayde two Lordes, leauyng them in the aforesayd townes of Uaas and Ruyllye, and then he went into Bziteyn.

When the French king heard the certentie hereof, anone he commaunded sir Barthzam de Glaycon, who was newly made Marshall of Fraunce, with a strong armie to enter the sayde Countrie of Angeou, and to make sharpe warre vpon the sayde Englishmen. The which vpon the. xij. day of October folowing, layd siege to the sayd towne of Uaas, and out of the same issued the sayd lordes of Fitzwater and Graunison, and gaue vnto the Marshall battaile: But in the ende the Englishe men were discomfited, so that of them were slaine. vj. hundzeth, and the rest put to flight. And there was taken the Lorde Graunison with other.

The Lorde Graunison taken.

And after this victozy the French men went vnto the towne of Uaas, and wanne it by assault, where also were slaine three hundzeth English men, and many taken pzisoners, and the other put to flight.

And after this Sir Barthzam pursued the Englishmen that were fled to a towne called Uersure: where in the assaultyng of the sayde Towne he slue and toke pzisoners foure hundzeth Englishmen. And thus by strife and dissension among themselues, those that before by amitie & good accozd were victozs, now by hatred and discozd, were slayne and taken pzisoners.

Losse vpon losse.

Now the king of Englande considering with himselfe of the great and daylie losses that he sustayned, and howe the Frenchmen continually gate and wanne from him in all partes in Fraunce, but chiefely the Countie of Poyteau, wherevpon he had spent a marueilous treasure in the fortefyeng and strengthning of the same, ouer and aboue the yerely reuennes thereof, and also did now well perceaue that he should haue warre on all parties, and also at this time it was shewed him that he should haue war wyth Scotland because the Scottes were newly allyed with the French king. Wherefore he was sore vexed and troubled, for he feared more the warre of the Scottes then the warre of the Frenchmen: And therefore with all speede he sent men of warre to the Frontiers of Scotlande, as to Barwike, Rokesborough, Newe Castell, Durcham, and into other places about the Frontiers. Also he sent a great Naule to the Sea, about Hampton, Gerneseye and the Isle of Wight, for it was shewed him howe that the French king had furnished and set foozth a great Naule to go to the Sea, and to lande in Englande, so that he wist not well on which parte he should first take heede.

The Scots rebell.

At thys time the Archebishop of Winchester (as Fabian calleth him) then being Cardinall, and was present at Auignion with Pope Gregozy the xj. of that name, was put in commission with the Archbishop of Beaunays, to make oz treate a peace and vnitie betweene the two Realmes of Englande and Fraunce. Which sayde Cardinall of Winchester, after his departure from the Pope, came downe toward Melune, where by the Cardynall of Beaunays he was honourably met and conueyed into the Citie of Melune. And when he had arested him there foure dayes, the two Cardinalles meetyng together went to Parys, where they had communication with the French king touching the peace. And after that they had vnderstande hys pleasure, the Cardinall of England tooke his leaue and departed to Calice, where he tooke shippyng, and so came into Englande, and shewed vnto the king of Englande the Popes pleasure, and the French kinges aunswere.

And

And in this time was sore warre in Guyan, and many townes gotten and yelded to the Frenchemen, and still the Englishmen had the worse, and many of them slayne and taken prisoners, for in a verie shorte time the Citie of Lymoges, and all the countrie of Lymosyn was vnder the obeysaunce of the French king. And the occasion of this losse as sayth sundrie authoures, was for that prince Edward a little before had reysed a great taxe vpon the inhabitauntes of that Countrie, whereby he lost all their hearts.

The reysing of taskes remoueth the hartes of the people from the prince.

When the french king had this obteyned the rule of the Countrie of Lymosyn, he immediatly after sent syr Berthram de Glaicon into the Erledome of Poyteau, and wanne there many townes and Castelles, and lastly layde his siege to Rochell.

In this yere king Edward kept his high Court of parliament at Westmynster, in the which toward the furniture and ayde of his warres he demaunded of the spiritualtie fiftie thousand pounde, and as much of the laye fee. The which by the Temporaltie was graunted, but the Clergie kept them of with pleasaunt aunswers: So that the king and his counsayle was with them discontented, in so much that to their displeasures, dyuerse officers, as the Chauncelour, the priuie seale, the Treasorer and other officers who then were possessed by spirituall men, were taken from them, and temporall Lordes set in their places.

The clergie refuse to ayde the king.

And shortly after, the aforesayde Cardynall of Beauuays came into Englande, to treate of the peace betweene the two realmes, but all his labour tooke none effect.

In the Month of Julie, the french king sent into the Country of Poyteau the aforenamed Sir Barthram de Claycon with a strong army, where he wanne dyuers holdes and fortresses from the Englishmen.

In the which time king Edward for strengthening of the countrie, and specially to defende the towne of Rochell, which as aboue in the other yere is shewed, was this yere besieged by the sayd Sir Barthram, sent the Erle of Pembrooke, with other noble men to fortefie the sayde towne, and to remoue the siege. But before he could come at that towne, he was encountred on the sea with a Fleete of Spanyards, the which king Henry of Castile had sent into Fraunce, to strength the french kings partie. By the which Fleete after long and cruell fight, the sayde Erle was taken, with syr Guychard de Angle and other to the number of. Clx. prisoners and the more parte of hys men slayne and drowned, with the losse of many good shippes.

The Erle of Pembrooke sent into Fraunce with a great power.

The Erle of Pembrooke taken by the Spanyards.

Also in the begynning of September next folowyng a Gascoyne borne, a man of good fame, whom the king of England had admytted for his Lieutenaunt and Gouernour of the countrie of Poyteau, named le Captall de Bueff, fought with an army of Frenchmen before a towne named Sonbise, where in conclusion his men were slaine and chased, and he with lxx. of his parte taken prisoners.

Then the Dukes of Berrey and Burgoyne vpon the. vj. daye of September came before Rochell, and had certaine communications with the rulers of the sayde towne for the deliuerie thereof.

King Edward nowe heryng of the taking of the Erle of Pembrooke, and of the losse that he daylie had of his men in dyuers partes of Fraunce, with also the ieopardie that the towne of Rochell and other stoode in, made

hastie

haſtie prouiſion and entended to haue paſſed the ſea: But the winde was ſo contrarious that he could haue no paſſage, wherfore ſaith Reynulph Monke of Cheſter, he returned agayne into Englande.

Rochell is yelden to the French men.

The. viij. daye of September folowyng the Captaine of Rochell hauing no comfort to haue any quick reſkues, yeelded vpon certaine appoyntments the ſayd towne vnto the aforenamed Dukes, to the vſe of the French king. And ſhortly after were alſo yeelden vnto them the Townes of Angoleſme, of Erantes, of Saint John the Angely with dyuers other.

This yere alſo Sir John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaſter, and Sir Edmond his brother Erle of Cambridge, wedded the two daughters of Peter which was late king of Caſtile, who was put to death by Henry his baſtard brother, as before is ſhewed in the. xlj. yere of this kinges reigne. Of the which two daughters, Sir John of Gaunt maryed the eldeſt, named Conſtance, and his brother, the ponger named Iſabell, ſo that by theſe mariages, theſe two brethren clayned to be enheritours of the kingdome of Caſtyle, or Spayne.

Alſo this yere, After the Duke of Britteyne had receyued many exhortations and requeſtes from the French king, to haue him vpon his partie: he ſent for certeyne Souldiours of Engliſh men, and fortefied with them ſome of his Caſtels and holdes. Of the which when king Charles heard, he ſent thether with a ſtrong power the aforenamed Sir Berthram de Clayton, warning them to make war vpon them as enemies to the houſe of Fraunce. The which accordyng to their commiſſion entered the lande of Briteyne, in waſtyng the ſame with yron and fyre, and in a little time there was yelden to him the moſt part of the chiefe townes, except Breſt, Aulroy, and Daruall.

Breſt in Britteyn beſieged.

And in the ende of June, the ſayd Barthram layde ſiege vnto Breſt, and the Lorde of Craon with other, lay before Daruall. And in all this tyme the Duke of Britein was in England: for ſo ſoone as he had beſtowed the aforeſaid Engliſh ſouldiors, he ſailed into England to ſpeake with king Edward.

The Duke of Lancaſter with a great power lādeth at Calice.

And in the moneth of July, the Duke of Lancaſter with Sir John de Mountford Duke of Briteyne and other, with a great power landed at Calice. And after they had reſted them there a fewe dayes, they road vnto Yeſden, and lodged them within the Parke another ſeaſon. And after paſſed by Dourlons, by Benqueſne, and ſo vnto Corby, where they paſſed the Ryuer of Some, and road vnto Roye in Vermendoys, where they abode the ſpace of. viij. dayes. And then they ſet the towne on fyre, and tooke their way toward Lamoys, and burned and ſpoyled the Countrie as they went. And in proceſſe of tyme, paſſed the ryuers of Oiſne, Marne, and of Aube, and roade through Champaigne, and by the Erledome of Brame, ſtreight vnto Guy, and paſſed the ryuer of Seyn, and ſo toward the riuer of Leyr, & vnto Marcigny the Nonnery. And when they were paſſed the ſayde Nonnery, they kept their way toward the ryuer of Ancherre, and ſo vnto Burdeaux. In all which iourney they paſſed without battaile.

In this tyme dyed at Burdeaux Edward the eldeſt ſonne of Prince Edward, to the great griefe and ſorowe both of the Prince his father, and of the good Ladie his mother. And ſoone after the death of his ſonne, he himſelfe beyng very ſickly, was aduiſed and counſayled, that he ſhould returne into England, and the rather that he might obteyne his health. The Prince did agree agree therevnto right gladly, and therevpon made his prouision. And when the Prince should depart from Acquitaine, he first caused a speciall summons to be made at Burdeaux, of all Barons and knightes of Gascoyn, and Poyteau, and in all other places where he was Lorde, and they vnder his obeysance. And when they were all come together in a Chamber before the prince: Then he spake vnto them and sayd, it is well knowen to you all, that I am your true and the right Lorde and inheritour of your countrie, and how that I haue gouerned, and kept you in peace asmuch as in my power hath lyen. I haue bene so faythful a Protector ouer you, that I haue not spared neither the aduenture of my life against your enemyes and mine, neyther the expences of my treasure, for your defence: and God be praysed, though now ye are a little afflicted, yet hetherto ye haue bene mainteyned in great wealth and puyssaunce agaynst your enemies. And nowe at this tyme, I beyng vexed with a great and grieuous sickneſſe, am counsayled by my Phisitions and other, that for the better recouery of my health, I should returne into England to my naturall Countrie, which God willyng I purpose shortly to do. And therefore I most hartely beseech you, euen as earnestly as a Prince may requyre his subiectes, that ye will beelde in mine absence, to my dere and naturall brother here present, the Duke of Lancaster, whome I leaue here as my Lieutenant to gouerne you, the same honour, reuerence, and obeysaunce, and faythfulneſſe of heart, that ye beare or should beare vnto me: and doubt you nothing but that ye shall finde him a right good Lorde, valiaunt and curteous, and therefore I beseeche you to ayde and assist him in all his affayres and attemptes, with your good aduice and counsaile.

And foorthwith the Barons of Aquitaine, Gascoyne, Poyteau, and of Raynton promised, and sware on their faythes, that there should neuer be default found in any of them. And therevpon immediately they did their fealtie and homage to the Duke of Lancaster, and promysed him their loues, seruices and obeysaunce, and in the presence of the Prince they sware to vpholde and keepe the same, and therevpon kissed his mouth.

The Prince returneth with his wife into England to king Edward his father.

And when this was ended, within short tyme after, the Prince and princes his wife, with their yong sonne Richard, accompanied with the Erle of Cambridge, and the Erle of Pembroke, and with them. v. C. fightyng men beside Archers entered into their Shippes, and so long sayled with a good and prosperous winde, that at the last they came vnto Southhampton, and there they tooke lande and refreshed them two dayes, and then they toke their horses, and the Prince went in a horse Litter, and at the last came to Windesore, where then the king was, who receyued right sweetly his children, & so there the king was enformed by the prince of all the state of Guien.

After the departure of the Prince from Burdeaux, the Duke of Lancaster kept the obsequy of his Cosyn Edward sonne to the Prince his brother, the which was honourably done in the Citie of Burdeaux.

An Imbassade sent frō the Pope to king Edward.

This yere (as sayth Froyssart) came into England sent from the Pope, who then was Gregorie the.xj. the Archebishop of Rauenne, and the Bishop of Carentes, for to treate of a peace betweene the two kinges of Englande and of Fraunce, the which met together at Bruges in Flaundyrs. And thether came certeine Lordes, aswell from the king of Englande, as also from the French king. And the Commissioners of the Frenche partie, after they had had ſpent a tyme in diſputations, they then prayed licence of the Legate, that they might go to Paris, and ſhewe vnto the king the offers of the Engliſhe partie, and ſo to returne with his pleaſure, wherevpon it was agreed, that a certeine ſhould ryde vnto the French king. And the Engliſhmen abode ſtiffely vpon the ſouereintie, that was that the king of Englande, and hys heyres kinges, ſhall enioy all the former landes, comprized in the peace lately made with John king of Fraunce, without homage, or other duetie for the ſame doyng. And for this the Frenche king aſſembled a counſaile at Paris, and there it was fully concluded, that the Frenche king might not geue ouer the ſouereintie.

When this report was brought to Bruges, the treatie was diſſolued without any concluſion of any thing, ſauyng that a peace was continued vntill the feaſt of all Saintes next folowyng.

This yere John Erle of Pembrooke, who before, as we haue ſhewed, was taken by the Spanyardes vpon the ſea, and now was raunſomed with the payment of a great ſomme and maſſe of money, returning into England, dyed by the way. And the Counteſſe his wife, who was diſcended of the noble houſe of the Erles of ſaint Paule in Fraunce, a woman of great vertue, and a louer of learning and learned men, founded in Cambridge a houſe for ſcholers, which at this day is called Pembrooke Hall.

An aſſembly at S. Omers and after at Bruges for a peace.

Yet once againe a newe aſſemblie was made for the treatie of a peace, to be kept at Saint Omers, but after it was kept at Bruges. Where, for king Edward appered the Duke of Lancaſter, and Sir Edmond his brother, the Erle of Cambridge, with diuers other of the kinges Counſayle: Where the ſayde Lordes with the other helde their aſſemblies, and Courtes, vntill it was nere Eaſter, to the great coſt and charge of both parties: But in the ende they departed againe without effect, ſauyng onely that the peace was prolonged vntill the firſt day of Apryll next folowyng. And yet againe by labour of the ſayd Legates the ſayde peace was further prolonged vntill Midſomer next folowyng. And in this meane tyme great laboures and paynes were taken to haue a peace concluded, but in the ende it would not be, ſome imputing the fault to the French and ſome to the Engliſhe. But in whome ſo euer the fault was, the French king in the tyme of theſe intreaties, wanne many townes and Caſtelles, aſwell in Guyan as in Bryteyne, and in other places to his great aduauntage.

The commons of Englande murmour agaynſt the rulers.

At this time there aroſe a great murmure among the people of Englande agaynſt certaine perſons that bare auctoritie about the king, as the Lorde Latymer then the kinges Chamberleyne and other: By whoſe ſiniſter counſayle as they ſayde, the king in his age was miſled, and hys treaſure miſpended, to the great diſhonor of the king, and to the great loſſe, hurt, and dammage of all the kinges ſubiects.

A parliament.

The Parliament denieth the king any further ayde.

The king being thus troubled on all ſydes with warres, called his high Court of parliament, in the which he required a ſubſidie for the defenſe of his enemies. Wherevnto it was aunſwered by the common houſe, that they could no lenger beare ſuche charges, conſideryng the manifold and moſt grieuous burdens that they had from time to time borne before. And further they ſayd, that they knew full well that the king was riche enough to defende him and his lande, if the land and his treaſure were well guyded and gouerned: But it had beene long euill ruled by euill officiers, so that the lande could not be plenteous, neyther with Chaffre, marchandise, nor riches. By reason whereof, & by their importune charges the commonaltie was greatly empouriſhed.

it

Moreouer, the sayde commons complayned them vpon diuers officers, that were the causers of this misorder, whereof the Lorde Latymer was noted for principall, with also dame Alice Piers, the which the king had long time kept for his Concubyne, and also one named Sir Richard Scury knight, by whose counsayles and sinister meanes, the king was misguyded and the gouernement of the lande disordered.

Lord Latymer is complayned vpon

Wherefore the sayde commons prayed by the mouth of their speaker, which was then Sir Piers de la mere, that the sayde persons with other might be remoued from the king, and other to be set in auctoritie about his person, as should serue for his honour and for the weale of his realme.

Which request of the commons, by the meanes of the Noble Prince Edward, was accepted, so that the sayde persons were remoued from the king, and other Lordes of the realme were put in their places.

A gift made to the king of euery poll foure pence.

And shortly after, the commons graunted the king his pleasure, so that he had of euery man and womã that were aboue the age of. xiiij. yeres, foure pence, Beggers onely except.

And by the Clergie was graunted that the king should haue of euerye beneficed man. xij. pence, and of Prieſtes not beneficed, foure pence, the foure orders of Fryers onely excepted.

But before this money was gathered, the king was fayne to borowe sundrie summes of money in diuers places: Among the which the Citie of London was sent vnto for foure thousande pounde: And for that the Maior then beyng, was not quick in the furthering of that matter, he was by the kings commaundement discharged, and another put in his place.

And vpon the eyght day of June, dyed that noble and famous prince the Flowre of Chiualrie, Edwarde the kinges eldest sonne, within the kinges palace of Westmynster, beyng of the age of. xlvij. yeres, and after with great solempnitie was conueyed to Cauntorbury, and there honorably buryed.

The death of Prince Edwarde.

After the death of the prince, the king contrarie to his promise before made, called to him agayne all suche persons as he before for his awne honour and the profite of the realme aduoyded out of his Court, and admytted them agayne to the same offices that they before occupied. By meanes of which alteration the aforesayde speaker of the parliament Sir Piers Delamere was in such wise complayned vpon to the king, that he was committed to prison, where he laye many yeres after. Fabian.

Then king Edward created Richard the sonne to prince Edward, prince of Wales, and gaue vnto him the Erledomes of Chester and Cornewall.

Richard the son of Prince Edwarde created prince of Wales.

And because the king waxed now sickly and feeble, he therefore betoke the rule of the realme vnto his sonne Sir John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster, and made him Gouernour of the lande, and so he contynued durynge hys fathers lyfe.

And this yere Sir John Wynsterwoorth knight, beyng arrayned of high treason at the Guyldhall in London, before the Lorde Maiour and other the Queenes Justices, for that he was charged to haue retayned great summes of money of the king, to haue payd his souldyours withal, and he did not

not onely kepe the sayde summes of money to his awne vse, but also fled vnto the French king, and conspired with hym agaynst his naturall prince and souereigne Lorde, of the which treason he was founde guiltie, and therefore had iudgement to be hanged, drawen, and quartered, which was executed accordyngly.

A schisme for election of two Popes.

This yere beganne a wonderfull Schisme in the Church of Rome, about the election of the Pope, for after the death of Gregory the.xi. there were chosen two Popes, the first was named Urban the.vi. and the other, Clement the.vii. The first an Italian, and the other a Frenchman. Of the which election ensued suche discorde for the terme and space of. xxxix. yeres, that much christian bloud was spent by eyther of them in the defense of their papacy, as after shall appere.

The death of king Edwarde the thirde.

Now approched the ende of king Edward the thirde, who in the beginning of his reigne was courageous but not constãt, and in the middle of his age a valiaunt and Noble Conquerour, and towarde the latter ende of hys dayes, lost that which before with great charge and trauayle he had gayned: and now yeelded himselfe to pay nature her debt, and dyed the.xxij. daye of June at his manor of Shene, now called Richemount, when he had reigned full fiftie yeres and fiue moneths, lacking foure dayes, and was of the age of.lxb. yeres: leauing behinde him foure sonnes, that is to say, Lyonell Duke of Clarence, John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster, Edmond of Langley Duke of Yorke, and Thomas of Woodstocke Erle of Cambridge. By the which sonnes and other Lordes of this realme he was most honorably conueyed from his Manour of Shene vnto the Monastery of Westmynster, and there solemply enterred within the Chapel of Saint Edward vpon the Southside.

The ſayde John Duke of Somerſet had a daughter which was called Margaret Coũteſſe of Richmond, which was mother to king Henry the.vij.

Richard the ſeconde of that name, borne in Burdeaur, a ſonne of Edward prince of Wales, who was called the blacke Prince, which was the eldeſt ſonne of king Edward the thirde, of the age of.xj. yeres, began hys reigne ouer the realme of England the.xxij. day of June. 1377. and was crowned at Weſtminſter the.xv. day of July next folowyng. In bountie and liberalitie he farre paſſed all his progenitors: But he was ouermuch geuen to reſt and quietneſſe, and loued litle dedes of armes and Martiall prowes: And for that he was yong, he was moſt ruled by yong counſayle, and regarded nothing the aduertiſement of the ſage and wiſe men of his realme. For the chiefe about him was of no wiſedome nor eſtimation, which turned his lande to great trouble, and himſelfe in the ende to extreme miſerye.

Ye haue heard before in the tyme of king Edwarde, that the peace was continued betweene Fraunce and Englande vntill Midſommer folowyng, which tyme was now expired. And the French king in the tyme of peace had made great prouiſion for warre, aſwell of Shippes and Galeys, as of men and munition, inſomuch that the king of Spaine had ſent him his admirall, called ſir Ferrand Sawſe, who with ſir John of Vien Admirall of Fraunce, ſo ſoone as the truce or peace was expired, went and brent the towne of Rye in Kent, the.xxviij. day, or.xxix. day of June, which was within fiue dayes after the death of king Edwarde.

The French men brenne the towne of Rye.

And ſhortly after newes hereof came to London: Then the Erle of Cambridge and of Buckyngham went to Douer with a great power. And the Erle of Salſburie and the Lorde Mountague went to Southampton: But in the meane time, the Frenchmen had landed in the Iſle of Wight, and had brent therein dyuers townes: And alſo they landed in the weſt partes of Englande, and brent Dartmouth, Plymmouth, Portesmouth and dyuers other townes. And then they came to Southampton, and there would haue landed, but there they founde Sir John of Arondell with a great number of men of warre, and Archers, who defended the towne right valiauntly, or elſe it had beene ſpoyled and taken. Then the frenchmen departed, and went toward Douer, and one daye they landed beſide a little Abbey, called Lyons. There were manye men of the Countrie aſſembled, and they had made the Priour of the place, and Syr Thomas Cheyny, and John Fuſtell their chiefe Captaines, and had put themſelues in good araye to defende the paſſage: So that the Frenchmen had but ſmall aduauntage there, for they loſt many of their people before they could lande: notwithſtandyng, at the laſt, by force they did lande, and there was a ſore ſkirmiſhe, and the Engliſhmen were put back, and two hundred of them ſlaine, and the two knights and the Priour were taken priſoners. Then the Frenchmen entred agayne into into their ſhippes, and lay ſtill all that night at Anker before the Abbey. And here the frenchmen knewe firſt of the death of king Edward the thirde, by the priſoners that they had taken, and of the coronation of king Richarde, and of the order that was taken for the gouernement of the realme. Then Sir John of Vyen cauſed a Barke to departe and to cary thoſe newes with other of his awne enterpriſes, vnto the french king.

After the Barke was ſent awaye, the frenchmen and the Spanyards hoyſſed vp their Sayles, and had winde at will, and came with the ſame tyde to Douer, about three of the clock in the after noone.

And there was readie to receyue them, Sir Edmonde Erle of Cambridge, and ſyr Thomas his brother Erle of Buckyngham, with ten thouſand, with Banners diſplayed, and the frenchmen were ſixe ſcore Veſſelles ſhippes and Galeys. The Frenchmen came heard by the towne, but taried not, but ſtreight paſſed by and tooke the deepe of the Sea. For then the Sea began to ebbe: Howbeit the Engliſhmen taried there ſtill all that day and the next night, and the Frenchmen by the nexte tyde, came before the Hauen of Calice, and there entred.

The French king ſendeth to the Scots to ſtir them againſt the Engliſh men.

At this time alſo the French king ſent vnto Robert king of Scotland, prayeng him to make earneſt and effectuall warre vpon the Engliſhmen and to folow them ſo hard that they ſhould haue no puiſſaunce to paſſe the Sea. Wherevpon king Robert aſſembled hys counſayle at Edenborough, where as were the moſt parte of all the knightes and Barons in Scotlande, and other ſuche as he thought were hable to doe him ſeruyce. And when they were thus aſſembled together, king Robert ſayde vnto them, ye know how that the Engliſhmen in time paſt haue done vnto vs many great hurtes and harmes in ſpoylyng and brennyng of our Countrie, beating downe of oure Caſtelles, and in ſleyng and raunſomyng of our men. And Sirs, nowe is the time come, that we maye be well reuenged of them: For now is there but a yong king in Englande, for king Edward is dead, who was wont to haue ſo good fortune. And when the Barons and yong knights that were there heard this, and they alſo being deſyrous to be reuenged, aunſwered and ſayd, all with one voyce, that they were readie and full appointed and furniſhed to ryde into England, and it were the ſame day or the nert folowyng, or when it pleaſed him. This aunſwere pleaſed greatlye the king of Scottes, and he thanked them all. And at the ſame time the king appointed foure Erles to be the chiefe Captaines of all the armie, that is to ſaye, the Erle of Douglas, the Erle Mozet, the Erle of Maure, and the Erle of Surlant. And he appointed Sir Archibald Douglas for Conеſtable of Scotlande, and Syr Robert Uerſey to be Marſhall of the hoſt, and ſo they made their ſommons to be at a certaine day at Morlane.

The Scots with a great power determine to enter vpon England.

And in the time of the making of thys aſſembly, there departed from them a baliant Eſquier of Scotland called Alexander Ramſey, who thought to enterprice and to atchieue a great feate of armes: and he tooke with him xl. that were well horſed, and roade by night prieuely, ſo long vntill that by daye breakyng he came to Berwike, which towne was then Engliſhe, and the Capitayne of the towne was one of the Erle of Northumberlands Eſquiers, and was called John Biſet. And in the Caſtell was Captaine a valiaunt knight called ſyr Robert Alenton.

The enterprice of Alexander Ramſey a Scot, who tooke the Caſtell of Barwike.

When the Scottes were come to Berwike, they kept themſelues cloſe, and ſent a ſpie to the towne and to the Caſtell, to ſee in what condition it was. The ſpie entred downe the diches, wherein there was no water, nor none could abide there, for it was all a quick ſande. And ſo the ſpie looked and hearkened all about, but he could neyther here nor ſee anye creature, and ſo he returned and ſhewed his maſter.

Then Alexander Ramſey auaunced forth and brought all his company priuely vnto the diches, and they brought with them ladders, and ſo dreſſed them vp to the walles. And Alexander was one of the firſt that went vp the ladder with his ſworde in his hande, and entered into the Caſtell, and all his companie folowed him, for there was none that withſtood them. And when they were all within, then they went to the chiefe Towre, where the Captaine lay a ſleepe. And there ſodainely with great Ires they brake open the doore. The Captaine ſodainely awooke, and had ſlept all night, for he had kept but ſmall watch, the which he deerely bought, and ſo opened his chamber doore, wenyng to him the noyſe had beene made by ſome of his owne Souldiours that would haue robbed or murdered him in his bed, becauſe he had diſpleaſed them the weke before, and ſo lept out at a wyndow into the great diches in great feare, and there brake his neck.

Berwike Caſtell is taken by the Scottes.

The watchmen were halfe a ſleepe, and heard the noyes, and awooke, and perceyued well howe that the Caſtell was ſcaled and betrayed, and ſo ſowned in a Trumpet Trahey, Trahey.

John Biſet Captaine of the Towne hearing the boyce of a Trompet, armed himſelfe immediatly, & cauſed all the towne to arme themſelues, and forthwith they drewe together all before the Caſtell, and heard well the noyes that the Scottes made within: But they could not enter into them, for the gate was ſhut and the bridge drawen. Then John Biſet remembred him ſelfe of a good deuiſe, and ſayde to them of the towne that were about him. Let vs breake downe the ſtayes of the bridge on this ſide, and then they that are within cannot iſſue out wythout oure daunger. And incontinent wyth Ires they bet downe the ſteyes of the bridge. And then John Biſet ſent a meſſenger to Anwike a. xij. myles of to the Lorde Percy, certefying him of all the matter, deſyryng him without delay to come to the reſcue of ꝑ Caſtell.

Alexander Ramſey and his company, when they had ſlayne in the Caſtell whome it pleaſed them, and had taken the reſt priſoners, and ſhut them vp into a towre, then ſayde Alexander, now let vs go downe to the towne, for it is oures, and let vs take all the goods that are therein, and let vs bring all the riche men into thys Caſtell, and then ſet fyre on the Towne, for it is not to be kept by vs. And within three or foure dayes we ſhall haue reſcue out of Scotlande, ſo that we ſhall ſaue all oure pillage: and at our departyng let vs ſet fyre in the Caſtell, and ſo pay our hoſte. To the which purpoſe they all agreed, for they all deſyred pillage.

And then they toke eche of them a glayue in their handes, for they found enough in the Caſtell, and ſo opened the gate and let downe the bridge: And when the bridge was downe, the ropes that helde it brake, for the reſtyng place of the bridge was broken awaye as afore ſayde.

And when John Biſet ſawe the maner of them, he and all his company beganne to ſhoote and crye, and ſayde: A Sirs, keepe you there, ye ſhall

not

not departe thence without our leaue.

And when Alexander Ramsey sawe the maner of them without, he knewe well that they were ware of his being in the Castell: and so with much a do closed in agayne the gate for feare of shot: and then they fortefyed the Castel thinking to haue kept it. And they cast out into the diches all the deade men that they had slaine, and locked the rest that were prisoners into a Towre. They thought that the place was strong enough to be kept for a long tyme, or at the least vntill some reskewe came to them out of Scotland, which they thought woulde not be long.

So soone as the Messenger had declared the whole matter vnto the Lorde Percy, he imediatly sent knowledge into the whole countrie, & made hast himselfe to come to the reskewe, and the Barons, knightes and Esquiers of the countrie and good men of warre came vnto him from all places. And the first that came thether was the Erle of Northumberland, and then daily came great companyes, so that at the last they mustered themselues, and they were aboue ten thousand men.

Then they besieged the Castell so nere that a Birde could not come out without knowledge. And after they begannae to mine vnder the Castell, the sooner to meete with the Scottes that were within, and so to recouer agayne the Castell.

Then tydinges came to the Barons of Scotland, howe the Erle, Barons, knightes, and Esquiers of Northumberland had besieged their companie in the Castell of Barwike. And they were all determined to go and rayse vp the siege, and to victaile the Castell, for they sayde that Alexander Ramseys enterprice was valiaunt. And to confirme the same, Sir Archibald Dowglas Constable of Scotlande sayde: Alexander is my Cosyn, and it commeth of a noble courage, and valiaunt heart, to enterprice suche a feate, and we ought to comfort and helpe him in his deede: wherefore, if we may, let vs go raise the siege, it will redounde to our great noblenesse, and therefore let vs go thether. And then they tooke order who shoulde go with him, and who should abyde, and so he toke with him fiue hundreth Speares, the best of all the hoste, and so roade on towarde Barwike.

Tidynges came to the Englishe Lordes, that the Scottes were comming to raise the siege, and to victuall the Castell. Then they went to counsaile, and so determined to take a place, & to abyde their enemies and to fight with them. And the Lorde Percye caused all his companie to be readie armed and furnished to fight, and to make their Musters, and they found themselues to be the number of three thousand men of armes, and. vij. thousande Archers. And when the Erle sawe that he had so great a number, he sayde: Let vs kepe our place, we are men enowe to fight with all the puissaunce of Scotland, and so they rested in a fayre playne without Barwike in two battayles in good order.

And they had not bene there the space of an houre, but they sawe certein Currours of the Scottes well horsed, which came to viewe the Englishe hoste. And when these Currours had well aduised the number of the Englishe men, then they returned to their maisters, and shewed them all that they had seene, and sayde: Sirs we haue ridden so nere to the English men, that we haue well aduised and considered all their doyng: And we saye vnto you, they are ready abidyng for you in two fayre battailes, in a goodly plaine, and in euery battaile a fiue thouſande men. Therefore nowe take good aduice, for we approched ſo nere them, that they perceyued well that we were Currours of Scotland, but they would not ſtirre nor ſende out one man to runne at vs.

When ſir Archibalde Douglas and his Captaines heard theſe tidyngs, they were penſife, and ſayde: we cannot ſee that it ſhould be for our profite to ryde as nowe againſt the Engliſhe men, for they are tenne againſt one of vs, wherfore we may loſe more than we can winne, and of a fooliſhe enterpryce commeth no good, as we maye nowe ſee by Alexander Ramſey: and there was preſent an vncle of Alexanders, called Sir William Lindſey, who tooke great paine to come to comfort his Nephewe. And he ſayde vnto the companie: Sirs, on the truſt of you, my nephew hath made this enterpryce, and taken the Caſtell of Barwike: It will turne you all to great blame if ye loſe him thus, and peradventure hereafter, there will be none ſo haſtie to ſhewe ſomuch good will to our Countrie. And they anſwered and ſayde, they could not amend it, neither was it mete that ſo many noble men as were there, ſhould put themſelues in aduenture of life or vndoyng, for the ſauyng of one Eſquier. Wherefore they determined to returne againe to their awne Countrie, and ſo withdrewe themſelues.

The Scots flie.

Nowe when the Erle of Northumberland, and the Erle of Nottyngham, and the other Barons of England perceiued that the Scottes came not forwarde, they ſente foorth their Currours, to knowe where they were become, and they brought worde how they were gone toward Morlan beyond the Caſtell of Roſbourgh.

Againſt night, the Engliſhe men drewe againe to their lodgynges, and made good watch that nighd, and in the morning euery man was readie to go and aſſaile the Caſtell, and there was a fierce aſſault, and endured almoſt a whole day. There hath not beene ſeene more hardier men of ſo fewe, then thoſe Scottes were, nor that better defended a place then they did. For the Engliſh men had ladders, which they rered vp to the Walles, and they went vp vpon them with Targettes ouer their heades, and before them, and ſo came and fought with the Scottes hande to hande, and ſome of them came downe againe into the Ditches: But the thing that troubled the Scottes moſt, was the Archers, who ſhot ſo wholy together, that they durſt not come to the defenſe of the wall. So long this aſſault continued, that at the laſt the Engliſhe men entered by force, and there ſlue as many as they found, not one of them that were within that ſcaped, but were ſlaine, except Alexander Ramſey, whome they tooke priſoner. And thus the Caſtell of Barwike was againe recouered from the Scottes, and the Erle of Northumberland made John Biſet Capitaine there, and he newly repayred the Caſtel & the bridge.

Berwike Caſtell recouered by the Engliſhe men.

In the ſecond yere of this kinges reigne (as ſayth Reynulph:) By reaſon of a variaunce that chaunced betwene the Lord Latymer, and ſir Raufe Ferrers on the one partie, and ſir Robert Hall, and Shakerley Eſquier on the other part, for a priſoner that was taken beyond the Sea in Spaine, called the Erle of Dean, whome the ſayde Eſquier kept in his poſſeſſion, contrary to the mindes and willes of the aforeſayd knightes. And hereupon the ſayde knightes beyng in Choler, entered into the Church of Saint Peters at weſtminſter, and there findyng the ſayde Sir Robert Hall kneelyng at Maſſe before the high Aultar, drewe out their ſwordes, and ſlue him: And afterward by their meanes and labour, cauſed the ſayde Shakerley to be arreſted, and committed to the Towre of London, where he was kept as priſoner a great while after, for he would not deliuer the Erle of Deane his priſoner vnto thoſe two knightes: But Carton calleth them Lordes.

About this tyme the French king ſent a great number of Shippes and Galeyes into England, and they landed in dyuers places, as at Rye, at Winchelſey, at Haſtinges, at Portelmouth, and in dyuers other places, and did great harme, but chiefely at Graues ende, where they landed, and ſpoyled the towne, & brent a great part thereof, and ſo returned againe into Fraunce with much ſpoyle.

Graues ende brent and ſpoyled by the Frenchmen.

And in this yere a Parliament was called, and therein was graunted to the king foure pence of euery man and woman beyng of the age of. xiiij. yeres and vpward, that were within the realme, at the which Subſidy the people did greatly murmure, and much miſchiefe came thereof, as in the yere folowyng ſhall appere. But yet with that money, an armie was prepared and ſent ouer, whereof Sir Thomas of Woodſtock Erle of Cambridge, and Vncle to the King was chiefe Capitaine: The which beyng accompanied with. vij. or. viij. thouſand men, paſſed the water of Some, and came vnto Soyſones, and paſſed alſo the Ryuers of Oyſe, and Marne, and other, and came before Troys, and wanne it, and after lodged them betwene the newe Towne and Sens.

The people greatly murmured for the payment of foure pence the polle.

And euer as they paſſed the Countries they tooke great raunſomes of the people, or elſe ſet fyre on their townes. And although ỹ the french king had ſent an armie of frenchmen to reſiſt them, yet they hindered them nothing at all of their purpoſe. For euer, if they chaunced to ſkirmiſhe, the Frenchmen were put vnto the worſe. And thus they continued forth their iourney, and paſſed by the Countrie of Gaſtynoyes, and ſo into Bryteyne, where they were ioyouſly receyued of lyr John de Mountfort, Duke of that Prouynce, who then was but newlye come thether.

To the entent to haue a ſtay and quyetneſſe with Scotland there was ſent vnto them in Ambaſſade John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaſter, and he came to the Towne of Berwike. And from thence, he ſent an Herault of Armes into Scotlande to the king and Barons there, ſhewyng them that he was come to ſpeake with them. And if they would, he would come and treate with them, and thereof he wylled them to ſend him worde, or elſe he knewe right well what he had to doe. The Herauld departed and roade to Edenborough, where king Robert of Scotlande, the Erle Douglas, the Erle de la Mare, the Erle Mozet, and other the Lordes of Scotland were aſſembled together. For they had knowledge how that the Duke of Lancaſter was comming thether to treate with them. Wherfore they were aſſembled in the chiefe towne of Scotland that ioyneth vpon the borders of England. And there the Herault did his meſſage, and was well heard at length, and he had anſwere that they were well content to here the Duke ſpeake. And ſo the Herault brought a ſafeconduyt for the Duke and his company, to endure as long as he was in the Marches & that they commoned together.

This the Herault returned to Barwike, and ſhewed how he had ſped.

And

And ſo the Duke departed from Barwike and left all his prouiſion in the towne behinde him, and ſo came to Roſebourgh and there lodged. And the nert daye he lodged at the Abbey of Maros which is on the ryuer, that departeth Englande and Scotlande aſunder. There the Duke and his companie taried, vntill the Scots were come to Monbanne, thre mile thence, & when they were come thether, they ſent word to the Duke. Thus the treaty began betweene the Scots and the Engliſhmen, and it endured fiftene daies.

The cõmons of England rebelled.

And in this meane whyle ỹ commons of England rebelled, by the which the whole ſtate of the realme was in great perill to be vtterly deſtroyed and loſt: and becauſe ye ſhall vnderſtande the truth thereof, & that the rulers of the realme may preuent and foreſee ſuche lyke miſchiefes as maye hereafter enſue, therefore I haue purpoſed fully to ſet foorth at length, the truth and whole diſcourſe thereof vnto you, as Froiſſart doth at large write the ſame.

Of ſmall occaſions great miſchiefes growe and encreaſe.

And firſt, conſider how ſtraũge a thing it is, that of ſo poore and ſimple a foundatiõ, ſo great a miſchiefe ſhould grow and inſurge, as this ỹ foloweth. There was and is an vſage in England in many places, that the noble men and Lords of Manoures hauing Fraunchiſes ought to haue ſeruices of the commons, that is to ſay, that their tenaunts ought by cuſtome to plow their landes, to gather and bring home their corne, and ſome to threſhe and fanne, and to carie wood, and water, and dyuers ſuche other things, which they ought to doe by their tenure and ſeruice that they owe to their Lords. And lykewiſe there are another ſort that holde their lands by villenage, and thoſe are commonly called bondmen, of the which kinde of people there were then many in England, and ſpecially in the County of Kent, Suſſex and Bedford.

At this time there were a certaine of ſuche kinde of people as is afore ſayde, that beganne to ſtirre in England and namely in Kent, and ſayde they were in great ſeruitude and bondage: But ſayd they, in the beginning of the worlde, there were no bond men: neyther ought there to be any nowe, except it were ſuch a one as had committed treaſon againſt his Lorde, as Lucifer did to God. But ſayde they we can haue no ſuche battayle, for we are neyther Angelles nor ſpirites, but men framed and formed to the ſimilitude of our Lordes, and therefore ſayde they, why ſhould we then be ſo kept vnder lyke beaſtes and ſlaues? And they playnely ſayde they would no lenger ſuffer it, for they would be all one with their Lordes, and if they labored or did anye thing for their Lordes, they woulde haue wages for the ſame as well as other.

John wall a prieſt the ſetter forth, and the very authour of rebellion.

And of this imagination was a fooliſhe prieſt in the Countie of Kent called John Wall, for the which lyke fooliſhe words he had bene three times in the Biſhop of Cauntorburies priſon. This prieſt vſed oftentimes on the Sundayes, when the people were going out of the Church after ſeruice, to call them back into the Cloyſter or Churchyard, and to talke to them as foloweth: A good people, matters go not wel to paſſe in England in theſe dayes, nor ſhall not do vntill euery thing be common, and that there be no Villeynes nor gentlemen, but that we be all as one, and that the Lordes be no greater then we be. What haue we deſerued, or why ſhould we be thus kept in ſeruitude and bondage? We be all come from one father and one mother, Adam and Eue. Wherefore can they ſaye or ſhewe that they are greater Lordes then we be? ſauyng in that which we get and labour for, that doe they ſpend.

They

They are clothed in Velvet and Chamlet furred richly, and we be clad with the poorest sorte of cloth. They haue their Wines, Spices, and fyne bread: and we haue the drawyng out of the Chaffe, and drinke water. They dwell in fayre houses, and we in homely cotages, and lye in the fieldes in winde and rayne. And with that which they haue by oure laboures, they keepe and maintaine their estates. We be called their bondmen, and without we doe them readie service, we must be beaten, punished or put out of our lyuings. And we haue no souereigne to whome we maye complayne, nor none that will here vs, nor doe vs right. Let vs go to the king, he is young, and shewe him in what daunger we be in: and let vs shewe him plainely that we wyll haue it otherwise, or else we wyll prouyde a remedy for our selues. And if we set forward, all maner of people that are now in bondage will folowe vs, to the entent they may be made free. And when the king seeth vs, he will prouyde some remedy for vs, eyther by fayrenesse or otherwise.

Thus John Wall vsed to talke on Sundayes, when the people went out of the Churches to go into the Villages, wherefore, many of the meane people loued him: and those that meant no goodnesse, sayde he sayde truth: and so they muttered together one with another in the Fieldes and wayes as they went.

The Archebishop of Cauntorbury, who was agayne informed of thys John Wall, caused him to be taken and committed to prison, where he remained two or three moneths, as a matter somewhat to correct his folye: howbeit, it had beene much better in the beginning that he had bene condempned to perpetuall prison, or else to haue dyed, rather then to haue suffered him agayne to be delyuered out of prison, for the great mischiefe that did ensue: But the Bishop had conscience to put him to death.

And when this John Wall was againe come out of Prison, he returned againe to his olde trade. Of his wordes and deedes there were many people in London enformed, namely suche as had great enuy at them that were riche. And at the last they began to speake among themselues, and sayd: that the realme of England was euill gouerned, and how that Golde and Siluer was taken from them, by such as were named noble men. And thus a sort of vnhappy people gathered together about London, began to rebell, and sent worde into dyuerse Countries to such as they knewe, that they should come to London, and bring their people with them, promisyng that they shoulde finde London open to receyue them, and the Commons of the Citie to be of the same mynde, and sayde, that they would worke so much with the king, that there should not be one bond man in all England.

This promise so moued them of Kent, Essex, Sussex, Bedford, and other Countries about, that they arose and came towardes London in great numbers. And they had made to themselues certeine Capitaines, named Watte Tyler, Jacke Strawe, and John Wall and other, of the which companye, Watte * Tyler was the chiefe, and he was a Tyler in deede, and an vngracious Patrone.

* Fabian sayeth Jacke straw was chiefe.

When these vnhappie men began thus to stirre, they of London, namely the honest Citizens were greatly afrayed. Then the Maior of London, and the substanciall of the Citie toke counsaile together: and when they saw the people come in on euery syde, they caused the Gates of the Citie to bee closed, cloſed, and would ſuffer no man to enter into the Citie: But when they had better aduiſed themſelues, they thought it not beſt ſo to do, leaſt they might chaunce thereby to geue an occaſion that their Suburbes might be brent. And ſo they opened againe the Gates of the Citie. And there entered in by xx. and. xxx. together, in ſome places an hundreth, and in other places two hundreth, and tooke their lodging within the Citie, but to ſay truely, the third parte of theſe people coulde not tell what to aſke or demaunde, or wherefore they came, but that one folowed another for company, as brute Beaſtes.

The kings mother the Princeſſe of Wales, was in great feare of the Kentiſhe rebels.

The ſame day that theſe vnhappie people of Kent were comming to London, there returned from Cauntorbury the kinges mother Princeſſe of Wales, comming from her pilgrimage. She was in great ieopardy to haue beene loſt: For theſe people came to her Chayre, and dealt rudely with her, whereof the good Lady was in great doubt, leaſt they would haue done ſome vilany to hir, or her Damoſelles: howbeit God kept her, and ſhe roade in one day from Cauntorbury to London, for ſhee neuer durſt tary by the way. And the ſame tyme king Richard her ſonne, was at the Tower of London, and there his mother found him, and with him there was the Erle of Sariſbury, the Archebiſhop of Cauntorbury, Sir Robert of Namure, the Lorde of Gomegines, and dyuers other, who were in doubt of this people that thus were gathered together, and wiſt not what they demaunded.

This rebellion was well knowen in the kinges Court, before anye of theſe people began to ſtyrre out of any of their houſes: But the king nor hys counſayle prouided not remedie therefore in due tyme.

The firſt entrie of the rebels was at Cauntorbury.

But here to begin and ſhew foorth the ſtory in order. Firſt on the Monday in the yere of our Lorde. 1381. certeine of the aforeſayd people iſſued out of London, and came firſt to Cauntorbury, and there John Ball or John Wall had thought to haue found the Biſhop, but he was at London with the king. When Watte Tyler, and Jacke Strawe entered into Cauntorbury, all the Common people made great ioy, for all the towne was of their mind. And there they tooke counſaile to go to London to the king, and to ſend ſome of their companie ouer the Thames into Eſſex, and likewiſe to ſend another company into Suſſex, and into the Counties of Stafford, and Bedford, to ſpeake to the people, that they ſhould all come to the farther ſyde of London, and thereby to cloſe London rounde about, ſo that the king ſhould not ſtop their paſſages, and that they ſhould all mete together on Corpus Chriſti day.

They that were at Cauntorbury did much harme, for they entered into Saint Thomas Church, and robbed, and brake vp the Biſhops Chamber. And in robbyng and bearyng out their pillage, ſayde, A, this Chauncelor of England hath had a good Market to bring together all this riches: he ſhall geue vs nowe an accompt of the reuenues of England, and of the great profites that he hath gathered ſithen the Coronation.

The rebels were enimies to all men of lawe, whether they were ſpirituall or temporall.

Then this Monday they came from Cauntorbury, and tooke their way to Rocheſter. And in their paſſage they ſpoyled the houſes of all men of lawe that ſtood in their way, whether they were Spirituall or Temporall. And when they were come to Rocheſter, there they had good cheere, for the people of that towne were of that minde. And then they went to the Caſtel there, and tooke the knight that had the rule thereof, who was called Sir John Motton: and they ſayde vnto him, Sir John, you muſt go with vs, and ye ſhalbe our ſouereigne Capteyne, and doe that we will haue you doe. The knight made many excuſes very honeſtly and diſcretely, but it auayled him nothing, for they ſayde vnto him, Sir John, if ye do not as we will haue you do, ye are but dead. The knight perceyuyng thoſe people in that furye, and readie to ſlay him: He then fearyng death, agreed vnto them, and ſo he went with them, though againſt his will. And in like maner did they in other countries in England, as Eſſex, Suſſex, Staffoꝛd, Bedfoꝛd, and Warwike, euen to Lincolne. For they brought the knightes and Gentlemen into ſuch a feare, that they cauſed them to go with thē whether ſoeuer they would haue them, as the Loꝛde Nolin a great Baron, ſir Stephen of Hales, and ſir Thomas of Giſighen, and other.

Then on the Tueſday theſe people lodged at Rocheſter, and from thence departed and came ouer the ryuer there, and ſo kept on their way towarde London, vntill they came to Datfoꝛd, ſpoylyng and brennyng as they went, all the houſes that belonged to any man of lawe, what ſoeuer they were, and they ſtroke of the heades of dyuers perſonnes: And ſo long they came foꝛwarde, that at the laſt they came to Blackheth, which is within foure myle of London, and euer as they went, they ſayde they were the kings men, and the ſeruauntes of the noble Commons of England.

But when they of the Citie of London knewe that they were ſo neere vnto them: The Maioꝛ cloſed the Gates, and ſtopped the paſſages.

And whyle the lewde company lay on Blackheth, they agreed the next day, which was Wedneſday, to ſende ſyꝛ John Mottō (whome they called their knight) to the king, to ſhewe him that all that they had done and doe, is foꝛ him and his honour: and howe the realme of Englande hath not bene well gouerned of a great ſpace, neyther foꝛ the honour noꝛ common profite of the ſame, by his Uncles, noꝛ yet by the Clergie, and ſpecially by the Archbiſhop of Cauntoꝛburie his Chauncelour, of whome they woulde haue accompt: But when they had well bethought themſelues, they wylled Syꝛ John Motton to let theſe things alone, and to ſay to the king that they deſyred to ſpeake with him, becauſe that to him, and to none other they woulde open their griefes. The afoꝛeſayde knight durſt doe none other, but paſſed ouer the Thames and came to the Towꝛe, pꝛayyng to ſpeake with the king. The king and they that were with him in the towꝛe, deſirous to here newes, wylled that the knight ſhould come vnto them. And at that tyme there were pꝛeſent with the king, firſt the pꝛinceſſe his mother, and hys two bꝛethꝛen, the Erle of Kent, and the Loꝛde John Holland, the Erle of Salſburie, the Erle of Warwike, the Erle of Oxfoꝛd, the Archebiſhop of Cauntoꝛbury, the Loꝛd of Saint Johns, Sir Robert of Namure, the Loꝛd of Uertaigne, the Loꝛde of Gomegines, the Maiour of London, and dyuers other notable Citizens.

Thys knight ſyꝛ John Motton, who was well knowen among them, foꝛ he was one of the kinges officers. He kneeled downe befoꝛe the king, and ſayde. My redoubted Loꝛde, let it not diſpleaſe your grace, the meſſage that I muſt ſhew vnto you, foꝛ deare ſyꝛ, it is by foꝛce and agaynſt my will, Sir John, ſayde the king, ſaye what ye will, I holde you excuſed, Sir, the commons of your realme hath ſent me vnto you, foꝛ to deſyꝛe you to come and ſpeake with them on Blackheth, foꝛ they deſyꝛe to ſpeake with you and none none other. And ſyr ye neede not to haue any doubt of your perſon, for they will doe you no hurte, for they holde and will holde you for their king: But Sir, they ſay they will ſhewe you diuers things the which ſhall be right neceſſary for you to take heede of, when they ſpeake with you, of the which thinges I haue no charge to ſhewe you: But I humbly beſeeche you, to geue me your aunſwere, ſuche as may appeaſe them, and that they maye knowe for truth that I haue ſpoken with you, for they haue my children in hoſtage vntill I returne agayne vnto them: and if I returne not agayne, they will ſley my children incontynent. Then ſayde the king, ye ſhall haue aunſwere foorthwith.

Then the king toke counſayle what was beſt for him to doe, and it was anone determined that the nexte morning the king would go downe by water, and without fayle ſpeake with them, by the Thames ſide, whether he wylled that a certaine of them ſhould come vnto him.

And when ſyr John Motton had that aunſwer, he deſyred nothing elſe, and ſo he tooke his leaue of the king and of his Lordes, and returned agayne to Blackheth, where he had left mo then. lx. thouſande men: And there he declared his aunſwere, which was, that the next morning they ſhould ſende ſome of their counſayle vnto the Thames, and the king would come and ſpeake with them. This aunſwere greatly pleaſed them, and ſo paſſed away that night, and the fourth parte of them faſted for lack of victuall, which greued them muche.

In the morning being thurſday, the king being accompanied wyth the Erle of Salſburie, the Erle of Warwike, the Erle of Suffolk and certaine knightes, tooke his Barge and rowed downe along the Thames to Detforde, and there were come downe the hill aboue ten thouſand of the aforeſayde perſons, to ſee and ſpeake with the king.

And when they ſawe the kings Barge comming, they began to ſhowte, and made ſuche a crie as if all the Deuills in hell had bene among them. And they had brought with them Sir John Motton, to the entent that if the king had not come, they would haue hewen hym all to pieces, and ſo they promyſed hym.

And when the king and his Lordes ſawe the demeanour of the people, the ſtoweſt hearted of them that were with the king were afrayed. And the Lordes counſayled the king not to take any landyng there, but to rowe vp and downe the ryuer. And the king demaunded of them what they would, for ſayde he, I am come hether to ſpeake with you. And they all with one voyce ſayde: we would that ye ſhould come a lande, and then we will ſhewe you what we lack. Then the Erle of Salſbury aunſwered for the king, and ſayde, Sirs, ye be not in ſuche good order nor araye that the king ought to ſpeake with you. And with thoſe wordes, they were ſomewhat ſtayed. Then the king was counſayled to returne agayne to the Towre of London, and ſo he did. And when they ſawe that, they were enflamed with wrath and returned to the hill where the great bande was. And there they ſhewed them what aunſwere they had, and howe the king was returned to the Towre of London. Then they cryed all wyth one voyce, let vs go to London, and ſo they tooke their waye thether, and in their goyng they bet downe the Lawyers houſes without all mercie, and many other houſes of ſuche as had offices offices vnder the king. And ſpecially they brake vp the kinges priſons, as the Marſhalſey, and kinges Benche, and delyuered freely all the priſoners that were within. And at the bridge foote, becauſe the Gates were cloſed, they threatened ſore the Citezens of London, ſayeng how they would brenne all the ſuburbes, and alſo ſley all the commons of the Citie, and ſet the Citie on fyre. And within the Citie were a great number of their affinitie, and they ſayde: why doe not we let theſe good felowes into the Citie? they are oure felowes, and that that they doe, is for vs: And ſhortly after the gates were opened, and they entred into the Citie, and went into houſes, and ſate downe to eate and drinke. And they could call for nothing but it was brought vnto them, for euery man was readie to make them good cheere, and to pleaſe them with meate and drinke.

Then their Capteynes Watte Tyler, Jacke Straw, Jacke Shepard, and other, to the number of. xx. thouſand, went through London, and came to the Sauoy, which then was a goodly place, and perteyned to the Duke of Lancaſter. And when they were entered therein, they firſt ſlue the kepers thereof, and then ſpoyled and robbed the houſe. And when they had ſo done, they ſet fyre on it, and cleane conſumed and deſtroyed it: And then came vnto the Temple and other Innes of Court, and ſpoyled the Bookes of law, and the recordes of the Counter, and ſet all the priſoners of Newegate and the Counters at large. And when they had this done, then they went ſtreight to the goodly Hoſpitall of the Rhodes, called Saint Johns beyond Smithfielde, and ſpoyled that likewyſe, and then conſumed it with fyre. Then they went from ſtreete to ſtreete in London, and ſlue all the Flemynges that they could meete withall, eyther in Church or in any other place, and they brake vp diuers houſes of the Lombardes, and robbed them, and toke their goodes at their pleaſure. And the ſame tyme they ſlue in the Citie a riche Citizen called Richard Lion, for that Watte Tyler once dwelled with him, and on a tyme did beate him, wherefore he was nowe reuenged vpon him, and cauſed his head to be ſtriken off, and put vpon the poynt of a Speare, and made it to be borne before him throughout London. Thus theſe vngracious people demeaned themſelues, like mad and outrageous beaſtes. And toward night they went to Saint Katherines before the Tower of London: ſaiyng howe they would neuer departe thence vntill they had the king at their pleaſure, and vntill that he had graunted vnto them all that they would aſke, and haue ſpeciall accomptes of the Chauncelor of England to know where allthe treaſure was become that he had leuyed through the realme: & without he made a good accompt thereof, it ſhould not be for his profite. And ſo after they had ſpent all this day, beyng Thurſday, and then called Corpus Chriſti day, and was then a highe and feſtiuall daye, in doyng of miſchiefes and murders, they reſted at night before the Towre, as afore ſayde.

Richard Lion murthered

But here may ye well thinke, that this was a heauy and troublous night vnto the king, and thoſe that were with him in the Tower, for ſuch was the behauiour of theſe vileynes, that dyuerſe and ſondry tymes in the night they ſhowted and cryed as all the deuilles in hell had roared.

And in this Euenyng the king was counſayled by his brethren and Lordes, and by ſir Nicholas Walworth Maior of London, and diuers other worſhipfull Citizens, that in the night tyme they ſhould haue iſſued out of the Tower, and haue entred into the Citie, & there to haue had ayde, & ſo to haue ſlaine al thoſe vnhappy people that then were at their reſt, for it was thought that many of them were dronken, by reaſon whereof they might haue beene ſlaine like flees, and among. xx. of them there was ſcant one in harneſſe. And ſurely the good men of London might haue done this at their eaſe, for they had ſecretly in their houſes a great number of theyr friendes, and ſeruauntes readie harneſſed.

And alſo ſir Robert Canolle was in his lodgyng, keepyng the kinges treaſure, with ſixe ſcore readie at his commaundement. And in lyke maner was ſir Perducas Dalbert, who was as then at London. In ſomuche as there might haue bene aſſembled. viij. thouſand men well harneſſed and appoynted: Howbeit, there was nothing done, for they were in feare of the reſt of the Commons of the Citie, and againe the number of the Commons of the Countrie were. lx. thouſand and mo.

Then the Erle of Sariſbury, and the wyſe men about the king ſayd, ſir if ye can appeaſe them with faire wordes, it were beſt and moſt profitable ſo to do, and to graunt them euery thing that they deſyre. So this counſaile was accepted and folowed, and the Maior countermaunded not to ſtirre that night. And in the Citie with the Maior, there were. xii. Aldermen, wherof ix. of them helde with the king, & the other three toke part with the vngracious people, as it was after well knowen, the which they ful derely bought.

On the Friday in the mornyng the people that were lodged at Saint Katheryns, began to apparell themſelues, and to cry and ſhowte, and ſayde: Without the king would come out and ſpeake with them, they would aſſault the Tower, and take it perforce, and ſley all them that were therein.

Then the king doubted thoſe wordes, and he was counſayled to go out and ſpeake with them. And then the king ſent vnto them that they ſhould all draw to a fayre plaine place called Myle ende, where as the people of the Citie did vſe to ſhote, and thether the king promiſed to come to them, and to graunt them whatſoeuer they deſyred.

Then the people began to depart, ſpecially the Commons of the Villages, and went to the ſame place, but all went not thether, for they were not all of one condicion, nor of one minde. For there were ſome that deſyred nothing but ſpoyle, and the vtter deſtruction of noble men, and to rob and ſacke London: And that was the principall matter of their beginnyng, the which they well ſhewed. For aſſone as the Tower Gate opened, and that the king iſſued out with his two brethren, and the Erle of Sariſbury, the Erle of Warwike, the Erle of Oxford, Sir Robert of Namure, the Lord of Briteyne, the Lord Gomegines, and dyuerſe other. Then Watte Tyler, Jacke Strawe, and John Bal, alias Wall, and mo then foure hundreth entered into the Tower, and brake vp Chamber after Chamber, and at the laſt found the Archbiſhop of Cauntorbury called Simon, a valiaunt man & a wiſe, and high Chauncelor of England, and him they brought out, and ſtroke off his heade, and alſo beheaded the Lorde of Saint Johns, and a gray Frier, which was a Phiſition belongyng to the Duke of Lancaſter, for hatred that they had to hys mayſter, and a Sergeaunt at armes called John Laige. And theſe foure heades they put vpon the endes of foure long Speares, and they made them to be borne before them through the ſtreetes of the Citie. And at the laſt ſet them them on high at London bridge, as though they had beene Traytors to the king and to the realme. Also these wretches entred into the Princesse Chamber, and brake her head, with the which she was so sore afrayde, that she sowned, and so was taken vp and borne to the water syde, and put in a Barge, & couered, and so conueyed to a place called the Royall, which then was the Queenes Wardrobe, and there she was all that day and night, as a woman halfe deade, vntill shee was comforted with the king her sonne, as ye shall after here.

Now when the king was come to Myle ende without London, he put out of his company his two brethren the Erle of Kent, and syr John Holande and the Lorde of Gomegines, for they durst not appere before the people. And when the king and his other Lords were there, he founde there a xx. thousand men of diuers Villages and of sundrie Countries in Englande.

And the king entered in among them, and spake vnto them gently and sayde. A good people, I am your king, what lacke ye? what doe ye saye? Then such as heard him sayd, that ye will make vs free for euer, our selues, our heyres, and oure landes, and that we be called no more bondmen, nor from henceforth so to be reputed or taken. Sirs, sayde the king, I doe gladly graunt your request: withdrawe you home to your owne houses, and into suche Villages as ye came from, and leaue behind you of euery Village two or three, and I wyll cause wrytinges to be made and seale them wyth my seale, the which they shall haue with them, conteining euery thing that ye demaund. And to the entent that ye shall be the better assured, I will cause my Banners to be delyuered vnto euery Baylywike, Shire and Countie.

These wordes quieted well the common people, and suche as were simple and good plaine men that were come thether, and wist not wel wherfore: They answered the king, it was well sayde, they desyred no better. And so they beganne to withdrawe themselues, and came into the Citie of London. And the king sayde also one worde, the which greatly contented them, and that was: syrs, among you good men of Kent, ye shall haue one of my banners, and ye of Essex another, of Bedford, of Cambridge, of Stafford, of Lyncolne, and of Lyn, eche of you shall haue one. And also I pardon euery thing that ye haue done hetherto, so that ye folowe my Banners, and returne home to your houses. They all answered they would so doe. Thus these people departed and went to London.

Then the king appointed mo then. xxx. Clerkes the same Fridaye to write with all diligence letters patents, to be sealed with the kinges seale, and to be delyuered to these people: and as they receaued their wrytings, so they departed into their Countries.

But yet the great benome remayned behinde, for Watte Tyler, Jack Strawe, and other of their Captaines sayde, they would not so depart, and there agreed vnto them mo then. xxx. thousand: And thus they abode stil, and made no haste, neyther to haue the kings wryting nor Seale, for their ententes was to haue spoyled the Citie. The which thing all the honest Citezens of London greatly feared, and therefore had priuely in their houses their friends in a readynesse.

When it drewe somewhat toward night, the king came to the Towre in the Royall, where the Princesse his mother beyng in great feare had remayned all that daye, to comfort her and taried there with her all that night.

And here (ſayth Froiſſart) I will tell you what happened among theſe vnhappie people before the Citie of Norwiche by a Capitaine among them named Wylliam Lyſter of Stafford. The aforenamed daye of Corpus Chriſti that the aforeſayde lewde people entered into London, the verye ſame tyme they aſſembled together of Stafford, of Lynne, of Cambridge, of Bedford. And as they were comming towardes London they had a Captaine among them called Lyſter, and as they came they ſtayed before Norwiche, and all the waye as they paſſed, they cauſed euery man to ariſe with them, ſo that they left fewe lewde people behinde them. And the cauſe why they ſtayed before Norwich was this. There was a knight, and a Captaine of the Towne called Sir Robert Sale, he was no gentleman borne, but he was ſage and valiaunt in armes, and for his valiauntneſſe king Edwarde made him knight, & he was of his body one of the mightieſt men in Englād.

william Lyſter Capteyn of the rebels.

Sir Robert Sale a valyaunt knight.

Lyſter the lewde Captayne of this route, thought that this man was meete to be a Captaine among them, to the entent they might be the more dradde and feared of the people: wherfore they ſent vnto him that he ſhoulde come and ſpeake with them in the fielde. The knight conſidered that it were better for him to go and ſpeake with them, rather then by his not goyng he ſhould prouoke them to doe any outrage to the towne, and therefore he toke his horſe, and ryd vnto them all alone, hauyng no company with him. And when they ſawe him, they ſhewed him moſt ioyfull and louing countenaunce and honored him very much, and prayed him to alight of his horſe, for they were deſyrous to common with him, and he ſo did, wherin he did very fondly. And aſſone as he was alighted, they came rounde about him, and began to ſpeake very fayre vnto him, and ſayde. Sir Robert, ye are a knight and a man greatly beloued in thys Countrie, and counted for a valiaunt man. And though you be ſo, yet we knowe you well, ye are no gentleman borne, but ſonne to a Villeyne, ſuche as we be: Therfore we will that ye ſhall go with vs, and we will make you ſo great a Lorde that one quarter of Englande ſhall be vnder your obeyſaunce.

When the knight had heard them thus ſpeake, it offended him not a little, wherefore beholding them with a cruell looke, he ſayde vnto them: Auoyde ye falſe traytorous and vngracious people: wene you that I will forſake the obedience and duety that I owe vnto my ſouereigne Lorde for ſuch a company of knaues as ye be, which ſhould be to my diſhonour for euer? I had rather ye were all hanged, as I doubt not but ye ſhall be, for that will be your ende. And with thoſe wordes he had thought to haue lept againe to his horſe, but he fayled of the Styrop, and the horſe ſterted awaye.

Then they cryed all with one voyce, at him, and ſley him without mercy. And when he heard thoſe wordes he let his horſe go, and drewe out his ſworde, and beganne to ſkirmiſhe with them, and he made ſuche rome about him that it was pleaſure to beholde him, for there was none that durſt come nere him. Howbeit, ſome there were that did approche neere vnto him, but at euery ſtroke that he gaue, he cut of eyther legge, head, or arme, and there was none ſo hardie but that they feared him. He did there ſuche deedes of armes, that it was marueil to beholde, but the number of theſe lewde people were mo then. xl. thouſande, and they ſhot ſore at him and wounded him to death. But yet before he dyed he slue. xij. of them out of hande, beside many other that he hurte: and finally he was stryken to the earth, and they cut of his armes and legges, and then hewed his body all to peeces. And thys was the end of syr Robert Sale, which did not a little offend all the knights and squires of Englande: But now to returne where we left. Sir Robert Sale slayne.

On Saturday, the next day in the forenoone, the king had bene at Westminster, and came from thence on the backsyde through Holborne into London, and thought to haue ridden to the Tower, and as he came ouer Smithfielde, he sawe there Watte Tyler, Jacke Strawe, and their companie assembled together, which caused him a little to stay, and considering them wel, they semed to be nere vnto the number of. xx. thousand, and all this company had the kings Bauners, for they were delyuered vnto them the day before. And these vileynes sayde among themselues, let vs ouerrunne and spoyle this Citie wherein we may haue great rychesse, before that they of Esser, Suller, Cambridge, Bedford, Arundell, Warwike, Redyng, Drenford, Guylford, Lynne, Staffordе, Lyncolne, Yorke, and Durain do come hether, For Walliot and Lister will bring them hether, and they will be Lordes of London if we be not, and therefore nowe seeyng we be first here, why should we not geue the attempt: and to this they were all agreed, and euen therewithall the king came. Walliot. Lyster.

And when Watte Tyler sawe the king, he sayd to his company, yonder is the king, I will go speake with him, stirre not you quoth he to his people, from hence, except I make you a signe, and when I make you a signe, come on together, and slay them all (except the king.) But do the king no hurt, for he is yong, and we shall rule him as we list, and leade him with vs round about England, and so without doubt we may be Lordes of the realme. And therewith he spurred his horse, and came to the king, so nere him that hys horse touched the kinges horses heade as they roade, and the first worde that he sayde vnto the king was this, Sir king, seest thou all yonder people? ye truely sayd the king, wherefore askest thou that? Because sayde he, they be all at my commaundement, and haue sworne to me fayth and trouth, to do all that I will haue them. In a good tyme sayde the king, be it so. Then sayde Watte Tyler, as he that sought nothyng but ryot. What, beleuest thou king, that these people and as many mo that are in London, which are at my commaundement, that they will depart from thee thus, without hauyng thy letters? No sayd the king, ye shall haue them, they are appoynted for you, and shall be delyuered eche of you one after another: Wherefore good felowes withdrawe your selues to your people, and cause them to depart out of London, for it is our entent that eche of you by Villages and Townеships shall haue letters Patentz as I haue promised you. With those wordes Watte Tyler cast his eyen on a Squier that was ther with the king, and bare the kinges sworde. And Watte Tyler hated greatly the same Squier, for wordes that had passed the day before betweene them, and sayde vnto him, what, sayth he, art thou there? Geue me thy dagger. Nay sayd the Squier, that will I not do, wherefore should I geue it thee? The king beheld the squier and sayd, geue it him, let him haue it, and he gaue it him. And when Watte Tyler had it, he began to play wyth it in his hand, turning of it: And then he sayde againe to the Squier, geue me that sworde, nay sayd he, it is the kings An arrogant and prowde villeyn.

ſworde, thou art not worthie to haue it, for thou art but a knaue. And there were no mo here but thou and I, thou durſt not demaund any ſuch things of me, neyther to ſpeake as thou haſt ſpoken, for as much Golde as would lye in yonder Abbey: By my fayth ſayd Watte Tyler, I will neuer eate meate vntill I haue thy head.

And with thoſe wordes the Maior of London came to the king, with xij. horſes well armed vnder their coates, and ſo he brake the preaſe, and ſaw and heard the demeanor of Watte Tyler in the preſence of the king, and he ſayde vnto him, Ha thou knaue, howe dareſt thou be ſo bolde in the kinges preſence to ſpeake ſuche wordes, it is to much to ſuffer thee ſo to do. Then the king began to chafe, and ſayde to the Maior, ſet handes on him. And when the king had ſayd ſo, Watte Tyler ſayde to the Maior, a Gods name, what haue I ſayde to diſpleaſe thee? Yes truely quoth the Maior, thou falſe ſtinking knaue, ſhalt thou ſpeake thus in the preſence of the king my naturall Lorde? I wiſhe neuer to liue, except thou dearely by it. And with thoſe wordes the Maior drewe out his ſworde, and ſtroke Watte Tyler ſuche a ſtroke on the heade, that he fell downe at the feete of his horſe. And aſſoone as he was fallen, he was compaſſed round about, ſo that he was not ſeene of his company. Then a Squier alighted, called John Standiſhe, and thruſt his ſworde into Watte Tylers belly, and ſo he dyed.

And for this the Citie geueth a ſworde in their armes.

Then the vnhappy people there aſſembled, perceyuyng their Capteyne ſlaine, began to murmure among themſelues, and ſayd: A, our Capteine is ſlaine, let vs go and ſlay them all. And therewith they raunged themſelues in the place in maner of battaile, and their Bowes bent before them.

Thus the king began a great outrage, howbeit all happened to the beſt: for as ſoone as Watte Tyler was on the earth, the king departed from all his company, and all alone he roade to the naughtie companie, but before his goyng, he ſayde to his awne people, ſirs, folowe not me, let me alone. And when he came to the vngracious people, who had put themſelues in order of warre, to be reuenged of the death of their Captaine: The king ſayde vnto them, Sirs what ayleth you, ye ſhall haue no Capteine but me, I am and will be your king and Captaine, be you therefore quiet. And a great number that heard him ſpeake, and ſeeyng him in preſence, quieted themſelues, and departed. But ſuch as were wicked and malicioully mynded, would not depart, but made a ſhewe as though they would do ſomewhat.

Then the king returned to his awne company, and demaunded of them what was beſt to doe. Then he was counſayled to drawe into the field, for to flie away was no boote. Then ſayde the Maior, it is good that we do ſo, for I thinke ſurely we ſhall haue ſome comfort of them of London, and of ſuche good men as be of our parte, who are prouided and haue their friends and men armed in their houſes.

And in this meane time, a crye and noyes went through the Citie, how the king and the Maiour were lyke to be ſlayne by theſe naughtie people: By reaſon of which noyes, a great number of good men iſſued out of their houſes, and came into Smithfield where the king was. And they were anone to the number of ſeauen or eyght thouſand men well armed.

Sir Robert Canoll.

Sir Perducas Dalbret.

And firſt, thether came Sir Robert Canol and Sir Perducas Dalbret well accompanied, and dyuers of the Aldermen of London, and with them

fire

ſixe hundzeth men in harneys. And a woꝛthie and puiſſaunt man of the City which was the kinges Draper, called Nicholas Brembꝛe, and he brought wyth him a great companie, and euer as they came, they raunged themſelues on foote in oꝛder of battayle.

And on the other part theſe vnhappie people were readie raunged, makyng countenaunce as though they would preſently fight: and they had with them dyuers of the kings Banners.

There the king made foure knightes. The one the Maiour of London, Syꝛ Nycholas Walwoꝛth, Sir John Standiſhe and Syꝛ Nycholas Brembꝛe. Then the Lozds ſayde among themſelues, what ſhall we doe? we ſee our enimies who would gladly ſley vs, if they might haue the better hande of vs. Syꝛ Robert Canoll counſayled to go and fight with them and ſley them all. But the king would not conſent therevnto, but ſayde: Naye, I will not ſo, I will ſende to them commanndyng them to ſende me agayne my Baners, and thereby we ſhall ſee what they wyll doe: Howbeit, eyther by fayꝛe meanes oꝛ otherwiſe, I wyll haue them: That is well ſayde, quoth the Erle of Salſbury. Then theſe newe knightes were ſent to them, and theſe knightes made token to them that they ſhould not ſhoote at them. And when they came ſo nere them that their ſpeeche might be heard, they ſayde: Sirs, the king commaundeth you to ſende him agayne his Banners. And incontinent they delyuered the Banners, & ſent them to the king, and then they were commaunded vpon payne of their heads, that all ſuche as had letters of the king, to bꝛing them fooꝛth, and to ſende them agayne to the king, and many of them delyuered their letters, but not all. Then the king commaunded them to be all tozne in their preſence. And aſſoone as the kinges Banners were taken from them, they kept none array, but the moſt parte of them thꝛewe downe their bowes, and ſo bꝛake their array, and returned into London. Sir Robert Canoll was ſoꝛe diſpleaſed that he might not ſet on them, but the king would not, but ſayde he would be reuenged on them well enough, and ſo he was after.

Thus theſe beaſtly people departed, ſome one waye and ſome another. And the king and his Lozdes, and all his company right comely and oꝛderly entred into London with great ioye, and fooꝛthwith his grace went to the Lady Pꝛinceſſe his mother, being in the Tower of the Roiall, where ſhe had taried two dayes, and two nightes, in great feare (as ſhe had good cauſe) And when ſhe ſawe the king her ſonne, ſhe greatly reioyced and ſayde: A fayꝛe ſonne, what paine and ſoꝛow haue I ſuffred foꝛ you this daye. Then the king ſpake and ſayde, Madame, I know it right well, but now I pꝛay you reioyce and thanke God, foꝛ it his high time. I haue thys daye recouered mine heritage and the realme of England, which I had almoſt loſt. And thus the king taried that day with his mother, and euery Lozd went peaceably to their awne lodgings. And fooꝛthwith a pꝛoclamation was made in euery ſtreete in the kings name, that all maner of men, not being of the Citie of London, neyther hath dwelt there the ſpace of one yere, to departe. And if any ſuche be founde there, the nexte day, which was Sunday, by the Sunne ryſing, that they ſhould be taken as Traytoꝛs to the king, and to loſe their heades. Aſſoone as this pꝛoclamation was made, they ſparkled abꝛoade, euery man to their awne homes.

And

And here is to be noted that in the tellyng of all this ſtorye, Sir John Froyſſart nameth one John Ball to be a chiefe Captaine, and I finde none other Aucthour that nameth any ſuch, but Jacke ſtraw, and Jacke Shepard. But I thinke it is ſome fault in the print, and that it ſhoulde be John Wall, for in the beginning of the ſtorie is ſet forth that a ſimple prieſt called John Wall was the firſt mouer, and ſpeciall authour, and ſetter forth of this rebellion, and therefore lyke enough that he was one of their Captaines. And it ſhould the rather appere ſo to be, for that in the beginning of their enterprices, they went firſt to the Byſhop of Cauntorburie, and ſpoyled his houſe, and bare ſuche malice vnto him that after they ſlue him in the tower of London. And the ſame Byſhop of Cauntorbury had three or foure times empriſoned the ſayde John Wall for his lewde communication that tended to rebellion, & therfore moſt lyke it ſhould be John Wall, ỳ ſought to be reuenged.

In like maner the aforeſayde author Sir John Froyſſart doth in this ſtory acompt Watte Tyler to be the chiefe of this rowte, whom he ſaith was a Tyler in dede, and an vngracious patrone. But Fabian, Caxton, Raſtell, Cowper, Polidore and many other Aucthours doe inpute Jack Straw to be chiefe, and more Froyſſart ſayeth it was Watte Tyler that bragged with the king, and toke vp the Maior of London in the kinges preſence, and alſo that it was Watte Tyler whome the Maior of London did ouerthrow: But all other ſay it was Jack Strawe, and it ſhould ſeeme rather Watte Tyler, for that in all this diſcourſe he was the buſieſt bragger of all the Captaines. But which of them ſo euer it was, they were naught all.

John Ball and Jacke Straw were founde hidden in an olde houſe.

But nowe ſayth Froyſſart, John Ball, and Jack Strawe were founde hidden in an olde houſe, where they had thought to haue ſtollen awaye, but they could not, for they were accuſed by their awne company. Of the taking of them, the king and his Lordes were glad, he cauſed their heades to be ſtriken of, and Watte Tylers alſo, and commaunded them to be ſet vpon London bridge, and thoſe valiaunt mens heades to be taken downe, which they had ſet on before. Theſe tydings ſpreade abroad ſo, that the people of ſtraunge Countries which were comming towardes London, returned back agayne to their houſes, and durſt come no further.

The end of the hiſtorie of the rebels of Kent.

And here we muſt returne to the Duke of Lancaſter, who all the time of this rebellio was in Scotland in ỳ treatie of a peace as ye haue heard before. And ſo long they continued this treatie, that at the laſt a truce was concluded to remain for thre yeres, & when this truce was cõcluded then the Lordes of eche part made good chere to other. Then ſayd the Erle of Douglas to the Duke of Lancaſter: ſir we know right well of the rebellion of the common people in England, & the peril that the realme is in at this preſent, and ſir we take you for a right ſage & valiaunt man, that in all the tyme of this communication of the treatie ye would not ſeme to vnderſtand anything therof: but ſyr, we ſay now vnto you, & we offer our ſelues to be redy to aide you with .v. or .vj. C. ſpeares, and to do you ſeruice. By my fayth ſaide the Duke, gentle Lords I thanke you, I will not refuſe your friendly offer: howbeit I thinke verily that the king my lord hath ſo good counſail, ỳ it ſhall be pacefied right well: howbeit, I deſyre you to haue a ſaufe conduyt for me & mine to returne into your Coũtrie if nede be, vntill the matter be appeaſed. The Erle Douglas, and the Erle Mozet who had the kinges auctoritie, graunted him hys deſyre, delyre, and so they departed, the Scottes went to Edenbourgh.

The Duke of Lancaster and his people wente to Barwike, wenyng to the Duke to haue entered into the towne, for when he passed that way, he left all his prouision behinde him: But the Capteyne of the towne called Sir Mathew Redmayn denyed him to enter, and closed in the gates against him and his, saiyng he was so commaunded by the Erle of Northumberland. And when the Duke heard these words, he was sore displeased and sayde: Howe commeth this to passe, Mathew Redmayn? is there in Northumberlande a greater souereigne then I am, which should let me to passe this way where all my prouision is with you? what meaneth these newes? By my fayth sir, sayde the knight, this is true that I say, and by the commaundement of the king: and sir, this that I do to you is right sore agaynst my will, but I must nedes do it, and therefore for Goddes sake holde me excused, for I am thus commaunded vpon paine of my life, that I shall not suffer you, nor none of yours to enter into the towne.

Sir Mathew Redmayn Captaine of Berwicke denied the Duke of Lancaster to enter into the towne.

Then the Duke not saiyng all that he thought, brake out of this matter, and sayde, Sir Redmayn, what tydynges out of England? and he sayde, he knewe none, but that the Countries were sore moued, and the king had sent to all this Country to be in a readinesse whensoeuer he should send. Then the Duke mused a little, and sodeinly turned his horse, and bid the knight farewell, and so went to the Castell of Rosebourgh, and the Constable receyued him. Then the Duke of Lancaster was counsayled, that because he was not sure howe the matters went in Englande, neyther knewe not of whome he was beloued, or hated, that therfore he should send vnto the Lordes of Scotland, desiryng them to sende a quantitie of men of warre to conuey him into Scotland: And then he sent to the Erle Douglas, who was as then at Alquest. And when the Erle sawe the letter, he was right glad thereof, and made the Messenger great cheere, and sent worde thereof to the Erle Moret, and to the Erle de la Mare his brother, prayiyng them incontinent without any delay to meete with him at Morlane the thirde day after, with a certeine number well horsed and appoynted. Assoone as these Lordes knewe this, they sent for men and friendes, and so came to Morlane, and there they found the Erle Douglas, and so they roade altogether, to the number of fiue hundreth Speares, and came to the Abbey of Mauros, which was. ix. little myle frome Rosebourgh. And on the way they met the Duke, and there the one embraced the other right louingly, and then kept forth their iourney vntill they came to Edenbourgh, where the king of Scottes of late had beene, but as then he was in the wilde Scottishe. There the Duke of Lancaster was greatly honoured of the Erle Douglas, and of the Barons of Scotland and the Castell was deliuered to the Duke to lie in, and there he lay vntill other newes came out of England, which was not so soone as the Duke had wished. And in the mean season, many naughtie reportes and rumors were raysed and bruted by the rebellious people, of the Duke of Lancaster, affirmyng that he was become Scottish, and a traytour to England: and Lyster, Watte Tyler, Jacke Strawe, John Ball, and other Capteynes of the rebelles affirmed at the present houres of their death, the same to be true. The which caused many shamefull and slaunderous tales to be reported of the Duke in euery parte of England. And no doubt these billeynes bare great hatred hatred to the Duke of Lancaſter, as appered by the brennyng of his houſe, and ſpoylyng of the ſame, and by the murderyng of his Phiſition.

Slanderous and lewde reports made of the Duke of Lancaster.

And ſoone after the death of theſe lewde Capteynes, the king viſited his realme and ſate in ſundrie places, and made inquirie of the aforeſayde rebels, and he perſecuted them in very quiet maner, from one village to another, and from one towne and Countie to another, ſo long vntill at the laſt, he had executed aboue. xb. hundreth of them, and the reſt he pardoned, and ſo all the realme was quieted.

The Duke of Lancaſter returneth home out of Scotland.

Then the king ſent for his vncle the Duke of Lancaſter out of Scotland, whereof he was glad, and at his departing he thanked the Lordes of Scotland of their great friendſhip. And the Erle Douglas, the Erle Moret, and other Lordes of Scotland would nedes bring him as farre as Mauros and there eche toke leaue of other. And thus the Duke came to Roſebourgh, to Newcaſtel vpon Tyne, and ſo to Durham, & Yorke, & at the laſt to Lõdon.

And when he had ſhewed to the king and his Counſaile how he had done with the Scottes: Then he forgate not to ſhewe howe Sir Mathew Redmayn ſhutte him out of Barwike. And the Duke inquired of the king if he would allow that deede, and it ſeemed that the king did but faintly allowe it. So the Duke ſayde no more at that tyme.

And ſhortly after on the day of the Aſſumption of our Ladie in Auguſt, the king helde a ſolempne feaſt at Weſtminſter, vnto the which came many Nobles and Lordes of England, and there was the Erle of Northumberland, and the Erle of Nottyngham, and dyuers other Lordes of the North. And the king made knightes the ſame day the young Erle of Pembrooke, Sir Robert Maubre, ſir Nicholas Twyford, and ſir Adam Fraunces.

Hotte and great wordes betweene the Duke of Lancaſter, and the Erle of Northumberland.

And at this feaſt there were great wordes betweene the Duke of Lancaſter, and the Erle of Northumberland. The Duke ſayd vnto him, Henrie Percye, I knewe not that ye were ſo great a man in England, as to cloſe the Gates of any towne, Citie, or Caſtell, againſt the Duke of Lancaſter. The Erle vnderſtood whereof the Duke meant, and he tempered his ſpeech, and ſayde, Sir I denie not that the knight did, for I can not. For the king here preſent commaunded me ſtreyghtly, that on mine honour, and on my lyfe, I ſhould not ſuffer any maner of perſon, Lord, or other, to enter into any Citie, towne, or Caſtell in Northumberland, without he were heyre of the place. And ſir the king and his Counſaile may well excuſe me, for they knewe that ye were in Scotland, and therefore they ſhould haue excepted you. What quoth the Duke, ſay you that there ought a exceptation to haue beene made for me, who am vncle to the king, and haue kept mine heritage as well or better then any other haue done, next to the king, and knowing that I was gone for the buſineſſe of the realme into Scotlande? This excuſe can not excuſe you, but that you haue done euill, and greatly agaynſt mine honour: and you haue geuen therby an occaſion to bring me in ſuſpition that I had done ſome treaſon in Scotland, when at my returning the kinges townes are cloſed againſt me, and ſpecially there where my prouiſion was: Wherefore I ſay, ye haue acquited your ſelfe right euill. And for the blame and ſlaunder that ye haue brought me into, I nowe to purge my ſelfe, here in the preſence of the king do caſt you here my gage: reyſe it and ye dare.

Then the king ſtepped forth and ſayde: Right louyng Uncle, all that was done, I must take it vpon me. And I must excuse the Erle of Northumberland, and speake for him. For we commaunded him on paine of his life that he should kepe close all the townes of the Marches, and ye knowe well howe our realme was then in great trouble and perill. The fault was in the Clerke that wrote the letters, and in the negligence of our Counsaile: For of truth we should haue excepted you: Wherefore I will and also desyre you, to put apart this euill opinion that ye haue of the Erle of Northumberland, and I take the charge on me, and discharge the Erle in that behalfe. Then kneled downe before the Duke, the Erle of Arondell, the Erle of Sarisbury, the Erle of Suffolke, the Erle of Stafford, and the Erle of Leycester, and sayde vnto him: Sir you here howe louingly and how truely the king speaketh, wherefore we beseech you to agree to his pleasure. Wel quoth the Duke, who was inflamed with yre, I will hold my peace, and as it pleaseth the king to haue it, it is reason that I be content therwith, & so departed.

In this time as sayth Polidore in his boke De Inuentoribus rerum, Gonnes were first in vse, which were inuented by one of Germany. But sayth he, least he should be cursed for euer that was the Authour of thys inuention, therefore his name is hidden, & not knowne. But dyuers say that a Monke was the inuenter, though they name him not. The first inuention of Gonnes.

In the Moneth of Aprill next followyng, there landed in Kent Dame Anne the daughter of Charles the fourth, late Emperour deceassed, and she was Sister vnto Wenceslaus who then was Emperour, the which of the Maior, and Citizens of London was honorably met vpon Blackheth, and conueyed with great triumph vnto Westmynster the eyght day of the month of Maye, and shortly after was there solemply maried vnto king Richard. Anne the daughter of Charles the the fourth late Emperour.

And the sayde yere was a terrible, and a horrible earthquake throughout the vniuersall worlde as many Authours write, but namely in England, that there downe Castelles, Churches, Steples, houses, and Trees, and whole Villages, that ỹ lyke was neuer sene nor heard of before, to the great terrour and feare of all suche as then lyued, and were present. A terrible earth quake.

This yere by the commaundement of Pope Vrbane, Henry Spencer Bysshop of Norwiche, with a great number of Spirituall men and other, went to warre vpon the king of Spaine. And for the maintenance of thys warre, the Pope, as sayth Froissart, had sent vnto the said Bishop more then xxx. Bulles, and also graunted to the king and to his Uncles, to further this enterprise, a Disme of the Clergie. And then the preachers aduaunced and set foorth this voyage to be so acceptable before God, and that the benefite of the Popes Bulles, were of such value for the remission of sinne, that the people of Englande, who soone gaue credite therevnto, beleued verily that if they dyed that yere, they could not come into heauen, except they had geuen somewhat in almose toward this warre. And at Londō (sayth Froissart) and in the Dioceese thereof there was gathered a Tonne full of Gold and siluer, and according to the Popes Bulles, he that most gaue, obteyned most pardon. And whosoeuer dyed in that time, and gaue his goodes to further that voyage, he was cleane absolued from paine and from sinne, and he accompted himselfe most happie that dyed in that season to obtaine so noble an absolution. And thus was gathered a great Masse of money. Bulles are of great force.

This Pope (as Fabian writeth) gaue authoritie to the sayde Bishop

to

to make warre vpon the king of Spaine, for that he contrarie to the Popes commaundement withholde certaine poſſeſſions, belonging of right vnto hyr John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaſter, in the right of his wife dame Conſtance.

But to ſay more truely, as diuers Authours ſaye, it was for the malice that this Pope Urbane bare vnto Pope Clement, to whome the Duches of Iniow had geuen the kingdomes of Naples, Cicilia, Apulia, and Calabria, of the which ſhe wrote her ſelfe Queene.

In perfourmaunce of which act, the ſayde Byſhop entring into the countrie of Flaundyrs, founde there the Flemynges with diuers miſcreaunts, ſuch as the king of Spaine had ſent thether, makyng reſiſtence agaynſt hym: wherefore he made vpon them ſharp warre, and wanne from them certaine townes, as Graueling, Burbourgh, and Dunkirke, and wanne great and riche pillage, ſo that he and his Souldiours ſtuffed and freight with it (as ſayth Reynulph) xlj. ſhippes. But ſhortly after the Flemynges aſſembled with ſuch power and ſtrength, and gaue vnto the Engliſhmen ſuche an aſſault about Dunkirke, that they were conſtreyned to geue back. And becauſe the ſayde ſhippes and goodes ſhould not come agayne into the poſſeſſion of his enimies, therfore he the ſayde Biſhop cauſed them to be ſet on fyre within the Hauen, and ſo were ſpoyled both ſhippes and goodes. And although that after this miſhap he recouered his ſtrength, and layde ſiege vnto the towne of Ipre, and wrought the Flemynges much care and trouble, yet ſhortly after, ſuch ſickneſſes fell among his people, as the Flux and other, that his ſouldiours dyed in great number: For the which he was compelled to leaue his iourney, and to returne agayne into England.

A warlike Byſhop.

In thys yere alſo was a battaile or Combate done and holden in the kings Palayce at Weſtminſter, betwene one called Garcon Appellaunt, and Sir John Anſlye knight Defendaunt, of the which fight the knight was at length the Victour and forced his enemie to yeelde vnto him. For the which the ſayde Garcon was immediatly from that place drawen to Tiborne, and there hanged for his falſe accuſation.

A Combate.

1383 7

And at this time, being the .vij. yere of the reigne of king Richarde, a truce or peace was concluded betwene him the french king, and the king of Scottes for one whole yere next enſuyng, ſo that the french men ſhould geue knowledge thereof vnto the Scottes.

After the concluſion of the aforeſayde peace, certaine Lordes of Englande returning out of Fraunce, and vnderſtandyng that the Frenche king had not yet geuen knowledge vnto the king of Scotlande of the truce, they now thinking to do a feate, aſſembled themſelues with their powers, namely the Erle of Northumberland, the Erle of Nottingham, and the Barones of the borders and Marches of Scotland, and made a road into Scotland, and beganne to brenne the countrie and lande of the Erle of Douglas, and of the Lorde Lyndſey, and left nothing vnbrent to Edenbourgh.

But ſhortly after that the Engliſhmen had done this feate, and were returned agayne into Englande, the Scottes, although then they had knowledge of the peace, that was concluded in Fraunce, yet they would not take knowledge thereof: But the Erle Douglas to be reuenged, entered into Northumberland, and ſo into the lande of the Lorde Percye, and there beganne to brenne, robbe, ſpoyle and deſtroy, and then returned by the lande of the Erle of Nottyngham and the Lord Mowbray, and there did much hurt, and so passed by Rosebourgh, but they taried not there, because they were so laden with pillage, prisoners and Cattell, and so returned into their Countrie againe without any daunger. And thus one michiefe was requyted with another lyke michiefe.

One michief asketh another.

Also, thys yere there came vnto king Richarde the king of Ermony, which was driuen out of his lande by the Infidelles and Turkes, and he prayed aide of the king to be restored to his dominion. The king feasted and comforted him according to his honour, and after counsayle taken with hys Lords concerning that matter, he gaue vnto him great somes of money, and other riche giftes: with the which (after he had taried in Englande about two Moneths) he departed with glad countenaunce.

The king of Ermony.

And in this time a variaunce chaunced betweene John Holland brother to the Erle of Kent, and the Erles sonne of Stafford: By reason of which variaunce in conclusion the sonne of the Erle was slayne by the hande of Sir John Holland: For the which dede the king was greuously amoued.

A variaunce betweene John Holland, and the Erles sonne of Stafford.

This yere the king assembled his high Court of parliament at Westminster, during the which he created two Dukes, a Marques & fiue Erles, The first was syr Edmond of Langley the kinges Uncle, and Erle of Cambridge, who was created Duke of Yorke; syr Thomas of Woodstock Erle of Buckyngham was created Duke of Glouceſter, Sir Robert Uere, who before was created Erle of Oxford, was nowe made Marques of Dublyn, Sir Henry Bolyngbrook sonne and heyre of John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, was nowe made Erle of Darby, Sir Edward sonne and heyre to the Duke of Yorke was made Erle of Rutlande, Sir John of Holland brother to the Erle of Kent was made Erle of Huntyngdon, Sir Thomas Mowbray was made Erle of Nottyngham, and Marshall of Englande, and syr Mighell de la Poole was made Erle of Suffolk, and Chauncelor of Englande, who was hated and iudged to be an euill man, both of the Lords and commons of this realme, as in the yere folowyng shall be shewed. And by authoritie of the same Parliament, Sir Roger Mortimer Erle of March, and sonne and heyre vnto Sir Edmond Mortimer, and of Dame Philip eldest daughter and heyre vnto Sir Lyonell the second sonne of Edward the thirde, was sone after proclaymed heyre apparaunt to the Crowne of Englande. The which Sir Roger shortly after sayled into Ireland, to suppresse the rebellion & vnquietnesse of the people of his Lordship of Wolster, which he was Lorde of by his aforesayd mother. But whyle he was there occupied about the same, the wylde Irishe came vpon him in great number, and slue him and many of his company.

Creation of Dukes and Erles.

This Henry was afterwarde king Henry the fourth.

Mighel de la Poole Chauncelor of England.

Sir Roger Mortymer proclaymed heyre apparaunt.

This Sir Roger had issue, Edmond, and Roger, Anne, Alice, and Alianor that was made a Nonne. The two aforesayde sonnes dyed without issue, and Anne the eldest daughter was maryed to Richarde Erle of Cambridge, which Richard had issue by the sayde Anne, Isabell Ladie Bourcher, and Richard that was after Duke of Yorke, and father to king Edward the fourth, which sayde Richard Erle of Cambridge was put to death by Henrie the fift at Southhampton, as after shall appere.

The issue of Sir Roger Mortimer

Also this yere Sir Henry Bolyngbrooke Erle of Darbye, maryed the Countesse daughter of Harford, by whome he was Lorde of that Countrie.

Henry Bolyngbrooke Erle of Darby.

And by her he had iſſue, Henry that after him was king, Blaunche Duches of Barre, and Philip that was wedded to the king of Denmark: Alſo Thomas Duke of Clarence, John Duke of Bedford, and Humfrey Duke of Glouceſter.

Robert Vere created duke of Ireland.

And where a litle before mencion is made, that ſir Robert Vere was made Marques of Dublyn, ye ſhall vnderſtand, that now the ſame man was created Duke of Ireland, & that the king purpoſed to haue made him king of Ireland if he might, ſuch an affection the king had vnto him, albeit that all the Noble men diſdeyned his high and ſodeyne exaltyng, ſeeyng that many of as good qualities and condicions as he was, and of as good blood, remayned ſtill in their olde eſtate. This Robert was maryed to a fayre yong Ladie of king Edwardes blood, which he forſooke and put from him, and toke vnto him one of a bace blood, a Sadlers daughter, which was borne in the realme of Beame, named Lancicron, which came ouer with king Rychardes wife. The puttyng away of the former Lady, was the occaſion of many great murmures and diſpleaſures agaynſt this Robert Vere, ſpecially by the Duke of Glouceſter Uncle vnto her, which determined vtterly when he ſawe tyme, to reuenge the iniuryes done vnto his Neece. This grudge borne by the Duke of Glouceſter, was not vnknowen to the Duke of Irelande, which caſt in his minde by what meanes he might deſtroy the ſayde Duke, and all thoſe which toke his part. The tyme of Eaſter came, at which ſeaſon it was before appoynted, that the Duke of Ireland ſhould haue taken his voyage into Ireland: But ſmall preparation was made for his goyng ouer: But yet becauſe it ſhould be thought none otherwiſe but ỳ the purpoſe ſhould hold, the king tooke his iourney into Wales, vnder pretence to bring him to Ship: and yet meant nothing leſſe, for his ſpeciall purpoſe was to deuyſe howe he might bring to paſſe to ſet holde vpon the Duke of Glouceſter, the Erles of Arondell, Warwike, and Darbie, with many other noble men: And to this vngracious purpoſe was of counſaile Myghell de la Poole Chauncelor of Englande, Sir Robert Treſilian one of the kinges chiefe Juſtices, and Alexander Neuell Archebiſhop of Yorke, with dyuerſe other, as after in this ſtory ſhall more at large appere. And after that the king had continued a certeine of tyme in Wales, he put off the iourney of the Duke into Ireland, and the king and the Duke returned to London, and thether had ſommoned a Parliament to be holden at Weſtminſter. And theſe thinges thus wrought betwene the king and the other perſons aforenamed, were not kept ſo ſecrete, but that the Duke of Glouceſter, and the other Lordes had thereof knowledge. Wherefore when the tyme of the Parliament came, they came vp euery of them with great power and ſtrength.

And ſoone after the begynnyng of the ſayde Parliament, the aforeſayde Myghell de la Poole Chauncelor (as I finde written in an olde Chronicle, which beareth the name of the Chronicle of Leyceſter) demaunded of the Commons in the kinges name, foure fiftenes, for with leſſe he ſayd that the king could not maintaine his eſtate, and his outward warres. The whole body of the Parliament made aunſwere againe, that without the king were preſent, they would make therin none aunſwere. And they ſaid further that if the king did not remoue this Myghel de la Poole from his office of Chauncelorſhip, they would no further meddle with any acte in thys Parliament,

This message beyng done to the king, the king sent agayne to the Commons that they should sende to Eltham (for there he lay then) xl. of the wisest and best learned of the common house, the which in the name of the whole house should declare vnto him their minde. And then the house were in more feare then they were in before, for a talke there went that the king entended to betrappe dyuerse of them which folowed not his mynde, eyther by that way or else at a banquet, which was appoynted to be made purposely at London, if Nicholas Exton then Maior of London would haue consented therevnto, at which tyme the Duke of Gloucester should haue beene taken. Wherefore the Lordes of the vpper house, and the common house assembled together, and agreed with one assent, that Thomas of Wodstocke Duke of Gloucester, and Thomas Irondell Bishop of Ely, should in the name of the whole Parliament be sent vnto the king to Eltham, which was done, and the king well pleased that they should come.

A dissention betwene the king and the Parliament

Lordes sent by the parliament to the king.

And first when they came into his presence, they most humbly saluted him, and sayd: Most high and our redoubted souereigne Lorde, the Lordes and Commons at this your Parliament assembled, with most humble subiection vnto your most royall Maiesty, in likewise desyre your most gracious fauor: So that they may liue in tranquillity and peace vnder you, to the pleasure of God, and wealth of your realme: On whose behalfe we also shewe vnto you, that one olde statute and laudable custome is approued, which no man can denie, that the king our souereigne Lorde may once in the yere lawfully summon his high Court of Parliament, and call the Lords & commons therevnto, as to that which is the highest Courte of his Realme. In which Court all equitie and iustice must shine, euen as the Sunne when he is at the highest, whereof poore and riche maye take refreshyng: Whereas also must be reformed all the oppressions, wronges, extorcions, and enormityes within the realme, and there to counsaile with the wise men for the maintenaunce of the kinges estate, and conseruation of the same. And if it might be knowen that any persons within the realme or without entended the contrary, there must also be deuised howe such euill wedes may be destroyed. There also must be studied and foreseene, that if any charge do come vpon the king and his realme, howe it may be well and honourably supported and sustayned. Hetherto it is thought to the whole realme, that your subiectes haue louyngly demeaned themselues vnto you, in ayding you with their substaunce to the best of their powers, and they desyre to haue knowledge how and by whome these goodes be spent. One thing resteth yet to declare on their behalfe vnto you, howe that by an olde ordenance, they haue an acte, if the king absent himselfe. xl. dayes, not beyng sicke, but of his awne minde, (not heedyng the charges of the people, nor their great paynes) will not resort to his Parliament, they then may lawfully returne home to their houses. And nowe sir, you haue bene absent a lenger tyme, and yet refuse to come amongest vs, which greatly is our discomfort.

Once in the yere the king may call a Parliament.

The king should be present at the Parliament once in xl. dayes.

To this the king aunswered by these wordes: Well, we do consider that our people and Commons go about to rise against vs: wherefore we thinke we can do no better then to aske ayde of our Cosyn the French king, and rather submit vs vnto him, then vnto our awne subiectes.

The kinges aunswere to the Lordes.

The motions agayne of the Lords to the king.

The Lordes aunſwered, Sir that counſaile is not beſt, but a way rather to bring you into daunger: For it is well knowen that the French king is your auncient enemie, and your greateſt aduerſarie. And if he ſet foote once within your realme, he will rather diſpoyle you, and inuade you, and depoſe you from your eſtate royall, then put any hande to helpe you. You may call to your remembrance, how your noble progenitors Edward the thirde, and Edward the Prince your father, toke great laboures vpon them, in heat and colde with great anguiſhe and troubles, and laboured without reſt, to conquere the realme of Fraunce, the which rightfully did apperteyne vnto them, and nowe vnto you. Pleaſeth you alſo to remember how many Lords noble men, & good commons of both realmes died in thoſe warres, and what great goodes the realmes expoſed & conſumed in ſuſteynyng of the warres. And nowe great pitie it is to here, that more burthens be dayly layde vpon your ſubiectes neckes, for mainteynyng of your charges, who are brought vnto ſuch vncredible pouertie, that they haue not to pay their houſe rents, nor to ayde theyr Prince, nor yet to haue ſufficient for their neceſſarie ſuſtenance: For ſo is your power depouerished, and Lordes and great men brought to infelicitie, and all your people to great debilitie. And as that king can not be poore that hath riche people: ſo can not he be riche that hath poore Cõmons. And as the king taketh hurt in this, ſo doth the Lordes and Noble men, euery one after his hauiour. And all theſe inconueniences be commonly by euill counſail which are about you. And if you put not the ſoner your helpyng hands for the redreſſe of ỳ premiſſes, this realme of England ſhalbe brought to naught and vtter ruyne, which cleerely ſhould be layde vnto your default, and in your euill counſail: Seyng that in the time of your father, this realme throughout all the worlde was highlye eſteemed, and nothing ordered after theſe wayes: Wherefore we be ſent vnto you, to exhort you, to ſequeſter all ſuch perſons as might be the occaſion of ruyne, eyther of you, or of your Realme.

The king is appeaſed, and promiſeth to come to the Parliament.

By theſe good perſwaſions the king was appeaſed, and promiſed within three dayes after, to come to the parliament, and to condiſcend to their peticions. And accordyng to his appointment he came. And ſone after his comming John Fortham Biſhop of Durham was diſcharged of the Treaſorerſhip, and in his place was ſet the Biſhop of Herdford. Alſo there was then diſcharged and put downe Mighell de la Poole Chauncelour of Englande to his great ſhame and rebuke: And in his rome was placed Thomas Arundell Biſhop of Elye, by the whole conſent of the parliament. After this Mighell de la Poole was charged with manye and great enorme crymes, fraudes, falſities and treaſons by him done and committed, to the great preiudice of the king and of his realme, and therupon was committed to ward: Notwithſtandyng, they would not adiudge him to death, nor diſgrade him from the honor of knighthood: But as ſome write, they deemed him to pay a fyne of twentie thouſande Markes, for ſuche aduauntages as he had gotten, beyng Chauncelour, in putting the kings ſubiects from expedition of their cauſes, vntill ſuche tyme as they had rewarded him: All which fynes were adiudged to the king in relieuyng of the commons. And alſo one thouſand pounds of yerely rents, which he had purchaſed. This done, the Lords and wiſe men of the realme, conſidering that by the couetouſneſſe of the offi-ters aforesayd, the kings treasure and goodes were purloyned and from the kinges profite clerely consumed: The king and the realme thereby sore decreased and empouerished: Tillage also layd downe in many quarters of the realme, and the kinges officers this notwithstanding marueilously enriched: wherfore they did chose. xiij. Lordes which should haue the ouersight vnder the king of the whole realme. Of the which, three were the new officers, that is to saye, the Bishop of Ely Chauncelour, the Bysshop of Herford Treasorer, and Nicholas Abbot of Waltham keeper of the priuie seale, and ten other, which were Wylliam Archbishop of Cauntorbury, Alexander Archbishop of Yorke, Edmond Langley Duke of Yorke, Thomas Duke of Gloucester, Wylliam Bysshop of Winchester, Thomas Bishop of Exceter, Richard Erle of Arundell, John Lorde Cobham, Richarde Lorde Scrope, John Lorde Deueror: All which had aucthoritie to enquire, intreate, defyne and determine of all maner of causes, querels, debtes and demaundes from the time of Edward the thirde vnto that present daye, as well within the realme as without, and also to enquire of the kings charges and of the order of his seruaunts. For the execution wherof well and truely to be done, they all tooke their othes, and the king in lykewise tooke his othe to abyde by their order, and them to mayntaine in all their actes, and not to reuoke any article of their commission, but to holde firme and stable all that euer the sayde counsaylors did order, during the time to them assigned. And if it happened that all the number could not come together to a determination of anye acte, that then if. vj. of them with the three principall officers aforenamed did agree, the act should stande firme and stable, whether they were matters of this side the sea or beyond the Sea. And if any manner of person attempted to moue the king to infringe any parte of thys ordynaunce, and that being knowne, for the first time, he should be depriued of his goodes and possessions, and for the second time, to be drawen thorough the Citie, and so put to execution as an arrant traytor. And for that the king should the rather shew his benuolent fauour in confirming these actes deuysed by the parliament. There was graunted vnto him halfe a deeme of the Spiritualtie, and halfe a deeme of the Temporaltie, to be payde at the feast of Saint Mighell then next, if it seemed to the Lordes and counsaylours that it was neede.

Thirteene Lordes chosen by ỹ parliament, by the kings assent to gouerne the realme.

The commission appereth in the statute of the .x. yere of king Richard the second.

The othes of the Lordes and of the King for due execution of the cõmissiõ.

A gift geuen to the king condicionally

These determinations notwithstanding, the king suffred Mighell de la Poole Erle of Suffolke which was prisoner at Wyndsore, to go at large, and not long after came Robert Tresilian, chiefe Justice of the common benche to Couentrie, and endited there two thousand persons. And the king and the Queene came vnto Grobye, and thether came vnto him by his commaundement the Justices of the Realme, and there were present all these euill Counsaylors, that is to say, Alexander Archebishop of Yorke, Robert Ueere Duke of Irelande, Mighell de la Poole, Robert Tresilian and their felowes. Of whome it was demaunded if it might stande with the lawes of the Realme, that the king might reuoke the ordynaunces by hym and hys realme made in his last parliament, which he accorded vnto in maner by constreynt. And they made aunswere that the king might well reuoke and make frustrate all their actes at his pleasure, for they were actes aboue the lawes.

out of the Northy parties, and helde a ſolempne counſayle in the Caſtell of Nottyngham the morowe after Saint Bartholomewes day. In the which counſayle was ſyr Alexander Archebiſhop of Yorke, Robert Veer Duke of Irelande, Mighell de la Poole Erle of Suffolk, Robert Treſilian Juſtice, Robert Bramble Juſtice and ſundry other. And al theſe Juſtices were commaunded to ſet to their handes to the queſtions vnder written, that by the meanes thereof, theſe ſeducers, which were about the king, thought they might haue good occaſion to put the Duke of Gloucester and all the other Lords to death, which were the laſt Parliament, as aforeſayde, ordeyned to haue the gouernaunce of the realme, and all other that were conſenting to the ſame. Dyuers there were of the Juſtices which refuſed to ſet to their hands, but they were conſtreyned thereto, among the which was John Belknap, who vtterly refuſed it, vntill ſuch time as the Duke of Ireland and the Erle of Suffolk compelled him therunto, which if he had ſtill refuſed, he had not eſcaped their hands. And when he had ſet to his ſeale: Nowe ſayth he, here lacketh nothing but a rope, that I maye receyue the worthy death for my rewarde, and I knowe that if I had not done thys, I could not haue eſcaped your handes, and nowe it is done for the kings pleaſure and youres, I haue deſerued death of the Lordes, which ſhortly folowed, for in the nexte parliament he was condempned and put to execution. And for that thys ſhould be in remembrance, an act of counſaile was made therof, in maner as foloweth.

A company of euil Juſtices and Counſaylours.

Memorandum that the .xvb. daye of Auguſt in the .xj. yere of the reigne of king Richarde the ſecond, at the Caſtell of Nottyngham afore the ſayde king, Robert Treſilian chiefe Juſtice of England, Robert Belknap chiefe Juſtice of the common benche, John Holte, Roger Fulthorp, and Wylliam Brough knightes, and felowes of the ſayde Robert Belknap, and John Lockton, one of the kings Sergeaunts at the law, being perſonally required in the preſence of the Lordes, and other witneſſes vnder written, by our ſayde ſouereigne Lorde the king, in the fayth and allegeaunce, by the which they are firmely bounden to the ſayde king, that they ſhould truely aunſwer to certayne queſtions vnder written, and before them recited, and vpon the ſame by their diſcretions to ſaye the lawe.

Articles propoſed and anſwers made vnto them.

1 Firſt, it was aſked of them whether the newe ſtatute and ordynaunce and commiſſion made in the laſt parliament holden at Weſtminſter, be hurtfull to the kings royall prerogatiue?

Wherevnto all of one minde aunſwered, that they be hurtfull, and ſpecially becauſe they were agaynſt the kings will.

2 Item it was inquired of them, howe they ought to be puniſhed which procured the ſayde ſtatute, ordynaunce and commiſſion to be made?

Wherevnto of one aſſent they anſwered, that they deſerued to be puniſhed by the Capitall payne, that is to ſay of death, onleſſe the king of his grace will pardon them.

3 Item, it was inquired how they ought to be puniſhed which excited the king to conſent to the making of the ſayde ſtatute, ordynance and commiſſiō?

Wherevnto of one minde they ſayde, that onelelſe the king would geue them his pardon, they ought to be puniſhed by the Capitall paine.

4 Item, it was enquired of them, what paine they deſerued that cōpelled the king to conſent to the making of the ſaid ſtatute, ordinance & commiſſion?

Where-

Wherevnto of one assent they gaue aunswere, that as Traytors they ought to be punished.

5 Item, how they ought to be punished that interrupted the king, so that he might not exercise those thinges that apperteyned to hys regality and prerogatiue?

Wherevnto of one assent it was aunswered, that they ought to be punished as Traytors.

6 Item, it was enquired of them, whether that after the businesse of the realme, and the cause of that assembly of the parliament were by the kinges commaundement disclosed and declared in the parliament, and other articles lympted by the king, vpon which the Lordes and commons of the Realme ought to procede in the same parliament: If the Lords and commons would in any wise proceede vpon other articles, and in no wise vpon the articles lympted by the king, till the king had answered the Articles expressed by them, notwithstandyng that they were by the king enioyned to the contrary: whether the king in this case ought to haue the rule of the Parlyament, and in deede to rule, to the intent that vpon the articles lympted by the king, they ought first to proceede or not, before they proceeded any further?

To which question, of one mynde they aunswered, that the king in this parte should haue the rule in order one after another, in all other articles touching, vntill the ende of the parliament. And if any doe contrarie to thys rule of the king, he ought to be punished as a Traytor.

7 Whether the king whensoeuer it pleased hym, myght not dissolue the Parliament, and commaunde hys Lordes and Commons to departe from thence or not?

Wherevnto it was of one mind answered, ỹ he may. And if any would procede in the parliament against ỹ kings wil, he is to be punished as a traytor.

8 Item, it was inquired that for as much as it is in the king to remooue suche of the Justices and officers as doe offende, and to iustefie and punishe them for their offenses, whether the Lordes and commons might without the kings will empeche the same officers and iustices vpon their offenses in the parliament or not?

To thys aunswere was made, that they might not: And he that did contrarie, was to be punished as a Traytor.

9 Item, it was inquired, howe he is to be punished that mooued in the Parliament that the statute whereby Edward, the sonne of king Edward, great Graundfather to the king that nowe is, was indited in the parliament might be sent for, by the inspection of which statute, the sayde newe statute or ordynaunce and commission were conceaued in the parliament.

To the which question of one accorde they aunswered, that as well he that so somoned, as the other which by force of the same motion brought the sayde statute into the parliament house, be as crymynous and Traytours to be punished.

10 Item, it was enquyred of them, whether the iudgement geuen in our parliament, holden at Westminster agaynst Wighell de la Poole, late Erle of Suffolk, were erronyous and reuocable or not?

To the which question, of one assent, they sayde, that if the same iudgement were now to be geuen, the same Justices and Sergeaunt aforesayde would would not geue the ſame, becauſe it ſeemed to them that the ſame iudgement is reuocable and is erronyous in euery parte. In witneſſe whereof the Iuſtices & Sergeaunt aforeſayde to theſe preſents haue ſet to their ſeales, theſe men being wytneſſes. Alexander Archebiſhop of Yorke, Robert Archebiſhop of Dowblynd, John Biſhop of Durham, Thomas Biſhop of Cheſter, John Biſhop of Bangor, Robert Duke of Ireland, Mighell Erle of Suffolke, John Rypon Clarke, and John Blake.

But here a little to returne backe: Ye heard before in the. viij. yere of the reigne of this king, that a peace was concluded with Englande, Fraunce and Scotland for one yere next to come. And that the Frenche men ſhoulde geue knowledge thereof to the Scottiſh king, and ſo it was that the French king ſent his Ambaſſadors into Scotland, and they paſſed through England to geue the Scottiſhe king knowledge of the peace. In the meane time that the French Ambaſſadors lay in Scotlande, among other thinges, the Erle Douglas ſayd vnto them, ye ſee our Coũtry, but ye conſider not the ſtrength thereof, for we are ſo lodged vpon England, that we may at our pleaſure enter which way we luſt, and brenne and ſpoyle foure dayes iourney into the realme, and returne againe at our pleaſure, we lacke nothing but men, had we a thouſand Speare men of Fraunce to ioyne with the power that we can make, we might geue England ſuch an ouerthrow as England neuer had, and this my Lordes were good for you to kepe in remembrance, and to ſhew the Lordes of Fraunce at your returne, that the next and redyeſt way to perſecute and conquere England, is to enter with vs into their land. The aforeſayde Ambaſſadors did lightly credit this tale, and at their returne forgat not to make report thereof vnto the counſaile of Fraunce, of the which diuers of them alſo thought it a right good way: Wherefore againſt the ſayde peace ſhould expire, they made prouiſion toward Scotland, mindyng to enter that way vpon England.

The French king purpoſed to enter & bere England three maner of wayes.

And at this time, there were bruted abroad in England diuers thinges, namely that the French king entended to aſſaile England with a mighty puiſſaunce, and that three maner of wayes. The one out of Britteyn, for that the Duke of Britteyne was become Frenche. The other by Normandie, for the which as it was ſayd, the Conſtable of Fraunce made his prouiſion at Harflew, and Deepe. And the thirde by Scotland.

The French king ſent a power into Scotland, purpoſing that way to ouerthrowe England.

In the beginnyng of May, Sir John de Vien Admirall of Fraunce, accompanied with a thouſande Speares of choſen knightes and Eſquiers, and fiue hundreth Croſbowes, with harneſſe to arme a thouſande Scottes, landed in Scotland, & at the laſt arriued at Edenbourgh, which is the cheefe towne in Scotland. And aſſone as the Erle Douglas, and the Erle Morey knewe of their comming, they went to the Hauen and met them, and receyued them right louingly: ſaiyng that they were right welcom into that Coũtrie. And at that time the king of Scottes was in the wilde Scottiſhe. But it was ſhewed theſe knightes, that the king would be there ſhortly, wherewith they were content, and ſo they were lodged thereaboutes in the Villages. For Edenbourgh though the king kept therein his chiefe reſidence, yet it is not like Paris, nor yet like Turney, nor Valenciens. For in al the towne there is not foure thouſand houſes. Therefore theſe Lordes and knightes were lodged in Villages about, as well as they might be in that Countrie.

Paris. Tourney. Valenciens.

When

When knowledge came into the Realme of Scotlande, that a greate number of men of armes of Fraunce were come into their Countrie: some thereat did murmure and grudge, and sayde: who the deuill hath sente for them? what do they here? Cannot we mainteine our warre with England without their helpe? we shall do no good as long as they be with vs, and so let them be tolde, that they may returne againe. And say vnto them, that we be strong inough in Scotlande to mainteine our warre without them, and therefore we will none of their companie, they vnderstand not vs, nor we them: They will quickly rifle and eate vp all that euer we haue in this Coũtrie: They will do vs more despight and dammage, then though the Englishemen fought with vs. For if the Englishemen brenne our houses, we care little therefore, for we may soone make them againe cheape inough, for in three dayes we will make them againe, if we may get foure or fiue stakes, and a fewe Bowes to couer them.

This was the communication of the Scottes at the commyng of the Frenche men, for they set nothing by them, but hated and spake shametully, and vilanously of them, like to rude people without all humanitie. And all thinges considered (sayth Froissart) it was to great an armie of so many noble men to come into Scotland. For.xx.or. xxx. Knightes of Fraunce had bene better then all that number of a thousand, and the cause is, that in Scotland ye shall find lightly no man of honour or nobilitie, neyther that knoweth what belongeth to a Gentleman. They are like wilde and sauage people, they couet to be acquainted with no straunger, and they are full of emy at the prosperous estate of others, and they are euer in feare to lose that they haue, for it is a poore Countrie. And when the Englishe men make any roade or voyage into the land, they are euer compelled to haue their victualles folowe them: for in Scotland they shall finde nothing. Neyther is there in Scotland yron to shoe their horses, nor leather to make harnesse for their horse, as Saddels, Bridels. &c. But they haue all these thinges readie made out of Flaundres. And when that prouision fayleth, then is there none to get in that Countrie.

The French men are euill welcomed to Scotland.

A description of Scotland and their maners.

When the Barons and Knightes of Fraunce, who were wont to finde fayre hostreyes, Halles hanged, and goodly Castelles, and soft beddes to rest in, sawe themselues in that necessitie: They began to smile, and sayde to the Lorde Admirall, Sir this is a pleasaunt iourney, we neuer knewe what beggery was vntill now, and now we finde it true, that our old fathers were wont to say: go your way, and ye liue long ye shall finde hard beddes.

The Admirall pacifyed them as well as he might, and sayde: It behoueth vs to suffer a little, and to speake fayre, for we be here in daunger, we haue a great long way to go, and by England we can not returne, therefore let vs quietly take in good worth that we finde.

Yet there was another thing that was greatly grieuous to the Frenche men: For when they were in Scotland, and would ryde, they found horses vnreasonably deare, for that which was not worth. x. Floreyns, they would not sell vnder an hundreth, and muche paine to haue them for their money. And when they had a horse, then had they neyther Bridle nor Saddell, except they brought them with them. In this trouble and daunger were the French men: Yea, and moreouer, when their Uerlets went forth a forraging, and and had laden their horſes with ſuch as they could get for money, in their returne home, the Scottes themſelues which had taken their money for the forage, did lie in wayte of them, and tooke all that they had from them, and ſlue them, ſo that there was none that durſt go a foragyng, for in a moneth the French men loſt of their varlettes mo then an hundreth, for if they went fourth three or foure together, they neuer returned againe, and thus the Frenche men were handeled in Scotland.

The deceipt & cruelitie of the Scottes.

Alſo now the French men deſired that the king of Scottes would come forward, and likewiſe the Lordes and knightes of Scotland, for the tyme paſſed away. And they aunſwered and ſayd, that they would make no warre on England at that tyme: and this they ſayde, becauſe they would make the French men pay well for their commyng: For before the king would come out of the wilde Scottiſh to Edenbourgh, he demaunded of the Admirall of Fraunce to haue a great ſomme of money, for him and his people. And the Admirall of Fraunce was faine to promiſe, and to ſeale that the king ſhould haue a certeine ſome of money before that he and his company departed his Realme. And if he had not done this, he ſhoulde haue had none ayde of the Scottes. And yet when he had made the beſt agreement with them that he could, he gate but little by them, as in the ende will appere.

A deſcription of Robert King of Scottes.

At the laſt, king Robert of Scotland came to Edenbourgh, with a paire of blered eyen, and it ſemed they were lyned with ſcarlet. And it appered by him, that he was no valiaunt man of armes, but that he loued rather to lye ſtill, then to ryde: He had.ix. ſonnes, and they loued well armes. So when the king was come, the Lorde and knightes of Fraunce drewe vnto him and did their duetie. And there was preſent with the king the Erle Douglas, the Erle Moret, the Erle de la Mare, the Erle of Surlant, and dyuerſe other, There the Admirall required the king that the cauſe of their commyng might be accompliſhed, which was to make a iourney into England.

The Barons, knightes, and Eſquiers of Scotland aunſwered and ſaid, that if God pleaſed, they would make ſuch a voyage that ſhould be to their honour and profite.

The king then ſent out his commaundement to aſſemble his power, & at a day appoynted, there were redy.xxx.thouſand men all on horſebacke.

Sir John Vien Admirall of Fraunce thought the tyme long, and faine would haue bene doyng of ſome great feate in Englande: when he ſawe the Scottes were come together, he made haſte and ſayde, Sirs, it is now time to ride, we haue lyen ſtill a great while. So then they ſet forwarde to Roſebourgh.

The king himſelfe went not in this iourney, for he abode ſtill in Edenbourgh, but all his ſonnes were in the armie. The thouſand complete harneſſe which the Frenche men brought with them, were deliuered to the knightes of Scotland, who were before but euill harneſſed, and had neede of that harneſſe.

Then they rode toward Northumberland, and ſo long they roade, that they came to the Abbey of Manes, and there they lodged all about the riuer of Tyne, and the next day they came to Morlan, and ſo before Roſebourgh.

The keper of the Caſtell of Roſebourgh vnder the Lord Mountagew, was a knight called Sir Edward Clifford. The Admirall of Fraunce, and the the Scottes taryed and behelde well the Castell. And when they had well considered it, they thought to assail it should not be profitable for them, wherfore they passed by, and drewe along the ryuer syde approchyng to Barwike, and so long they road, that they came to two towers right strong, the which were kept by two knightes, the father and the sonne, both were called Syr John Strand. About these Towers were faire Laundes, and a faire place, the which incontinent were brent, and the two Towers assayled, and there were many feates of armes shewed, and diuerse Scottes hurt with shot and throwyng of stones: But finally the Towers were wonne by plaine assault, and the knightes taken, the which manfully defended the same as long as they might.

And after the conquest of these two Towers, they went to another Castell called Uerley, belongyng to Sir John Mountagew, and vnder him was Capteine thereof Sir John of Lushborne, who had there with him, his wife, and his children, and all his goodes. And he knewe well before that the Scottes would come thether: and therefore he had furnished this Castel to the best of his power to abide the assault. So about this Castell taryed all the armie. This Castell stoode in a fayre Countrie, by a fayre Ryuer that commeth out of Tymbre, and renneth into the sea. And one day there was a great assault geuen to the sayd Castell, and the Frenche men bare themselues right well that day, much better then did the Scottes, for they entered into the ditches, and passed through with muche paine: There were manye feates of armes done, what by them aboue and them beneath. The Frenche men mounted vp by Ladders, and fought hande to hande with Daggers on the walles.

Uerley Castel is assaulted by the Scottes.

Sir John Lushborne did quite himselfe as a valiaunt knight, & fought with the French men hande to hande on the Ladders. At this assault, there was slaine a knight of Almaine called sir Bleres Gastelain, which was great pitie. There were many hurt that day: But at the last the number of Scots and French men were so great, that the Castell was wonne, and the knight and his wife, and children taken, and.xl. other prisoners. And then the Castell was brent, and rased downe, for they saw well that it was not to be kept, seeyng it stood so farre within England as it did.

Uerley Castel taken and rased downe.

Then the Admirall and the Scottes roade towarde Anwike, and there they had knowledge that the Duke of Lancaster, the Erle of Northhumberland, the Erle of Nottyngham, with a great number mo, were comming vpon them with a great power.

When the Admirall of Fraunce heard these tydinges, he seemed to be very ioyfull, and in like maner were all the Barons of Fraunce, and all the Scottes: But they were counsailed to returne againe toward Barwike, because of their prouision that folowed them, and to be nere to their awne Coũtrie, and there to abyde their enemies. And so they returned towarde Barwike, and so to their awne Countrie.

Tydings was brought into England how the Frenchmen and Scottes were in Northumberland, and had destroyed and brent the Countrey. The king of England knowyng before of the comming of the Frenchmen, made great prouision for Scotland, both by sea and lande. And by sea, the king had. xxvj. shippes laden with victuall and prouision coastyng the Frontiers of Englande, and readie to enter into euery hauen of Scotland.

The king of England entreth Scotland with a great power.

The king himſelfe came accompanied with his Uncles, the Erle of Cambridge, and ſyr Thomas Holland, the Erle of Salſburie, the Erle of Arondell, the Erle of Pembrook, the Erle of Stafford, the Erle of Huzien, the Lord Spencer, and ſo many other Barons and knightes, that they were foure thouſand ſpeares, beſide them that went before with the Duke of Lancaſter, the Erle of Northumberland. ꝛc. Which were two thouſand ſpeares, and. xv. hundred Archers, beſide verlets.

And it was tolde the king that the Scottes and Frenchmen were lyke to fight with the Engliſhmen that went before, and therefore the king made ſuche haſte, that he came to the Marches of Dureſme, and there he heard that the Scottes were returned into Scotland.

The king paſſed ſtill forwarde, beyng accompanyed with eyght thouſand men of armes, and. lx. thouſand Archers, and paſſed Berwike, and ſo into Scotland to the Abbey of Maros. The which Abbey, in all the warres that had bene betwene Englande and Scotlande, was neuer hurte, vntill this time, and nowe was it vtterly ſpoyled and brent, for it was the entent of the king neuer to returne into Englande, vntill he had deſtroyed a great peece of Scotlande, becauſe they brought in Frenchmen to the deſtruction of Englande.

The Abbey of Maros in Scotlande ſpoyled and brent.

When the Admirall of Fraunce knewe that the king of Englande was paſſed the ryuer of Twede, and was entred into Morland in Scotlande, Then he ſayde to the Barons of Scotland, Sirs, why doe we lye here ſtill? Let vs go forth and looke on our enimies, and fight with them.

It was ſhewed vs before we came hether, that if ye had out of Fraunce but one thouſand of good men of armes, ye ſhould be ſtrong enough to fight with all the Engliſhmen, and I aſſure you, ye haue no here then. xv. C. of good knights and ſquiers, and ſuche as will ſtande by it, and take that fortune that God doth ſende.

The Scottes aunſwered and ſayde, Sir we beleue well that ye and your company are choſen men and valiaunt: But ſyr we haue knowledge that al the power of England is here at this preſent, and there were neuer ſo many Engliſhmen aſſembled together in theſe partes as are nowe, and if ye will, we will bring you into place where ye ſhal wel ſee and aduiſe them. And then if ye thinke them meete to be foughten withall, we wyll not refuſe it. Then ſayde the Admirall, I pray you let me ſee them. And they brought him to a Mountaine, where vnder the hill was a paſſage that the Engliſhmen muſt nedes paſſe, and they ſawe them and viewed them to be to the number of ſixe thouſand men of armes, and. lx. thouſand Archers and other.

Then ſayde the Admyrall to the Erle Douglas, and the Erle Morel, in dede here is no egall number to fight with them, for ye are not aboue. xxx. thouſand, and yet many euill armed. But now aduiſe your ſelues beſt what is to be done, they are now entred into your Country, and they are enough to ouerrunne al your Country, and to deſtroy it: if ye are not minded to encounter with them, what will ye then do? ye ſayd ye could enter out of your countrie dyuers wayes into dyuers places of England: And I thinke it beſt that we make them ſome warre there as they doe vs here. And herevnto all the Barones of Scotlande agreed and ſayde, we are well contented ſo to doe, and we knowe dyuers wayes. And they agreed to go into Wales, which is otherwise called Winsland, and so to go to the Citie of Carlisle, and there to be reuenged. And so they left the Englishmen in Scotlande, and they went by the Forestes and Mountaynes. And the Scottishe king was gone to the wylde Scottishe, and there remayned.

The king of Englande, with his Uncles, Barons, Knights and army went to Edenborough, the chiefest towne in all Scotland, and there laye .v. dayes, and at his departing set fyre on it, and brent it downe to the ground. And lykewise he brent Estreuelyn and the Abbay therevnto adioynyng. Also they brent Saint Johns towne, and the towne of Streuelyn, the towne of Dondee, and to be short, they spared nothing that stood in their waye, neyther Towne, Village, Abbey, nor Church, for they might doe in Scotland what they would, for there was no people left to resist them. For all the people were gone with the Frenchmen & Scots toward Carlisle, as aforesayd.

Scotland is sore spoyled and plagued.

Now when the king had thus spoyled, destroyed, and brent Scotland, the Duke of Lancaster aduised hym to folow the Scottes and Frenchmen to Carlisle. And there were other considered that Winter approched, and that the passage ouer the Mountaynes and forests would be long and daungerous, and that it would be no small thing to victuall still that great army. Wherefore at the last, by the meane of the Erle of Orford, the king was fully perswaded to returne into Englande as he came, and so he did.

The king returneth agayne into England, not meting with any Scotte that durst encounter him.

The French Lordes and the Scottes lykewise, as aforesayd, made a roade into Northumberlande betweene the Mountaynes, brennyng Manoures and Townes, and all that stood in their waye, and did much hurte, and besieged the Citie of Carleisle, but they gaue it ouer, & returned againe into Scotland the same waye they went, but the Frenchmen sayde, they neuer entended to go that way any more.

The Frenchmen returne into Scotlãd as men weerie of that iourney.

When the Admyrall of Fraunce and hys companye, were returned to Edenborough, then they tasted of some paine, for they founde the Towne cleane brent, and destroyed, so that there was nothing to be had for money, Wynes there were none, so that for drinke, they had none but small Ale or Beere, and their Bread was made of Barley and of Otes. Also their horses were dead for hunger, and foundred for pouertie. And when they woulde haue soulde them, they wist not to whome, nor there was none that woulde geue them one penny, neyther for horse, nor for harneys. The Souldyours tolde their Capitaines how they were delt withall, and they knewe it to be true by their awne experience, and their seruaunts sayde that they could not endure with that miserie: They sayde that the Realme of Scotlande was such a coũtrie as no host were hable to endure there a Wynter, for if they did they should eyther dye for cold, or starue for hunger, or both. And also if they should departe asunder, and serche for their lyuyng abroad in the Countrie, they doubted that the Scottes would slay them in their beddes. The Admyrall considered wel all these things, and saw all was lyke to be true that they sayde: Howbeit he was in purpose to haue bidden there all the Wynter, and to haue sent vnto the French king, and to the Duke of Burgoyne, and to haue had newe prouision of money and victualles, and to haue made a new freshe warre agayne the next Sommer. Howbeit he sawe well the euill nature and maner of the Scottes, and consydered well the perill of his people, and therfore he gaue leaue vnto all ſuche as would, to departe. But at their departing, then was the miſchiefe: For the Lordes coulde finde no paſſage for themſelues, nor yet for their men. The Scottes would that ſuch knights and ſquiers as were but poore, ſhould departe, to the entent that they might rule the remnaunt at more eaſe. And they ſayde to the Admyrall, Sir, let your men departe when you will: But as for your ſelfe, ye ſhall not departe out of this Countrey, vntill we be fully ſatiſfied of all ſuch charges and dammages as we haue borne and ſuſteyned all this ſeaſon with your army. This communication ſeemed harde to the Admirall and to the other Barons of Fraunce. And the Admyrall ſhewed all this matter to the Erle Douglas, and to the Erle Moret, who ſeemed to be ſore diſpleaſed, that they were ſo hardly delt withall. And ſo theſe two Erles ſpake to the other Erles, and Barons of Scotlande, who ſayde howe they had loſt as well as they. But they aunſwered, ſayeng, although you diſſemble with them, we will be recompenſed. Then theſe two Erles ſayde to the Admyrall and to the other Lordes of Fraunce, that they could not rule the other Lords nor commens: wherefore it behoued them, if they purpoſed to go out of the realme, to ſatiſfie the commons, and to reſtore vnto them all their dammages.

Howe the Frenchmen opened their griefes one to another.

Howe the Scots handled the frenche men.

The Admirall of fraūce is driuen to a ſtreight.

And when the Admyrall ſawe that it woulde be none otherwiſe, he thought he would not leeſe the more for the leſſe, and he conſidered well how that he was without comfort, & cloſed in with the Sea, and ſaw how that the Scottes were of a wylde opynion, and therefore agreed to the Scottes requeſt, and cauſed a proclamation to be made, that all maner of perſons that could proue that anye of his people had done them any dammage, let them come to the Admyrall, and he would recompenſe them the value thereof, the which proclamation appeaſed the Scottes. And ſo the Admyrall became debter to them all, and ſayd how he would not depart out of Scotland vntill all the complayntes were fully ſatiſfied and payde. Then dyuers knightes and Squyres had paſſage, and ſo returned wythout eyther horſe or harneis, curſſing the day that euer they came into Scotlande, ſaiyng that there were neuer men that had ſo harde a voyage, wyſhing that the French king had peace wyth Englande one yere or two, and ſo both kings together to go into Scotlande, vtterly to deſtroy that Realme for euer, for they ſayde they neuer ſawe ſo euyll people, nor ſo falſe, nor more fooliſhe people in feates of warre. The Admyrall of Fraunce by them that firſt departed, wrote his letters to the French king, and to the Duke of Burgoyn, certefying them what caſe he was in, and howe the Scots dealt with hym, and that if they would haue hym to come home, they muſt ſend thether ſuche ſummes of money as he was become debtor for, to be payde to the knightes, Squires and commons of Scotland. For the Scottes ſayd playnely that the warre that they made into England, at that tyme, was for Fraunce, and not for themſelues. And therefore all ſuche dammages as they had taken by that iourney, they would be fully recompenſed agayne before he went out of Scotland, to the which he had ſworne and agreed.

The reporte of the frenche men howe they lyked Scotlande.

The French king and his counſayle were bounde to redeeme agayne the Admiral, for they ſent him thether. Then the ſommes of money were ordeyned for, and payde by exchaunge in the Towne of Bridges, and ſo the Scottes were ſatiſfied, and the Admyrall tooke his leaue in Scotland and departed departed into Fraunce.

Nowe when the Admirall was returned into Fraunce to the yong king Charles, and to the Duke of Burgoyn, and they demaunded of him the condicion of the king and the Lordes of Scotland: He answered, that the Scottes somwhat resembled the English men, because they are enuious to straungers. And moreouer he sayd, that he had rather be Erle of Sauoy, or Erle of Arthoys, then to be king of Scottes, and sayd also that he had seene all the power of the Scottes in one day together, as the Scottes sayd themselues, and yet he neuer sawe together, not past. v.C. Speares, and.xxx. thousande men of warre, the which number against the Englishe Archers, or against a thousand of other good men of armes, could not long endure.

The report made by the Admirall vnto the frenche of the estate and maners of Scotland.

Then the Admyrall was demaunded if he had seene the puyssaunce of England: He aunswered, yea, for on a day quoth he, when I saw the Scots flie away for feare of the Englishemen, I desyred them to bring me where as I might see and aduise the Englishe hoste, and so they did. I was set at a streight passage, where as they must nedes passe, and to my iudgement, they were. lx. thousand Archers, and fyue or seuen thousand men of armes. And the Scottes sayde, that it was all the power of England, and that there were none abydyng behynde.

Then the king and his Counsaile studied a little, and at the last sayd, it is a great thing of. lx. thousand Archers, and. vj. or. vij. thousande men of armes. It may well be, quoth the Constable, that they may make that number: But I had rather fight with them at home in their awne Marches with that number, then here with halfe the number: And so I haue heard my father say often tymes when I was yong. By my fayth, sir quoth the Admirall, if ye had bene there with a great number of men of Armes, as I supposed ye should haue bene, I thinke we had famished all in Scotland. And thus an ende of the French mens voyage into Scotland.

Nowe ye haue heard of the iourney that the Frenche men made into Scotland against England, and ye haue also heard before, that the Frenche king entended to enter into England, and made prouision for the same three maner of wayes. First by Scotland, as ye haue alreadie heard, the second by Britayn, because the Duke of Britayn was nowe reconciled to the Frenche king, and thirdely by Normandie, in the which two places he made prouision of a huge armie, and nauie, as after shall appere.

And while the aforesayd French men were busie in Scotland agaynst the Englishe men, as aboue sayde, the yong French king Charles, and his Uncle the Duke of Burgoyn and Constable of Fraunce, had great desyre and affection to go with an army into England, and all knightes and squires of Fraunce did very well agree therevnto, saiyng why should not we once go into Englande to see the Countrie, and to learne the pathes of the same, as they haue done in Fraunce. So that forthwith great prouision and furnyture for that voyage was made in Fraunce on all sydes, and tares and tallages set and assessed vpon the Cities, townes, and Burgesses of the same, and in the plaine Countrie, that in an hundreth yere before there had beene none such seene nor heard of. And also great prouision made by sea all the Sommer tyme vntill the moneth of September, they did nothing else, but grinde Corne, and bake Bisket. And at Tornay, Lisle, Doway, Arras, Amiens,

A great prouision made by the frenche against Englande.

Bethune, ſaint Omers, and in all the Townes about Scluſe, they were occupied to lyke purpoſe. For the Frenche king by the aduiſe of his counſaile purpoſed to take the Sea at Scluce, and ſo to enter England, and to deſtroy the ſame. They that were riche men in the Realme of Fraunce to the ayde and furniture of this voyage, were tared and ſealled at the thirde penny, and fourth part of their goodes, & many payd more then they were worth beſides.

And from Spaine, and from the Porte of Ciuile to Pruce there was no great ſhip on the Sea that the French men could lay theyr handes vpon, neyther any ſhip that was vnder their obeyſance, but they were reteyned for the French king. And his men, and his other prouiſion came from all partes, and arryued in Flaundyrs, both wyne, ſalt, fleſhe, fiſhe, otes, hay, Onyons, Biſket, flower, egges in Pipes, and all maner of thinges that could be deuyſed, ſo that the prouiſion was ſo great as it could not be beleued of any, but of ſuch as ſawe it. Beſydes this, Lordes, Knightes, Eſquiers, and men of warre were written vnto and deſyred to come and ſerue the Frenche king in this iourney, out of Sauoy, Almaine, and from the Sonne goyng downe, to the lande of the Erle of Armínack. And ſo theſe Lordes of farre Countries, as the Erle of Sauoye was reteyned with fiue hundreth ſpeares. Alſo the Erle of Armínack, & the Dolphyn of Annerency, though they were of farre Countries, yet they made their prouiſions ſo great and coſtly, that it was a great marueyle to thinke thereof: And it was a wonder to conſider from whence ſuch prouiſion came, what by land, and what by ſea into Flaundyrs, as to Bruges, to Dan, and to Scluſe. Alſo there was ſent for into Holland, Zeland, Middlebourgh, Zirickzee, Dordright, Stonehoue, and to all other townes on the ſea coaſt, and to the riuers enteryng into the ſea, for all maner of ſhippes that could do any ſeruice, and all were brought to Scluce. But the Hollanders, and Zelanders ſayd to them that reteyned them, if ye will haue our ſeruice, pay vs our wages cleerely, or elſe we will not go to any Porte, and ſo they were payde, wherein they did wiſely. And (ſayth Froyſſart) I thinke that ſithen the creation of the worlde, there was neuer ſene together ſo many great ſhips as were at ỳ tyme at Scluſe, and at Blanquerge: For in the moneth of September in the ſayde yere, they were numbred to be.xij. hundreth, lxxxvij. ſhippes at Scluſe: And their Maſtes ſeemed in the ſea lyke a great Wood or Foreſt. And the Conſtable of Fraunce his ſhip, was apparayled and furniſhed at Lenterginer in Bruteyn. Alſo the Conſtable of Fraunce cauſed to be made in Bruteyn of Tymber, a Cloſure for a Towne, made like a Parke, that when they had taken lande in Englande, to cloſe in their fielde to lodge therein with more eaſe and ſafetie. And whenſoeuer they ſhould remoue their fielde, the Cloſure was ſo made, that they might take it a ſunder in pieces, and a great number of Carpenters and other were retayned in wages to attend therupon. And whoſoeuer at that tyme had beene at Bruges, at Dan, or at Scluſe, and had ſeene the buſineſſe that there was in chargyng and ladyng of ſhippes with haye, ſackyng of Biſket, and ladyng of Onyons, Peaſon, Beanes, Barley, Candelles, hoſen, ſhoes, ſpurres, knyues, daggers, ſwordes, Targettes, Ares, Mattockes, Nayles of all ſortes, Wymbles, Hammers, Beddes, Cowches, Horſe ſhoes, Pottes, Pannes, Candleſtickes, Candles, Torches, Piche, Tarre, Roſen, Ropes, Gables, Ankers, ſhot Powder, Ordinaunce, Armor, and of all other thinges neceſsarye that might be thought vpon, as Bootes, Clokes, Saddelles, Bry-dles, Bittes, Stirops, and Stirop leathers, stalyng Ladders, and a num-ber of thinges mo that I can not reherce. Whosoeuer (sayth Froissart) that had bene there and had seene it, although he had bene right sore sicke, yet it woulde haue made him to haue forgotten both hys disease and paine. The lustie ponkers of Fraunce talkyng among themselues, had almost none other talke, nor made none other accompt, but that the Realme of England should haue beene vtterly spoyled and destroyed for euer and euer, without all mer-cie and recouerie.

Of this great preparation and prouision the king of England and his counsayle were well informed, and the king was certainely assured that the French king would come into England, for so had he & his Nobles swore. And although at the first heryng of thys wonderfull great prouision, it dyd somewhat abashe the Englishmen, which was no great maruayle. For as the matter of it self was very great, so the same was reported to be ten times much more then it was. And agayne, although the Englishmen vnderstood of this great prouision, yet were they not in certaintie, whether the same was wholy purposed to lande in England, or else to laye siege to Calice both by land and sea. For the Englishmen knewe well that of all the Townes of the worlde, the French men most coueted to haue Calice: Wherefore the king of England sent to Calice great prouision of Wheat and other grayne, Salt, Flesh, Fishe, Wyne, Beere, and other thinges. And thether was sent Sir Thomas Holland Erle of Kent, Sir Hugh Cauell, Sir Wylli-am Helman, Sir Dangosses, syr Walter of Vrnes, Sir Water Paulle, syr Wylliam Toncet, syr Lewes of Mountalbon, syr Coiers of Dambrichi-court, and fine hundred men of armes, and fine hundred Archers, and the Erle Richard of Arondell, and syr Henry Spencer were ordeyned to keepe the Sea, with .xl. great shippes well furnished and trimmed with the num-ber of three hundred men of armes, and sixe hundred Archers.

The king of Englād was certefied of the prouision that ỹ french king made to enter the realme of Englande.

Agayne an other report was bruted abroad that this army of the French being so furnished and appoynted, was not meant to go neyther to Calice, neyther yet into Englande, but rather was altogether purposed against the towne of Gaunt. And (sayth Froissart) as I was informed, the towne of Gaunt the same season doubted greatlye that all that prouision was to come vpon them: But they were in a wrong beliefe, for the Duke of Burgoyne their Lorde meant towards them nothing but rest and quiet, although that Fraunces Atreman were shortly after the making of the peace at Tourney slayne, which happened rather by his awne folye, then by anye displeasure that the Duke ought vnto him: but because that matter doth not properly touche this our discourse for Englande, I therefore passe it ouer.

Sundrye bruites and reports were made of the intention of this great Nauie and armie of Fraunce.

Frances Atreman slaine.

And now agayne to returne to the prouisions that were made at thys season at Dan, and at Sluce, it is not had in remembrance of man, neyther in writyng was euer the lyke seene or read of the charges of thys prouision, for, sayth Froissart, Gold and siluer was as fast spent by the French king, as though it had reigned out of the Clowds, or that it had come out of the some and skomme of the sea.

The French king himselfe, as yong as he was, had more minde and de-syre to this iourney into England, then any other, and so he shewed himselfe alwayes to the ende thereof. And nowe to go forward, euery man helped to make prouiſion for other, and to garniſhe and bewtifie their ſhippes, and to paynt them with their armes, and to aduaunce and make them a glorious ſhewe to the whole worlde. Painters at that time were well ſet on worke, and the time was to them very profitable, for they had whatſoeuer they deſyred, and yet there could not enow of them be gotten for money. They made Banners, Penons, Standards of ſilke, ſo ſumptuous and comely that it was a maruell to beholde.

Great coſt vainly ſpent.

Alſo they peynted the Maſtes of their ſhippes from the one ende to the other, glittering with Golde, and deuiſes and armes that was maruelous ryche: and ſpecially (ſayth Froiſſart) as it was tolde me, the Lorde Guy of Tremoyll ſo decked, garniſhed, and bewtified his ſhip with peynting and colours, that it coſt him two thouſande Frankes of french money, that is more then. CCxxij. pound of the curraunt money of Englande. And in lyke maner did euery Lorde of Fraunce ſet foorth his deuiſe and ſhewe.

And as it is before ſayde, all that hath beene reherſed, and whatſoeuer elſe was done in Fraunce concernyng the aduauncement of this iorney, was well knowen in Englande, which brought ſome feare among them, and therefore they cauſed dyuers generall proceſſions to be made in euery good Towne and Citie three times in the weeke, wherin prayer was made with feruent ſpirite and deuocion vnto almightie God to be their Protectour and ſhield agaynſt their enimies, and the perill that the realme was then in. And yet notwythſtanding, there were in Englande at that tyme more then a hundreth thouſand that hartely wiſhed and deſyred that the Frenchmen myght arryue in Englande. And thoſe luſtie young laddes, as triumphyng among themſelues and their companions would ſay, let theſe frenchmen come, there ſhall not one taple of them returne agayne into Fraunce. And ſuche as were in debt and cared not for the payment thereof, they reioyſing greatly at the comming of the frenchmen would ſaye to their creditors when they demaunded their debt of them, Sirs, be you patient a little and beare wyth vs, for they forge in Fraunce newe Floreyns wherewith ye ſhall be payde. And in truſt thereof they lyued and ſpent very largely. And when they coulde not be credited, they woulde ſaye, what woulde ye haue of vs, it were better for you that we ſhoulde ſpend freely the goodes of this Realme, rather then the Frenchmen comming hether ſhould finde and conſume the ſame.

At thys time the king of Englande was in the Marches of Wales, and wyth him the Erle of Oxford, by whoſe aduiſe the greateſt thinges in Englād were gouerned, & without whoſe aduiſe nothing in effect was done. Alſo there was with the king as chiefe of hys Counſayle, ſyr Symond Burle, ſyr Nicholas Braule, ſyr Robert Tauilion, ſyr Robert Beauchamp, ſyr John Saluen, and ſyr Mighell de la Poole. Alſo there was named Syr Wylliam Neuell, brother to the Lorde Neuell. All theſe as the talke went, did wyth the king what they would. And as for the kings Uncles, the Erle of Cambridge, and the Erle of Buckyngham could doe nothing wythout it were agreable to the other aforeſayd. And this trouble and difference among themſelues was well knowne in Fraunce, which greatly aduaunced the enterpryce of the French king.

Now when the king and the Lordes of Englande were truelye informed that the French king was ready with his power to enter into England and to destroy it, then they drewe together in counsayle. And the king at that tyme beyng in Wales, as afore sayde, was written vnto by his Uncles and other of the counsayle, that it was meete and necessary for hym to come to London where his Lords, and he might best consult for the weale and defence of his realme.

The king forthwith returned towarde London with the Queene hys wyfe, and came to Wynsore, but shortly after, he came to Westmynster, and thether came vnto him all the Lordes of his counsayle, and there tooke aduice what things were to be done agaynst this iorney, and enterprize of the Frenche king.

The king of England with his counsaile taketh aduice for the defece of England.

Then ỳ Erle of Sarisbury, who was a right valiant and prudent knight sayde before the king and hys Uncles, and before all the Lords and prelates of England that were there present. Sir, my souereigne Lord, and all ye my Lords and other, it ought not to be marueyled at if our aduersary the french king doe come and runne vpon vs, for sithen the death of our late souereigne Lorde and noble king Edward, one of the puyssauntest Princes that euer reigned, this noble realme of Englande hath beene in great hazard and aduenture to haue beene lost and destroyed euen with the lewde and naughtie people brought vp and nourished in the same, which thing is not hidden from Fraunce, and that which is worse, it is well knowne that we among oure selues are not in perfite loue and vnitie, and that maketh our enimy so bolde. And herevnto I wyll specyally direct my speeche, to moue and exhort that peace, vnitie, and loue may be had amongest our selues, and that beyng first had, and faythfully and louyngly graunted of euery of vs, we shall the better deuyse the resistaunce and withstandyng of our forreyn enimies. And nowe to beginne with that matter. First it is meete that we ordeyne a sufficient power for the defence of all oure enimies at euery Porte, Hauen and Creke, within this realme, that our Country receaue no dishonour blame nor dammage. And then let vs with all diligence see well to the defence of all oure good Fortes, holdes, Cities and good townes, and endeuour our selues to the good consideration and defence of the same.

The worthy and godlye counsayle geuen by ỳ Erle of Sarisbury.

Nowe when the Erle of Sarisbury had ended his tale, his wordes and saiyng was very well noted, as the wordes of a sage and valeant knight, and there was no replie made, but with one voice they consented to enter into deuises for defence. And first they thought it most meetest to prouide for the defence of those Hauens where they thought the Frenche king was most lykest to lande. And for that the Erle of Sarisburies possession in parte marched nere vnto the Isle of Wight, which is right ouer agaynst Normandie, and the Countrie of Caulx, therefore he with his Archers and power was there placed for the defence of that frontire. The Erle of Deuonshire was appointed to be at Hampton, with two hundreth men of Armes, and. vj. hundreth Archers, to defende the Hauen and towne. The Erle of Northumberland was placed at Rye, with two hundreth men of Armes, and. vj. hundreth Archers. The Erle of Cambridge was assigned to Douer, with. v. hundreth me of Armes, and. xij. hundreth Archers. And his brother the Erle of Buckingham, at Sandwich with. vj. hundreth men of Armes, and. xij. hundreth Archers. The Erle of Stafford and the Erle of Pembrooke were assigned to Orwell hauen, with.v.hundreth men of armes, and.xij.hundreth Archers. And ſir Henry Percey, & Foulx Percey, were appoynted to Yarmouth, with three hundreth men of armes, and.vi.hundreth Archers. And ſir Symond Burle was appoynted Capteyne of Douer Caſtell. All the Hauens and Portes betwene the riuer of Humbre, and Cornewall, were relieued with men of armes and archers.

And on the Mounteines and hilles all along the ſea coaſt, vpon the frontiers, lying againſt Flaundres and Fraunce, were placed certeine numbers of watchmen, but in ſuch maner (ſayth Froiſſart) as I can not well deſcribe: But as I heard, they had empty Pypes filled with ſande, one ſet vpon another, and on the height of them was place made where the watch men might both ſtand and ſit, and there they continued their watche both night and daye, hauyng alwayes ſpeciall eye and regarde towarde the ſea, hauyng in ſpeciall charge that when they eſpyed any naupe of Frenchmen drawyng towardes them, that then they ſhould cauſe certeine Beacons beyng nere vnto them, to be ſet on fyre, that by reaſon thereof the people might be drawen the ſooner to that place, to awayte for the enemie. It was alſo ordered, that if it fortuned that the French nauie came, that they ſhould ſuffer the French king peaceably to take lande, and all his, and to enter into the land three or foure dayes iourney, and that then they ſhoulde firſt go betweene the ſea and them, and to fight with his ſhippes if they could, and to deſtroy them, and to take their prouiſion from them, and then to followe the Frenche men, but not immediately to fight with them, and to harry them and keepe them wakyng, and to kepe them from goyng a foragyng, and from the deſtruction of the Country, and ſo alſo by diligent folowing of them, they ſhould be brought to great lack and ſcarcetie. This was the opinion and order of this counſaile of England. And at that time alſo it was agreed, that Rocheſter bridge ſhould be broken downe, where there is a great Ryuer ronnyng from Arondell, in the County of Suſſex, and entereth into the Thames, and ſo into the ſea againſt the Ile of Tenet: and this bridge they of Londō, to be the more ſure, did beat downe.

Great taxes ſet vpon the people both in Fraunce and in England.

And where as the taxes and tallages were great in Fraunce: In likewiſe at that tyme they were great in England, ſo that the realme felt great griefe thereof. There were at that tyme ready in England for defenſe, of good fighting men, a hundreth thouſand Archers, and.x.M. men of armes.

Here the French men courageouſly make a ſhow to ſet forward againſt England.

Nowe the time approched, that euery man beganne in Fraunce to ſet forwarde, cryng, and ſaiyng, Now let vs go on theſe curſſed Engliſhe men, who haue done ſo many miſchiefes and wickednes in Fraunce, the tyme is at hande, that we ſhall be reuenged vpon them for the death of our fathers, brethren, and kinſmen, whome they haue cruelly ſlaine and diſcomfited. Then the French king tooke his leaue of the Queene his wife, and of the Queene his mother, and of the Duches of Orleaunce, and of all the other Ladies of Fraunce, and the ſame daye hearde a moſt ſolempne Maſſe in our Ladie Churche in Paris, and he ſayde that he purpoſed neuer to returne againe to Paris, vntill he had bene firſt in England. And the next day early he road to Senliſe: But all this while the Duke of Berry was ſtill in his Countrie of Berrye, although great prouiſion were made for him, both in Flaundres and at Scluſe. And likewiſe the Duke of Burgoyne was then in his Countrie, but he forthwith toke his leaue of the Ducheſſe, and of his children, and determined termined to take his leaue of his great aunt the Ducheſſe of Brabant, and ſo he departed out of Burgoyne, and roade in great eſtate, and the Admyrall of Fraunce in his company, and ſir Guy of Tremoyll, & ſo they came to Brurſelles, and there found the Duches of Brabant and other Ladyes, who receyued him with great honour. And two dayes he taryed there with them, and then tooke his leaue, and from thence he road to Mons in Henault, and there he found his daughter the Ladie of Oſtreuant, and Duke Aubert, and his ſonne, ſir William of Henault Erle of Oſtreuant, who receyued the Duke with great ioy, and ſo brought him to Valenciens. And the Duke was lodged in the Erles Palace, and Duke Albert in the lodgyng of Vicongnet, and the Ladie of Oſtreuant. And from thence the Duke roade to Doway, and ſo to Arras, and there he founde the Ducheſſe his wife tarying for him. Then the Frenche king came to Compaigne, and ſo to Noyon, and from thence to Peron, and ſo to Bapalmes, and ſo to Arras, and dayly there came downe people from all partes, in ſuch great numbers that the Countrie was almoſt eaten vp. And to ſay truth, nothing remayned in the Countrie, but it was taken from them, without making any payment for the ſame. So that the poore Commons that had gathered together their cornes, had nothing left them but ſtrawe, and that alſo was taken from them, and if they made any complaint thereof, they were eyther beaten or ſlaine. There Pondes were fiſhed, there houſes beaten downe for fyre wood: So that if the Engliſhe men had arriued in that Countrie, they could haue done them no more hurt, neyther was it likely that they would haue done ſo much hurt vnto them as the Frenche men did. And when the poore pitifully called vpon them for ſome amendes, they anſwered, as nowe we haue no ſiluer to pay, but when we returne we will bring inough, and then euery thing ſhall be fully anſwered and payde. But when the poore people ſawe their goodes thus taken away and ſpent, and that they durſt not complaine thereof, they curſſed them betwene their teeth, ſaiyng: Get ye into England, or to the deuill, and God graunt that ye neuer returne againe.

The French king came nowe to Liſle in Flaundyrs, and his two Vncles with him, the Duke of Burgoyn, and the Duke of Burbon, for as yet the Duke of Berrey was behinde in his owne Country, and made prouiſion for his iourney. And with the king at Liſle was the Duke of Barre, the Duke of Lorayn, the Erle of Armynack, the Erle of Sauoy, the Erle Dalphyn of Annetinge, the Erle of Geneue, the Erle of Saint Paule, the Erle of Ewe, the Erle of Longueuile, and other great Lordes of Fraunce, in ſuch number as I am not able (ſayth Froiſſart) to name them. The report was, that there ſhould paſſe into England, xx. thouſand knights, and ſquiers, which certeinly were a goodly company, alſo. xx. thouſand Croſbowes, and xx. thouſand of other men of warre, which were perſons that ſhould enter into England, & remaine in the fielde, beſyde all the full furniture of the whole nauie vpon the ſea. And at this tyme ſir Oliuer Cliſſon was in Briteyn, and prouided there for his buſineſſe and nauie, and was appointed to bring with him the Cloſure of the fielde made of Tymber, whereof mencion is made before. And with the ſayde ſir Oliuer Cliſſon Conſtable of Fraunce, ſhoulde come out of Briteyn the beſt knightes and Eſquiers therein, as the Vicount of Rhoan, the Lorde of Rays, the Lord of Beawmanour, the Lorde of de la

Vale,

Vale, the Lorde of Rocheforte, the Lorde of Maleſtroyt, ſir John of Maleſtroyt, and fiue hundreth Speares Britons choſen men of warre. For it was the Conſtables purpoſe and entent, that no man ſhould enter into England, without he were a man of armes choſen. And he gaue charge to the Admirall, ſaiyng: take hede that ye charge not our Shippes with Uerlettes and boies, for they ſhall do more hurt then profite. So that two or three knightes, without they were great maiſters & Capitaynes, although they hyred ſhips for their money, yet ſhould they haue but one horſe ouer, & one Uerlet. And to ſay the truth, they ordeyned all theyr buſineſſe in ſo good order, that dyuerſe were of that opinion, that if they might arriue altogether in England, where as they entended to lande (and that was at Orwell Hauen) howe that they ſhould haue put the Countrie in great feare, and ſo they ſhould haue done without all doubt. For the great Lordes both ſpirituall and temporall, & the people of the good townes of England were in great doubt: But the Commons and poore people made ſmall accompt thereof, no more did the poore Gentlemen, for they deſyred the warre, eyther to leaſe, or to winne all. And they ſayde one to another, I truſt God hath ſent vs a good tyme, for that the Frenche king will come into this Countrie, he ſheweth himſelfe to be of a valiaunt courage, and we haue not heard of three hundreth yeres paſt, of a French king of like courage, but he doth it to make his ſouldiours good men of warre: And we thanke him that he will thus viſite vs, for nowe we ſhall attaine to ſome riches, or elſe ſhortly make an ende of our lyues.

Nowe the Frenche king came downe to Liſle, to ſhewe that the iorney pleaſed him, and to come the neerer to his paſſage. And it was commonly ſpoken in Flaundyrs, and Arthoys, that the french king and his armie taketh Sea on Saturday, on Mondaye, one Tewesday, ſo that euery daye in the weeke it was ſayde, he departeth to morowe. And the kinges brother, the Duke of Thourayn, and the Biſhop of Beauoys Chauncelour of Fraunce, and dyuers other great Lordes tooke their leaue of the king at Liſle, and they returned to Paris, and it was ſayde, how that the king had geuen and committed the gouernaunce of the Realme of Fraunce to his ſayde brother the Duke of Thorayne, and to dyuers other Lordes, as the Erle of Bloys and other. And yet all this time the Duke of Berry was behinde, and came fayre and ſoftly, for he had no great appetite to this iourney of going into England: But his long taryeng was very diſpleaſaunt vnto the king, and to the Duke of Burgoyn and to the other Lords, for they would fayne haue bene gone. Still great prouiſion was made, which was very coſtly and dere vnto them, for that which was not worth two ſhyllings, they payde.x. ſhyllings, and yet they would nedes haue it, for euery man deſired to be well furniſhed, in maner of an enuie that euerie man deſyred to be better appointed then other. And though the great Lordes were well payde their wages, other poore felowes bought the bargayne full dere, for ſome had owyng vnto them for a Moneths wages, and yet could get nothing. The Treaſorer of the warres and Clerkes of the Chamber of accompts ſayde. Sirs, content you vntill the next weeke, and then ye ſhall be payde, and ſo they were aunſwered weekely. And if any payment were made vnto them, it was but for eyght dayes, when they were owyng eyght weekes. So that ſome of the wiſer ſorte, when they ſawe thys maner of dealyng, and howe they were ſo

euill payde, they were much offended and sayde, this voyage will be of small effect: For it is most lykely, or at the least to be greatly suspected, that so sone as the money is collected and gathered of suche tares as were set, that then they will breake this iorney and returne home agayne into their awne countreyes, and those which cast these doubts, and prouided for themselues, were wise. But the poore Gentlemen and common souldyours, who had spent all that euer they had, and euery thing was so deere in Flaundyrs, that hard it was to get eyther bread or drinke, and specially if any were in suche neede (as there were a great number) to sell his armour to make money of, there was no person to buy it, neyther was there anye money to geue him for it. There was suche and so great a number of people about Dan, Bruges, and Ardenburgh, and specially at Sclus, that when the king came thether, they wist not where to lodge him. The Erle of saint Paule, the Lorde of Cowey, the Lorde of Anuergne, the Lorde de Antoigne, and dyuers other Lordes of Fraunce: and to lye the more at their ease, they were lodged at Bruges, and dyuers times they resorted to the king at Sclus, to knowe when they should departe. And euer it was sayde vnto them that within three or foure dayes, or when the Duke of Berry doth come, and also that we haue winde to serue vs. And thus euer the time passed, and the dayes shortened, and the yere began to ware foule, and colde, and the nightes long, the which expence and losse of time muche greeued and offended the Lordes, not onely for that their charges were great, but also most chiefly for that by their long tarryaunce, their victualles much diminished.

And in this meane time Lyon king of Armony: who being in Fraunce, and had assigned vnto him by the French king sixe thousande Frankes by the yere, which is one thousand Marke of the currannt money of England, toward the maintenaunce of hys estate. And at this time he tooke on him for a good entent to go into England to speake wyth the king there, and his counsayle, to see if he might perswade anye maner of peace to be had betwene the two realmes of Englande and Fraunce. And so he departed from his lodging of Saint Aulbyn beside saint Dionise, onely with his awne company and without any great furniture: and so he roade to Bolleigne, and there he tooke shypping, and landed at Douer, where he founde the Erle of Cambridge, and the Erle of Buckyngham, and mo then an. C. men of armes, and two thousand Archers, who laye there to keepe that passage. For the brute went that the French king would lande there, or else at Sandwich. And at this time the king of Englande laye at London, and parte of his counsayle with him, and daylie heard tydinges from all the portes of England.

The arriuall of Lyon king of Armony at Douer.

When the king of Armony was arryued at Douer, he had there good cheere, because he was a straunger, and so he came to the kinges Uncles, who receaued him right honorably. And at tyme conuenient they demaunded of him from whence he came, and whether he would. The sayde King of Armony sayde, that in trust of goodnesse he was come thether to see the king of Englande and his counsayle, to treate for peace betwene Englande and Fraunce, for he sayde he thought that the warre was not meete, for he sayde by reason of the warre betwene these two Realmes, which hath endured so long: The Sarazens, Jewes and Turckes are waren proude, for there is none that maketh them any warre, by reaso whereof I (saith he) haue loſt my lande and realme, and am not lyke to recouer it agayne without there were firme peace in all chriſtendome. And I would gladly ſhew this matter which in effect toucheth all chriſtendome, vnto the king of Englande and to his counſayle, as I haue done vnto the French king. Then the kings Uncles demaunded of him if the french king had ſent him hether or no? he anſwered and ſayde, nay there is no man that ſent me, but I am come hether by mine awne motion, to ſee if the king of England and his counſayle would any thing bende to the intreatie of peace. Then it was demaunded of hym where the french king was? he anſwered I beleue he be at Scluſe. I ſaw him not ſince I toke my leaue of him at Scluſe. Thē he was demaūded how he could make anye entreatie of peace, hauing no power ſo to do? And they ſayde moreouer vnto him, if ye be conueyed to the king our Nephew, and to his counſayle, and the French king in the meane ſeaſon ſhould fortune wyth hys puyſſaunce to enter into England, ye may hap thereby to receaue great blame, and your perſon to be in great ieopardie with them of the Countrie. Then the king aunſwered, I am in ſuretie of the french king, for I haue ſent vnto hym, deſyring that vntill I returne agayne, not to remoue from Scluſe. And I repute him ſo noble, and ſo well aduiſed, that he wyll graunt my deſyre, and that he will not enter into the Sea vntill I returne agayne vnto him. Wherefore, right honorable and valiant gentlemen, I pray you in the inſtance of loue and peace, to conuey me to ſpeake with the king, for I deſyre greatly to ſee him: Or elſe ye that be his Uncles, if ye haue auctority to geue me aunſwere to all my demaundes. Then the Erle of Buckyngham ſayde, Syr king of Armony, we be here ordeyned to keepe and defend thys paſſage and Frontier of Englande, and we haue no charge to meddle anye further with the buſineſſe of the realme, without we be otherwiſe commaunded by the king: But ſyr ye be come for a good entent into this countrie, and ye are right hartely welcome. But ſyr, for any certaintie of aunſwere ye can haue none of vs, for as now we be not of the counſayle. But we will cauſe you to be conueyed to the king without perill or dammage. The king thanked them and ſayd, I deſire nothing elſe but to ſe the king & ſpeake with him.

The next day the king of Armony was conueyed with a good conduct that the Lordes appointed vnto him for feare of any reencountries. And at the laſt he came to London, and ryding thorough London, he was well receaued becauſe he was a ſtraunger. And when time was conuenient, he was brought to ỹ king, who lay then at the Royall, which was then the Quenes Wardrobe, neere vnto Watlyngſtreete in London.

When the comming of the king of Armony was knowne, the kinges counſayle drewe to the king, to here what tydings the king brought in that troubleous ſeaſon. When the king of Armony was come into the kings preſence, he made his due ſalutations, and then began to ſhew the preſent eſtate of Fraunce, and how he was come from thence, ſpecially to ſee the king of Englande, whome he had neuer ſene before, and ſayde, howe that he was right ioyous to be in his preſence, truſting that ſome goodneſſe ſhould grow thereby. And then he vttered with many wordes, that to withſtand the great daunger of the preſent miſchiefe that was lykely to happen to England, therfore he was come of his awne good will to do ſome good therin if he might: not ſent from the french king, but wylling to ſet ſome accorde and peace be-twene the two realmes of Englande and Fraunce, if he might.

And the Lorde Chaunceloure shortly aunswered him and sayde, syr king ye are welcome into this realme, for the king our soueregne Lorde and all we are glad to see you here: But syr, we saye that the king hath not here all his counsayle, but shortly they shall be here, and then ye shall be aunswered, and so for that time the king of Armony departed. And within foure dayes after the king remoued to his Palayce of Westmynster, and thether came to him all his counsayle, and also the king of Armony.

And when he was come into the presence of the king of Englande, and his counsayle, the king caused the king of Armony to sit by him. And there the king of Armony rehersed agayne the requestes that he made, and also shewed wisely howe that all Christendome was decayed and weakened by occasion of the warres betweene Englande and Fraunce, and how that all the knightes and squiers of both the realmes entended and prepared themselues to nothing, but alwayes to be of the one parte or the other, whereby the Empire of Constantinople leeseth, and daylie is lyke more to leese. And then he shewed, ỳ by reason of thys warre he hymselfe had lost all his realme of Armonye, and therefore desyred for Gods sake that there might be some treatie of peace had betwene the two realmes of Englande and Fraunce.

The Archebishop of Cauntorbury, who was appoynted to aunswere him, said: sir king of Armonie, it is not the maner nor neuer was seene, betwene two such enemies as the king of England, and the Frenche king are, that the king our soueregne Lord should be requyred of peace with his enemie, and he hauyng in readinesse an huge armie to enter his land. Wherefore sir, for aunswere vnto you, if it will please you to returne to the Frenche king, and to cause him and all his puyssaunce to withdraw themselues backe againe into their awne Countryes, and when euerye man is at home, if it please you to returne againe hether, then we will gladly entend to your treatie. And this was the aunswere that the king of Armonie had, and so he dyned with the king of England, and had as great honour done vnto him as could be deuised. And the king offered him many riche giftes of Golde, and siluer, but he would take none, although he had neede thereof, but onelye a Ryng to the value of a. C. Frankes, which was in English money .xl. pound or thereaboutes.

The aunswere made to the king of Armonie.

And after dinner he departed, and toke his way to Douer, and there toke leaue of such Lordes as were there, and so toke his passage and came to the french king, and shewed him howe he had bene in England, and what answer he had there. But the french king & his Uncles toke no regard to any thing that he sayde, and therefore sent him backe againe immediately into Fraunce.

The departure of the king of Armonie.

Shortly after, the Duke of Berry toke his leaue at Paris, & sayd that he would neuer enter there again vntill he had bene in England, although it appered that he thought nothing lesse. And all the way as he came, he had letters from the king, & from the Duke of Burgoyn to hast him away: But yet notwithstãding he hasted fayre & easely, and came by small iourneyes. And in this tyme the Constable of Fraunce departed from Lentringer, standyng on the sea side in Britein, with a great number of men of armes and prouision. He had .lxxij. great Shippes, and he had with him the Closure of the fielde made of Tymber. And the Constable and his companie had good winde at the begynnyng: But when they approched neere to England, the winde roſe ſo fiercely and was ſo tempeſtuous about the entrie of Mergate, & the Thamys mouth, that whether they would or not, their ſhippes were ſcattered, ſo that.xx. kept not together, and ſome were driuen perforce into Thamys, and there were taken by the Engliſhe men, and ſpecially there was taken two or three ſhippes laden with part of the Cloſure of Tymber that was ordeyned to cloſe in the fielde, and certeine maiſter Carpenters and Artificers with them, & ſo they were brought to London, wherat the king had great ioy, & ſo had all the Londoners. But the Conſtable and other Lords with much paine came to Scluſe to the french king. Of the Conſtables commyng & his companie, the french king was right ioyfull, and the king ſayd vnto hym: ſir Conſtable, when ſhall we depart, certeinly I haue great deſyre to ſee England, & therfore I pray you ſet forth all things with ſpede, for mine Uncle the Duke of Berry will be here within theſe two dayes. Sir, quoth the Conſtable, we cannot depart vntil the wind ſerue vs, & againe the tempeſt is ſore and great: Then ſaid the king, I haue bene in my veſſell vpon the ſea, & the ayre therof pleaſeth me right wel, & I beleue I ſhal be a good mariner, for the ſea did me no hurt. In the name of God, quoth the Conſtable, it hath done hurt to me, for ſir we were in great perill cõming from Britayn hether. The king demaũded how ſo? Then the Conſtable ſayd, by fortune of the ſea, and great windes that roſe againſt vs vpon ỳ frontiers of England. And ſir, we haue loſt both of our ſhips & men, for the which I am right ſory, but now there is no remedy. Thus the king and the Conſtable deuiſed in words: But ſtill the tyme paſſed away and Winter approched, and the Lords lay there in great cold and perill. The Flemyngs alſo were very loth that they ſhould returne againe through their Countrie, and ſaid among themſelues: why the deuill doth not the french king paſſe into England? what meaneth he to tary ſo long in this country? Are we not pore enough, though the French king make vs no porer? And to be ſhort, all the whole Country of Flaundyrs began to mutter and cry out vpon them,

The courage of the French king.

The cõmyng of the Duke of Berrye.

At the laſt the Duke of Berry came to Scluſe to the king, and the king ſayd vnto him. A good Uncle, I haue bene greatly deſyrous to ſee you, why haue you taried ſo long? We had bene as nowe in England, and had fought with our enemyes if ye had bene come. The Duke began to ſmile and excuſe himſelfe, but did not vtter what was in his minde. But there they reſted.vij. dayes, and euery day it was ſayde, that they ſhould depart to morowe. Howbeit, truely the wind was ſo contrary, that they could not ſayle into England. And winter was farre on, for it was paſt Saint Andrewes tyde: and it was no good ſeaſon for the Noble men to take the Sea, although diuerſe of theyr Shippes were redy croſſed to depart. But then the kinges counſaile drewe together, and the Duke of Berry brake all this purpoſe, and ſayde flatly that it was not meete to counſaile the French king beyng but a childe, to take the ſea at that ſeaſon of the yere, and alſo that the voyage was hindered of much of their proviſion that was taken into England, that went with the Conſtable of Fraunce. And moreouer he ſayde, call all the Mariners together, and looke if all they will not ſay that my counſaile is good. For though we be now xv. C. good ſaile of Shippes, yet before we come there, we ſhall not be three hundreth in companie, and therfore conſider what perill we ſhall put our ſelues in, and namely in a ſtraunge Countrie, wherein before we haue not trauayled.

nayled. And in the ende they concluded to differre that voyage vntill Aprill, or May next folowyng, and their prouisions of Bisquet, Salt, Bete, & Wine should be safely kept vntill then. And so brake vp this most wonderfull voyage for this tyme, which cost the realme of Fraunce a hundreth thousande frankes, thirtie tymes tolde (sayth Froissart) which of English money was CCC. xxxiij. thousand. CCC. xxxiij. poumde. vj. shillinges. viij. pence, after ix. frankes to the pound.

The breaking vp of thys great enterprise.

And in this yere, as sayth Fabian, the Erle of Arondell was sent into the Duchy of Guyan, for to strength such souldours as the king at that tyme had in those partes, or as some wrote, to kepe the Seas from Rouers, & enemies. The which Erle in keepyng his course and passage, met with a great fleete of Flemyngs, laden with Rochell Wine, and set vpon them, and distressed them and their shippes, and so brought them into dyuerse Portes of England. By reason whereof, the sayde Wine was so plentifull in England, that a Tonne thereof was solde for. xiij. shillinges, foure pence, and for. xx. shillinges to take the choyse. And in that fleete was taken the Admirall of Flaūdyrs, which remayned here long after as prisoner.

Ye haue heard before in the beginning of the. x. yere of this kings reigne that a great counsayle was holden at Nottyngham, and vnto the same were called the chiefe Justices and Sergeaunts at lawe, and that there was proponed certaine articles against the Lordes of the realme that were admitted by Parliament to haue the examination of suche as had beene lewde rulers, and such as had the gouernment of the kings treasure, and that the same articles, as before may at large appere, did specially touch the lyues of the sayd honorable personages, & that by the sentence and iudgement of the lawyers they were all condempned as Traytors. The which when the sayde Lordes vnderstood, they assembled themselues together and agreed for the safetie of themselues, and for the better gouernement of the realme to gather suche power as they might, and to resort vnto the king, and to admonishe hym to remoue and aduoyde from him al such lewde counsaylors as before had bene complayned vpon in Parliament, as aforesayde, and also in all humble maner to beseech his highnesse to hearken to their complaynts agaynst the sayd euill counsaylors, which not onely sought the bitter destruction of the realme, but also of his royall person.

Nottingham counsayle.

The comming of the king and his Lordes to London.

The king hering of thys assembly, came to London in Nouember, being accompanyed with all the aforesayde lewde counsaylors, and there purposed to haue holden a parliament, and to haue attaynted the aforesayde Lordes, which in the last parliament were appointed and authorised to haue the examination of suche as had consumed and made awaye the kings treasure, as aforesayde: But the king heryng of the Lords approching with a great puyssance, steyed in such sorte as that parliament went no farther. Notwithstandyng the king caused to be made, that no Citezene of London should be so hardie to sell to the Duke of Gloucester, the Erle of Arondell, or anye other the Lords, any harnesse, Bowes, Arrowes, nor any other municion or matter that should tende to the furniture of the warre, vpon a great paine.

A proclamation made by the king agaynst hys Lordes.

But this notwithstanding, the Lords with a goodly company well furnished, came to London: and before they approched neere to the Citie, they sent vnto the king the Archbishop of Cauntorbury, the Lord John Louell, the Lord Cobham, and the Lorde Iohn Eueror requiring to haue deliuered vnto them ſuch as were about him, Traytors and ſeducers both of him and the realme, and troublers both of poore men and riche, and ſuch as ſowed diſcordes and variaunces betweene the king and his nobles: And they farther declared that their comming was for the honour and wealth both of the king and the realme. But the king ruled by his fyue euill counſaylors, was perſwaded that the Lordes intended to bring him vnder: Therefore they gaue him coũſayle to make the king of Fraunce ſure friend vnto him in theſe great neceſſities, and for to be more in quiet, to giue him the Towne and Marches of Calice, and whatſoeuer he had elſe beyond the Seas, and ſo to call in the french king to chaſtiſe his enimies, and thoſe Lordes that neuer would be tamed. And immediatly the king ſent for the Maior of London, and demaunded of him how many hable men he ſuppoſed that the Citie coulde make? And he aunſwered that he thought ſurely within an howre to haue fiftie thouſand, well then ſayd the king, go and proue what will be done. And after the Maior beganne to attempt the matter, the Citezens aunſwered with one voyce, that they would neuer fight agaynſt the kings friendes and defenders of the realme: But agaynſt the kings enemies, and the enemies of the realme they would alway be readie, which anſwere the Maior reported to the king. At this time alſo was about the king the Lord Rauſe Baſſet, which ſayde franckly to the king, ſyr I haue bene and ſhall be your true liege man, and my bodye and goods ſhall alway be yours in all iuſtice and truth: But of thys I aſſure you, if it fortune me to come into the field, vndoubtedly I will alway folow the true part, and it is not I that intend to aduenture the breaking of my head for the Duke of Ireland. Alſo at the ſame tyme was the Erle of Northumberland with the king, which ſayd vnto him, ſyr no doubts therof, but theſe Lords which now be in the field, alway haue bene your true and faithfull ſubiects and yet be, and entend not to do or attempt any thing againſt your eſtate, wealth and honor: But they feele themſelues ſorowfully greeued by the wicked imagination and falſe oppreſſion of certayne perſons which are about you. And ſyr, without fayle all your realme is ſore mooued therewith, and that both great and ſmall, as well your nobles as your commons. And I ſee none other but they entend to aduenture their lyues with the Lords, ſpecially in this caſe, which they doe recon yours & your realmes. And ſyr, now ye be in the chiefe place of your realme, and in the place of your coronation, nowe order your ſelfe wiſely and like a king, and ſend vnto them to come into your preſence in ſome open place, and there will them to declare vnto you the entent of their comming with ſo great a number to theſe parts, and I doubt not, but they will ſhewe ſuche reaſons, that you ſhall haue them excuſed.

The Archebiſhop of Cauntorbury and Biſhop of Ely Chauncelor, and other Biſhops there preſent, affirmed the Erles aduiſe to be good, and the king conſidering wiſely the caſe as it ſtoode, appeaſed himſelfe, and accorded to their aduiſe, and deſyred the Archbiſhop of Cauntorbury and the Biſhop of Ely to aduertiſe them of his pleaſure, which was: that he willed them to come vnto him to Weſtmynſter the Sunday folowyng, and ſo they tooke their leaue of him and returned vnto the Lordes, and made vnto them relacion of all the kings minde. were so stiffe in their matter that they swore all wholy that they woulde neuer leaue of as long as they had one penny to maintaine their cause. And if any of them happened to die, the ouer lyuers should doe the same vntill the time that this matter were brought to good effect: And because they were in doubt that the king by his sinister counsayle should stirre the City of London agaynst them, they first determyned to certefie the Maior and the Citie that their comming was for reformations of great and enorme causes, which they declared vnto the sayd Maior and Citezens in writing, and desired their fauours and counsayle therein. And this done, they farther determyned to kepe their daye on the Sundaye followyng to come to the kinges presence. And according to the same appointment the sayde Lordes came into the Hall at Westmynster. But before their comming thether, they sent certaine persons to serche both the Hewes, and also the Archebishop of Yorkes place, if percase any man had bene layde there to betrap them. For it was shewed vnto them that in those places there should be some treason wrought against them. And when they perceyued that all was cleere, they went forth on their way. And when they entred into Westminster hall, and had sight of the king, they made vnto him humble obeysaunce, and so went they forth vntill they came to the nether step going vp to the kings seat of estate, where they made their second obeysaunce, and then the king made them a countenaunce to come nere vnto him, and they so did, kneeling downe before hym. And he forthwith arose from his place, and louingly welcommed them, and tooke eche of them by the hand, and that done set him downe againe. There they declared vnto him that their comming was for none euil to his person that euer they imagined or thought: But the cause of their griefe was against the fiue Traytors which were about his person, and suche matters as they had to charge them was there ready in writing, which they deliuered vnto the king. There the king openly promised them that they should appere personally at the parliament, and that none of them shoulde haue of him pardon without the assent of the Lordes, if they had offended according to their accusations, And then forthwith the king arose from his place, and led them to his chamber, and after that he had dronken with them, they departed. And for as much as it should be well knowne throughout all the Citie that these Lordes had nothing offended him with their comming, the king caused a proclamation to be made, the effect wherof was as foloweth.

RIchard by the grace of God. &c. We will that it be knowen to all our liege people throughout our Realme of England: That where as Thomas Duke of Glouceſter, Richard Erle of Arondell, and Thomas Erle of Warwike haue bene defamed of Treason by certeyne of our counsaylors: We, as it appertaineth, diligently searching the cause and ground of this defamation, finde no such thing in them, nor any suspicion thereof. Wherefore we declare the same defamation to be false and vntrue, and do receyue the same Duke and Erles into our speciall protection. And because their accusers shall be notoriously knowen, their names are Alexāder Archbishop of Yorke, sir Lionel Uere (but in the boke of statutes he is called sir Robert Uere) Duke of Ireland, Michell de la Poole Erle of Suffolke, Robert Tresilian chiefe Iustice of Englande, and Nicholas Brimbre of London knight: Who in likewise shall remaine vnto the nert Parliament, and there shall stande to their aunſwere, but in the meane time we take them into our protection, ſtreightly charging and commaũdyng that no maner of perſon charge any of the aforenamed, eyther openly or priuily, neyther in worde nor deede to hurt them, or cauſe any hurt to be done vnto them, but all querels and demaundes againſt them to be remitted vnto the next Parliament prefixed.

The accuſers are in great feare.

Then came the wicked counſaylours to the king, ſhewyng to him that they were dayly in daunger of their lyues by the great Lordes of the realme, and ſaw none other but dayly they ſhould be in more, for ỳ the king had promiſed that they ſhould apere at the next Parliament, which was at hand, and ſayde alſo that all the diſpleaſure that they had, was onelye for the Kinges ſake, and not for any matter of their awne, and that it was not his honour to ſee them ſo entreated: And further, they ſayde, that they neyther durſt nor would put their bodies to ſo manifeſt a daunger as to appere in Parliament.

The euill Counſaylors ſpe.

The king conſideryng this, withdrew himſelfe from the counſaile of hys Lordes, which then were aſſigned to ſit at London for matters of the Parliament: So that Counſaile which was ordeyned for the purpoſe to haue the Parliament, was delayed and layd aſyde. And theſe falſe counſaylours fled from the king into dyuers partes. And among other, Mighell de la Poole Erle of Suffolke fled into Calice, and as it was then ſayde, he had ſhauen off the heare of his heade, and came in lyke a Poulter to the Gates of the Caſtell of Calice to ſell his Capons, where as his brother was Capitain: and anone he was knowne, and taken, and brought to William Beauchampe his brother Capiteyne of Calice, who foorthwith brought him into England to the king. But the king was not a little diſpleaſed with his brother for taking and bringyng of him, and therefore committed him to warde. But afterward he ſet him againe at libertie, for that it ſhould not appere that he puniſhed him for that cauſe, and ſo he returned to Calice, & kept his place. Yet Mighell de la Poole, fearing ſtill the diſpleaſure of the great Lordes would not tary, but toke his leaue of the king and departed from hũ. And the king beyng now deſtitute of the ſayde Chauncelor, and alſo of the Duke of Ireland, was nothing contented in his mynde: But foorthwith ſent for the ſayde Duke of Ireland to come to him. And alſo he ſent one Thomas Molyners, which was a man of great power in the Counties of Lancaſhire and Cheſſhire, and by hũ the king ſent to the Shirife of Cheſter a Commiſſion vnder a ſecrete ſeale, commaundyng him that he ſhoulde arreyſe a great power, and that they ſhould ſee the Kinges kinſman and eſpeciall friend the Duke of Ireland conueyed in ſafetie to his preſence, not lettyng for any labour or expenſes. Then this Molyners reyſed a great power, and ſuche as for the loue they bare vnto the Duke of Glouceſter, and to the other Lordes, would not go with him, he did empriſon them in dyuerſe priſons, commaundyng the Jaylours to kepe them ſtrept in Irons, and to geue them bread and water, and ſome day water onely, vntill his returne againe. The king alſo commaunded Sir Raufe Vernon, and ſir Raufe Ratcliffe to aſſiſt them: And ſo they ſet foorth toward the king, and they were in number aboue fiue thouſand men. Wherof when the Duke of Glouceſter had knowledge, he and the Erle of Darbie, the Erle of Arondell, the Erle of Warwike, and the Erle of Nottyngham aſſembled their powers out of all quarters, to ayde and aſſiſt them with all ſpeede againſt theſe oppreſſors of the Commons, and of the Realme, Realme, for feare least the honour of the Realme of Englande should be by them troden vnder foote.

The Duke of Irelande hauyng in his company Molyners, Vernon, and Ratcliffe, with a power of fiue thousand men, as afore sayde, came still forward vntill he came to Radcocke Bridge, not passyng foure myles from Cheppyng Norton: and if he had passed the same bridge, he had bene sure out of the daunger of his enemyes. But when he came thether, he founde it kept by the Erle of Darbyes folkes, which had broken the bridge, and so stopt his passage: And within a little way therof lay the Erle of Darby himselfe with a great company. But after the Duke of Irelande had knowledge of the Erles beyng there, he stayed and caused the kinges Banner to be displayed, and with a mery countenaunce he exhorted his company to quite themselues valiauntly, and he caused his Trompettes to sound: howbeit, there apeared vnto him, that as some were willyng to fight on his part, so there were other that clerely forsooke him, and sayde they woulde not fight agaynst so manye Noble men, nor in so vniust a cause. The Duke of Irelande espiyng this, gaue his horse the spurres, and roade forwarde, thinking to haue passed the Bridge: But when he came thether and sawe the Bridge broken, he sayde with open voyce, we are decepued, and turned his horse and alighted, and gate him vpon an other Courser, myndyng to haue fled ouer the Thamys: But there met him the Duke of Glouceſter, with his companie. And when he sawe that he was enclosed amongest his enemies on the one syde, and the Riuer of Thamys on the other syde, and also the Erle of Darby to preasse on him so fast for to haue taken him, he thought to put all to hazard, and cast away his Gauntlets, and his swoorde to make him the lighter, and gaue hys horse the spurres, and tooke the riuer, and so escaped all his enemyes. And the next newes that was heard of him, was, that he was slaine in Louaine in huntyng of a wilde Boare, in the yere of our Lorde. 1393. and in the .xvj. yere of the reigne of king Richarde the seconde. But when king Richarde heard of his death, he tooke it meruey lous heauily, and to shew the great affection that he bare vnto him, he commaunded that his dead carkasse should be brought from Louayn into England, and to be conueied with all solempne funerall pompe to the Priorie of Colney in Esser, and caused him to be layde in a Coffin of Cypresse, and to be adourned with princely garmentes, and his face vncouered, and garnished with a Chaine of Golde, and riche ringes put on his fingers. And the king himselfe was at his buryall accompanied with the Dukes mother, and with one Archebishop, and sundrie other Bishops: But of Noble men, there were verye fewe, for they had conceyued suche hatred agaynst him, that they vtterly contemned him. But to returne where we left: After the Duke was fled, as afore sayde, Thomas Molyners woulde haue folowed him also, but the Lorde Mortimer drewe him backe and there killed him. Then the Lordes armye set vpon the people that came with the Duke out of Chesshire, Lancashire, and Wales, and toke them as enemies, and spoyled them of their horse, harnesse, Bowe, and Arrowes, and so sent them home without doyng of them any more harme.
